Rushworth observes, That these Speeches, and some others, concerning Grievances, did so convince the rest of the house, that when a question was put relating to any considerable grievance, not one member offered to put a negative upon it. In consequence of the Resolution of the house, 'That no Monopolist or Patentee should be allowed to sit in that house,' several were turned out accordingly, and new writs were ordered for electing others in their stead. See p. 651.

Dec. 1. A long Report is entered from the Committee of Inquiry after Papists, &c. all tending as evidence against secretary Windbank. In the end it was ordered, "That he should, the next day, give Answer to such questions as should be put to him, upon several informations delivered in here against him; and he, in the mean time, to have notice of it."

Resolutions against Ship-Money.] Dec. 7. A Report was made by Mr. St. John from the committee appointed to examine into the legality of Ship-Money; which ended, the house came to the following Resolutions upon it:—
"Resolved, upon the question, nullo contradicente, 1. That the charge imposed upon the subjects for the providing and furnishing of Ships, and the assessments for raising of Money for that purpose, commonly called Ship-Money, are against the laws of the realm, and the subjects' right of property, contrary to former Resolutions of parliament, and to the Petition of Right. 2. That the extrajudicial Opinions of the Judges, published in the Star-Chamber, and enrolled in the courts of Westminster, [] in the whole and every part of them, are against the laws of the realm, the right of property, the liberty of the subject, contrary to former Resolutions of parliament, and to the Petition of Right. 3. That all the writs, commonly called Ship-Writs, the judg ment in the Exchequer, in Mr. Mampden's Case, in the matter and substance thereof, that he was anywise chargeable thereby, is against the laws of the realm, &c."—A committee was then appointed to go forthwith to the several Judges, to know how they were solicited or threatened, in what manner, and by whom, to give any opinion or judgment concerning Ship-Money; and, lastly, to acquaint the Judges with what had been voted this day concerning it.

Two Subsidies granted.] Dec. 10. The way for raising 100,000*l.* for the Relief of the King's Army and the Northern counties, was debated; when, after many speeches, the house resolved, That two Subsidies should be granted, instead of the sum aforesaid; and, the next day, a bill was ordered in accordingly.

Petition of the City of London against Bishops, &c.] Dec. 11. A Petition from the city of London, signed by 15,000 citizens, was presented to the commons by alderman Pennington, attended by some hundreds of people, and was as follows:

"That whereas the government of archbishops and lord bishops, deans and archdeacons, &c. with their courts and ministrations in them, hath proved prejudicial and very dangerous both to the church and commonwealth; they themselves having formerly held, that they have their jurisdiction or authority of human authority, till of these later times, being further pressed about the unlawfulness thereof, they have claimed their calling immediately from the Lord Jesus Christ; which is against the laws of this kingdom, and derogatory to his majesty and his state royal: and whereas the said government is found, by woful experience, to be a main cause and occasion of many foul evils, pressures, and grievances of a very high nature unto his majesty's subjects, in their consciences, liberties, and estate; as in a schedule of particulars, hereunto annexed, may in part appear: we therefore most humbly pray and beseech this honourable assembly, the premises considered, that the said government, with all its dependences, roots, and branches, may be abolished, and all laws in their behalf made void, and the government, according to God's word, may be rightly placed among us; and we your humble suppliants, as in duty we are bound, will daily pray for his majesty's long and happy reign over us, and for the prosperous success of this high and honourable court of parliament:

A Particular of the manifold EVILS, PRESSURES and GRIEVANCES, caused, practised, and occasioned by the PRELATES and their DEPENDENTS.

I. "The subjecting and intralling all ministers under them and their authority, and so by degrees, exempting of them from the temporal power; whence follows, II. The faint-heartedness of ministers to preach the truths of God, lest they should displease the prelates; as, namely, the doctrine of Predestination, of free Grace, of Perseverance, of original Sin remaining after Baptism, of the Sabbath, the doctrine against universal Grace, Election for Faith foreseen, Free-will, against Antichrist, Nonresidents, human Inventions in God's Worship; all which are generally withheld from the people's knowledge, because not relishing to the bishops. III. The encouragement of ministers to despise the temporal magistracy, the nobles and gentry of the land: to abuse the subjects, and live contentiously with their neighbours, knowing that they, being the bishop's creatures, shall be supported. IV. The restraint of many godly and able men from the ministry, and thrusting out of many congregations their faithful, diligent, and powerful ministers, who lived peaceably with them, and did them good; only because they cannot, in conscience, submit unto and maintain the bishops' needless devices; nay, sometimes, for no other cause, but for their zeal in preaching, or their great auditories. V. The suppressing of that godly design, set on foot by certain saints, and sugared with many great gifts by sundry well-affected persons, for the buying of Improprations, and placing of able ministers in them; maintaining of Lectures, and founding of Free-Schools; which the prelates could not endure, lest it should darken their glories, and draw the ministers from their dependence upon them. VI. The great increase of idle, lewd and dissolute, ignorant and erroneous men in the ministry, which swarm, like the locusts of Egypt, over the whole kingdom; and will they but wear a canonical coat, a surplice, a hood, bow at the name of Jesus, and be zealous in superstitious ceremonies, they may live as they list, confront whom they please, preach and vent what errors they will, and neglect preaching at their pleasure, without controul. VII. The discouragement of many from bringing up their children in learning; the many schisms, errors, and strange opinions which are in the church; great corruptions which are in the universities; the gross and lamentable ignorance, almost every where, among the people; the want of preaching ministers in very many places both of England and Wales; the loathing of the ministry; and the general defection into all manner of prophaneness. VIII. The swarming of lascivious, idle, and unprofitable Books and Pamphlets, Play-Books and Ballads; as, namely, 'Ovid's Art of Love;' 'The Parliament of Women,' which came out at the dissolving of the last parliament; Barnes's Poems; Parker's Ballads, all in disgrace of religion, to the increase of all vice, and withdrawing of people from reading, studying, and hearing the word of God, and other good books. IX. The hindering of godly Books to be printed, the blotting out of, or perverting in, those which they allow to be printed, all or most of that which strikes either at Popery or Arminianism; the adding of what or where pleaseth them; and the restraints of reprinting books, formerly licensed, without relicensing. X. The publishing and vending of Popish, Arminian, and other dangerous books and tenets; as, namely, That the church of Rome is a true church, and, in the worst times, never erred in fundamentals; that the subjects have no property in their estates, but that the king may take from them what he pleaseth; that all is the king's, and that he is bound by no law, and many other; from the former whereof hath sprung, XI. The Growth of Popery, and increase of Papists, Priests, and Jesuits, in sundry places, but especially about London, since the Reformation; the frequent vending of crucifixes and Popish pictures, both engraven and printed, and the placing of such in Bibles. XII. The multitude of Monopolies and Patents, drawing with them innumerable perjuries; the large increase of Customs and Impositions upon Commodities; the Ship-Money, and many other great burthens upon the commonwealth, under which we all groan. XIII. Moreover, the Offices and Jurisdictions of archbishops, lord bishops, deans, archdeacons, being the same way of church government which is in the Romish church, and which was in England in the time of popery; little change thereof being made, except only the head from whence it was derived; the same arguments supporting the Pope, which do uphold the prelates; and overthrowing the prelates, which do pull down the Pope; and other reformed churches having, upon their rejection of the Pope, cast the prelates out also as members of the Beast: Hence it is, that the prelates here in England, by themselves or their disciples, plead and maintain, that the Pope is not antichrist, and that the church of Rome is a true church, hath not erred in fundamental points, and that salvation is attainable in that religion; and therefore have restrained to pray for the conversion of our sovereign lady the queen. Hence also hath come, XIV. The great Conformity and Likeness, both continued and increased, of our church to the church of Rome, in vestures, postures, ceremonies, and administrations; namely, as the bishops rockets, and the lawn sleeves, the four-cornered cap, the cope and surplice, the tippet, the hood, and the canonical coat, the pulpits clothed, especially now of late, with the jesuits badge upon them every way. XV. The standing up at Gloria Patri, and at reading the Gospel, praying towards the East, the bowing at the name of Jesus, the bowing to the altar towards the East, cross in baptism, the kneeling at the communion. XVI. The turning of the communion-table altar-wise; setting images, crucifixes, and conceits over them, and tapers and books upon them, and bowing and adoring to or before them; the reading of the second service at the altar, and forcing people to come up thither to receive, or else denying the sacrament to them; terming the altar to be the mercy-seat, or the place of God Almighty in the church; which is a plain device to usher in the mass. XVII. The christening and consecrating of churches and chapels, the consecrating fonts, pulpits, tables, chalices, church-

yards, and many other things, and putting holiness in them; yea, reconsecrating upon pretended pollution, as though every thing were unclean without their consecrating; and, for want of this, sundry churches have been interdicted, and kept from use as polluted. XVIII. The Liturgy, for the most part, is framed out of the Romish Breviary, Ritual, and Mass-Book; also the Book of Ordination for archbishops and ministers, framed out of the Roman pontifical. XIX. The multitude of Canons formerly made; wherein, among other things, excommunication, ipso facto, is denounced for speaking of a word against the devices aforesaid, or subscription thereunto; though no law enjoined a restraint from the ministry without such subscription, and appeal is denied to any that should refuse subscription or unlawful conformity, though he be never so much wronged by the inferior judge; also the Canons made in the late sacred synod, as they call it, wherein are many strange and dangerous devices to undermine the Gospel, and the subjects liberties; to propagate Popery; to spoil God's people; to ensnare ministers and other students; and so to draw all into an absolute subjection and thralldom to them and their government, despoiling both the king and the parliament of their power. XX. The countenancing Plurality of Benefices; prohibiting of Marriages, without their license, at certain times, almost half the year; and licensing of marriages without banns asked. XXI. Profanation of the Lord's Day, pleading for it, and enjoining ministers to read a Declaration, set forth, as it is thought, by their procurement, for tolerating of sports upon that day; suspending and depriving many godly ministers for not reading the same only out of conscience, because it was against the law of God so to do, and no law of the land to enforce it. XXII. The pressing of the strict observation of Saints Days, whereby great sums of money are drawn out of men's purses for working on them; a very high burthen on most people, who, getting their living by their daily employments, must either omit them and be idle, or part with their money, whereby many poor families are undone, or brought behind-hand; yea, many church-wardens are sued, or threatened to be sued, by their troublesome ministers, as perjured persons, for not presenting their parishioners who failed in observing holy-days. XXIII. The great increase and frequency of Whoredoms and Adulteries, occasioned by the prelates corrupt administration of justice, in such cases; who taking upon them the punishment of it, do turn all into monies for the filling of their purses; and, lest their officers should defraud them of their gain, they have, in their late Canon, instead of remedying these vices, decreed, that the commutation of penance shall not be without the bishop's privy. XXIV. The general abuse of that great ordinance of Excommunication, which God hath left in his church to be used as the last and greatest punishment the church an inflict upon obstinate and great offenders; and the prelates and their officers, who, of right, have nothing to do with it, do daily excommunicate men either for doing that which is lawful, or for vain, idle, and trivial matters; as working or opening a shop on a holy-day; or not appearing, at every beck, upon their summons; not paying a fee, or the like; yea, they have made it, as they do all other things, a hook or instrument wherewith to empty men's purses, and to advance their own greatness; and so that sacred ordinance of God, by their perverting of it, becomes contemptible to all men, and seldom or never used against notorious offenders; who, for the most part, are their favourites. XXV. Yea further, the pride and ambition of the prelates being boundless, unwilling to be subject to either man or laws, they claim their office and jurisdiction to be as divine; exercise ecclesiastical authority in their own names and rights, and under their own seals; and take upon them temporal dignities, places and offices in the commonwealth, that they may sway both swords. XXVI. Hence follow the taking commissions in their own courts and consistories, and where else; sit in matters determinable of right of common law; the putting of ministers upon parishes, without the patrons and people's consent. XXVII. The imposing of Oaths of various and trivial articles yearly upon churchwardens, and sides-men, which cannot be observed without perjury; unless they fall at jars continually with their ministers and neighbours, and wholly neglect their own calling. XXVIII. The exercising the oath ex officio, and other proceedings, by way of imposition, reaching even to men's thoughts; the apprehending, and detaining of men by pursuivants; the frequent suspending and degrading of ministers; fining and imprisoning of the commons of people; breaking up of men's houses and studies; taking away men's books, letters, and other writings; seizing upon their estates, removing them from their callings; separating between them and their wives against both their wills; the rejecting of probations with threatnings; and the doing of many other outrages; to the utter infringing the laws of the realm, and the subjects and liberties, and ruining of them and their families; and, of latter time, the Judges of the Bench are so awed with the power and greatness of the prelates, and other ways promoted, that neither Prohibition, Habeas Corpus, or any other lawful remedy can be had, or take place, for the distressed subjects in most cases; only Papists, Jesuites, Priests, and such others as propagate Popery or Arminianism, are countenanced, spared, and have much liberty; and from hence hath followed, amongst others, these dangerous consequences, 1. The general Hope and Expectation of the Romish party, that their superstitious religion will, ere long, be fully planted in this kingdom again; and so they are encouraged to persist therein, and to practise the same openly in divers places; to the high dishonour of God, and contrary to the laws of the realm. 2. The Discouragement and Destruction of all good subjects; of whom multitudes, both clothiers, merchants, and others, being deprived of their ministers, and over-burthened with these pressures, have departed the kingdom to Holland, and other parts; and have drawn with them a great part of the manufacture of cloth and trading out of the land into other places, where they reside; whereby wool, the great staple of the kingdom, is become of small value and vends not; trading is decayed; many poor people want work; seamen lose employment; and the whole land much impoverished, to the great dishonour of this kingdom, and blemishment to the government thereof. 3. The present wars and commotions between his majesty and his subjects of Scotland; wherein his majesty and all his kingdom are endangered, and suffer greatly, and are like to become a prey to the common enemy, in case the wars go on; which we exceedingly fear will not only go on, but also increase to an utter ruin of all, unless the prelates with their dependencies be removed out of England; and also they and their practices, who, as we, under your honours' favour, do verily believe and conceive, have occasioned the quarrel. All which we humbly refer to the consideration of this honourable assembly, desiring the Lord of Heaven to direct you in the right way to redress all these evils."

The attack made upon episcopal jurisdiction did not stop here; for the commons not only censured the whole body of the established church, but severely punished, by imprisonment, or otherwise, several particular members of it. The Journals are full of the names of delinquents sent for and imprisoned, fined, &c. for carrying on, in their several cures, superstition and idolatry, as it is there called; such as bowing to the Altar, setting of the table altar-wise, with rails about it; for putting J. H. S. on the communion-cloth, painting images in churches, and the like.

Dec. 14. The Treasurer of the Household was intreated to acquaint his majesty with the great care and affection of this house to advance and settle his revenue; and, for that purpose, do humbly desire his majesty that he will give them leave to enter into the debate of his revenue and exchequer.

The commons entered into debate concerning the New Canons made by the late convocation. Sir E. Dering, Sir Benj. Rudyard, and Mr. Nathaniel Piennes, spoke warmly against them: but as these speeches are long and tedious, and as the principal arguments therein have been fully argued in the foregoing debates on Grievances, we purposely omit them.

Resolution against the Canons lately made by the Convocation. Dec. 15. After a long debate on the Canons, it was resolved, upon the question, nullo contradicente, 1. "That the Clergy of England, convented in any Convocation, or Synod, or otherwise, have no power to make any constitutions, canons, or acts whatsoever, in matter of doctrine, discipline, or otherwise, to bind the clergy or the laity of this land, without common consent of parliament." 2. "That the several Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, treated upon by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, presidents of the respective convocations for those provinces, with the rest of the bishops and clergy, and agreed on, with the king's licence, in their several synods, begun at London and York, do not bind the clergy or laity of this land, or either of them."

Dec. 16. It was further resolved, 1. "That the Canons and Constitutions do contain in them many matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of this realm, to the right of parliaments, to the property and liberty of the subjects, and are matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence." 2. "That the several grants of Benevolence, and Contribution granted to his majesty, by the clergy of the provinces of Canterbury and York, in the several convocations, or synods, holden at London and York, in 1640, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy."

A committee was appointed to prepare the several votes, concerning the new Canons, and to make them ready for this house to present to the lords; and to examine and consider who were the promoters of these new Canons, and who the principal actors; and what execution has been made upon them, and by whom; and to consider how far, in particular, the lord abp. of Canterbury has been an actor in all the proceedings of them; and further to examine how far he has been an actor in the great design of the subversion of the laws of the realm, and of the religion; and to prepare and draw up a Charge against him and such others as shall appear offenders in these particulars. To have power to send for persons, papers, records, books, and witnesses, and to do any other act which they, in their judgments, think fit.

Dec. 17. The Treasurer of the Household informed the house, "That the king, being acquainted by him with the great care and affection of the commons, to advance and settle his majesty's Revenue, doth very graciously interpret the same; and had commended him to give the house thanks for it in his name. That his majesty doth give the house free leave to enter into the debate of his Revenues and Expences, as is desired; and hath given orders, that all his officers and ministers, from time to time, shall assist the house therein, as occasion shall be."

The late Breaches of Parliamentary Privileges inquired into.] Dec. 18. A committee was appointed to take into consideration the Breaches of Parliamentary Privileges, both in the last parliament, and in that of Stio Caroli; and, especially, the proceedings against Mr. Hollis, Sir Peter Hayman, Mr. Strode, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Seldon, Mr. Walter Long, Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, Mr. Crew, Mr.

Bellasisse, Sir John Hotham, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Pym, and Sir Walter Erle, members of either the last parl. or that of Stio Caroli. And they are likewise to consider what reparations are fit to be granted to the parties grieved; and to think of some course to prevent the like hereafter; but the committee is first to inquire after, and to consider of the Breaches of Parliament, Stio Caroli, and report them to the house.

Dr. Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, charged with High Treason.] It was resolved upon the question, "That a Message be sent to the lords, to accuse Wm. Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, of High Treason, in the name of this house, and of all the commons of England; and to desire that he may be forthwith sequestered from parliament, and be committed. That, within some convenient time, this house will resort to their lordships with particular accusations and Articles against him." Mr. Hollis was appointed to go up to the lords with this message; who, soon after returning, reported, "That he had delivered it; and that the lord keeper told him the lords had considered of the message, and, accordingly, had sequestered the archbishop from the house, and committed him to the custody of their gentleman usher."—In the Journals of the Lords there is nothing more particular relating to this affair, except, "That when the archbishop was accused there, as is said, he desired leave to speak, and dropped some unguarded expressions, which he afterwards begged to recant, but was refused. He then desired leave to go to his house to fetch some papers that might enable him to make his defence, which the house granted, provided he did nothing but in sight of the gentleman usher, in whose custody he was ordered to remain."

On this occasion, we find a speech made by Mr. Grimston. The trial at large of the archbishop being printed singly, and also in the State Trials, we shall pass it over cursorily; but shall nevertheless give this speech, because it exhibits, by way of abstract, the whole accusation against that prelate.

Mr. Grimston said:—"Mr. Speaker; That hath been presented to the house a most faithful and exact report of the conference we had with the lords yesterday, together with the opinion of the committees that we employed in the service, that they conceived it fit, that the abp. of Canterbury should be sequestered, and I must second the motion: and, with the favour of this house, I shall be bold to offer my reasons, why I conceive it more necessary we should proceed a little further than the desire of a bare sequestration only.—Mr. Speaker, long introductions are not suitable to weighty businesses: we are now fallen upon the gentleman, the abp. of Canterbury. Look upon him as he is in highness, and he is the sty of a pestilential filth, that hath infected the state and government of this commonwealth: look upon him in his dependences, and he is the man, the only man, that hath raised and advanced all those that, together with himself, have been the authors and causers of all the ruins, miseries, and calamities we now groan under. Who is it but he, only, that hath brought the earl of Strafford to all his great places and employments? A fit spirit and instrument to act and execute all his wicked and bloody designs in these kingdoms. Who is it but he, only, that brought in secretary Windebank into that place of trust; the very broker and pander to the whore of Babylon? Who is it, Mr. Speaker, but he, only, that hath advanced all our Popish bishops? I shall name but some of them; bishop Manwaring,* the bishop of Bath and Wells,† the bishop of Oxford,‡ and bishop Wren,|| the least of all these birds, but one of the most unclean ones. These are the men that should have fed Christ's flock; but they are the wolves that have devoured them; the sheep should have fed upon the mountains, but the mountains have eaten up the sheep. It was the happiness of our church, when the zeal of God's house eat up the bishops, glorious and brave martyrs, that went to the stake in defence of the Protestant religion; but the zeal of our bishops hath been only to persecute and eat up the church. Who is it, Mr. Speaker, but this great archbishop of Canterbury, that hath sitten at the helm, to steer and to manage all the unlawful projects that have been set on foot in this kingdom these ten years last past? And rather than he would stand out, he hath most unworthily trucked and chafered in the meanest of them; as for instance, that of Tobacco, whereia thousands of poor people have been stripped and turned out of their trades, for which they have served as apprentices: we all know he was the compounder and contractor with them for the licences, putting them to pay fines, and a fee-farm rent to use their trade. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, he might have spent his time much better, and more for his grace in the pulpit, then thus sharking and raking in the Tobacco-shops. Mr. Speaker, we all know what he hath been charged with here in this house; crimes of a dangerous consequence, and of a transcendent nature; no less than the subversion of the government of this kingdom, and the alteration of the Protestant religion; and this not upon a bare information only, but much of it is come before us already upon clear and manifest proof; and there is scarce any grievance or complaint come before us in this place, wherein we do not find him intermentioned, and, as it were, twisted into it; like a bony angry wasp, his sting in the tail of every thing: we have likewise, this day, heard, in the report of the conference of yesterday, the accusation which the Scots nation hath charged him withal; and we do all know he is guilty of the same, if not more, here in this kingdom. Mr. Speaker, he hath been the great and common enemy of all goodness and good men; and it is not safe that such a viper should be near his maj.'s person, to distil his poison into his sacred ears; nor is it safe for the commonwealth, that he sit in so eminent a place of government, being thus accused: we know what we did in the earl of Strafford's case: this man is the corrupt fountain that hath infected all the streams, and till the fountain be purged, we can never expect or hope to have clear channels. I shall be, therefore, bold to offer my opinion, and, if I err, it is the error of my judgment, and not my want of zeal and affection to the public good. I conceive it is most necessary and fit, that we should now take up a resolution to do somewhat; to strike while the iron is hot; and to go up to the lords in the names of the commons of this house, and in the names of the commons of England, and to accuse him of High Treason; and to desire their lordships his person may be sequestered, that, in convenient time, we may bring up his Charge.'

Informations against Dr. Wren, Bp. of Ely. Dec. 19. It was ordered, "That a message should be sent to the lords, to acquaint them, that there are certain Informations of a high nature, in their house, against Dr. Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, concerning the setting up of Idolatry and Superstition, in divers places, and exercising some acts of it in his own person; with divers other matters of great importance; and that they have information likewise, that he endeavours an escape: therefore they desire their lordships that there may be some care taken, that he may give good security to abide the judgment of parliament." Mr. Hampden went up with this message, to whom the lord keeper returned this Answer, 'That their lordships had ordered the bishop of Ely to give bail for 10,000*l.* to stand the judgment of parliament.'

Secretary Windebank flies the Kingdom. This parliament of inquisition, as Saunderson calls it, began now to look terrible to all that lodged but under a suspicion of guilt; but insufferable to those whose consciences condemned themselves. Sir Francis Windebank, secretary of state, was said to be one of the latter; who, observing a storm rising strongly against him, by some votes in the house, about the beginning of December, thought proper to withdraw himself to a place of greater safety, and fled into France.

Articles against Secretary Windebank. The Articles against him were ready drawn up, and the crimes he was accused of were as follows:—
 "1. Seventy-four Letters of Grace to Recusants, within these 4 years, signed by his own hand.
 2. Sixty-four Priests in the Gatehouse, within these 4 years discharged, for the most part, by him.
 3. Twenty-nine discharged by his verbal order.
 4. A Warrant to protect one Muffon, a condemned Priest, and all the houses he frequented.
 5. One committed by the king's own hand, and discharged by him, without signification of the king's pleasure therein.
 6. A Petition of St. Giles in the fields, near London, to the king, of the Increase of Popery in their parish, wherein 21 persons were seduced and turned by two priests, the which priests were both discharged by him."

* Bishop of St. Davids'. † Dr. Wm. Piers.

Secretary Windebank's Vindication of himself in a Letter to the Earl of Pembroke. From Calais this unfortunate statesman wrote the following letter to Philip earl of Pembroke, then lord great chamberlain of England; which, though not strictly parliamentary, may well claim a place in this history. It was in these words:—"My lord; I owe myself to your lordship for your late favours, and therefore much more the account of myself; though the debt, in either respect, be of little consideration, and the cancelling of both may be of greater advantage to you than to continue the obligation.—This account had been presented to your lordship at my first arrival here with my first dispatches, but I was so mortified with my hazardous passage in an open shallop, and so perplexed with the thoughts of miseries, into which I find myself plunged; and besides, the departure of the messenger that carried those letters, was so sudden, that it was not possible to perform this duty to your lordship sooner; for the which I do most humbly crave pardon. Your lordship may now please to accept the expressions, from the saddest and most wounded soul in the whole world, who am a spectacle of misery in myself, in my distressed wife and children, and in my whole fortunes; who have left the attending of my sovereign and master, and access to the best prince in the world; who am become a scorn and by-word to all the world, both at home and abroad; a wanderer, an exile from my own country, now in the declination of my years, and likely to end my days in a remote country, far from the comfort of all my friends.—What I am guilty of none knows so well as his majesty, whom I have served faithfully, diligently, and with as true and loyal a heart, according to my poor abilities, as any other whatsoever; and if I found my conscience charged with any crime of baseness, corruption, infidelity, or any thing else unworthy of a gentleman, I should not venture to address these complaints to your lordship, or to any other person of honour.—In this disconsolate estate, being an object not altogether unworthy of your lordship's compassion, be it for no other respect, but that I have long served the king and queen's majesties, I doubt not but your lordship, in your generosity and goodness, will have a lively sense and feeling of my sufferings, and vouchsafe me such relief as in your honour you may; and if myself, who, by course of nature, cannot be now of long continuance, be not considerable, I must beseech your lordship to have pity upon my poor innocent wife and children, that they receive such comfort and assistance from you in my absence, that they may be preserved from perishing. And to that end I most humbly crave your lordship's favour to this bearer, my son, and to give him the honour of access whenever he shall make his addresses to you; wherein you shall do a work of singular charity.—Now, because there is an opinion in the world, that I have much improved my fortune by the Roman party, and that there hath been a design, by my ministry, to introduce popery into England, I shall humbly crave your lordship's patience in giving me leave to clear these two great misunderstandings; which, if they were true, were sufficient to render me incapable of his majesty's favours, or of the compassion of any person of honour whatsoever.—For the first, it is notorious to all the world, that having now served his majesty, in the place of secretary, for the space of above 8 years, I have not added one foot of land to the inheritance left me by my father; which, in land and lease, was not above 500*l.* per annum; a poor and inconsiderable estate for a secretary, and such a one as most secretaries have more than trebled in a short time: for my manner of living, it hath been much under the dignity of a secretary, and if I had not been very frugal, I could not have subsisted; where then this concealed mass of treasure is, I wish those that speak so liberally of it would let me know; for I do protest to God I am utterly to seek where to discover it; and at this present I am so unfurnished with money, that if his majesty cause me not to be supplied, I am unable to subsist in these parts, without exposing my family in England to the danger of starving; and yet neither my purpose nor inclination is to live otherwise here, than in the greatest obscurity and closeness that possibly I may. I assure your lordship that those of the Roman party that passed my hands, by his majesty's commandment, were poor distressed creatures, and far from being able to enrich me: and besides, how little I have attended my own private interest, and how freely and like a gentleman (I hope I may speak the truth without ostentation) I have done courtesies to all, I wish it should rather appear by the testimony of such as have made use of my services, than by my own. My father and I have served the crown of England near 80 years together, in which time, if a greater estate had been raised it might well have been justified, considering the great employments near the persons of queen Elizabeth, king James, and his majesty that now is, we both have had; and your lordship may believe it, for I avow it upon the faith of a christian, that it is no more than I have above mentioned; and whether there are not many, from less employments, have risen to be noblemen, and made their fortune accordingly, I leave the world to judge.—For the other suspicion, of my being a favourer or advancer of popery, I protest before the Almighty God, and as I shall answer at the last dreadful day, that I know no ground for the least suspicion thereof; neither am I myself, nor is any of mine, to my knowledge, guilty of the least thought of any such purpose; for myself, I received my pay tism in the church of England, and I know nothing in the church of Rome that can win me from that church wherein I was made a Christian; I do therefore hold this church of England, not only a true and orthodox church, but the most pure and near the primitive church of any in the Christian world; and this I will be ready to seal with my blood, whensoever there shall be occasion: with this further protestation, that if I did not hold it so, I would not continue in it for any worldly consideration whatsoever.*—For that which hath passed my hands for favour of that party, it hath been merely ministerial, as his maj. best knows; and I must be bold to say that his maj. hath not been deceived by it, but hath received many greater advantages: besides that, if a secretary of state should not hold intelligence with the party, is absolutely to disable him from the service of the state, and that hath been done always more or less, and so must always continue: kings and their ministers of state have ever had, and might ever have, a latitude according to time and occasion, and cannot be so tied, according to strictness of law, as others are, without peril to the government; therefore, when the Roman party were practique and busy about the state, there was reason to be more strict; but now, by the wisdom of the queen and her good offices, they are better tempered, less severity hath been used; it being the prerogative of the prince to use moderation according to the accusation. Further than this I have not had to do with the Roman party, nor thus far, but in obedience to my master's commandment; which I hope shall not be censured a crime. This being my condition, I most humbly submit it to your lordship's wisdom and goodness; and seeing there is no malignity in it, nor prejudice to the state, that your lordship would vouchsafe me your favour and protection, and preserve from perishing your lordship's most humble and faithful, though much distressed servant,

FRAN. WINLEBANK."

"Calais, Jan. 11, 1640."

PROCEEDINGS ON THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE LORD KEEPER FINCH.

Dec. 21. Upon an intimation given to the house of commons by a member, That the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, understanding that there were complaints against him in the house, desired that he might be heard to say something to the house, before they voted any thing against him: this was granted, and he

* Saunderson says, "That sir Francis Winlebank having been questioned and mainly convicted for prying Jesuits and Priests, and of worse matters suspected guilty, got over into France, where he remained to his death a professed Roman Catholic:" but Whitlocke is more tender, saying only, "That it was reported he remained to his death a professed Papist."—Life of Charles I. p. 333. Memoirs, p. 37.

was admitted in this manner:—There was a chair set for him to make use of, if he pleased, and a stool to lay the Purse upon, a little this side the bar, on the left hand as you come in. He himself brought in the Purse, and laid it on the chair; but would not sit down himself, nor put on his hat, though he was moved to do it by the Speaker; but spoke all the while bare-headed, and standing, the serjeant at arms attending the house, standing by him with the mace on his shoulder.

The Lord Keeper's Apology before the Commons.] The speech he made, on this uncommon occasion, was as follows:*

"Mr. Speaker; I do, first, present my most humble thanks to this honourable assembly, for this favour vouchsafed me, in granting me admittance to their presence; and do humbly beseech them to believe it is no desire to preserve myself, or my fortune, but to deserve the good opinions of those that have drawn me hither. I do profess, in the presence of Him that knoweth all hearts, that I had rather go from door to door, and crave Da obolum Belisario, &c. with the good opinion of this assembly, than live and enjoy all the honours and fortunes I am capable of. I do not come hither with an intention to justify my words, my actions, or my opinions; but to make a plain and clear narration thereof, and then humbly to submit myself, and all that concerns me, to the wisdom and justice of this house.—I do well understand, Mr. Speaker, with what disadvantage any man can speak in his own cause; and if I could have told how to have transmitted my thoughts and actions by a clearer representation of another, I do so much defy my own judgment in working, and my ways in expressing, that I should have been a most humble suitor, that another might have done it. But this house will not be taken with words, but with clear and ingenuous dealing; and therefore I shall beseech them to think, I come not hither with a set and studied speech: I come to speak my heart, and to speak it clearly and plainly, and then leave it to your clemency and justice; and I hope, if any thing shall slip from me, to work contrary to my meaning or intention, disorderly or ill placed, you will be pleased to make a favourable construction, and leave me the liberty of explanation, if there shall be any: but I hope there shall be no cause for it.—I hope, for my affection in religion, no man doubteth me; what my education, and under whom, for many years, is well known; I lived near 30 years in the society of Gray's Inn: and if one, that was a reverend preacher in my time, Dr. Sibbs, were now alive, he were able to give testimony to this house, that when a party, ill-affected in religion, sought to weary him, and tire him out, he had his chiefest encouragement from me.—I have now, Mr. Speaker, been 15 years of the king's council; from the first hour to this minute, no man is able to say that ever I was author, adviser, or consentor to any project. It pleased the king, my gracious master, after I had served him divers years, to prefer me to two places; to be Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and then Keeper of his Great seal. I say it in the presence of God, I was so far from the thoughts of the one, and from the ambition of the other, that but for my master's grace and goodness, I had never enjoyed those honours.—I cannot tell, Mr. Speaker, nor do I know, what particulars there are that may draw me into your disfavour or ill opinion; and therefore I shall come very weakly armed: yet to those that either in my own knowledge, or by such knowledge as is given me, and not from any in this house, I shall speak somewhat, that I hope, being truth, and accompanied with clearness and ingenuity, will procure, at least, some allay of that ill opinion which may perhaps be conceived of me.—Mr. Speaker, I had once the honour to sit in the place that you do: from the first time I came thither, to the unfortunate time (see p. 490), I do appeal to all that were here then, if I served you not with candour. Ill office I never did to any of the house, good offices I have witnessed enough I did many. I was so happy that, upon an occasion which once happened, I received an expression and testimony of the good affection of this house towards me. For the last unhappy day, I had a great share in the unhappiness and sorrow of it. I hope there are enough do remember, that no man within the walls of this house did express more symptoms of sorrow, grief, and distraction, than I did.—After an adjournment for 2 or 3 days, it pleased his majesty to send for me, to let me know that he could not so resolve of things as he wished; and therefore was desirous of an adjournment for some few days more. I protest I did not then discern in his majesty any inclination, and I believe it was not in his thoughts, to dissolve this assembly; but he was pleased, in the first place, to give me a command to deliver his pleasure to the house for an adjournment for some few days, till the Monday following, as I remember; and commanded me withall to deliver his pleasure, that there should be no further speeches, but forthwith, upon the delivery of the message, I should come and wait upon him: he likewise commanded me, if questions were offered to be put, upon my allegiance I should not dare to do it. How much I did then, in all humbleness, reason with his majesty, is not for me here to speak; only thus much let me say, I was no author of any counsel in it, I was only a person receiving a commission. I speak not this as a thing I now produce or do invent, or take up for my own excuse; but that which is known to divers, and some honourable persons in this house, to be most true. All that I will say for that, is humbly to beseech you all to consider, that if it had been any other man's case as it was mine, how he would have comported himself between the displeasure of a gracious king, and the ill opinion of this honourable assembly. I beseech you lay all together, lay my first actions and behaviour with the last; I shall submit all to your honourable and favourable constructions.—For the Shipping-Business, my opinion of that cause hath lain heavy upon me. I shall clearly and truly present unto you what every thing is, with this protestation, That if, in reckoning up my own opinion that I was of, or what I delivered, any thing of it be displeasing, or contrary to the opinion of this house, that I am far from justifying of it; but submit that, and all other my actions, to your wisdoms and goodness.—Mr. Speaker, as to the first writs that were sent out about the Shipping-business, I had no more knowledge of it, and was as ignorant as any one member of this house, or any man in the kingdom. I was neither the author nor adviser of it; and will boldly say, from the first to this hour, I did never advise nor counsel the setting forth of any Ship-Writs in my life.—Mr. Speaker, it is true that I was made chief justice of the Common Pleas some four days before the Ship-Writs went out to the ports and maritime places. As I do remember the 20th of Oct. 1634, they do bear teste; and I was sworn justice the 16th of Oct. so they went out in that time, but without my knowledge or privacy: the God of Heaven knows this to be true.—Mr. Speaker, afterwards his maj. was pleased to command my lord chief justice of the king's bench, that then was, Sir Tho. Richardson; and chief baron of the Exchequer that now is (Sir Humphrey Davenport,) and myself, then chief justice of the Common Pleas, to take into consideration the precedents then brought unto us, which we did; and after returned to his maj. what we had found out of those precedents.—It is true, afterwards, his maj. did take into consideration, that if the whole kingdom were concerned, it was not reason to lay the whole burthen upon the Cinque-ports and maritime towns only: but upon what ground his maj. took that consideration, I do confess I do know nothing of it.—His maj. did command my lord chief justice, that now is (Sir Tho. Bromston,) my lord chief baron, and myself, to return our opinions; 'Whether, when the whole kingdom is in danger, and the kingdom in general is concerned, it be not according to law and reason, that the whole kingdom and his maj. and all interested therein, should join in defending and preserving thereof?' This was in time, about 1634.—In Michaelmas term following, his maj. commanded me to go to all the Judges, and require their opinions in particular. He commanded me to do it to every one, and to charge then, upon their duty and allegiance, to keep it secret. Mr. Speaker, this was never intended by his maj. (so professed by him at that time, and so declared to all the Judges) nor was it required by him to be such a binding opinion to the subject, as to hinder him from calling it in question; nor to be binding to themselves, but that, upon better reason and advice, they might alter it; he only desired their opinions for his own private satisfaction.—I know very well, that extrajudicial opinions of Judges ought not to be binding; but I did think, and speak my heart and conscience freely; myself and the rest of the Judges being sworn, and by our oaths tied to counsel the king when he should require advice of us; and we were bound, by our oaths and duties, to return our opinions, when demanded; accordingly I did obey his majesty's command, and do here, before the God of Heaven, avow it.—I did never use the least promise of preference or reward to any, nor did use the least menacing; I did leave it freely to their own consciences and liberty, for I was left the liberty of my own by his majesty, and had reason to leave them the same liberty.—And I beseech you be pleased to have some belief, that I would not say this, but that I know the God of Heaven will make it appear; and I beseech you, that extravagant speeches may not move against that which is a positive and clear truth.—Mr. Speaker, in the discourse of this (as there are, between Judges, some small discourses sometimes) never was there any cause wherein Judges conferred, that so little conference was as between me and them. Mr. Speaker, against a negative I can say nothing; but I shall affirm nothing unto you, but, by the grace of God, as I affirm it to be true, so I make no doubt of making it appear to be so. This opinion was subscribed without solicitation; there was not any man of us did make any doubt of subscribing our opinion, but two, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Crooke.—Mr. Justice Crooke made not a scruple of the thing, but of the introduction, for it was thus: 'That where the ports and the maritime towns were concerned, there, according to the precedents in former times, the charge lay on them: so when the kingdom was in danger, of which his majesty was the sole judge, whether it was not agreeable to law and reason, the whole kingdom should bear the charge?' I left this case with judge Crooke. The next term I spake with him, he could give me no resolution, because he had not seen the writs in former times; but did give his opinion, 'That when the whole kingdom was in danger, the defence thereof ought to be borne by all.' So of that opinion of his, there was no need of a solicitation.—I speak no more here than I did, openly, in my argument in the Exchequer-Chamber: this is the naked truth. As for Mr. Justice Hutton, he did never subscribe at all. I will only say this, that I was so far from pressing him to give his opinion, because he did ask time to consider of it, that I will boldly say, and make it good, That when his majesty would have had him sometimes sent for, to give his opinion, I beseeched his majesty to leave him to himself and his conscience; and that was the ill office I did. The judges did subscribe in Nov. or Dec. 1635. I had no conference (nor truly, I think, by accident, any discourse) with any of the Judges touching their opinions; for, till Feb. 1636, there was no speech of it. And when they had delivered their opinions, I did return, according to my duty, to my master the king, and delivered them to him; in whose custody they be.—In Feb. 1636, upon a command that came from his maj. by one of the then secretaries of state, the judges being all assembled in Gray's-Inn, we did then fall into a debate of the case then sent unto us; and we did then return our opinion unto his maj. There was then much discourse and great debate about it. Mine opinion and conscience, at that time, was agreeable to that opinion I then delivered. I did use the best arguments I could, for the maintenance of my opinion; and that was all I did. It is true that then, at that time, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Crooke, did not differ in the main point, which was this: 'When the kingdom was in danger, the charge ought to be borne by the whole kingdom.' But in this point, 'Whether the king was the sole judge of the danger?' they differed: so as there was, between the first subscription, and this debate and consultation, some 15 months difference.—It is true, that all of them did then subscribe, both justice Hutton and justice Crooke; which was returned to his majesty, and after published by my lord keeper, my predecessor, in the Star-Chamber.—For the manner of publishing it I will say nothing, but leave it to those whose memories will call to mind what was then done. The reason of the subscription of justice Hutton and justice Crooke, though they differed in opinion, grew from this that was told them from the rest of the Judges, 'That where the greater number did agree in their vote, the rest were involved and included.'—Now, Mr. Speaker, I have faithfully delivered what I did in that business, till I came, which was afterwards, to my argument in the Exchequer-Chamber. The question was, a scire facias issued out of the Exchequer, in that case of Mr. Hampden's; of which I can say nothing, for it was there begun, and afterwards adjourned, to have advice of all the judges.—Mr. Speaker, among the rest, according to my duty, I argued the case. I shall not trouble you to tell you what my argument was; I presume there are copies enough of it: only I will, very briefly, tell you there are 4 things which I then declared. First, concerning the Matter of Danger, and necessity of the whole kingdom: I profess that there was never a judge in the kingdom did deliver an opinion, but that it must be in a case of apparent danger. When we came to an argument of the case, it was not upon a matter or issue, but it was upon a demurrer. Whether the danger was sufficiently admitted in pleading? And therefore this was not the thing in dispute, but only the first degree and step that led unto it. I did deliver myself as free and as clear as any man did, That the king ought to govern by the positive laws of the kingdom; that he could not alter nor change, nor innovate in matters of law, but by common consent in parliament. I did further deliver, That if this were used to make a further revenue or benefit to the king, or in any other way, but in case of necessity, and for the preservation of the kingdom, the judgment did warrant no such thing. My opinion in this business, I did, in the conclusion of my argument, submit to the judgment of this house. I never delivered my opinion, That money ought to be raised, but ships provided for the defence of this kingdom; and in that the writ was performed: and that the charge ought not to be in any case, but where the whole kingdom was in danger. Mr justice Hutton and Mr. justice Crooke were of the same opinion with me.—Having related unto you my whole carriage in this business, I do humbly submit myself to your grave and favourable censures; beseeching you not to think that I delivered these things with the least intention to subvert, or subject, the common law of the kingdom, or to bring in or to introduce any new way of government. It hath been as far from my thoughts, as any thing under the Heavens.—Mr. Speaker, I have heard, too, that there hath been some ill opinion conceived of me about Forest-business: which was a thing as far out of the way of my study, as any thing I know towards the law. But it pleased his majesty, in the sickness of Mr. Noy, to give some short warning to prepare myself for that employment. When I came there, I did both the king and commonwealth acceptable service; for I did, and dare be bold to say, with extreme danger to myself and fortune, (some do understand my meaning herein) run through that business, and left the Forest-Boundaries as I found them. When I went down about that employment, I satisfied myself about the matter of perambulation. There were great difficulties of opinions, what perambulation was. I did arm myself as well as I could before I did any thing in it. I did acquaint those that were then judges, in the presence of the noble lords, with such objections as I thought it my duty to offer unto them. If they thought they were not objections of such weight, as were fit to stir them, I would not do the king that disservice. They thought the objections had such answers as might well induce the like upon a conference with the whole country, admitting me to come and confer with them; to which the country did unanimously subscribe.—It fell out afterwards, that the king commanded me, and all this before I was chief justice, to go into Essex; and did then tell me he had been informed, that the bounds of the Forest were narrower than in truth they ought to be; and I did according to his command.—I will here profess that which is known to many. I had no thought, nor intention, of enlarging the bounds of the Forest, further than those parts for which there was a perambulation 26 Edw. 4. I desired the country to confer with me about it, if they were pleased to do it; and then, according to my duty, I did produce those records which I thought fit for his majesty's service; leaving them to discharge themselves, as by law and justice they might do. I did never, in the least kind, go about to overthrow the Charter of the Forest; and did publish and maintain Charta de Foresta, as a sacred thing, and no man to violate it; and that it ought to be preserved for the king and commonwealth. I do most humbly submit all that I have done to the goodness and justice of this house."

Whitlocke tells us, 'This Apology of lord Finch, which he calls a very elegant and ingenious speech in his own vindication, et capite benevolentiam, was delivered with an excellent grace and gesture.' He adds, "That many were exceedingly taken with his eloquence and carriage, and it was a sad sight to see a person of his greatness, parts, and favour, to appear in such a posture, before such an assembly, to plead for his life and fortunes." The Lord Keeper being withdrawn from the house,

Mr. Rigby, member for Wigan, stood up, and, in answer to his lordship, spoke as follows:—"Mr. Speaker; Though my judgment prompts me to sit still and be silent, yet the duty I owe to my king, my country, and my conscience, moves me to stand up and speak. Mr. Speaker, had not this syren so sweet a tongue, surely he could never have effected so much mischief to this kingdom: you know, sir, 'opti morum putrefactio pessima;' the best things putrified become the worst; and as it is in the natural, so in the body politic; and what's to be done then, Mr. Speaker, we all know, 'ense recidendum est,' the sword of Justice must strike, 'ne pars sincera trahatur.'—Mr. Speaker, it is not the voice, 'non vox sed votum;' not the tongue, but the heart and actions that are to be suspected: for doth not our Saviour say it, 'Shew me thy faith by thy works, O man?' Now, Mr. Speaker, hath not this kingdom seen; seen, said I; pay felt and smarted under the cruelty of this man's justice? So malicious as to record it in every court of Westminster, as if he had not been contented with the enslaving of us all, unless he entailed it to all posterity. Why shall I believe words now, 'cum factum videam?' Shall we be so weak men, as, when we have been injured and abused, to be gained again with fair words and compliments? Or, like little children, when we have been whipt and beaten, be pleased again with sweet meats? Oh, no: there be some birds that, in the summer of parliament, will sing sweetly; who, in the winter of persecution, will, for their prey, ravenously fly at all, upon our goods, nay, seize upon our persons; and hath it not been with this man so, with some in this assembly?—Mr. Speaker, it hath been objected unto us, That in judgment we should think of mercy; and 'Be ye merciful as your heavenly Father is merciful;' now God Almighty grant that we may be so, and that our hearts and judgments may be truly rectified to know truly what is

mercy: I say to know what is mercy; for there is the point, Mr. Speaker: I have heard of foolish pity, foolish pity: do we not all know the effects of it? And I have met with this epithet to mercy, 'Crudelis misericordia;' and, in some kind, I think there may be a cruel mercy: I am sure the spirit of God saith, 'Be not pitiful in judgment;' nay it saith, 'Be not pitiful of the poor in judgment;' if not of the poor, then a latiori not of the rich; there's the emphasis. We see, by the set and solemn appointments of our courts of justice, what provision the wisdom of our ancestors hath made for the preservation, honour, and esteem of justice; witness our frequent terms, sessions, and assizes; and in what pomp and state the judges in their circuits, by the sheriffs, knights, and justices, and all the country, are attended oft-times for the hanging of a poor thief for the stealing of a hog or a sheep; nay, in some cases, for the stealing of a penny, and very justly too, in terrorem. And now, shall not some of them be hanged that have robbed us of all our property; and sheared, at once, all our sheep, and all we have away; and would have made us all indeed poor Belsharius's to have begged for halfpennies, when they would not have left us one penny that we could have called our own?—Let us therefore now, Mr. Speaker, not be so pitiful as that we become remiss; not so pitiful in judgment, as to have no judgment; but set the deplorable estate of Great Britain now before our eyes, and consider how our most gracious sovereign hath been abused, and both his majesty and all his subjects injured, by these wicked instruments: for which my humble motion is, That with these particulars we become not so merciful, as to the generality (the whole kingdom) we grow merciless. Fiati Justitia.

It was then Resolved, upon the Question, 'That John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, lord keeper of the Great Seal of England, shall be accused by this house of High Treason, and other misdemeanors, in the name of this house, and all the commons of England. And that the lords be desired to sequester him from parliament, and be committed; and that, within some convenient time, this house will resort to their lordships with particular Articles and Accusations against him.' Ordered, 'That the lord Falkland go up with this message.'—By the Lords Journals we find, that this last-named message was not delivered till next day; when the lords returned this Answer to it, 'That they had taken the message into consideration; but, having received intimation that the Lord Keeper was not to be found, they had ordered him into safe custody when he could be so: and when the particulars of his Charge come up against him, they will give all furtherance to it.' In the mean time his majesty, by commission under the Great Seal, had appointed sir Edw. Littleton, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, to sit as Speaker in the Lord Keeper's place.

As the escape of the Lord Keeper Finch, prevented the further progress of the Impeachment, we shall not give the Articles at large, but content ourselves with an abstract thereof, with the lord Falkland's speech to the lords, after they were read in that house; as also a Copy of a Letter he wrote to the earl of Pembroke after his escape.

Articles of Impeachment against the Lord Keeper Finch. The Sum of the ARTICLES against the Lord Keeper were as follows:—

I. "That the said John lord Finch, baron of Fordwich, lord keeper, &c. had traiterously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of England, and, instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary, tyrannical government against law; which he hath declared by traitorous and wicked words, counsels, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions. II. That, in pursuance of his traitorous purposes, he did, in the 3rd or 4th years of his majesty's reign, being then Speaker of the house of commons, and contrary to the commands of that house, deny, and hinder the reading of some things relating to the safety of the king and kingdom, and the preservation of religion, and did forbid all members to speak; and said, if any of them offered to speak, he would rise and go away, and did offer to rise and go away; endeavouring, as much as in him lay, to subvert the antient and undoubted rights and course of parliaments. III. That, being one of his majesty's council, he endeavoured to enlarge the Forests, particularly in Essex, beyond their due bounds, &c. IV. That, being chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1635, he drew up the Questions and Opinions, concerning Ship-Money, and solicited and procured the Judges to sign them. V. That he subscribed an extrajudicial Opinion relating to Ship-Money himself, and pressed the justices, Crooke and Hutton, to sign them against their consciences. VI. That he delivered his Opinion against Mr. Hampden in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the case of Ship-Money; and threatened the said judges to induce them to deliver the like opinion; and urged baron Denham to retract the opinion he had given for Mr. Hampden. VII. That he published, in his circuit, That his majesty's right to Ship-Money was so inherent in the crown, that an act of parliament could not take it away; and threatened all such as refused to pay it. VIII. That he did most of the business of the Common-Pleas in his private chamber, and sent warrants into several counties to release all persons arrested on outlawries, on paying 40s. fees; whereas no such persons ought to be bailed or released without a supersedeas under seal, or reversal. IX. The ninth Article charges him with perverting justice, while he was lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. X. That he endeavoured to incense his majesty against parliaments; and framed and advised the publishing the Declaration, after the Dissolution of the last parliament."

Lord Falkland's Speech in Support of the said Articles.] After the reading of these Articles,

The Lord Falkland made the following speech in support of them:—‘My Lords; These Articles against my lord Finch being read, I may be bold to apply that of the poet,

‘Nil refert tales versus qua voce legatur.’

And I doubt not but your lordships must be of the same opinion, of which the house of commons appears to have been, by the choice they made of me, that the Charge I have brought is such, as needs no assistance from the bringer; leaving not so much as a colour for any defence, including all possible evidence, and all possible aggravation, that addition alone excepted, which he alone could make, and hath made, I mean his confession, included in his flight.—Here are many and mighty crimes, crimes of supererogation: so that high Treason is but a part of his charge, pursuing him ferrely in every several condition; being a silent Speaker, an unjust Judge, and an unconscionable Keeper: that his life appears a perpetual warfare, by mines and by battery, by battle and by stratagem, against our fundamental laws, (which, by his own confession, several conquests had left untouched) against the excellent constitution of this kingdom, which hath made it appear unto strangers rather an idea, than a real commonwealth; and produced the honour and happiness of this as the wonder of every other nation; and this with such unfortunate success, that, as he always intended to make our ruins a ground of his advancement, so his advancement the means of our further ruin.—After that, contrary to the duty of his place, and the end of that meeting in which he held his place, he had, as it were, gagged the commonwealth; taking away, to his power, all power of speech from that body, of which he ought to have been the mouth, and which alone can perfectly represent the condition of the people, whom that only represents; which, if he had not done, in all probability, what so grave and judicious an assembly might have offered to the consideration of so gracious and just a prince, had occasioned the redress of the Grievances they then suffered, and prevented those which they have since endured: according to the ancient maxim of ‘Odise quos laceris,’ he pursued this offence towards the parliament, by inveighing against the members, by scandalizing their proceedings, by trampling upon their Acts and Declarations, by usurping and devolving the right, by diminishing and abrogating the power, both of that and other parliaments, and making them, as much as in him lay, both useless and odious to his maj.; nay, he pursued his hatred to this fountain of justice, by corrupting the streams of it, the laws; and perverting the conduit pipes, the judges.—He practised the annihilating of ancient and notorious perambulations of particular Forests, the better to prepare himself to annihilate the ancient and notorious perambulations of the whole kingdom; the meeres and boundaries between the liberties of the subject and sovereign power; he endeavoured to have all tenures durante beniplacito, and to bring all law from his maj.’s courts into his majesty’s breast; he gave our goods to the king, our lands to the deer, our liberties to his sheriffs; so that there was no way by which we had not been oppressed and destroyed, if the power of this person had been equal to his will; or that the will of his majesty had been equal to his power.—He not only, by this means, made us liable to all the effects of an invasion from without, and (by destruction of our liberties, which included the destruction of our property, which included the destruction of our industry) made us liable to the terriblest of all invasions within, that of want and poverty: so that, if what he plotted had taken root (and he made it as sure as his declaration could make it, what himself was not, parliament-proof) in this wealthy and happy kingdom, there could have been left no abundance but of grievances and discontent, no satisfaction but amongst the guilty.—It is generally observed of the plague, that the infection of others, is an earnest and constant desire of all that are seized by it; and as this design resembles that disease, in the ruin, destruction, and desolation it would have wrought, so it seems no less like it in the effect; he having so laboured to make others share in that guilt, that his solicitation was not only his action, but theirs; making use both of his authority, his interest, and opportunity to persuade; and, in his majesty’s name (whose piety is known to give that excellent prerogative to his person, that the law gives to his place, not to be able to do wrong) to threaten the rest of the Judges, to sign Opinions contrary to law; to assign Answers contrary to their Opinions; to give Judgment, which they ought not to have given; and to recant Judgment, when they had given it as they ought: so that whosoever considers his care of, and concernment, both in the growth and the continuance of this project, cannot but, by the same way, by which the wisest judgement found the true mother of the child, discover him not only to have been the fosterer, but the father of this most pernicious and envious design.—I shall not need to observe, that this was plotted and pursued by an Englishman against England; which increaseth the crime in no less degree than parricide is beyond murder: that this was done in the greatest matter joined to the greatest bond, being against the general liberty, and publick property, by a sworn Judge; and if salt itself become unsavoury, the gospel itself hath designed whither it must be cast: that he poisoned our very antidotes, and turned our guards into a destruction, making law the ground of illegality: that he used the law not only against us, but against itself; making it, as I may say, felo de se; making the pretence, for I can scarce say, the appearance of it, to contribute to the utter ruin of itself.—I shall not need to say, that either this is, or can be of the highest kind, and in the highest degree, Parliamentary Treason; a treason which needs not a combination of many several actions, which alone were not treason, to prove a treason altogether; and by that demonstration of the intention, to make that formally treason, which were, materially, but a misdemeanor; a treason as well against the king, as against the kingdom; for whatsoever is against the whole, is undoubtedly against the head; which takes from his majesty the ground of his rule, the Laws; (for if foundations be destroyed, the pinnacles are most endangered) which takes from his majesty the principal honour of his rule, the Ruling over free Men; a power as much nobler than that over villains, as that is over beasts; which endeavoured to take from his majesty the principal support of his Rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules; a better and surer strength add wall to the king, than the sea is to the kingdom; and, by begetting a mutual distrust, and by that a mutual disaffection between them, to hazard the danger even of the destruction of both.—My lords, I shall the less need to press this, because as it were unreasonable in any case to suspect your justice; so, here especially, where your interest so nearly unites you; your great share in possessions, giving you an equal concernment in property; the care and pains, used by your noble ancestors in the founding and asserting of our common liberties, rendering the just defence of them your most proper and peculiar inheritance; and both exciting to oppose and extirpate all such designs as did introduce, and would have settled an arbitrary, that is, an intolerable form of government; and have made even your lordships and your posterity but right honourable slaves.—My lords, I will spend no more words, ‘luctando cum larva,’ in accusing the ghost of a departed person, whom his crimes accuse more than I can do; and his absence accuseth no less than his crimes. Neither will I excuse the length of what I have said, because I cannot add to an excuse, without adding to the fault; nor plead for my own imperfections, either in the matter or manner of it. I will only desire by the command, and in the behalf of the house of commons, that these proceedings against the Lord Keeper Finch may be put in so speedy a way of dispatch, as in such cases the course of parliament will allow.

Lord Keeper Finch's Letter to the Earl of Pembroke, after his Escape.] The Lord Keeper's Letter from the Hague, to the earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain, after his escape, was as follows:—

“Hague, Jan. 3, 1640.

“My most well-beloved lord; The interest your lordship hath ever had in the best of my fortunes and affections, gives me the privilege of troubling your lordship with these few lines, from one that hath now nothing left to serve you withal but his prayers: these your lordship shall never want, with an heart as full of true affection to your lordship, as ever any was.—My lord, it was not the loss of my place, and with that of my fortunes, nor being exiled from my dear country and friends, though many of them were cause of sorrow, that afflicts; but that which I most suffer under, is, that displeasure of the house of commons conceived against me: I know how true a heart I have ever borne towards them, and your lordship can witness, in part, what ways I have gone in, but silence and patience best becomes me; with these I must leave myself and my actions to the favourable construction of my noble friends, in which number your lordship hath a prime place. I am now at the Hague, where I arrived on Thursday the last day of last month, where I purpose to live in a fashion agreeable to the poorness of my fortunes. As for any views in this world, I have utterly cast off the thoughts of them; and my aim shall be so to learn ‘to number my days, that I may apply my heart unto wisdom;’ that wisdom that shall wipe all tears from mine eyes and heart, and lead me by the hand to true happiness, which can never be taken from me. I pray the God of Heaven to bless this parliament with both a happy progress and conclusion: if my ruin may conduce but the least to it, I shall not repine at it. I truly pray for your lordship, and your noble family, that God would give an increase of all worldly blessings, and, in the fulness of days, to receive you to his Glory; if I were capable of serving any body, I would tell your lordship, that no man should be readier to make known his devotion, and true gratitude to your lordship, than your lordship's most humble and affectionate poor kinsman and servant, “FINCH.”

Articles of Impeachment against sir George Ratcliff.] Dec. 31. Sir George Ratcliff was impeached by the commons, at a conference with the other house, on the following Articles:

I. “That he the said sir George Ratcliff hath traiterously conspired and confederated with Tho. earl of Strafford, to subvert the fundamental laws and governments of the realms of England and Ireland; and to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government, against laws; and hath been a counsellor, actor, and abettor in that wicked and traiterous design of bringing the Irish army into England, to compel the subjects of this kingdom to submit thereto. II. That he hath traiterously confederated and conspired with the said earl of Strafford, and hath been an actor, counsellor, and instrument to him, in assuming and exercising regal power, over the liberties and persons, lands and goods of his majesty's subjects of Ireland; and accordingly hath exercised the same tyrannically, to the subversion and undoing of divers of his majesty's liege people. III. That, for the better enabling of the said earl and himself to go on with their traiterous designs, he, the said sir G. R. traiterously joined and confederated with the said earl, in taking great sums of money out of his majesty's exchequer of Ireland, and converting them to the use of the said earl and himself, when his majesty was necessitated for his own urgent occasions, the army having been then long unpaid. IV. That he hath traiterously confederated with the said earl, and abused the power and authority which he held in Ireland, to the countenancing and encouraging of papists, that he might settle a mutual dependence and confidence betwixt the earl and himself, and that party; and to alienate the affections of the Irish Papists from the subjects of England, and by their help to prosecute and accomplish their malicious and tyrannical designs. V. That he hath traiterously confederated with the said earl of Strafford, in plotting and endeavouring to stir up enmity and hostility between his majesty's subjects of Ireland and those of Scotland. VI. That, the better to preserve himself and the said earl, in these and other traitorous courses, he hath laboured to subvert the rights of parliament, and the antient course of parliamentary proceedings.—All which offences were committed during the time that the said sir George was a counsellor of state in the kingdom of Ireland, and had taken oath for the faithful discharge of the same. By which actions, confederacies, and conspiracies, he hath, traiterously, and contrary to his allegiance, endeavoured the ruin and destruction of his majesty's kingdoms, for which they do impeach the said sir George Ratcliff of High Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. And the said commons saving to themselves, &c. do pray that the said sir George may be put to answer all and every of the premisses, and that such trial and judgment may be had thereon, as is agreeable to law and justice."

Mr. Pym's Speech in support of the said Articles.] After the reading of these Articles,

Mr. Pym delivered himself to the lords in these words: "My Lords; By hearing this Charge, your lordships may perceive what near conjunction there is between this cause and the earl of Strafford's: the materials are, for the most part, the same in both: the offences of the earl, moving from a higher orb, are more comprehensive; they extend both to England and Ireland: these, except in one particular, of reducing England by the Irish army, are confined within this kingdom. The earl is charged as an author, sir George as an instrument and subordinate actor. The influences of superior planets are often augmented and enforced, but seldom mitigated by the concurrence of the inferior, where merit doth arise not from well-doing, but from ill: the officiousness of ministers will rather add to the malignity of their instructions, than diminish it; that so they may more fully ingratiate themselves with those upon whom they depend.—In the crimes committed by the earl, there appears more haughtiness and fierceness, being acted by his own principles. Those motions are ever strongest, which are nearest the primum mobile: but in those of sir George, there seems to be more baseness and servility, having resigned and subjected himself to be acted upon by the corrupt will of another.—The earl of Strafford hath not been bred in the study and practice of the law, and having stronger lusts and passions to incite, and less knowledge to restrain him, might more easily be transported from the rule. Sir George, in his natural temper and disposition, being more moderate, and, by his education and profession, better acquainted with the grounds and directions of the law, was carried into his offences by a more immediate concurrence of will, and a more corrupt suppression of his own reason and judgment. My lords, as both these have been partners in offending; so it is the desire of the commons they may be put under such Trial and Examination, and other proceedings of justice, as may bring them to partake of a deserved punishment, for the safety and good of both kingdoms."

Sir George Ratcliff was then ordered to be brought to the bar, and told, That the house of commons had brought up Articles of High Treason against him; which being read unto him, and having liberty to speak, he desired their lordships that he might have counsel assigned him, with liberty to come and advise him; because he conceived there was in the charge divers points of law to be considered, and he himself was altogether unknowing in the manner of proceedings in this house. Next he desired, that he might be allowed a competent time to answer in. Both which requests were granted him.—Then their lordships called in the keeper of the Gatehouse and told him that sir George was committed upon an accusation of High Treason: therefore they would now expect from him that he should be kept in safe custody upon his peril; and that every night he must take a note what persons have visited him that day, and every Saturday give an account of it to this house.

Informations against six of the Judges.] Dec. 22. The commons resolved, "That a message be forthwith sent to the lords, to desire them that the lord chief justice Bramstou, lord chief baron Davenport, justice Berkeley, justice Crawley, baron Trevor, and baron Weston, do, by themselves and others, put in good security to abide the judgment of parliament; for that there are Informations of Crimes of a high nature against them in this house." Mr. Waller to go up with this Message. 'The Journals of the Lords acquaint us, That when Mr Waller had accused the Judges, as aforesaid, they being all present except the lord chief baron, submitted themselves to the pleasure of the house. And it was ordered, 'That the said Judges, for the present, should enter into recognizances, in open court, of 10,000*l.* each, to abide the censure of parliament.' Which was done accordingly; and the next day sir H. Davenport gave the same security.

Two additional Subsidies voted.] Dec. 23. The commons having resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, on the Supply, it was resolved, "That two Subsidies more should be added to those Subsidies already agreed upon, to be employed to the same uses, or to such as this house shall appoint." On this occasion, Sir *Benj. Rudyard rose and said: 'Mr. Speaker; The principal part of this business is money; and now we are about it, I shall be glad we may give so much as will not only serve the turn for the present, but likewise to provide that it come not quick upon us again: I believe that the two Subsidies are spent already. We know how much time this business hath cost us; if we be but half as long about another, it may cost more than money: for if two armies should be driven to extreme necessity, (and they will be judges of their own necessity) we shall not be able to sit here, and give more, though we would. Believe it, sir, this is the business of all the businesses in the house; of all the businesses in the kingdom: if we stand hacking for a little money, we may very thriftily lose all we have; this being a business of so peremptory and destructive a nature. Wherefore, my humble and earnest motion is, That we may dispatch it fully, and at once; if there should be an overplus of money remaining, we can soon resolve how to dispose of it. Four Subsidies will do the work, if they be given presently; for every day tells us that we are not so much masters of our own time and occasions, as to do every thing when we would: let us do this whilst we may. Though I dwell not in the North, yet I dwell in England.'

The Abp. of Canterbury's Petition to the Lords.] The same day a Petition was presented to the lords from the archbishop of Canterbury, in these words:

"That whereas your lordships petitioner, when he was to withdraw and leave that honourable assembly, gave offence to your lordships in some thing which passed from him in his speech, he is very heartily sorry for the same; and most humbly prayeth that your lordships will pass by that passionate offence, pressed from your petitioner by the weight and unexpectedness of the charge which fell upon him. And that your honourable lordships would be pleased to grant that your humble petitioner may have some liberty to take the air, for his health's sake, under what safeguard your lordships shall think fit; and this in regard that his health begins to fail him already, by reason the house where he is hath no place in which he may take any fresh air at all."

Whereupon the house ordered, "That the archbishop should take the air, for his health's sake, in company with Mr. Maxwell, the gentleman usher, to any place excepting the Spring-Garden, or any belonging to the king's house. But to be suffered to speak with nobody at that time out of the presence of the said usher, and he to be answerable for his grace's forthcoming."

Information against Dr. Piers Bishop of Bath and Wells.] Dec. 24. It was resolved, by the commons, upon the question, 'That, upon several Informations and Complaints to this house made against Dr. Wm. Piers, bishop of Bath and Wells, of divers heinous crimes, tending to corruption and subversion of religion in that diocese, and other misdemeanors of a high nature, a message shall be sent to the lords, to desire them to take security from himself, and others, to be forthcoming, and to stand and abide the judgment of parliament. Sir H. Mildmay to go up with this message.' This was done accordingly, and the bishop, by himself and sureties, was bound in 10,000*l.* bound to answer this Charge of the commons against him.

Alterations in the Judges Patents.] Jan. 15. About the beginning of this month a motion having been made, 'That for the future, this clause, 'Quamdiu se bene gesserint,' might be inserted in the patents of the Judges, instead of 'Durante beneplacito,' and a committee having been appointed to wait on the king with this request, the earl marshal and the lord Chamberlain reported this day, That his majesty condescended to the desired alteration for the future.

Bill for frequent holding of Parliaments.] Jan. 19. A Bill was brought in and read, called, 'A bill for preventing Inconvenience happening by the long Intermission of Parliaments;' and, upon the question, ordered to be engrossed. The next day it passed the commons, and was sent up to the lords. In the course of its progress through the commons,

Lord *Digby addressed the house thus: 'Mr. Speaker; I rise not now, with an intent to speak to the frame and structure of this bill, nor much by way of answer to objections that may be made; I hope there will be no occasion for this, but that we shall concur, all unapishly, in what concerneth all so universally. Only, sir, by way of preparation, to the end that we may not be discouraged in this great work, by difficulties that may appear in the way of it, I shall deliver unto you my apprehensions in general, of the vast importance and necessity that we should go through with it. The result of my sense is, in short, this, That, unless for the frequent convening of parliaments, there be some such course settled as may not be eluded, neither the people can be prosperous and secure, nor the king himself solidly happy. I take this to be the unum necessarium: let us procure this, and all our other desires will effect themselves. If this bill miscarry, I shall have left me no public hopes; and, once past, I shall be freed of all public fears.—The essentialness, sir, of frequent parliaments, to the happiness of this kingdom, might be inferred unto you by the reason of contraries, and from the woful experience which former times have had of the mischievous effects of any long intermission of them. But, Mr. Speaker, why should we climb higher than the level we are on; or think further than our horizon; or have recourse for examples in this business to any other promptuary than our own memories; nay, than the experience almost of the youngest here? The reflection, backward, on the distractions of former times upon intermission of parliaments, and the consideration, forward, of the mischiefs likely still to grow from the same cause, if not removed, doubtless gave first life and being to those two dormant statutes of Edw. 3. for the yearly holding of a parliament: and shall not the fresh and bleeding experience, in the present age, of miseries from the same spring, not to be paralleled in any other, obtain a wakening, a resurrection for them? The intestine distempers, sir, of former ages upon the want of parliaments, may appear to have had some other co-operative causes; as, sometimes unsuccessful wars abroad; sometimes, the absence of the prince; sometimes, competitions of titles to the crown; sometimes, perhaps, the vices of the king himself. Let us only consider the posture, the aspect of this state, both toward itself and the rest of the world; the person of our sovereign, and the nature of our suffering, since the 3d of his reign: and there can be no cause, colourably inventible, whereunto to attribute them, but the intermission, or, which is worse, the undue frustration of parliaments, by the unlucky use, if not abuse, of prerogative in the dissolving them. Take into your view, Mr. Speaker, a kingdom in a state of the greatest quiet and security that can be fancied; not only enjoying the calmest peace itself, but, to improve and secure its happy condition, all the rest of the world at the same time in tempests, in combustions, in uncomposible wars. Take into your view, sir, a king, sovereign of three kingdoms, by a concentrating of all the royal lines in his person, as indisputably as any mathematical ones in Euclid; a king, firm and knowing in his religion, eminent in virtue; a king, that hath, in his own time, given all the rights and liberties of his subjects a more clear and ample confirmation, freely and graciously (I mean in the Petition of Right) than any of his predecessors, (when the people had them at advantage) extortedly. This is one map of England, Mr. Speaker. A man, sir, that should present unto you, now, a kingdom, groaning under that supreme law which salus populi periclitata would enact; the liberty, the property, of the subject fundamentally subverted, ravished away by the violence of a pretended necessity; a triple crown shaking with distempers; men of the best conscience ready to fly into the wilderness for religion! Would not one swear that this were the antipodes to the other? And yet, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, this is a map of England too, and both at the same time but too true.—As it cannot be denied, Mr. Speaker, that, since the Conquest, there hath not been in this kingdom a fuller concurrence of all circumstances in the former character, to have made a kingdom happy, than for these 12 years last past; so it is most certain, that there hath not been, in all that deduction of ages, such a conspiracy, if one may so say, of all the elements of mischief in the second character, to bring a flourishing kingdom, if it were possible, to swift ruin and desolation. I will be bold to say, (and I thank God, we have so good a king, under whom we may speak boldly of the abuse of his power, by ill ministers, without reflection upon his person) that an accumulation of all the public Grievances since Magna Charta, one upon another, unto that hour in which the Petition of Right passed into an act of parliament, would not amount to so oppressive, I am sure not to so destructive, a height and magnitude to the rights and property of the subject, as one branch of our enslaving since the Petition of Right! The branch I mean is the Judgment concerning Ship-Money.—This being a true representation of England, in both aspects, let him, Mr. Speaker, that (for the unmatched oppression and enthralling of free subjects, in a time of the best king's reign, and in memory of the best laws enacted in favour of subjects liberty) can find a truer cause than the ruptures and intermission of parliaments; let him, I say, and him alone, be against the settling of this inevitable way for the frequent holding of them.—It is true, sir, wicked ministers have been the proximate causes of our miseries; but the want of Parliaments the primary, the efficient causes: ill ministers have made ill times; but that, sir, hath made ill ministers. I have read, among the laws of the Athenians, a form of recourse, in their oaths and vows of their greatest and public concernment, to a threefold deity, Supplicium exaltatori, purgatori, malorum depulsori. I doubt not but we, here assembled for the commonwealth in this parliament, shall meet with all these attributes in our sovereign. I make no question but he will graciously hear our supplications, purge away our grievances, and expel malefactors; that is, remove ill ministers, and put good in their places. No less can be expected from his wisdom and goodness.—But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, if we partake not of one attribute more in him; if we address not ourselves unto that, I mean honorum conservatori, we can have no solid, no durable comfort in all the rest: for let his majesty hear our complaints never so compassionately: let him purge away our grievances never so efficaciously: let him punish and dispel ill ministers never so exemplarily: let him make choice of good ones never so exactly: yet, if there be not a way settled to preserve and keep them good, the mischiefs and they will all grow again like Sampson's locks, and pull down the house upon our heads. Believe it, Mr. Speaker, they will. It hath been a maxim among the wisest legi-lators, That whosoever means to settle good laws, must proceed in them with a sinister opinion of all mankind, and suppose, that whosoever is not wicked, it is for want only of the opportunity. It is that opportunity of being ill, that we must take away, if ever we mean to be happy; which can never be done, but by the frequency of Parliaments. No state can wisely be confident of any public minister's continuing good, longer than the rod is over him. Let me appeal to all those that were present in this house, at the agitation of the Petition of Right; and let them tell us truly of whose promotion to the management of affairs do they think the generality would, at that time, have had better hopes than of the late Mr. Noy and sir Tho. Wentworth; both being at that time, and in that business, as I have heard, most keen and active patriots; and the latter of them, (to the eternal aggravation of his infamous treachery to the commonwealth be it spoken) the first mover and insister to have this clause added to the Petition of Right, 'That, for the comfort and safety of his majesty's subjects, he would be pleased to declare his will and pleasure, that all his ministers should serve him according to the laws and statutes of the realm.' (See p. 377).—And yet, Mr. Speaker, to whom now can all the imputations upon our liberties, under pretence of law, and the late shipwreck, at once, of all our property, be attributed more than to Noy: and those, and all other mischiefs whereby this monarchy hath been brought almost to the brink of destruction, so much to any as to that grand apostate to the commonwealth, the now lieutenant of Ireland? The first I hope God hath forgiven in the other world; and the latter must not hope to be pardoned in this, till he be dispatched to the other. Let every man but consider those men as once there were; the excellent law for the security of the subject, enacted immediately before their coming to employment, in the contriving whereof themselves were principal actors; the goodness and virtue of the king they served; and yet the high and public oppressions that, in his time, they have wrought; and surely there is no man but will conclude with me, that, as the deficiency of parliaments hath been the causa causarum of all the mischiefs and distempers of the present times; so the frequency of them is the sole catholic antidote that can preserve and secure the future from the like.—Mr. Speaker, let me yet draw my discourse a little nearer to his majesty himself, and tell you, that the frequency of parliaments is most essentially necessary to the power, the security, the glory of the king. There are two ways, Mr. Speaker, of powerful rule, either by fear, or love; but only one of happy and safe rule, that is, by love; that Firmissimum imperium quo obediētes gaudent to this Camillus advised the Romans. Let a prince consider what it is that moves a people, principally, to affection and dearth towards their sovereign, he shall see that there needs no other artifice in it than to let them enjoy, unmolestedly, what belongs unto them of right: if that hath been invaded and violated in any kind, whereby affections are alienated, the next consideration for a wise prince, that would be happy, is how to regain them; to which 3 things are equally necessary. 1. Reinstating them in their former liberty. 2. Revenging them of the authors of those violations; and, 3. Securing them from apprehensions of the like again. The first, God be thanked, we are in a good way of. The second in warm pursuit of. But the third, as essential as all the rest, till we be certain of Triennial Parliaments, at the least, I profess I can have but cold hopes of.—I beseech you then, since that security for the future is so necessary to that blessed union of affections, and this bill so necessary to that security; let us not be so wanting to ourselves, let us not be so wanting to our sovereign, as to forbear to offer unto him this powerful, this everlasting philter, to charm unto him the hearts of his people, whose virtue can never evaporate. There is no man, Mr. Speaker, so secure of another's friendship, but will think frequent intercourse and access very requisite to the support, to the confirmation of it: especially if ill offices have been done between them; if the raising of jealousies hath been attempted. There is no friend but would be impatient to be debarred from giving his friend succour and relief in his necessities.—Mr. Speaker, permit me the comparison of great things with little. What friendship, what union can there be so comfortable, so happy, as between a gracious sovereign and his people? And what greater misfortune can there be to both, than to be kept from intercourse, from the means of clearing misunderstandings, from interchange of mutual benefits? The people of England, sir, cannot open their ears, their hearts, their mouths, or their purses, to his majesty, but in parliament. We can neither hear him, nor complain, nor acknowledge, nor give, but there. This bill, sir, is the sole key that can open the way to a frequency of those reciprocal endearments, which must make and perpetuate the happiness of the king and kingdom. Let no man object any derogation from the king's prerogative by it. We do but present the bill, it is to be made a law by him. His honour, his power, will be as conspicuous in commanding at once that parliaments shall assemble every third year, as in commanding a parliament to be called this or that year. There is more of majesty in ordaining primary and universal causes, than in the actuating particularly of subordinate effects. I doubt not but that glorious king Edw. 3. when he made those laws for the yearly calling of parliaments, did it with a right sense of his dignity and honour. The truth is, sir, the king's of England are never in their glory, in their splendor, in their majestic sovereignty, but in parliament. Where is the power of imposing taxes? Where is the power of restoring from insolvency? Where is the legislative authority? Marry, in the king, Mr. Speaker. But how? In the king circled in, fortified and evirtuated by, his parliament. The king, out of parliament, hath a limited, a circumscribed jurisdiction: but, waited on by his parliament, no monarch of the East is so absolute in dispelling grievances. Mr. Speaker, in chasing ill ministers, we do but dissipate clouds that may gather again; but, in voting this bill, we shall contribute, as much as in us lies, to the perpetuating our sun, our sovereign, in his vertical, in his noon-day, lustre.*

Jan. 20. The votes of the commons, concerning Ship-Money, were sent up to the lords, by Mr. St. John, who made a learned speech on that occasion. Afterwards the lords proceeded to vote the illegality of it; which they did in the same manner as the commons, Dec. 7, nem. con.

Four Members expelled for being Monopolists.] Jan. 21. The commons expelled 4 of their members, Mr. Wm. Sandys, sir John Jacob, Mr. Tho. Webb, and Mr. Edm. Windham, for being Monopolists, according to a former order of this house. See p. 651.

A Sum voted for the Relief of the Scots.] Jan. 22. In a grand committee of the whole house, after long and serious debate, they came to this Resolution, 'That this house thinks fit that a friendly Assistance and Relief shall be given towards the Supply of the Losses and Necessities of the Scots; and that, in due time, this house will take notice of the measure and manner of it.' Upon this occasion,

Sir John Wray* delivered himself to this purport:—'Mr. Speaker; There is no malady more destructive to the natural or politic body, than the Morbus caducus, or falling-sickness; nor is there any physick or compound more to be esteemed than that which can cure it in either. Mr. Speaker, this unknown remedy, if we be wise to apply it, and take the receipt with all the ingredients, without any scruple of distaste, I am confident the recovery will be perfect, and the whole body of Great Britain safe and sound. Mr. Speaker, the happy Union of Scotland and England hath thus long, ever since, flourished in interchangeable blessings of plenty, and mutual love and friendship: but of late, by what fatal disasters and dark underminings we are divided, and severed into Scots and English armies, let their well-composed preambles speak for me; which I wish were printed as an excellent emblem of brotherly love, that discovers who hath wounded us both, and how each should strive to help the other in distress; seeing their and our religion and laws lye both at stake together. Think of it what you will, noble senate, their subsistence is ours; we live or die, rise or fall together. Let us then find out the Boutefeux of this prelatical war, and make them to pay the shot for their labour; who, no doubt, long for nothing more than that we should break with them, who worship but one God, and serve but one master with us: nor need we fear that they intend to dispossess the English of their inheritance or freehold, being ready to withdraw their forces upon reasonable terms, referring their demands of reparation for losses, to the justice and courtesy of this house; which I assure myself will give both a bountiful, chearful, and speedy supply in this case of necessity; for, 'bis dat, qui cito dat,' is the best motto, or motion at this time.'

Sir Benj. Rudyard made the following speech upon the same occasion:—'Mr. Speaker; It will become us thankfully to acknowledge the prudent and painful endeavours of my lords, the peers commissioners, in treating with the Scots, and in mediating with the king; whereby, God assisting, we are now probably drawing near to a blessed peace. His majesty, in his wisdom and goodness, is graciously pleased to give his royal assent to their acts of parliament, wherein the Articles of their assembly are likewise included; inasmuch as their religion, their laws, their liberties, are ratified and established, besides their Grievances relieved and redressed, for which we use to give the king money, and are still ready to do it. This, although it be a large, yet it is not received as a full satisfaction. Besides, when they came into England, they published in a Remonstrance, 'That they would take nothing of the English, but what they would pay for, or give security:' we have defrayed them hitherto, and have provided to do it longer. They may well remember, that we assisted them in the time of their reformation; and it is not to be forgotten, that we did bear our own charges. Concerning mutual restitution of ships and goods, my lords the commissioners have very fairly and discreetly accommodated that particular already. As for inferential and consequential damages, such a representation would but administer unacceptable matter of difference and contestation; which, amongst friends, ought to be warily and wisely avoided. We could alledge, and truly too, that Northumberland, Newcastle, and the Bishoprick, will not recover their former state these 20 years. We have heard it spoken here in this house, by an understanding knowing member in this particular, That the coal mines of Newcastle will not be set right again for 100,000*l.* beside the over price of coals, which all the while it hath and will cost this city, and other parts of the kingdom. A great deal more of this nature might be rehearsed; but I delight not to press such tender-stretched arguments: let us, on both sides, rather thank God, by proceeding in the way he hath laid before us, and wry not his way to ours: time and his blessing will repair all our implicit damages, with many prosperous explicit advantages. They say, that they do not make any formal demand, but they do make a sum to appear, 514,000*l.* which is more than ever we gave the king at once. A portentous apparition, which shews itself in a very dry time: when the king's revenue is totally exhausted, his debts excessively multiplied, the kingdom generally impoverished by grievous burthens and disordered courses! All this supply is to be drawn out of us only, without the least help from any of his majesty's other dominions; which to my seeming, will be an utter draining of the people, unless England be piteus inexhaustus, as the Popes were wont to call it.—Notwithstanding, sir, now that I have in part opened the state we are in, though nothing so exactly as they have done theirs, I shall most willingly and heartily afford the Scots whatsoever is just, equitable, and honourable, even to a convenient, considerable, round sum of money, towards their losses and expences, that we may go off with a friendly and handsome loss: if they reject it, we shall improve our cause. It was never yet thought, Mr. Speaker, any great wisdom, over much to trust a successful sword. A man that walks upon a rising ground, the further he goes, the larger is his prospect; success enlarges men's desires, extends their ambition, it breeds thoughts in them they never thought before; this is natural and usual. But the Scots being truly touched with religion, according to their profession, that only is able to make them keep their word; for religion is stronger and wiser than reason, or even reasons of state.—Beyond all this, Mr. Speaker, the remarkable traces of God's wonderful Providence in this strange work, are so many, so apparent, as I cannot but hope, almost to belief, that the same all-governing merciful hand, will conduct and lead us to a happy conclusion; will contract a closer, firmer union between the two nations, than any meer human policy could ever have effected, with incalculable benefits to both; in advancing the truth of religion; in exalting the greatness of the king; in securing the peace of his kingdoms, against all malicious, envious, ambitious opposites to religion, to the king, to his kingdoms; wherein I presume, all our desires and prayers do meet.

On the 3rd of Feb. the Affair of the Scots was again taken into consideration, by a committee of the whole house; and it was resolved, on the question, "That this house doth conceive that the sum of 300,000*l.* is a fit proportion for the friendly Assistance and Relief formerly thought proper to be given towards the supply of the Losses and Necessities of our brethren of Scotland; and that this house will, in due time, take into consideration the manner how, and the time when, the same shall be raised."

The Scots Commissioners return Thanks.] The next day this Resolution of the commons was made known to the lords, at a conference, and 3 days after, we find an Answer of the Scots Commissioners entered in the Lords' Journals, by way of returning their thanks for this extraordinary bounty; which we give in its own words:—"We intreat your lordships, whose endeavours God hath blessed in this great work, to make known to the parliament, that we do no less desire to shew our thankfulness for their friendly assistance and relief, than we have been earnest in demanding the same. But the thankfulness which we conceive to be due, does not consist in our affections or words at this time, but in the mutual kindness and real declarations to be expected from the whole kingdom of Scotland, in all times to come: and that, not only for the measure and proportion which the parliament hath conceived to be fit, and which, to begin our thankfulness now, we do, in the name of the whole kingdom, cheerfully accept of; but also for the kind and Christian manner of granting it unto us, as to their Brethren; which addeth a weight above many thousands, and cannot be compensated, but by paying the reciprocal love and duty of Brethren; and for the Resolution, To consider, in due time, for the raising the same for our relief, which also maketh the benefit to be double. This makes us confident that God, whose working at this time hath been wonderful, hath decreed the peace and amity of the kingdoms, and will remove all rubs out of the way, that our enemies at last will despair to divide us, when they see that God hath joined us in such a fraternity; and that Divine Providence will plentifully recompence unto the kingdom of England their justice and kindness, and unto Scotland all their losses; which shall, by these and other means amongst ourselves, be repaired by the rich and sweet blessing of the purity and power of the gospel, attended with the benefit of a happy and durable peace, under his majesty's long and prosperous reign, and of his royal posterity to all generations." Dated Feb. 5, 1640.

A Conference concerning the King's reprieving Goodman, a condemned Seminary Priest.] Jan. 23. The commons sent up to desire a conference with the lords, which being agreed to, a report of it was made in the upper house, by the lord privy seal, to this effect:—"That Mr. Glynn had acquainted them with the commons sending to the city of London, to advance money for his majesty's service, and that of the commonwealth; answer was returned, That there was a general discontent amongst the citizens, for the reprieve of one Goodman, a seminary priest, lately condemned for high treason, who had been formerly so for the same offence, and banished this kingdom. By which they found that there was a great connivance at Jesuits and Priests through the kingdom, to the great disheartening of the people in this time of parliament, when they expect a thorough reformation. The commons, therefore, desired their lordships assistance to discover such instruments as have dared to intercede for the interruption of public justice against such offenders, &c." The lords thought proper to acquaint the king with this message from the commons, and appointed the lord privy seal and the earl marshal to deliver it.

The King's Speech relating to the Distractions in the Government.] This day, the king having commanded both houses to come before him at Whitehall, his majesty spoke to them as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; A principal cause of my speaking to you now, is, that I foresee the great inconveniences that may daily arise, by the slow pace of this parliament, in those businesses that most import the welfare of this kingdom: therefore I hold it necessary, at this time, to lay, shortly, before you, the State of Affairs as they now stand, thereby to quicken, but not to interrupt, your proceedings.—And first, I must remember you, that there are two armies in the very bosom of this kingdom; and, in effect, as it cannot be otherwise, maintained by you. The very naming of which doth more lively represent the mischievous inconveniences thereof, than a better tongue than mine, in particular, can declare. Therefore I must, in the first place, recommend to your care the quick dispatch of this business; assuring you the delay thereof shall no ways be occasioned by me. In the next place, I must recommend to your care my Navy and Ports; the condition of both are so well known, as to need no mention in particulars: only thus much, when the walls and defences of this kingdom are weak and out of order, I leave all men to judge what disheartening it will give to our friends, and what encouragement to our enemies. Last of all, though not least of all to be considered, I must lay before you the present Distractions of Government, occasioned, partly, because of the parliament, though not by it. For some men taking occasion, by the sitting thereof, more maliciously than ignorantly, will put no difference between reformation and alteration of government. Hence it comes that divine service is irreverently interrupted, petitions tumultuously given, and much of my revenue detained or disputed.—More particulars I will not mention, because I will hasten to put you in a way of remedy; which I will do, first, by shewing you my clear intentions, then by warning you to eschew those rocks that may hinder this good work. First then, know that I shall readily concur with you to find out and reform all innovations in church and commonwealth; and, consequently, that all courts of justice shall be regulated according to law; my intention being to reduce all matters of Religion and Government, to what they were in the purest times of queen Elizabeth. Moreover, what parts of my Revenue that shall be found illegal, or grievous to the public, I shall willingly lay down, relying entirely on the affections of my people.—Having thus clearly shewn you mine intentions, I will now tell you what you are to eschew; to which purpose I cannot but take notice of those Petitions (I can't tell how to call them) given in the name of several counties, against the present established government of the church, and of the great threats that are given, That bishops shall be no better than cyphers, if not clear done away.—Now I must tell you, that I make a great difference betwixt reformation and alteration of government; though I am for the first, I cannot give way to the latter. I will not say that bishops may not have over-stretched their power, or incroached upon the temporal; which, if you find, correct and reform the abuse, according to the wisdom of former times; and so far I am with you. Nay farther; if, upon serious debate, you shall shew me that bishops have some temporal authority, inconvenient to the state, and not so necessary to the church, for the support of episcopacy, I shall not be unwilling to persuade them to lay it down. Yet, by this, you must understand, that I cannot consent for the taking of their voice in parliament, which they have antiently enjoyed under so many of my predecessors, even before the Conquest, and ever since; and which, I conceive, I am bound to maintain, as one of the fundamental institutions of this kingdom.—There is but one other rock, and that not in substance, but in form; yet that form is so essential, that, except it be reformed, it will mar the substance: there is a Bill given in for frequent Parliaments; the things I like, that is to say, to have often parliaments; but to give power to sheriffs and constables, and I know not whom, to do my office, that I cannot yield unto. But to shew you that I am desirous to please you in forms, which destroy not the substance, I am content you shall have an act for this purpose; but so reformed, that it neither intrench upon my honour, nor that inseparable right of the crown concerning parliaments: to which purpose I have commanded my learned counsel to wait on you, my lords, with such propositions as I hope will give contentment; for I ingenuously confess, that frequent parliaments are the best means to preserve that right understanding between me and my subjects, which I so earnestly desire.—To conclude all; I have now shewed you the State of Affairs, my own clear Intentions, and the Rocks I wish you to eschew. In all which you may perceive the desire I have to give you contentment; as you shall likewise find by these ministers I have, and intend to employ in my affairs, for the pursuance of my good intentions; which, I doubt not, will bring peace and happiness to my subjects, to the contentment of us all. I have no more to say at present."

A Remonstrance from both Houses concerning Seminary Priests, &c.] The commons being withdrawn, the king spoke a few words to the lords, to tell them, "That he heard of a conference to be that afternoon, about the business of Goodman the priest; and that, in a day or two, he would send them the reasons for what he had done in that matter, which he hoped would satisfy them."

But this not contenting the commons, they agreed to address the lords to join with them in a Petition to the king; and, on the 29th of this month, a Remonstrance of both houses was presented to the king by the lord keeper, to the following effect: "They desire the law relating to Jesuits and Seminary Priests, and insist upon the necessity of their being put in execution at this time; and particularly, because it appears to the commons, by proof, that of late years, about the city of London, 10 Priests and Jesuits have been discharged out of prison, many of them having been condemned of high treason: that they are credibly informed that, at this present, the Pope hath a Nuncio, or agent, resident in London; and they have just cause to believe the same to be true: that the Papists as publickly, and with much confidence and importunity, resort to us at Denmark-house, St. James's, and the ambassadors' chapels, as others do to their parish churches: that they conceive the not putting of these statutes in execution against priests and Jesuits, is a principal cause of the increase of Popery. Therefore they humbly desire, that a speedy course may be taken for the due execution of the laws against Priests and Jesuits, that all mischiefs, before mentioned, may be timely remedied by his majesty's great wisdom: and, lastly, that Goodman, the priest, be left to the justice of the law."

The King's Answer.] Feb. 3. The king sent the following answer: "My lords and gentlemen; Having taken into my serious consideration the late Remonstrance, made unto me by the houses of parliament, I give you my Answer, That I take in good part your use of the true religion established in this kingdom, from which I will never depart; as do for your tenderness of my safety, and security of this state and government. It is against my mind that Popery or Superstition should any way increase within this kingdom; and I will restrain the same, by causing the laws to be put in execution.—I am resolved to provide against Jesuits and Priests, by setting forth a Proclamation with all speed, commanding them to depart the kingdom within one month; which if they fail, or shall return, then they shall be proceeded against according to the laws. Concerning Rosetti, I bid you to understand, that the queen hath always assured me, that, to her knowledge, she hath no commission, but only to enter into a personal correspondence between her and the Pope, in things requisite for the exercise of her religion; which is warranted her by the articles of the marriage, which gave her a full liberty of conscience; yet she have persuaded her, that since the misunderstanding of this person's condition gives offence, she will, within a convenient time remove him. Moreover, I will take a special care to restrain my subjects from resorting to us at Denmark-house, St. James's, and the chapels of ambassadors. Lastly, concerning the Goodman, the priest, I will let you know in season why I surprised him. I am informed, either queen Elizabeth, nor my father, did ever swear, that any priest in their times was executed merely for religion; which seems to me to be his particular case; yet, seeing I am moved by both houses, to give way to us, and because I will avoid the inconvenience of giving so great discontent to my people, as I conceive this mercy may produce, therefore I do remit this particular case to both the houses; but I desire them to take into their consideration the inconveniences, as I conceive may, upon this occasion, fall upon my subjects and other protestants abroad; especially since it may seem to other states to be a severity: which suspicion having thus represented to you, I think myself discharged from all the ill consequence that may ensue upon the execution of this person."

A Letter from the Queen to the Commons on the same Occasion.] As the foregoing Remonstrance seemed principally levelled at the Queen's conduct at this time, she thought proper, the next day, to send the following Letter to the house of commons, by Mr. Comptroller:

"That her majesty hath been ready to use her best endeavours for the removing of all misunderstanding between the king and people: that, at the request of the lords who petitioned the king for a parliament, her majesty, at that time, writ effectually to the king, and sent a gentleman, expressly, to persuade the king to the holding of a parliament: That she hath, since, been most willing to do all good offices between the king and his people, which is not unknown to divers of the lords; and so shall ever continue to do, as judging it the only way of happiness to the king, herself, and kingdom, that all things be justly settled between the king and his people, and all cause of misunderstanding taken away and removed: that her maj. having taken knowledge, that having one sent to her from the pope, is distasteful to this kingdom, she is desirous to give satisfaction to the parliament; which, in convenient time, she will do, and remove him out of the kingdom: that understanding, likewise, that exception had been taken to the great resort to the chapel of Denmark-house, she will be careful not to exceed that which is convenient and necessary for the exercise of her religion. She further taketh notice, that the parliament is not satisfied with the manner of raising money, for the assistance of the king in his journey to the North, in the year 1639, at her entreaty from the catholics;* but she was moved thereunto, merely out of her dear and tender affection to the king, and of the example of other his majesty's subjects; she seeing the like forwardness, could not but express her own forwardness to the assistance of the king: that if any thing be illegal, she was ignorant of the law, and was carried therein only out of a great desire to be assisting to the king in so pressing an occasion; but promiseth to be more cautious hereafter, not to do any thing but what may stand with the established laws of the kingdom: that her maj. being desirous to en-ply her whole power to unite the king and people, desireth the parliament to look forwards, and pass by such mistakes and errors of her servants, as may be formerly committed; and this their respect, she promiseth, shall be repaid with all the good offices she can do to the house, which they shall find with real effects, as often as there shall be occasion."

The Journals inform us, That this message being read in the house, Mr. Comptroller was desired to return their humble thanks to her majesty, for her gracious expressions therein.

Goodman, the Priest's Petition to be executed, for Peace-Sake.] Before we dismiss the affair of John Goodman the priest, we shall here insert a remarkable letter of this man's to the king, as it is entered in the Lords Journals, when the king's Answer to the Remonstrance was reported to that house, and which, we suppose, occasioned his maj. to refer his punishment to the will of both houses, rather than have any hand in it himself: but we cannot learn whether this priest was executed or not.

"To the King's most excellent majesty:
The PETITION of JOHN GOODMAN, condemned,

"Humbly sheweth, That whereas your majesty's petitioner hath understood of a great discontent, in many of your majesty's subjects, at the gracious mercy your maj. was freely pleased to shew unto your petitioner, by suspending the execution of the sentence of death, pronounced against your petitioner, for being a Roman priest: these are humbly to beseech your maj: rather to remit your petitioner to their mercies that are discontented, then to let him live the subject of so great a discontent in your people against your maj. For it hath pleased God to give me grace to desire with the prophet, 'That if this storm be raised for me, I may be cast into the sea, that others may avoid the tempest.' This is, most sacred sovereign, the Petition of him, that should esteem his blood well shed, to cement the breach between your maj. and your subjects, on this occasion. Ita testor, "JOHN GOODMAN."

The King's Speech to the Lords about the Marriage of the Lady Mary with the Prince of Orange.] Feb. 10. This day the king came to the house of lords; the business he came upon was expressed in a short speech, as follows:

"My lords; That freedom and confidence which I expressed, at the beginning of this parliament, to have of your love and fidelity towards my person and estate, hath made me at this time come hither to acquaint you with that alliance and confederacy which I intend to make with the prince of Orange and the United Provinces; which, before this time, I did not think expedient to do, because that part, which I do desire your advice and assistance upon, was not ready to be treated on. I will not trouble you with a long digression, by shewing you the steps of this Treaty; but leave you to be satisfied in that by those who, under me, do manage that affair: only I shall shew you the reasons which have induced me to it, and in which I expect your assistance and counsel. The considerations that have induced me to it are these: 1st. The matter of Religion: here needs no dispensation; no fear that my daughter's conscience may be any way perverted. 2ndly. I do esteem that a strict alliance and confederacy with the States will be as useful to this kingdom, as that with any of my neighbours; especially considering their affinity, neighbourhood, and way of strength. And, lastly, which I must never forget on these occasions, the use I may make of this Alliance towards the re-establishing of my sister and my nephews. Now, to shew in what I desire your assistance; you must know that the Articles of Marriage are in a manner concluded, but not to be totally ratified until that of Alliance be ended and agreed; which, before I demanded your assistance, I did not think fit to enter upon. And that I may not leave you too much at large how to begin that council, I present you here the Propositions which are offered by me to the States's ambassadors for that intent. And so, my lords, I shall only desire you to make as much expedition in your counsels, as so great a business shall require, and shall leave your lordships to your own free debate."

This proposition was well approved of by the whole nation; and, soon after, the Marriage was concluded with great solemnity.

The King's Speech on giving the royal Assent to the Bill for Triennial Parliaments.] Many conferences were held this month, between the lords and commons, about settling the bill. For preventing Inconveniences, which happen by the long Intermission of Parliaments; on the 15th it was finally concluded, and ready for the royal assent. The commons, however, seemed to be jealous that the king would not pass it; for, that same day, they sent a message to the lords, by sir Francis Seymour, to acquaint their lordships, That they had deputed some of their members to attend his majesty, and desire that the royal assent may be given to the bill of Subsidies that afternoon: and that their lordships may be pleased to depute some lords to move his majesty, that the bill for Triennial Parliaments may pass at the same time; which the lords agreed to, and received for Answer, 'That his maj. would take that afternoon to consider of this request, in regard of the late warning of it at this time, and will return an Answer in the morning.' Accordingly,

Feb. 16. The king came to the house of lords, and being seated on his throne, the lords in their robes, and the commons, with their Speaker, attending, the title of the bill for Triennial Parliaments was read; on which his majesty made the following speech to both houses:

"My lords, and you the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons, You may remember, when both houses were with me at the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, I did declare unto you two rocks I wished you to shun. This is one of them, and of that consequence, that I think never bill passed here, in this house, of more favour to the subjects than this is, and if the other rock be as happily passed over as this shall be at this time, I do not know for what you can ask, for ought I can see, at this time, that I can make any question to yield unto: therefore I mention this, to shew unto you the sense that I have of this bill; and the obligation, as I may say, that you have to me for it; hitherto, to speak freely, I have had no great encouragement to do it: and if I should look to the outward pace of your actions and proceedings, and not look to the inward intentions of your hearts, I might make a question of it. Hitherto, you have gone on in that which concerns yourselves to amend; and not those things that merely concern the strength of this kingdom, neither for the state, nor for my own particular. This I mention, not to reproach you, but to shew you the state of things as they are. You have taken the government almost in pieces, and, I may say, it is almost off the hinges. A skilful watchmaker, to make clean his watch, will take it asunder; and, when it is put together, it will go the better, so that he leave not out one pin of it. Now, as I have done all this on my part, you know what to do on yours: and, I hope, you shall see clearly, that I have performed really what I expressed to you, at the beginning of this parliament, of the great trust I have of your affections to me: and this is the greatest expression of trust, that, before you do any thing for me, I do put such a confidence in you."

After this speech was ended, the clerk of the parliament read the king's royal assent to the aforesaid bill, in these words: 'Le Roy le veut.' Next, the Speaker of the house of commons, in a short speech, presented a bill, intitled, 'An Act for Relief of his Majesty's May, and the Northern Parts of this Kingdom,' containing a grant of 4 entire Subsidies, humbly beseeching his majesty to accept thereof. The clerk then read the royal assent to the said bill, in these words: 'Le Roy remercient ses bons sujets, accepte leur Benevolence, et ainsi le veut.'

Both Houses return Thanks to the King for passing the Triennial Bill.] The commons being returned to their house, a message was brought from the lords by the lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, (sir John Banks,) and Mr. justice Heath, 'That their lordships are so full of joy, for his majesty's gracious Answer to the bill of the Triennial Parliaments, that they do intend to wait upon his maj. to-morrow when he will please to give them leave to express their most humble thanks: and they assure that this house would join with them in: and that their lordships will likewise intimate unto his maj. that there may be ringing of bells, and bonfires throughout the whole Kingdom.' Answer was returned by the same messengers, 'That this house hath taken into consideration their lordships message, and do receive it with much joy; and were in agitation of the same business, just as the message was sent, and will be ready to join with their lordships, as is desired, at such time and place as shall be appointed.' Soon after another message was brought by the same Judges, 'That the lords, that attended his majesty, are returned with this answer to the lords house: 'That his maj. is pleased that both houses shall attend him this afternoon, between 2 and 3 o'clock, at the Banqueting-House at Whitehall: 'They conceive that which is to be spoken is to be said by the lord keeper, in the name of both houses; and, for that purpose, have conceived a form, but leave it to this house to make such alteration as they shall think fit.'

The lord chief justice having read the same, the commons agreed to the form proposed. And, accordingly both houses attended the king in the Banqueting-house; when the lord keeper, Littleton, in their names, returned thanks to his majesty in hæc verba:

"May it please your majesty; I am to give your maj. most humble and hearty thanks, in the name of both houses of parliament and this whole kingdom, for the speedy and gracious royal assent unto the bill entitled, 'An Act for preventing of Inconveniences happening by the long Intermission of Parliaments,' which, as it is of a singular comfort and security for all your subjects for the present, so they are confident, it will be of infinite honour and settlement for your majesty's royal crown and dignity, as well as comfort to their posterity."

Abstract of the Triennial Bill.] As we have made it a rule, in the course of this work, to take notice of the most remarkable laws passed in every parliament, we shall give a view of this most extraordinary act; especially as it was repealed in the 16th year of this king's eldest son and successor; and is therefore not to be found in the Statutes at Large.* The preamble runs thus: "Whereas, by the laws and statutes of this realm, a parliament ought to be holden at least once every year, for the redress of grievances; but the appointment of the time and place for the holding thereof hath always belonged, as it ought, to his majesty and his royal progenitors: and whereas it is, by experience, found, that the not holding of parliaments accordingly, hath produced sundry and great mischiefs and inconveniences to the king's majesty, the church and commonwealth; for the prevention of like mischiefs and inconveniences in time to come, be it enacted, That the said laws and statutes shall be henceforth duly observed: that if a Parliament be not summoned and assembled before the 3rd of Sept. in every third year, then a parliament shall assemble and be held on the 2nd Monday in Nov. ensuing: that if the lord chancellor shall fail to issue out writs, pursuant to the directions of this act, then the peers of the realm shall meet at the usual place, at the old palace of Westminster, and they, or any 12, or more, shall issue out writs in the king's name: that in case of default by the peers, the sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. shall cause elections to be made: and, in their default, the freeholders, citizens, and burgesses shall proceed to the election of knights, citizens and burgesses, in such manner as if writs of summons had been duly issued. That no Parliament, henceforth to be assembled, shall be dissolved or prorogued within 50 days after the time appointed for their meeting, nor adjourned within fifty days after their meeting, but by consent of either house respectively, who may appoint each their own Speaker." Besides the above clauses, there were many provisos for the effectual putting this act in execution, and penalties on the respective offenders: and that none might plead ignorance, it was ordered to be read, yearly, at the sessions and assizes.*

Sir Simonds D'Ewes's Speech concerning the Precedency of the two Universities. We meet with a speech of sir Simonds D'Ewes, occasioned by the afore-mentioned Bill for 4 Subsidies; but the day is not mentioned. The Editor thereof gives us the following account of it:† "This bill, for relief of the king's army, having been drawn by a committee, Cambridge was placed before Oxford; whereupon it was ordered to be disputed and debated in a grand committee; and when it came to that clause, where Cambridge was placed before Oxford, many of the house that had been Oxford men, cried to have Oxford placed first; but the Cambridge men cried, that the bill should stand as it was; and thereupon the Oxford men called to have it put to the question; and divers Cambridge men called upon sir Simonds D'Ewes, being then present at the committee, which drew him to speak as followeth."

Sir Simonds D'Ewes. 'I stand up to persuade, if it may be, the declining of the present question, and the further dispute of this business. We had a long debate, lately, about the placing Cambridge before Oxford, in the said bill. I account it no honour to Cambridge, that it got the precedence by voices at the former committee; nor will it be any glory to Oxford to gain it by voices here, where we all know the multitude of borough towns of the western parts of England, which do send so many worthy members hither, as (if we measured things by number, and not by weight) Cambridge is sure to lose it. I would propose a more noble way for deciding the present controversy than by question; in which, if the university of Oxford, which I do highly respect and honour, shall obtain the prize, it will be far more glory to it, than to carry it by multitude of voices: let us therefore dispute it by reason, and not make an idol of either place; and if I shall be so convinced, I shall readily change my voice, wishing we may find the same ingenuity in the Oxford-men. There are two principal respects, in which these famous universities may claim precedence of each other. 1. In respect of their being; as they were places of note in the elder age. 2. As they were antient nurseries, and seed-plots of learning.—If I do not therefore prove that Cambridge was a renowned city, at least 500 years before there was a house in Oxford standing, and whilst brute beasts fed, and corn was sown on that place where that city is now seated; and that Cambridge was a nursery of learning before Oxford was known to have a grammar-school in it, I will yield up the bucklers. If I should spend time to reckon up the vain allegations produced for the antiquity of Oxford, by Twyne; and of Cambridge, by Caius, I should but repeat the dreams of the antients; for I account the most they have published in print to be no better. But I find, by authority without exception, that in the antient Catalogue of the British Cities, Cambridge is the ninth in number, where London is but the eleventh: and who would have thought that Oxford would have contended for precedence with Cambridge, which London gave it 1200 years since? This I find in Gildas Albanus's British Story, who died about the year 520, being the antientest domestic monument we have, p. 60. And a Saxon anonymous story, written in Latin, touching the Britons and Saxons, p. 39. who saith of himself, That he lived in the day days of Penda, king of the Mercians, in the 10th year of his reign, and that he knew him well; which falls out to be near upon the year 620. And, lastly, I find the same Catalogue of the said British Cities, with some little variation, to be set down in Nennius's Latin story of Britain, p. 38: and he wrote the same, as he says himself, in 880. They all call it Cair-grant: the word Cair, in the old Celtic tongue, signifying City.—These three stories are exotic and rare monuments, remaining yet only in antient manuscripts amongst us, not known to many; but the authority of them is irrefragable, and without exception. The best and most antient copies, that I have seen, of Gildas Albanus

* The preamble for repealing this act runs thus: "Whereas an Act made in the parliament begun at Westminster the 3rd day of Nov. in the 13th year of the reign of our late sovereign lord king Charles of blessed memory, entitled, 'An Act for preventing of Inconveniences happening by the long Intermission of Parliaments,' is in derogation of his majesty's just rights and prerogative inherent to the imperial crown of this realm, for the calling and assembling of parliaments; and may be an occasion of manifold mischiefs and inconveniences, and much endanger the peace and safety of his majesty, and all his liege people of this realm: be it therefore enacted," &c.

and Names remain in the university library of Cambridge; being those I have vouched, and the Saxon Anonymous in a library we have near us. This Cair-grant is not only expounded by Alfred of Beverly, to signify Cambridge, but also by William de Ramsay, abbot of Croylund; who, in his manuscript story of the Life of Guthlacus, (ignorantly, in those elder days, reputed a saint) goes yet further, and says it was so called a granta flumine. This place still remained a city of fame and repute, a long time, under the reign of the English Saxons, and is called, in many of the old Saxon manuscript annals, Granteceaster; and, notwithstanding the great devastations it suffered with other places, by the Danish incursions, yet, in the first volume of the book of Doomesday, (for now I come to cite the records) it appears to have been a place of considerable moment, having in it decem custodias, and a castle of great strength and extent. And so I have done with Cambridge as a renowned place.— And now I come to speak of it as it hath been a nursery of learning: but I will not begin higher with it than the time of the learned Saxon monarch, king Alfred; because, I suppose, no man will question or gainsay but that there are sufficient testimonies of certain persons that did, together, in Cambridge, study the arts and sciences much about that time: had it grew so famous for learning about the time of Wm. I. the Norman, that he sent his youngest son Henry thither, to be there instructed; who was afterwards king of England, by the name of Hen. I. and was surnamed Beasclerke, in respect of his great and uncommon knowledge. If I should undertake to alledge and vouch the records, and other monuments of good authority, which assert and prove its increase and flourishing estate in the succeeding ages, I should spend more time than our weighty occasions at this time will permit. It shall therefore suffice to add, that the most ancient and first endowed college of England, was that called Valence in Cambridge; which, long after the foundation thereof, as appears by one of our Parliament-Rolls, (Rot. Parl. anno 66 Hen. 6. num. 31.) remaining upon record in the Tower of London, received the name of Pembroke-Hall.—It appearing therefore so evidently, by all that I have said, that Cambridge is, in all respects, the elder sister, which I speak not to derogate from Oxford; my humble advice therefore is, That we lay aside the present question, as well to avoid division amongst ourselves, as to entomb all further emulation between the two sisters, and that we suffer the present bill to pass as it is now penned; and the rather, because Oxford had the precedence in the last bill of this nature that passed this house.*

This debate not being taken notice of in the Journals, and the title only, but not the act itself, being printed in Scobell's Collections and the Statutes at Large, it does not appear which of the Universities had the precedence in this bill.

Judge Berkley accused of High Treason.]

Feb. 11. It was resolved, upon the question, 'That sir Robert Berkley, knt. one of the Judges of the King's Bench, shall be accused by this house of High Treason, and other great misdemeanors; and that sir John Colepeper be appointed to go to the lords, and desire that he may be forthwith committed; and that this house will shortly exhibit particular Articles against him.' In consequence of this, judge Berkley was taken off the bench, in Westminster-Hall, by the usher of the black rod, and committed: which struck a great terror in the rest of his brethren, then sitting, and on all of his profession.

Feb. 26. The commons exhibited, at a conference of both houses, their Charge against Dr Wm. Laud, ahp. of Canterbury: but the Articles themselves, and Mr. Pym's speech on the delivery of them, being both printed in the Trial at large, in the single Folio edition, and in the State Trials, are unnecessary here; especially when it is considered that the bulk of it is by far too copious for this design.

March 1. This day is principally taken notice of, on account of an extraordinary division of the house; both from the number of members then attending, and the equality of their voices. One Dr. Chaffin had been sent for as a delinquent, by the serjeant at arms, for speaking of indiscreet words in a Sermon, preached by him in the cathedral church of Salisbury, at a metropolitical visitation held there; which words did admit of such an interpretation as reflects, in an ill and scandalous sense, upon parliaments. The words were these, which he also added to the Litany, 'From all Lay-Puritans, and all Lay-Parliament-men, good Lord deliver me.' The question being put, Whether, for these words, Dr. Chaffin should be committed prisoner to the Tower? The house divided, and it was carried in the negative, 190 against 189, in all 379; a greater division than any we have met with during this parl. It was ordered, however, That the doctor should be called to the bar, and receive a sharp reprehension and admonition, and make a public explanation of his words, in the cathedral of Salisbury, on some Lord's day, within some convenient time afterwards.

March 5. Lord Andover* made the following speech concerning the Star Chamber, in the house of lords:—'My lords; Since your lordships have already looked so far into the privileges of the peers, as to make a strict inquiry into Foreign Honours; let us not destroy that among ourselves, which we desire to preserve from strangers. And if this grievance I shall move against, have slept till now, it is very considerable, lest custom make it every day more apparent than others. Your lordships very well know, there was a statute framed 3 Hen. 7. authorizing the chancellor, treasurer, and privy-seal, and the two chief justices, calling to them one bishop, and a temporal lord of the king's council to receive complaints upon bill or information, and cite such parties to appear as stand accused of any misdemeanor; and this was the infancy of the Star-Chamber: but afterwards the Star-Chamber was, by cardinal Woolsey, in Henry 8th's time, raised to man's estate; from whence, being now altogether unlimited, it is grown a monster; and will hourly produce worse effects, unless it be reduced by that hand which laid the foundation; for the statutes, that are ratified by parliament, admit of no other way of repeal. Therefore I offer humbly unto your lordships these ensuing reasons, why this statute of Henry 7th should be repealed. 1. The very words of the statute clearly shew that it was a needless institution; for it says, They who are to judge, can proceed with no delinquent otherwise than if he were convicted of the same crime by due process of law. And do your lordships hold this a rational court that sends us to the law, and calls us back from it again? 2. Divers judicatories confound one another, 'et in pessima publica plurimæ sunt leges.' And this reason is from circumstance, or rather à consuetudine; of which there are many examples both domestic and foreign; but more particularly the parliaments of France, abbreviated into a standing committee by Philip the Long; and continued, according to his institution, until Lewis 11th came to the crown, who, being a subtil prince, buried the volume in the epitome; for, to this day, whenever the three estates are called, either at the death of the old king; or to crown the new, it is a common proverb, 'Allons voir feu les états.' My lords, arbitrary judgments destroy the common laws; and, in them, the two great charters of the kingdom; which, being once lost, we have nothing left of liberty but the name. Then the last reason is, though it was the first cause of my standing up, the great eclipse it hath ever been to the whole nobility: for who are so frequently vexed there as peers and noblemen: and notwithstanding their appeal to this assembly is ever good, whilst that famous law of 4 Edw. 3. remains in force, for the holding of a parliament once a year, or more, if occasion require; yet who durst, a year ago, mention such a statute, without the incurring the danger of a prosecution? Therefore I shall humbly move your lordships, That a select committee of a few may be named, to consider of the act of parliament itself; and, if they shall think it of as great prejudice as I do, that then the house of commons, in the most usual manner, may be made acquainted with it either by bill or conference, who also haply think it a bur-

then to the subject; and so when the whole body of parliament shall join in one supplication, I am confident his maj. will desire that nothing shall remain in force which his people do not willingly obey.'

Lord Andover's Speech concerning the Pacification with the Scots. March 6. Lord Andover* made the following speech concerning the Pacification with the Scots:—'My lords; I did lately move your lordships, that the breach of the Pacification might be speedily reviewed, as the unum necessarium; and truly my opinion, at that time, is yet nothing altered; although, upon better thoughts, methinks, it should first be known who did actually engage us in these fruitless dissensions, and so derive the mischief from some original: for, my lords, the kingdom cannot now long stand at gaze, or undergo new burthens. Wherefore what is to be done (if you intend it should prosper) must presently receive life from the whole people, or otherwise we shall expire in a dream; and when the success differs from expectation, it is not enough to cry out, Quod non putabam. My lords, the wise man says, 'There is a proper season for all things under the sun; and we often find the experiment in natural bodies, which are voluntarily weakened, to recover strength, yet with a restriction to such bounds, and limits, as the physician prescribes himself; and truly, I think it is your lordships case at this point, either to consider what should further be done than is already, or else how to get out of those labyrinth we now are in, lest the words of the Psalmist come home to ourselves, 'Vendidisti populum sine pretio.'—My lords, I am confident the house of commons doth thoroughly see both into the prejudice and vast expense that these two armies lay upon the land; and undoubtedly, so many gentlemen of worth, as sit there, will have tender eyes upon the commonwealth. It will therefore become your lordships to second them in your way, and whilst they apply to public wounds, the care of this house may search the intestines; for if they be not cleansed, it will be but a superficial cure, and break out again.—My lords, it seems the earl of Strafford and the abp. of Canterbury have gone the high ways of iniquity, and every one knows how to trace them; but mines under ground are most considerable, which, unless they be likewise found out, may at any time spring, and supplant the whole fabric of all our labours. Let us then examine this fantastic war, ab initio; lest, as the duke of Burgundy made a few sheep skins the cause of his quarrel; so we shall find those sheets of paper, sent under the name of a Liturgy, and book of Canons, were but the Mops of the story, to divert our eyes from the main design.—Therefore my humble motion shall be for a select committee of no great number, who may have power from the house to begin ab origine mali; revise every man's negotiations, who was either an actor or counsellor since the first appearance of those troubles in Scotland; and that they may examine the Scots counsel upon such articles, as the heavy pressure of this kingdom shall, upon common fame, administer unto them.'

The King's Offer to reduce the Forest Laws. This day, the earl of Holland signified to the lords, 'That the king had commanded him to let them know, That his majesty understanding that the Forest Laws are grievous to the subjects of this kingdom, his majesty, out of his grace and goodness to his people, is willing to lay down all the new Bounds of his Forests in this kingdom, and that they shall be reduced to the same condition as they were before the late justice seats were held.'

Bill for disabling Bishops, &c. from holding civil Offices. March 11. This day it was resolved, 'That for Bishops, or any other clergyman whatsoever, to be in the commission of the peace, or to have any judicial power in the Star-Chamber, or in any civil court, is a hindrance to their spiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away; and a bill was ordered for that purpose.'

It hath been taken notice of, that few or no reports, from conferences held between the two houses, are entered in the Journals of the commons; a blank being usually left instead of it.

Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Cosins. March 15. Mr. Rouse carried up, from the house of commons, Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Cosins, prebendary and treasurer of the church of Durham; which he introduced in the following manner:—'My lords; I am commanded by the house of commons, to present to your lordships a Declaration and Impeachment against Dr. Cosins, and others, upon the complaint of Mr. Peter Smart; which Mr. Smart was a proto-martyr, or first confessor of note, in the late days of persecution. The whole matter is a tree, whereof the branches and fruit are manifest in the Articles of this Declaration; which being read, I shall, with your lordships favour, discover and lay open the root.'

The ARTICLES were read thus:

'I. That he was the first man that caused the Communion-Table in the church of Durham to be removed, and set Altar wise; in the erecting and beautifying whereof, he (being then treasurer) expended 200*l*. II. That he used to officiate at the West-Side thereof, turning his back to the people. III. That he used extraordinary Bowings to it. IV. That he compelled others to do it, using violence to the persons of them that refused so to do: for instance, once some omitting it, he comes out of his seat, down to the seat where they sat, being gentlewomen, called them whores and jades, and pagans, and the like unseemly words, and rent some of their cloaths. V. That he converted divers Prayers, in the Book of Common-Prayer, into Hymns, to be sung in the Choir, and played with the organ, contrary to the antient custom of that church. VI. That whereas it had been formerly a custom in that church, at the end of every sermon to sing a psalm, this custom, when Dr. Cosins came thither, was abrogated; and, instead thereof, they sung an anthem in the choir; there being no psalm sung either at the minister's going up into the pulpit, or at his coming down. VII. That the first Candlemas-day, at night, that he had been in that church, he caused 300 wax-candles to be set up and lighted in the church at once, in honour of our lady, and placed threescore of them on and about the Altar. VIII. That, in this church, there were reliques of divers images, above which were remaining the ruins of two scorpions, with the picture of Christ between them, erected in queen Mary's reign, in the time of Popery: all which, when queen Elizabeth came to the crown, were demolished by virtue of a commission by her to that intent granted; which, so continued demolished from that time, till, Dr. Cosins came to that church; who, being treasurer, caused the same to be repaired, and most gloriously painted. IX. That, all the time he was unmarried, he wore a cope off white satin, never officiating in any other, it being reserved solely for him, no man except himself making use thereof; which, after marriage, he cast off, and never after wore. X. That, there was a knife belonging to the church, kept altogether in the vestry, being put to none but holy uses, as cutting the bread in the sacrament, and the like; Dr. Cosins refusing to cut the same with any other but that, thinking all others that were unconsecrated, polluted; but that which he put holiness into, ever was termed the consecrated knife. XI. That, in a Sermon preached in that church, he did deliver certain words in disgrace of the reformers of our church: for instance, the words were these: 'The Reformers of the Church, when they abolished the Mass, took away all good order; and, instead of reformation, made it a deformation.' XII. That he seldom or never, in any of his sermons, stiled the Ministers of the Word and Sacraments, by any other name than Priests; nor the Communion-Table by any other name than Altar. XIII. That, by his appointment there was a cope bought, the seller being a convicted Jesuit, and afterwards employed in that church, having upon it the picture of the invisible and incomprehensible Trinity. XIV. That whereas it had been formerly a custom in that church, at 5 of the clock, to have morning-prayers read, winter and summer; this custom, when Dr. Cosins came thither, was abandoned, and, instead thereof was used singing, and playing on the organs, and some few prayers read; and this was called the first Service: which being ended, the people departed out of the church, returning at 9, having then Morning-Prayers read unto them; and this was called the second Service. Which innovation, being disliked and complained of

by Mr. Justice Hutton, was reformed. XV. That he framed a superstitious ceremony, in lighting the Tapers which were placed on the Altar, which, for instance, was this: a company of boys, that belonged to the church, came in at the choir-door with torches in their hands, lighted, bowing towards the Altar at their first entrance, bowing thrice before they lighted their tapers; having done, they withdrew themselves, bowing so oft as before; and once turning their back-parts towards the altar, the organs all the time going. XVI. That he counselled some young students of the University, to be imitators and practisers of his superstitious ceremonies; who, to ingratiate themselves in his favour, did accordingly; and being afterwards reproved for the same, by some of their friends, confessed that Dr. Cosins first induced them to that practice, and encouraged them therein. XVII. That he used, upon Communion-Days, to make the Sign of the Cross with his finger, both upon the seats whereon they were to sit, and the cushions to kneel upon, using some words when he so did. XVIII. That one Sabbath-Day there was set up an unnecessary company of tapers and lights in the church; which, Dr. Hunt, being then dean, fearing they might give offence, being they were unnecessary, sent his man to pull them down, who did so: but Dr. Cosins, being thereat aggrieved, came to the fellow, and there mis-called him in a most uncivil manner; and began to beat him in the public view of the congregation, to the great disturbance of the same. XIX. That the Dean and Chapter of that Church, where Dr. Cosins was one, with many others, being invited to dinner in the city of Durham, Dr. Cosins, then and there, spake words derogating from the king's prerogative. The words were these, 'The king had no more power over the church, than the boy that rubs my horse's heels.' XX. That there being many Canons of the said church present at that time, amongst the rest there was one took more notice of his words than the rest, and acquainted one of his fellow canons with them when he came home. This canon being a friend to Dr. Cosins, told the doctor that such a man exclaimed against him, and charged him with words which he should speak at such a time. The doctor presently sends for him; and when he came into the house, the doctor desires him to follow him into an inner room, who did so; but, as soon as he came in, the doctor shuts the door, and sets both his hands upon him, calling him rogue and rascal, and many other names; inasmuch that the man, fearing he would do him mischief, cried out. Mrs. Cosins coming in, endeavoured to appease her husband, and, holding his hands, the other ran away. XXI. That the doctor did seek many unjust ways to ensnare this man, that so he might take a fit occasion to put him out of his place; but none of them taking effect, he put him out by violence, having no other reason why he did so, but because he had no good voice, when he had served the place two years before Dr. Cosins came thither: for instance of which unjust ways to ensnare this man, Dr. Cosins hired a man and a woman to pretend a desire of matrimony, and to offer a sum of money to this petty canon to contract matrimony between them in a private chamber; so thereupon to take advantage of his revenge upon him."

These Articles being read, Mr. House proceeded thus: 'My lords; I am now to discover the root of Mr. Smart's persecution. Your lordships have heard of a great design to bring in Popery: you have heard of armies of soldiers, and particularly of the Popish Irish army; the burthen and complaint of the commons: but there is another army not so much spoken of, and that is, an army of Priests: for since Altars came in, so they delight to be called. It is a saying of Gregory the Great, 'That when antichrist comes, Preparatus est exercitus Sacerdotum,' there is an army of Priests to receive him. This is fulfilled in our time; for certainly this army of priests doth many ways advance the design and plot of Popery. The first is by the subversion of our laws and government. Our laws and Popery cannot stand together; but either Popery must overthrow our laws, or our laws must overthrow Popery. But to overthrow our laws, they must overthrow parliaments; and to overthrow parliaments, they must overthrow property: they must bring the subject's goods to be arbitrarily disposed, that so there may be no need of parliaments. This hath been done by Dr. Manwaring, (whom we find wanting, yet not in the seats, but at the bar of the lords house) and the like by Dr. Beale: and I think it was the intention of the late canons.—A second way, by which this Army of Priests advanceth the Popish design, is the way of treaty. This hath been acted both by writings and conference. Sancta Clara himself saith, 'Docetissimi eorum quibuscum egi:' so it seems they had conferences together: and Sancta Clara, on his part, labours to bring the Articles of our Church to Popery; and some of our side strive to meet them in that way. We have a testimony, that the great arch-priest himself hath said, 'It were no hard matter to make a reconciliation, if a wise man had the handling of it.' But I verily believe that, as the state of papacy stands, a far wiser man than he cannot reconcile us without the loss of our religion: for the Pope being fastened to his errors, even by his chair of inerrability, he sits still unmoved; and so we cannot meet, except we come wholly to him. A man standing in a boat tied to a rock, when he draws the rope, doth not draw the rock to the boat, but the boat to the rock. And Sancta Clara doth (in this somewhat honestly) confess it; for he saith, That he dealt in this way of treaty, not to draw the church to the Protestants, but the Protestants to the church.—A third way is the way of violence: this violence they exercise partly by secular arms, and partly by priestly arms, which they call spiri-

ual. For secular arms we have their own confession, that the late war was Bellum Episcopale; and we have the Papists confession, that it was Bellum Papale; for, in their letters, they say, 'That the war concerns them, not only as subjects, but as Catholics; for so they falsely call themselves; and if it be so, then Bellum Episcopale is also Bellum Papale: in the Episcopal war, the Papal cause is advanced by the spiritual arms. Thus they come to execution.—When a great man is coming, his sumpters, his furniture, his provisions, go before: the Pope's furniture, altars and copes, pictures and images, are come before, and, if we believe Dr. Cosins, the very substance of the Mass; a certain sign that the Pope was not far off. Now, these forerunners being come, if any man resist them, fire comes out of the brambles, and devours the cedars of Lebanon; the army of the Priests falls upon him with their arms of suspension, sequestration, excommunication, degradation, and deprivation: and by these arms hath Mr. Smart been oppressed and undone. He falls upon their superstitions and innovations; and they fall upon him with their arms, they beat him down, yea they pull him up by the roots, taking away all his means of maintenance and living; yet they leave him life to feel his miseries: 'Ita seruant, ut diu se sentiat mori.' There is no cruelty equal to priestly cruelty. These are they that did put our Saviour to death. The calling is reverend, but the corruption of it most pernicious; 'Corruptio optimi pessima.' I know no reason of this change, except it be that of the apostle, 'Because when they knew God, they did not worship him as God, but made a God of the world; placing the excellency of priesthood in worldly pomp and greatness; and gave the glory of the invisible God to pictures, images and altars; therefore God gave them up to vile affections, to be implacable, unmerciful, and without natural affection.' But whatsoever is the cause of their corruption, certainly their arms have fallen heavily upon Mr. Smart, and priestly cruelty hath cast him into a long misery; from which he could get no release by any priestly mercy.—And now it is prayed, That as these delinquents, by the cruel oppressions of Mr. Smart, have advanced the cause of Popery, so they may in such a degree of justice be punished, that, in them, priestly cruelty, and the very cause of Popery, may appear to be punished, and suppressed; and that Mr. Smart, suffering for the cause of Protestantism, may be so repaired, that, in him, pious constancy, and the very cause of Protestantism, may appear to be righted and repaired.'

Report of a Conference concerning the State of the Kingdom.] March 22. A conference with the other house being desired by the lords, concerning the great Affairs of the Kingdom, the same was reported the next day to the commons, by Mr. Pierrepont in the following manner:

The Earl of Bedford began the conference, and said, "Gentlemen, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons. I am commanded by my lords here to let you know, that they have taken serious deliberation of the Propositions made by you, the other day, in a conference, concerning the extremity in which the kingdom was, for want of money to give satisfaction to the two armies. I am commanded to let you know, their lordships, in this, and any thing else that may conduce to the service of the king, and good of the kingdom, will concur, and be very ready to give such assistance as you shall propound, or, upon debate with them, think fit to advance the work. You were pleased to declare the great industry used for raising of monies; and truly we conceive it can scarce be paralleled in any time, where the house of commons hath shewed so great affection to the good of the kingdom, as, in their own particulars, to be so engaged as they have been: but they now perceive, though as good security as can be hath been tendered, (not only personal security, but the security of the kingdom, the bill of Subsidies) the cause of this hindrance must be some apprehension of damage, which the kingdom hath, and particularly the city of London, in that they fear inquiet and dangerous times, and so loth to part with money; for we cannot but conceive there is money in the kingdom, and in the city: this fear is that which maketh them all keep the wealth they have, to serve their turns in extremity of danger; and therefore think, that since there is great use of money to open the credit of the kingdom, for the granting of Subsidies doth not get ready money, but gives credit; and peace and tranquillity will encourage the lending of money: and therefore the lords have commanded the lords commissioners, with all speed, to bring unto you the bottom of the treaty with the Scots, that the kingdom may see in what estate we are; and I hope it will be in a few days towards peace: and their lordships, as well for the sums in arrears, as for those other great sums which are promised, and must in time be provided, will, I make no doubt, likewise concur with you in that, and in all things else that may conduce to the happiness of the state: and therefore, because ways of money are more proper to proceed from you than from us, if you shall think that any way that may be propounded by you may be effectual; or, if you propound not, these lordships will let you know some of their propositions; and if you be not now prepared to confer about it, we shall, when you please, debate the same with you."

Lord Say. 'My lords have commanded me to let you know, that they do conceive much content in the good correspondency between both houses, as it is evidenced in this particular; which, though it is a tender point (and wherein my lords will not trench upon your privileges) you desire their advice; and there is nothing, wherein they may concur with you, that they will be unwilling unto: one way they have thought of; which, if you approve of it, and think it fit, may be used; whereby the city may be moved, from both houses, to lend; for there is the money to be had; but there are some obstructions, which may be by mistakes: and I do not doubt but that they will, when they shall be moved by both houses, be induced to lend that money that may serve the occasion, when the danger shall be made appear.'

Earl of Essex. 'I am only to add this more, That, because there may be another obstacle of lending money, the great grievances and calamities of this kingdom, together with the causes and advisers thereof, I am commanded to tell you, their lordships are very sensible of it; and that, in removing of any that have been the causes of these troubles, and, in the redress, they shall be ready to join in any way with you.'

Earl of Bath. 'To press, with all expedition, the Scots commissioners to come to a conclusion of the treaty, to the content of both houses.'

Account of Burton, Bastwick, and Prynne. One of the first affairs which took up the attention of the house of commons, after the meeting of this parliament, was the Censures in the Star-Chamber, or elsewhere, with the subsequent Imprisonment of Burton, Bastwick and Prynne, as mentioned Nov. 7, in their Journals. These men had highly offended the court, and the whole hierarchy of English bishops, by publishing some books against that order: but, as this affair made a great noise at that time, it will be necessary to see what the cotemporary historians say of it. And first, lord Clarendon writes, 'There were 3 persons most notorious for their declared malice against the government of the church by bishops, in their several books and writings, which they had published to corrupt the people; with circumstances very scandalous, and in language very scurrilous and impudent, which all men thought deserved very exemplary punishment. They were of the three several professions which had the most influence upon the people; a divine, a common lawyer, and a doctor of physio; none of them of interest or any esteem with the worthy part of their professions, having been formerly all looked upon under characters of reproach. Yet when these men came to be sentenced, and for the execution of that sentence brought out to be punished as common and signal rogues, exposed on scaffolds to have their ears cut off, and their faces and foreheads branded with hot irons, men began no more to consider their manners, but the men; and each profession, with anger and indignation enough, thought their education, degrees, and quality would have secured them against such infamous judgments, and treasured-up wrath for the time to come.'

Saunderson writes, 'That Mr. Burton was a divine, at first employed by the court as clerk of the chapel closet; but this not being preferment suitable to his own conceited merit, he grew factious first, and then insolent in print, in two pamphlets against episcopacy, sharp and full of rancour.'—Dr. Bastwick had before been censured, by the high commission, for writing and speaking against the prelacy: and, to shew his sentiments plainer, this author has given us the title of an Answer he made to an Information exhibited against him, by the Attorney General, in these words:—'The Answer of John Bastwick, doctor of physick, to the Information of sir Jn. Bankes, knt. attorney general; in which there is a sufficient demonstration, that the prelates are invaders of the king's prerogative royal; contemners and despisers of Holy Scriptures; advancers of popery, superstition, idolatry, and profaneness. Also, that they abuse the king's authority, to the oppression of his loyalest subjects, and therein exercise great cruelty, tyranny, and injustice; and, in the execution of these impious performances, they shew neither wit, honesty, nor temperance: nor are they servants of either God or the king, but of the devil; being enemies to God and the king, and of every living thing that is good. All which the said Dr. Bastwick is ready to maintain, &c.' This Answer was contained in six sheets of large parchment, to the amaze of the whole court; nor could he be brought to be briefer, but printed it all, and dedicated it to the king, with an epistle to prove it.—Prynne was a barrister of Lincoln's-inn, who, for some pamphlets published against the king and church, had been before censured; but, upon a new attack against them, was punished the more. His sentence was a fine of 5000*l.* to the king, to lose the remainder of his ears in the pillory, to be stigmatized on both cheeks with an S. for Schismatick, and perpetual imprisonment in Caernarvon castle, in Wales. Bastwick and Burton each 5000*l.* to the king, to lose their ears in the pillory, and be imprisoned; the first in Launceston, in Cornwall, and the other in Lancaster castle. Our author concludes the account of these men with observing, 'That, had they been brought to the King's-Bench bar, they would not have been conjured up, by policy and power, to join their revenge against the king and all their accusers.'—We shall only add, that the house of commons did not only vote the sentences against these men unjust and illegal, but released them from their imprisonments. Mr. Whitlock says, 'That they were conducted into London, from their several prisons, by many hundreds of horse and foot, in great pomp and defiance of justice; and that they petitioned the house of commons for damages against their prosecutors.'

PROCEEDINGS ON THE IMPEACHMENT OF THE EARL OF STRAFFORD.

We now enter upon an affair of great importance, wherein one of the principal servants of the crown was accused by the Commons of High Treason. But before we proceed, it will be proper to take notice of an error made in the Lords Journals, by order of that house after the Restoration of Charles II. of all the Proceedings against the earl of Strafford this time. This extraordinary act was taken into consideration in a succeeding reign, and another order was made by the lords relating to it. This order is entered in the Journals just where the first erasure begins, and is in these words:—"Die Martis Julii 5to. 1698. The earl of Rochester reported from the lords committees, appointed to inspect the Journals of this house, in the year 1640 and 1641, relating to vacating or obliterating divers proceedings therein, pursuant to the act for reversing the earl of Strafford's attainder, as follows, viz. Upon perusal of the Journal of this house, in relation to the proceedings upon the Impeachment from the house of commons, it appears plainly that, by the former orders made by this house, relating to the cancelling and obliterating the proceedings of the earl of Strafford, according to the act of parliament made for reversing of the said earl's attainder, it could not be intended that any other proceedings should be obliterated than those relating especially to the said act of attainder; it is therefore ordered and declared, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That whatsoever stands crossed upon the Journals relating to the proceedings on the Impeachment of the said earl, ought not or shall be looked on as obliterated; and that the several orders for obliterating and making any proceedings concerning the earl of Strafford, must be taken to be intended only to the act of attainder."—Which report being agreed to by the house, it was ordered, "That there be a note, or memorandum, of the aforesaid order in the margin of the Journals, where say such proceedings have been obliterated.—But an authentic copy of all the Proceedings was afterwards interleaved in the Original Journal by an order of the house, 15th Feb. 1708, and has since appeared in the printed editions of that work.

Nov. 11. A message from the commons to the lords was delivered by Mr. Pym, to this effect: "My lords; The knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled for the commons in parliament, have received information of divers sinister designs and practices of a great peer of this house; and, by virtue of a command from them, I do here, in the name of the commons now assembled in parliament, and in the name of all the commons of England, accuse Thomas earl of Strafford, lord lieutenant of Ireland, of High Treason. And they have commanded me further to desire your lordships, that he may be sequestered from parliament, and forthwith committed to prison. They are further commanded me to let your lordships know, that they will, within a few days, resort to your lordships, with the particular Articles and Grounds of his Accusation; and yet do further desire that your lordships will take upon some convenient and fit way, that a passage between Ireland and England, for his majesty's subjects of both kingdoms, may be free, notwithstanding any restraint to the contrary."

After this, the commons withdrew; and the lord keeper reported the effect of it to the house. And, after their lordships had considered of the message, they resolved to give this Answer for the present, by the lord keeper: viz. "That the lords do let them know, that they have been made acquainted with the Charge of High Treason, which the commons have made against the earl of Strafford; and their lordships do not doubt but that the commons did take great consideration in it before they came hither; and their lordships will take it into their consideration, and will send them a further Answer, by messengers of their own."

Whereupon the commons went to their own house; and the earl of Strafford, coming into the house, was commanded to withdraw. Then their lordships, falling into a serious debate of the message, concluded, and ordered, That the earl of Strafford, for this Accusation of High Treason by the commons, shall be presently committed to the safe custody of the gentleman usher of this house; and to be sequestered from coming to this house of parliament, until he hath cleared himself of this Accusation. The earl of Strafford being called to the bar as a delinquent, kneeling, the lord keeper, by direction of the house, signified to him as followeth:

"My lord of Strafford; The house of commons, in their name, and in the name of the whole commons of the kingdom of England, have this day accused your lordship, to the lords spiritual and temporal in this high court of parliament assembled, of High Treason. The Articles they will within few days produce. In the mean time, they have desired of my lords, and the lords have accordingly resolved, That your lordship shall be committed to safe custody to the gentleman usher, and sequestered from this house, until your lordship have cleared yourself of the accusation that shall be laid against you."

After this, he, offering to speak, was not permitted, but immediately sent away. And so the earl of Strafford went out of the house to the gentleman usher. Afterwards the lords thought it fit to send a message to the commons, to let them know how far they had proceeded for the present; and their lordships did agree, that the two lords chief justices should deliver a message to the commons, to this effect: "That the lords of the high court of parliament have taken into consideration the Charge of High Treason, which the commons have made against the earl of Strafford; and do let them know that their lordships have committed him to safe custody; and have sequestered him from coming to the house; and do desire that the Articles and Accusation against him may be brought in speedily; and further to let them know, that their lordships will take it into consideration how to free and open the passage between Ireland and England, notwithstanding any restraint; and to that purpose will move his majesty in it."

Nov. 11. The lord keeper signified to the house, That, waiting this morning on his maj. he was commanded by him to go to the earl of Strafford, to receive from him an account of some things in Ireland, that his maj. might know the better how to order his affairs there. Upon which his lordship humbly represented to his maj. the place his lordship held in the lords house; and that he had, by their lordships command, pronounced the sentence for commitment of the said earl, upon the accusation of the commons; and therefore humbly besought his maj. he might, before his going to the earl of Strafford, acquaint the house therewith; which his maj. was graciously pleased to give him leave to do. For which respect their lordships were pleased to give him thanks. And, upon the motion of the earl of Essex, it was agreed by their lordships, That the rest of their lordships, that have any occasion to go to him, should in the like manner acquaint the house first with it.

E. of Strafford's Petition to be bailed, and have Counsel.] Nov. 19. A Petition from the earl of Strafford was presented to the house by the lord keeper; viz.

"To the right hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in the High Court of Parliament assembled: The humble Petition of Thomas earl of Strafford, his majesty's lieutenant general of Ireland;

"Humbly sheweth, That the petitioner was, on the 11th of this month, called to the bar, before your lordships; and there charged, in the name of the commons of England, with High Treason, and by your lordships committed to the gentleman usher, where he hath since remained, to his very great prejudice, both in health, fortune, and otherwise; howbeit, your petitioner hears not as yet of any matter in special objected against him; by means of this restraint (wherein nevertheless he willingly submits himself to the good pleasure of your lordships), your petitioner is, for the time deprived of the most valuable and esteemable inheritance any subject of this kingdom can be possessed of; to wit, the honour to sit in parliament, amongst the peers of the realm. Your petitioner humbly beseecheth your lordships he may be bailed, have counsel assigned, and Mr. Wm. Raylton allowed him as a solicitor, in the modest and just course of his own defence. And your petitioner shall wish to your noble lordships all increase of honour and happiness."

Message from the Commons, touching the Examination of Witnesses.] Nov. 20. Mr. Pym delivered the following message from the commons:

"My lords; The knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the house of commons assembled, have commanded me to let your lordships know, that there were divers Witnesses, which the house of commons were to produce in the great cause now depending before your lordships, wherein they have charged the earl of Strafford of High Treason; some of these witnesses were members of the house of commons, and for those they had already made an order to be ready to be examined by your lordships when they should be required; others are members, or assistants, of this hon. house; and for those they desired that your lordships would order they might be examined upon oath, if it should be required; and because some of the witnesses to be produced in this cause might be of his majesty's most hon. privy council, it was desired that your lordships would take some such course as should seem best to your own judgments, that they may be ready to be examined upon oath, if they be required. My lords; treason is such a crime as, in the first preparation and design, for the most part walks in the dark; or, if it come abroad, it is with such disguises as it is hardly to be discerned; and therefore I am commanded to commend it to your lordships just care and wisdom, so to provide, that, when any witnesses shall be produced, they may be speedily examined; and both the names of the parties, and the matter of the interrogatories and answers, may be kept private, till there shall be an occasion to make use of them; whereby subtle practices and combinations may be prevented, and the truth secured from corruption and concealment: there is only one thing more which I am to add, That your lordships will be pleased, that some members of the house of commons may be present at those examinations, to present to your lordships new interrogatories and questions, if it shall be needful."

The lords returned for Answer; "That the Message is of great importance, and their lordships will consider seriously of it, and will send a further Answer by messengers of their own."

Nov. 20, p. m. The lord keeper reported the effect of the message from the house of commons, delivered by Mr. Pym; and after much consideration of the many particular and weighty points in it, their lordships broke the body of the Message into 5 Heads; which, for the more clear and methodical proceeding, and the better to draw each point to a Resolution, their lordships thought it fit to handle each branch distinctly, and to finish one before they fell upon another. The 5 Heads of the Message were these: 1. The examinations of the members of the house of commons upon oath. 2. The examination of the lords of this house and the assistants upon oath. 3. The examination of the privy counsellors upon oath. 4. To provide that the proceedings may be speedy and secret. 5. About the members of the house of commons to be present at the examinations."

Nov. 21. Before their lordships proceeded to debate the particulars of the Message, they made this declaration: "That, before their lordships do enter into any debate concerning the Examination of Witnesses, their lordships do declare, That no examinations of witnesses ought to be taken, before a particular charge be given; and that this house doth understand the message from the house of commons in no other sense."

Hereupon their lordships proceeded to the consideration of the first branch of the Message from the house of commons; viz. "1. The examination of the members of the house of commons upon oath." And it was conceived that this particular needed no long debate. Therefore this house did leave the members of the house of commons to be examined, as they shall appoint. Then their lordships proceeded to the consideration of the 2nd branch, which was, "2. The examination of the lords of this house, and the assistants, upon oath." And, for the speedier resolution in this particular, the house was adjourned into a committee, during pleasure; and, after a little debate, it was agreed, "Upon the desire of the house of commons, and by the consent of the peers of this high court of parliament assembled, That, for this time, and in this case, the peers and assistants shall be examined upon oath, as witnesses."—To the 4th Head, "That the proceedings may be speedy and secret," it was agreed, that their lordship's will provide that they may be so.

Nov. 25. A conference took place between both houses; and the lord keeper reported the effect of it; viz. "That the house of commons have delivered their Articles of High Treason against the earl of Strafford, consisting of divers Charges; and that the commons desired, 1. That the earl may be called to answer the said Articles. 2. That they may be made acquainted with the earl's Answer. 3. That they may be made acquainted with the Depositions. 4. They required further, they might add to their accusation, as occasion should serve. After this, the Articles were read publicly, in hac verba:

"Articles of the Commons, assembled in Parliament, against Thomas Earl of Strafford, in Maintenance of their Accusation, whereby he stands charged with High Treason.

"I. That he the said Thomas earl of Strafford hath traiterously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the realms of England and Ireland, and, instead hereof, to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government, against law, which he hath declared by traiterous words, counsels, and actions, and by giving his majesty advice, by force of arms, to compel his loyal subjects to submit thereunto. II. That he hath traiterously assumed to himself regal power over the free liberties of persons, lands, and goods of his majesty's subjects, in England and Ireland, and hath exercised the same tyrannically, to his subversion and undoing of many, both peers and others, of his majesty's liege people. III. The better to enrich, and enable himself to go through with his traiterous designs, he hath detained a great part of his majesty's revenue, without giving any legal accounts; and hath taken great sums of money out of the exchequer, converting them to his own use, when his majesty was necessitated for his own urgent occasions, and his army had been a long time unpaid. IV. That he hath traiterously abused the power and authority of his government, to the increasing, countenancing, and encouraging of Papists, that so he might settle a mutual dependance and confidence betwixt himself and that party, and by their help prosecute and accomplish his malicious and tyrannical designs. V. That he hath maliciously endeavoured to stir up enmity and hostility between his majesty's subjects of England and those of Scotland. VI. That he hath traiterously broken the great trust reposed in him by his majesty, of lieutenant general of his Army, by wilfully betraying divers of his majesty's subjects to death, his majesty's Army to a dishonourable defeat by the Scots at Newborne, and the town of Newcastle into their hands, to the end that, by effusion of blood, by dishonour, by so great a loss as of Newcastle, his majesty's realm of England might be engaged in a national and irreconcilable quarrel with the Scots. VII. That, to preserve himself from being questioned for these and other his traiterous courses, he laboured to subvert the right of parliaments, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings, and, by false and malicious slanders, to incense his maj. against parliaments.—By which words, counsels, and actions, he hath traiterously, and contrary to his allegiance, laboured to alienate the hearts of the king's liege people from his maj. to set a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his majesty's kingdoms, for which they do impeach him of High Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. And he the said earl of Strafford was lord deputy of Ireland, or lord lieutenant of Ireland, and lieutenant general of the Army there, under his majesty, and a sworn privy counsellor to his maj. for his kingdoms both of England and Ireland, and lord president of the North, during the time that all and every of the crimes and offences before set forth were done and committed; and he the said earl was lieutenant general of his majesty's Army in the North parts of England, during the time that the crimes and offences in the 5th and 6th Articles set forth were done and committed.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said earl, and also of replying to the Answer that he the said earl shall make unto the said Articles, or to any of them, and of offering proof also of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Accusation or Impeachment that shall be by them exhibited, as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require; and do pray that the said earl may be put to answer to all and every the premises; and that such proceedings, examination, trial, and judgment, may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice."

Whereupon it was ordered, by the lords, That, upon the accusation of High Treason of the earl of Strafford, by the house of commons, he be forthwith committed to the Tower; and that he have a copy of the Articles, to prepare a speedy Answer; and likewise that he have free access of such counsel to him, to advise about his Answer, as this house shall allow and approve of, when he shall present a list of their names: and that the access of friends and servants shall not be debarred him; and such physicians as he shall think fit for his health shall have access unto him.

The earl of Strafford was presently sent for, by the gentleman usher, in whose custody he was; who appeared at the bar, as a delinquent. And then the lord keeper signified to him, That the house of commons have delivered an Impeachment of High Treason against him, which was read unto him publicly, in open court. After which he had leave given him to speak. He rendered their lordships humble thanks for their proceedings with him, and desired of their lordships: "That he might have time given him to Answer. That he might have Counsel assigned him. That he might have Servants about him, and his friends to have access to him."

He being commanded to withdraw, and the house taking his requests into consideration, he was called for in again; and the lord keeper told him that their lordships had ordered, that he should stand forthwith committed to the Tower, and shall have such Counsel allowed him, and, if need be, assigned him, as the house shall approve of, when he delivers in their names in writing; and that the access of his friends and servants is not debarred him; and likewise such physicians as he shall think fit for his health may repair unto him. For this the earl gave their lordships humble thanks; but craved leave to desire one thing more, which was, that no Examinations of Witnesses might be before he had made his Answer; and that the names of witnesses may be given in before they be examined. But, he withdrawing, the house appointed the lord keeper to send for these in writing from the earl of Strafford.

Nov. 27. The lords took into consideration to give resolution to those Heads of the Message from the commons which are not resolved of, whereby to give an Answer to the commons; and the particular that was debated was, "The Examination of Privy Counsellors and Assistants of this house upon oath;" for the freer debate whereof, the house was adjourned into a committee; and being resumed, it was ordered, That all such peers of this hon. house as shall be required shall, for this time, and upon this occasion, be examined upon oath; and that all the assistants shall be likewise examined upon oath, if it be required.

Petition of the E. of Strafford concerning Witnesses. This day the Petition of the earl of Strafford was read, in hæc verba:

"The humble Petition of Thomas Earl of Strafford, his Majesty's Lieut. General of Ireland.

"Most humbly sheweth; That, in obedience to your lordship's order, and in due acknowledgment of your lordships noble justice and respect vouchsafed this your petitioner the other day, he now expresseth in writing that humble request he made then concerning the Examining of Witnesses, which, with your lordships favour, was this: That there might be no admission of any Examination of Witnesses in this cause till your petitioner had put in his Answer to the Charge of Treason exhibited against him. That, after answer, no witness should be examined before your petitioner had the name of such witness delivered unto him by your lordships order, to the intent (as by his council he should be advised) he might either except against such witness, or cross-examine him. And that, before either of these two points should be overruled against your petitioner, your lordships might be honourably pleased to hear him, by his counsel, at the bar, to shew cause why he humbly conceives his desires herein to be just and reasonable. Finally, the petitioner humbly craves your lordships remission, if his petitions be not so formal or pertinent as they both ought and might be, if he had the help of Counsel; and shall ever, with all expression of duty and thankfulness, retain in full memory your lordships most honourable justice and noble respects to your petitioner the other day, and pay your lordships the duties of his whole life for the same. And always and unfeignedly pray for your most noble lordships increase of all lasting honour and happiness."

Whereupon it was ordered, That no examinations are to be taken before the earl of Strafford hath put in his Answer; and that no Counsel shall be heard at bar, as is desired in the petition. And as touching the delivering the Names of Witnesses to the earl of Strafford before their Examination, whereby he might except against them, or cross-examine them, their lordships thought it fit to defer the consideration of this until to-morrow morning, against which time the lord keeper was desired by the house to give order to the clerks and ministers of some court of justice, to search out for some precedents of this nature, the better to inform the house, as they shall see cause. The house was pleased to assign Counsel to the earl of Strafford, according to a list presented by him; and those which the house did assign were these: Counsel; Mr. Richard Lane, Serj. Rowles, Mr. Recorder of London, Mr. Platt, Mr. George Lowe, Mr. John Lightfoote, and Mr. Hugh Wyndham. Any of these counsellors have liberty to be excused, if they can alledge any just excuse.

Feb. 17. This day the earl of Strafford being, by order of this house, to appear in person, and put in his Answer in writing, came to the bar. The lord keeper asked himself, whether he had accordingly brought his Answer in writing. He desired, That he might have leave to speak by his counsel; which the house permitted. Then Mr. Lane, the Prince's attorney, being of his counsel, acquainted the house, That the earl of Strafford's Answer is not now ready; and gave these reasons following, to induce this house to believe that it is real, and not excuse: "1. That the general accusation of High Treason against the earl of Strafford consists of 7 Heads, and out of these generals in the last Impeachment are extracted 38 Articles, each Article containing several charges. 2. They contain the actions of the earl of Strafford's service, for 15 years past, and trench upon his several offices both in England and Ireland; which will draw the Answer into a great length; he being to recollect himself, to give an account of all the particulars. 3. The instructions for drawing his Answer must be taken from his own mouth, and by one man. 4. That yesterday was the first day that his counsel read over the Answer, which is yet but in the rough draught, consisting of 200 sheets of paper; that they were reading it over from 9 in the morning until 11 at night; and are of opinion that many alterations must be made therein; and, in conclusion, desired some longer time for putting in the earl's Answer."

After this, the earl said, "That his Charge was heavy; and that he hath not neglected any time in preparing his Answer against this day; therefore desires some longer time."

He and his counsel being withdrawn, the house took what had been said into consideration; and their lordships being desirous to proceed upon such grounds as might stand with the justice and honour of this house, and give satisfaction to the whole kingdom, the house was put into a committee during pleasure, that this business might be the better debated; and they took into consideration whether the counsel shall be heard upon oath, if they will voluntarily affirm upon oath, what they have averred unto this house without an oath, whether the earl's Answer be ready now or not. And the house being resumed; it was resolved, That the counsel be called in, and told, that they having averred to the lords that the earl's Answer is not yet ready, to ask them what proof they will offer, to give their lordships satisfaction therein. This being done, and some of the lords not receiving full satisfaction therein; it was put to the question, whether, upon that which hath been declared at the bar by the counsel, it be fit to give further time to the earl of Strafford; and it was resolved, That, upon what hath been declared at the bar by the counsel, it is fit to give the earl further time to put in his Answer. And it was resolved, That the earl of Strafford shall put in his final Answer to the Charge of High Treason against him, upon Wednesday next, the 24th inst, peremptorily, without expectation of any further time; at which time the earl is to attend in person,

Feb. 24. This day the king came to the house of lords unexpectedly, for which reason, neither he nor the lords were robed. The king declared to the house, that the cause of his coming now was to hear the charge against the earl of Strafford; and the earl being called to the bar, the Articles against him were read distinctly by the clerk of parliament; with his Answers to each by his lordship's counsel. After which his majesty withdrew. When the king was gone, the lords ordered the lord keeper to resume the house; and commanded the earl of Strafford to be again brought to the bar, (taking all that was done in the king's presence to be no act of the house) and appointed the lord keeper to demand his Answer of him. A question arising, Whether the bishops should be present at the reading of the earl's Answer, being in agitatio cause ungracious? Their lordships chose to withdraw on that occasion.

The earl's Answer being tendered by him, and read by his counsel; he then asked leave to speak; which being allowed, he said, "That he desired time to examine witnesses in his own defence, and to have the names of those who had been examined against him: to have power to cross examine or except against such witnesses as he should desire: that the deposition of his own witnesses might be taken in writing; and that he might have a warrant from the house to produce his witnesses." Upon which it was ordered, "That no Answer should be given unto the earl, until the house of commons was made acquainted with his request;" and a conference was desired accordingly. It was afterwards granted.

The house of commons was employed, seemingly, all the rest of this month, in getting ready to support the Charge against the earl of Strafford; whose trial began on the 22nd of March; scaffolds being erected in Westminster Hall for that purpose. We meet with the following speech of sir John Wray for a vigorous prosecution of the earl. It seems to have been spoken sometime during this month, but the day is not mentioned.

Sir John Wray.—' Mr. Speaker; In this great and weighty cause; we ought seriously to consider, 1st. What we have done ourselves already, in the Accusation and Impeachment of this great earl of High Treason. 2nd. Let us remember what we now are; not only parliament-men, but public men, and Englishmen. As parliament-men, let us follow the steps of our ancestors, and be constant to that rule of law which was their guide, and should be ours. As public men, forget not whom we here represent, and by how many chosen and trusted. As Englishmen, let us call to mind the undaunted spirits and stout hearts of those antient heroes, from whom we are descended; how free they were from pusillanimity, and how they scorned all flattery, and slavery: let us then, now or never, shew that the same blood runs in our veins. 3dly. Let us be well advised what to do, in case we shall be denied justice in this particular; upon which depends not only the happiness, but the safety of this parliament, of this kingdom, of ourselves, and of our posterities. And this is my aviso.*

March 25. This day a conference was held, to represent to the lords the necessity of expediting the earl of Strafford's Trial, in respect of the pressing occasions of both houses, and of the state of the whole kingdom; which would be much interrupted and prejudiced by the protraction of it. In this consideration the house of commons desired their lordships that they would be pleased to prevent all unnecessary delays, which might be occasioned by his excursions or impertinent exceptions; which, as they would take up much time in debate, so they may occasion frequent adjournments, which were desired to be avoided.

April 9. The lords and commons being still engaged in attending the Trial of the earl of Strafford, de die in diem, the other proceedings of both houses are very short in their Journals. This day the commons prayed a conference with the lords; the heads of which were to this effect, 'To acquaint them with the great necessities of the kingdom; the preciousness of Time, and how much already had been spent in this Trial; how prejudicial it will be to the kingdom, if any more be spent than has been; and therefore to desire that to-morrow may be appointed for a peremptory day for the earl of Strafford to be heard, if he will come;† otherwise, that the committee of this house may proceed in their Replication to the whole matter, and the earl to be absolutely excluded from saying any more, as to the matter of fact. This request was acceded to by the lords. Upon this occasion,

Sir John Wray made the following speech: 'Mr. Speaker; Truth is the daughter of time, and experience the best schoolmaster, who hath long since taught many men and estates the sad and woful effects of an half-done work: those convulsions and rentings pains, which the body of Great Britain now feels, shew us, that the ill humours and obstructions are not yet fully purged, nor dissolved.—Mr. Speaker, God will have a thorough work done; if instead of redressing evils, we think to transact all, by removing of persons, and not things, well may we lull our troubles for a season, but they will return with greater violence. For, believe it, Mr. Speaker, let us flatter ourselves as we please, a dim-sighted eye may see, that although we think we have now passed the equinoctial of the Straffordian line, and seem to have gone beyond Canterbury; yet the factious and undermining agents of our religion grow daily more and more powerful; and, no doubt, do labour an extirpation of all parliaments, and men too, that will not think, say, and swear to their opinions and practices. Have we not then Mr. Speaker, a wolf by the ears? Is there any way to get scot-free, or wolf-free, but one? Then let us take and not forsake that old English parliamentary road, which is via tuta, and will bring us safely to our journey's end. This is my humble motion.'

Sir H. Vane's Notes of Opinions in Council, produced against the earl of Strafford.] April 10. An affair of the utmost consequence to the earl of Strafford, since it cost him his life, came before the commons. Preparatory to it, the doors of the house were ordered to be shut, the key brought up, and none to go out without leave: then Mr. Glynn reported from the committee in the earl of Strafford's Cause, That they had some further evidence to corroborate the latter part of the 23d Article against him: thereupon sir Henry Vane, the younger and Mr. Pym, were enjoined by the house to declare their whole knowledge concerning the matters contained in that Article against the earl, and how and by what means they came by it. When they had done this, a Paper^o was produced by Mr. Pym, and so much of it read by him as concerned the earl of Strafford, but afterwards he was ordered to read it all. Notice being then given that a message from the lords waited at the door, they were ordered to be called in; but all the members to keep their seats, and none to stir out without leave.—The further examination of this business is left short in the Journals; it is only said there, That the treasurer, sir H. Vane, was enjoined by the house to answer, Whether he did take any Notes to the effect of those notes already read, at what time, and upon what occasion? The Answer is omitted; and this is all which is said, therein, at this time.

On the same day a bill for the Attainder of Thomas earl of Strafford, for High Treason, was read a first time in the house.

April 12. Heads of a conference to be desired with the lords were argued in the house. "1st, A Narrative of the Evidence mentioned on Saturday last, to which two members of this house were ready to depose. 2dly, That the house having taken it into consideration, did conceive it very material; but, in regard of the danger and distractions of the present times, and that much time may be spent in the debate touching the admitting of this Evidence, they resolve to come to a general reply, setting aside that evidence for this time, &c. 3dly, That upon occasion of discovery of this Evidence,† a Paper was read in the house whereby

* In a marginal note of the printed Journals, we are told, 'That this Paper was a Copy of Notes, taken at a Giunta of the privy council, for the Scots Affairs, about the 5th of May last. Commons Journals, Vol. II. p. 118.

† Mr. Whitlocke gives the following Account of the Discovery of this Paper of Notes, taken by Secretary Vane of some Opinions delivered at the Council Table, the morning of the day the last parliament was dissolved, thus: "Se it did appear, that at the same time the dangerous words were spoken by the earl of Strafford, touching the bringing the Irish army into England, other words were then spoken by two others, then present, decyphered by these letters, L. Arch. L. Cott. (by which we conceive is meant the lord archbishop of Canterbury and lord Cottington) very full of pernicious counsels to the king, and slander to the commons assembled in the last parliament, as would appear by the Paper, if their lordships would please to have it read, which the committee is commanded to read, and leave it to their consideration: and to desire their lordships will take some course that it may be duly examined by whom these words were spoken, that there might be some further proceedings to prevent the dangers that may ensue thereupon; and that these counsels may be looked into, and searched to the bottom."

The conference being held, as was desired, Mr. Glynn reported to the house, 'That the lord steward did speak for the rest of the lords; and told them, that the lords had agreed this house may proceed as formerly was intended, before the offer of further Evidence was proposed: the lord Strafford to recollect his Evidence first, and, that being done, the members of the house of commons to state theirs. All this to be ended to-morrow morning; of which they would give the earl of Strafford notice.'

Mr. Whitlocke informs us, That the next day, April 13, the earl being brought to Westminster, and both houses being met, the Notes were openly read: the title of them was, "No Danger of a War with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive." Then followed the Opinions interlocutory:

K. C.* "How can we undertake an offensive war, if we have no more money?"

Secretary Vane being out of town, sent a letter to his son, sir Henry Vane, the younger, then in London, with the key of his study, for his son to look in his cabinet for some papers there, to read to his father. The son looking over many papers, among them lighted upon these notes; which being of so great concernment to the public, and declaring so much against the earl of Strafford, he held himself bound in duty and conscience to discover them. He showed them to Mr. Pym, who urged him, and revealed with him, that they might be made use of in the evidence against the earl of Strafford, as being most material and of great consequence, in relation to that business."

employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience; for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months."

L. Arch.‡ "You have tried all ways, and have always been denied, it is now lawful to take it by force."

L. Cot.‡ "Leagues abroad there may be made for the defence of the kingdom: the lower house are weary of the king and church: all ways shall be just to raise money by, in this inevitable necessity, and are to be used, being lawful."

L. Arch. "For an offensive, not any defensive war."

L. L. Ir. "The town is full of lords, put the Commission of Array on foot, and if any of them stir we will make them smart."

To this the earl answered, "That it were hard measure, for opinions and discourses by privy counsellors, in a debate of council, to be prosecuted under the notion of treason. 1. As to the words; 'That the king had an army in Ireland to reduce this kingdom;' they are only proved by the single testimony of one man, Secretary Vane; which is not of validity enough in law, in matter of debt, much less in point of life and death. 2. That the secretary's deposition was exceeding dubious; for, upon two examinations, he could not remember any such words; the third time his testimony was not positive, 'but that I spake those words, or the like;' and words may be very like in sound, yet differ much in sense. 3. That there were present at the debate but eight privy counsellors; two of them (the archbishop and secretary Windebank) cannot be produced. Secretary Vane affirms the words; I deny them. Four remain for evidence, the marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Northumberland, the lord treasurer, and the lord Cottington. All these have declared upon their honours, that they never heard me speak those words, nor any the like. 4. Suppose I spake the words, which I grant not, yet cannot the word this rationally imply England; as is yielded on all hands; because England was not out of the way of obedience, as the earl of Clare well observed; and because there never was any the least intention of landing the Irish army in England, as the lords of the council are able to attest."

Mr. Whitlocke proceeds to tell us, "That the foregoing Paper, of so great consequence, was missing at the committee; and, by the earl's Answer, it was supposed he had seen it, and that it was conveyed to him (Mr. W.) by some of the committee: that he, being in the chair, and having the charge and custody of all the papers, was suspected more than others to have acted this piece of treachery." He adds, "That great inquiry and search was made for the Paper, but it could not then be found. He told them when it was missing; and that amongst such a multitude of papers as he had in his custody, it was not easy to see that he had them all again, when they were brought forth, or any of them called for: that he never shewed this paper to any but the committee, and knew not who had it, or what was become of it; nor did he convey it, or know of any that had conveyed it away. But this would not serve; the house was acquainted with the missing of the Paper, and they ordered, 'That every one of the committee should make a solemn protestation in the house, that they did not convey it away, nor knew what was become of it.' All of them made this protestation, and the lord Digby with more earnestness and deeper imprecations than any of the rest; yet afterwards, at the Battle of Naseby, the king's cabinet being taken, among the papers in it was a copy of these Notes, under the lord Digby's hand; whereby Whitlocke was cleared, and the conveyer of the paper to the king, and from him to the earl of Strafford, was fully discovered."

The Earl's Defence.] The earl having delivered his Answer to the additional Proof, the lord steward told him, 'That if he had any thing further to say in his defence, he should proceed, because the court intended to prepare matters for their speedy judgment.' Whereupon he made a summary repetition of the several parts of his former defence, and concluded thus:

"My lords, it is hard to be questioned upon a law which cannot be shewn. Where hath this fire lain hid so many hundred years, without smook to discover it, till it thus burst forth to consume me and my children? That punishment should precede promulgation of a law; to be punished by a law subsequent to the fact is extrem hard: what man can be safe, if this be admitted? My lords, it is hard in another respect, that there should be no token set, by which we should know this offence; no admonition by which we should avoid it. If a man pass the Thames in a boat, and split himself upon an anchor, and no buoy be floating to discover it, he who owneth the anchor shall make satisfaction: but if a buoy be set there, every man passeth upon his own peril. Now, where is the mark, where is the token upon this crime, to declare it to be High Treason?—My lords, be pleased to give that regard to the peerage of England, as never to expose yourselves to such moot points, such constructive interpretations of laws: if there must be a trial of wits, let the subject matter be of somewhat else than the lives and honours of peers. It will be wisdom for yourselves, for your posterity, and for the whole kingdom, to cast into the fire these bloody and mysterious volumes of constructive and arbitrary treason, as the primitive christians did their books of curious arts; and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the law and statute, that telleth us what is, and what is not treason, without being more ambitious to be more learned in the art of killing, than our forefathers. It is now full 340 years since any man was touched for this alleged crime, to this height, before myself. Let us not awaken these sleeping lions, to our destructions, by taking up a few musty records, that have lain by the walls so many ages forgotten, or neglected.—May your lordships please not to add this to my other misfortunes; let not a precedent be derived from me so disadvantageous, as this will be, in its consequence, to the whole kingdom. Do not, through me, wound the interest of the commonwealth: and howsoever these gentlemen say, they speak for the commonwealth; yet, in this particular, I indeed speak for it, and shew the inconveniences and mischiefs that will fall upon it: for, as it is said in the statute, 1 Hen. IV. 'No one will know what to do or say for fear of such penalties.*' Do not put, my lords, such difficulties upon ministers of state, that men of wisdom, of honour, and of fortune, may not, with cheerfulness and safety, be employed for the public. If you weigh and measure them by grains and scruples, the public affairs of the kingdom will lye waste; no man will meddle with them, who hath any thing to lose.—My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of those dear pledges a saint in Heaven hath left me."—At this word he stopped a while, letting fall some tears to her memory, then he went on,— "What I forfeit myself is nothing; but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity, woundeth me to the very soul. You will pardon my infirmity, something I should have added, but am not able, therefore let it pass.—Now, my lords, for myself, I have been, by the blessing of Almighty God, taught, 'That the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of Glory which shall be revealed hereafter.' And so, my lords, ever, with all tranquillity of mind, I freely submit myself to your judgment; and whether that judgment be of life or death, Te Deum laudamus."

Mr. Whitlocke sums up his account of the earl's behaviour, in these words; which are the more remarkable as he was chairman of the committee against him, "Certainly never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and gestures, than this great and excellent person."

* By this act, which the earl here quoted, it was enacted, "That, in no time to come, any Treason be judged otherwise than it was ordained by the statute in the time of our king's noble grand-father, king Edw. 3. which God assol." And the reason given for it is, "Because, by an act of 21 Rich. 2. divers pains of Treason were ordained by statute, inasmuch that there was no man which did know how he ought to behave himself, to speak, or say, for doubt of such pains: Statute at large, Anno 1 Hen. IV. cap. 10.

did; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some few excepted, to remorse and pity."

April 14. Notwithstanding these proceedings relating to the Trial, the bill for the Attainder of the earl of Strafford went on; and this day it was read a second time in the commons, and committed to a committee of the whole house.*

April 15. Another conference was desired by the commons, relating to the Trial and this Bill; in which, amongst other matters, it was observed to the lords, 'That the evidence of fact being given, it was proposed, from the beginning, to go by way of bill; and that they had accordingly brought in a bill for his Attainder. That the proceedings, by way of bill, stand no way in opposition to the other proceedings that have already been in this business.'—Mr. Whitlocke reported from this conference, 'That they were told by the lords that they were not absolutely resolved how the Trial should proceed: that the lord Strafford's counsel should have notice to attend there the next day, and should not speak to any matter of fact, but to matter of law only.'

April 16. This day the commons took into consideration yesterday's report from the lords, concerning the Trial; when it was resolved, "That it is sufficiently proved, that Thomas earl of Strafford hath endeavoured to subvert the ancient and fundamental laws of these realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government, against law."

In the afternoon of this day another conference was desired with the lords on the following particulars: 1. To take notice to them of their lordships Resolution to hear the earl of Strafford's counsel in matter of law only. 2. To put their lordships in mind of a saving the commons had in that point; and further to tell them this, That if, after his counsel shall be heard, any doubt should remain with their lordships, they shall be ready to satisfy them in due time. 3. That to this end, they do intend to send a committee of this house, only to hear what his counsel shall say. 4. To desire that their lordships would be pleased to put an end to this Trial as soon as in justice it may be; to desire also a continuance of their care, that the counsel, under colour of speaking to the matter of law, travel not into matter of fact.

April 19. The same Resolution was made in regard to the earl of Strafford, as on the 16th, with the addition of voting him 'Guilty of High Treason.'

Lord Digby's Speech against the Bill for attainting the E. of Strafford.] April 21, p. m. This afternoon a final determination was put to the bill of Attainder against the earl of Strafford, in the house of commons. It had been debated strongly great part of the morning, and was ordered to be ingrossed. This ingrossment was made very quick; and, on the third reading of it,

'Mr. Speaker; We are now upon the point of giving (as much as in us lies) the final sentence unto death or life, on a great minister of state, and peer of this kingdom, Thomas earl of Strafford; a name of hatred in the present age, by his practices, and fit to be made a terror to future ages by his punishment. I have had the honour to be employed by the house in this great business, from the first hour that it was taken into consideration. It was a matter of great trust, and I will say, with confidence, that I have served the house in it, not only with industry, according to my ability; but with most exact faithfulness and service. And as I have hitherto discharged my duty to this house and to my country, in the progress of this great cause, so I trust I shall do now in the last period of it, to God and to a good conscience. I do wish the peace of that unto myself, and the blessings of Almighty God to me and my posterity, according as my judgment on the life of this man shall be consonant with my heart, and the best of my understanding in all integrity.—I know well, Mr. Speaker, that by some things I have said of late, whilst this bill was in agitation, I have raised some prejudices upon me in the cause. Yea some (I thank them for their plain dealing) have been so free as to tell me, that I have suffered much by the backwardness I have shewn in this bill of Attainder of the earl of Strafford, against whom I have, formerly, been so keen, so active.—I beg of you, and the rest, but a suspension of judgment concerning me, till I have opened my heart unto you clearly and freely in this business. Truly, sir, I am still the same in my opinions and affections, as unto the earl of Strafford: I confidently believe him to be the most dangerous minister, the most insupportable to free subjects, that can be characterized. I believe his practices in themselves as high, as tyrannical, as any subject ever ventured on; and the malignity of them hugely aggravated by those rare abilities of his, whereof God had given him the use, but the Devil the application. In a word, I believe him to be still that grand apostate to the commonwealth, who must not expect to be pardoned in this world, till he be dispatched to the other, (see p. 651). And yet, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand must not be to that dispatch: I protest, as my conscience stands informed, I had rather it were off.—Let me unfold to you the mystery, Mr. Speaker: I will not dwell much upon justifying unto you my seeming variance at this time from what I was formerly, by putting you in mind of the difference between prosecutors and judges. How misbecoming that fervour would be in a judge, which perhaps was commendable in a prosecutor. Judges

we are now, and must put on another personage. It is honest and noble to be earnest, in order to the discovery of truth; but when that hath been brought so far as it can to light, our judgment thereupon ought to be calm and cautious. In prosecution upon probable grounds, we are accountable only for our industry or remissness; but in judgment we are deeply responsible to God Almighty for its rectitude or obliquity. In cases of life, the judge is God's steward of the party's blood, and must give a strict account for every drop.—But, as I told you, Mr. Speaker, I will not insist long upon this ground of difference in me now, from what I was formerly. The truth of it is, sir, the same ground whereupon I (with the rest of the few to whom you first committed the consideration of my lord Strafford) brought down our opinion, That it was fit he should be accused of Treason; upon the same ground I was engaged with earnestness in his prosecution; and had the same ground remained in that force of belief with me, which till very lately it did, I should not have been tender in his condemnation: but, truly, sir, to deal plainly with you, that ground of our accusation, that spur to our prosecution, and that which should be the basis of my judgment of the earl of Strafford, as unto Treason, is, to my understanding, quite vanished away.—This it was, Mr. Speaker: his advising the king to employ the army in Ireland to reduce England. This I was assured would be proved, before I gave my consent to his accusation. I was confirmed in the same belief, during the prosecution, and fortified most of all in it since sir Henry Vane's preparatory examination, by assurances which that worthy member, Mr. Pym, gave me, that his testimony would be made convincing by some Notes of what passed at the juncto, concurrent with it; which I ever understanding to be of some other counsellor, you see now prove but a copy of the same secretary's Notes, discovered and produced in the manner you have heard; and those such disjointed fragments of the venomous part of discourses: no results, no conclusions of councils, which are the only things that secretaries should register; there being no use of the other, but to accuse and bring men into danger.—But, sir, this is not that which overthrows the evidence with me, concerning the army in Ireland; nor yet, that all the rest of the juncto remember nothing of it; but this, sir, which I shall tell you, is that which works with me, under favour, to an utter overthrow of his evidence, is unto that of the army of Ireland: before, whilst I was prosecutor, and under tie of secrecy, I might not discover any weakness of the cause, which now, as a judge, I must. Mr. Secretary was examined thrice upon oath, at the preparatory committee. The first time he was questioned to all the interrogatories; and to that part of the 7th, which concerns the Army in Ireland, he said positively these words, 'I cannot charge him with that;' but, for the rest, he desires time to recollect himself; which was granted him.—Some days after he was examined a second time, and then deposes these words concerning the king's being absolved from rules of government, and so forth, very clearly. But being pressed to that part, concerning the Irish Army, again, he said, He could say nothing to that.—Here we thought we had done with him, till divers weeks after, my lord of Northumberland, and all others of the juncto, denying to have heard any thing concerning those words, of reducing England by the Irish army, it was thought fit to examine the secretary once more; and then he deposes these words to have been spoken by the earl of Strafford to his majesty, 'You have an Army in Ireland, which you may employ here to reduce (or some words to that sense) this kingdom.—Mr. Speaker, these are the circumstances which, I confess with my conscience, thrust quite out of doors that grand Article of our Charge, concerning his desperate advice to the king, of employing the Irish Army here.—Let not this, I beseech you, be driven to an aspersion upon Mr. Secretary, as if he should have sworn otherwise than he knew or believed; he is too worthy to do that; only let thus much be inferred from it, that he who twice upon oath, with time of recollection, could not remember any thing of such a business, might well a third time misremember somewhat: and in this business the difference of one letter, here for there, or that for this, quite alters the case; the latter also being the more probable, since it is confessed on all hands, that the debate then was concerning a war with Scotland: and you may remember that, at the bar, he once said 'to employ there.' And thus, Mr. Speaker, I have faithfully given you an account, what it is that hath blunted the edge of the hatchet, or bill, with me, towards my lord Strafford.—This was that whereupon I accused him with a free heart, prosecuted him with earnestness; and, had it to my understanding been proved, should have condemned him with innocence; whereas, now, I cannot satisfy my conscience to do it. I profess, I can have no notion of any body's intent to subvert the laws, treasonably, but by force; and this design of force not appearing, all his other wicked practices cannot amount so high with me.—I can find a more easy and more natural spring, from whence to derive all his other crimes, than from an intent to bring in tyranny, and to make his own posterity, as well as us, slaves; as, from revenge, from pride, from avarice, from passion, and insolence of nature. But had this of the Irish Army been proved, it would have diffused a complexion of treason over all; it would have been a withe indeed to bind all those other scattered and lesser branches, as it were, into a faggot of treason.—I do not say but the rest may represent him a man as worthy to die, and perhaps worthier, than many a traitor. I do not say but they may justly direct us to enact, that they shall be treason for the future. But God keep me from giving judgment of death on any man, and of ruin to his innocent posterity, upon a law made a posteriori. Let the mark be set on the door where the plague is, and then let him that will enter die. I know, Mr. Speaker, there is in parliament a double power of life and death, by bill, a judicial power, and a legislative: the measure of the one is, what is legally just; of the other, what is prudentially and politically for the good and preservation of the whole: but these two, under favour, are not to be confounded in judgment. We must not piece up want of legality with matter of convenience; nor the defaultence of prudential fitness, with a reticence of legal justice.—To condemn my lord of Strafford, judicially, as for Treason, my conscience is not assured that the matter will bear it. And to do it by the legislative power, my reason, consultatively, cannot agree to that; since I am persuaded neither the lords nor the king will pass this bill; and, consequently, that our passing it will be a cause of great divisions and combustions in the state.—Therefore my humble advice is, That, laying aside this bill of Attainder, we may think of another, saving his life, such as may secure the state from any lord of Strafford, without endangering it as much by division concerning his punishment, as he hath endangered it by his practices. If his may not be hearkened unto, let me conclude in saying that to you all, which I have thoroughly inculcated in mine own conscience upon this occasion, Let every man lay his hand upon his own heart, and seriously consider that we are going to do with a breath, either justice or murder; justice on the one side, or murder heightened and aggravated to its uttermost extent on the other: for, as the casuists say, He who lies with his sister commits incest; but he that marries his sister sins higher, by applying God's ordinance to his crime; so, doubtless, he that commits murder with the sword of justice, heightens that crime to the utmost.—The danger being so great, and the case so doubtful, that I see the best lawyers in diametrical opposition concerning it, every man wipe his heart, as he does his eyes, when he would judge of a nice and subtil point. The eye, if it be practised with any labour, is vitiated in its discerning. Let us take heed of a blood-shot eye in judgment. Let every man purge his heart clear of all passions. I know this great and wise body politic have none; but I speak to individuals, on the weakness which I find in myself, away with personal animosities; away with flatteries to the people, in being the sharper against him, because he is odious to them; away with all fears of lest by the sparing his good they may be incensed; away with all such considerations, as that it is not fit for a parliament, that one accused by it of Treason should escape with life. Let not former vehemence of any against him, nor fear from thence that he cannot be safe while that man lives, be an ingredient in the sentence of any one of you. Of all these corruptives of judgment, Mr.

Speaker, I do, before God, discharge myself, to the utmost of my power; and do, with a clear conscience, wash my hands of this man's blood, by this solemn protestation, that my vote goes not to the taking of the earl of Strafford's life.

The question being then put for passing the bill against the earl, it was carried in the affirmative, 204 against 59. Mr. Pym was ordered to carry this bill up to the lords, and to express to them, 'That it was a bill that highly concerned the commonwealth in the expediting of it.'

The foregoing speech of lord Digby gave such offence to the house, that a motion was made, "That the lord Digby explain himself for something he said here this afternoon, at the passing of the bill of Attainder of Thomas earl of Strafford, to-morrow morning." The next day the lord Digby did explain himself; but nothing farther was done in the business at that time; though, not long after, when this speech was printed, a heavy censure fell upon it.

April 28. Mr. Hyde was sent up to the lords, 'To acquaint their lordships that this house had received such information, as hath caused them to fear that the earl of Strafford may have a design to escape; that he has ships at sea at command; and that the guard about him is weak: therefore to desire their lordships, he may be close confined, and his guard strengthened.' Mr. Hyde brought for Answer, 'That their lordships had before given directions to the lieutenant of the Tower, that he should be a close prisoner, and to take care for a strong guard; but that they would repeat their directions about it.'

April 29. This day was wholly taken up with hearing the point of law discussed, in Westminster-hall, relating to the earl of Strafford. And, on the next, the commons ordered 'That the solicitor should bring in a perfect Copy of his argument used on that occasion; and likewise that Mr. Pym give in copies of his speeches, made by him in Westminster-hall, both at the beginning and the latter end of the trial of the earl of Strafford.'

The King's Speech in favour of the E. of Strafford.] May 1. The King came to the house of peers; and, being seated on the throne, he commanded the house of commons to be sent for, and then spoke to both houses as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; I had not any intention to speak of this business, which causes me to come here to-day, which is the Impeachment of the earl of Strafford, because I would do nothing that might hinder your occasions; but now as it comes to pass, that, of necessity, I must have part in that Judgment, I think it most necessary for me to declare my conscience therein. I am sure you all know that I have been present at the hearing of this great business, from one end to the other; that which I have to declare unto you is shortly this, that, in my conscience, I cannot condemn.

him of High Treason.—It is not fit for me to argue the business: I am sure you will not expect it: a positive doctrine best becomes the mouth of a prince. Yet I must tell you three great truths, which I am sure nobody can know so well as myself: 1. That I never had any intention of bringing over the Irish Army into England, nor ever was advised by any body so to do. 2. There never was any debate before me, neither in public council, nor at private committee, of the disloyalty and disaffection of my English subjects; nor ever had I any suspicion of them. 3. I was never counselled by any to alter the least of any of the laws of England, much less to alter all the laws: nay, I must tell you this, I think nobody durst ever be so impudent as to move it to me; for if they had, I should have put such a mark upon them, and made them such an example, that all posterity should know my intention by it; for my intention was ever to govern according to law, and not otherwise.—I desire to be rightly understood: I told you, in my conscience, I cannot condemn him of High Treason; yet I cannot say I can clear him of Misdemeanor: therefore I hope that you may find a way, for to satisfy justice and your own fears, and not to press upon my conscience.—My lords, I hope you know what a tender thing conscience is. Yet I must declare unto you, that, to satisfy my people, I would do great matters: but, in this of conscience, no fear, no respect whatsoever, shall ever make me go against it. Certainly I have not so ill deserved of the parliament at this time, that they should press me in this tender point; and therefore I cannot expect that you will go about it.—Nay, I must confess, for matter of Misdemeanor, I am so clear in that, that though I will not chalk out the way, yet let me tell you, that I do think my lord Strafford is not fit, hereafter, either to serve me or the commonwealth in any place of trust; no not so much as that of a constable: therefore I leave it to you, my lords, to find some such way as to bring me out of this great strait, and keep yourselves and the kingdom from such inconveniences. Certainly he that, in his conscience, thinks him guilty of high Treason, may condemn him of Misdemeanor."

Great Tumults about Westminster Hall.] May 3. Both houses being adjourned to this day, on account of Sunday intervening, we are told by a Collector of these Times, "That, very early in the morning, there met, about Westminster-Hall, a great number of citizens, 5000, or thereabouts, being, for the most part, men of good fashion;* who, as the lords and parliament-men came by, made a lane for them to pass with their coaches, calling upon them for Justice against the earl of Strafford and others; complaining, that they were undone through the want of due execution thereof; and that trading was so decayed thereby, that they could scarce get bread to maintain their families." The lords, adds our author, "generally gave them good words; amongst whom, the lord high steward,* upon whom they called with greatest clamour, went out of his coach, some other of the lords being with him, and, with his hat in his hand, prayed them to be quiet, and what lay in his power should be done; and he would likewise move his majesty, that justice might be executed according to their requests: and accordingly, the lord high steward, and some other lords, went to the king, (who purposed to be at the house that morning, his barge waiting at the privy-stairs for that end, but, by reason of the tumult, did not come) and acquainted him with the citizens complaints and desires, moving his majesty therein: and, upon their return, certified the citizens, that his majesty had promised they should have speedy execution of justice to their desires."

Names of the Commoners who voted against the Earl of Strafford's Attainder posted up.] Dr. Nalson informs us, "That when the earl of Holland came out to take coach, they redoubled their cry; and, coming up to the earl of Bristol's coach, some of them told him, 'For you, my lord of Bristol, we know you are an apostate from the cause of Christ, and our mortal enemy; we do not therefore crave justice from you, but shall shortly crave justice upon you, and your false son the lord Digby.' They also posted up the names of all those members who had voted for the earl, under the following title:

Mr. Whitlocke tells us, "That this was complained of by some who were named in the list, as a high breach of the privilege of parliament; yet, being the act of a multitude, no address was endeavoured."—Lord Clarendon says, "That these unheard-of acts of insolence and sedition continued to many days, till many lords grew so really apprehensive of having their brains beaten out, that they absented themselves from the house; and others, finding that seconds the house of commons was like to have to compass whatever they desired, changed their minds; and so, in an afternoon, about fourscore who had been present at the trial, there were only 46 lords in the house the good people still crying at the door for justice) they put the bill to the question, and, 1 lords only dissenting, it passed that house."

The Commons resent the King's Speech in favour of the Earl.] The next thing we find remarkable in the commons, is a Report of the King's last speech, given by the Speaker, at the command of the house; at which, Rushworth says, they seemed to be much troubled and discontented; and it was ordered, "That Mr. Selden, Mr. Whitlocke, and Mr. Glynn, should immediately retire into the committee-chamber, to insert a clause in the Subsidy bill, That neither the passing of that bill, nor any other, should determine this Session of Parliament." Lord Clarendon adds, "That the commons, in great passion and fury, declared his last act of his majesty to be the most unparalleled breach of privilege that had ever happened: that if his maj. might take notice that bills were passing in either house, and declare his own opinion, it was to forejudge their counsels, and they should not be able to supply the commonwealth with wholesome laws, suitable to the diseases it laboured under: that this was the greatest obstruction of justice that could be imagined: that they were bound to maintain the privileges of parliament; which were now too grossly invaded and violated: with many sharp discourses to that purpose."

May 7. The lord chief justice of the King's bench delivered in to the lords, the unanimous opinion of all the Judges present: "That they are of opinion, upon all which their lordships have voted to be proved, that the earl of Strafford doth deserve to undergo the pains and forfeitures of High Treason by law."

Bill of Attainder passed.] This day the Bill of Attainder passed the lords, without any amendment or alteration. Immediately upon this, a conference was desired by the commons; the substance whereof was, "That in regard the peace of the kingdom doth much consist in the dispatching of the bill of Attainder of Thomas earl of Strafford, to desire their lordships to move his majesty, as speedily as may be, to give his concurrence." Mr. Pym brought word back to the house, "That the lords would join with them to attend his majesty, according to his appointment, at 4 this afternoon, in the Banqueting-house, Whitehall." But the Answer the king then gave to both houses, was, "That he would be at the house of lords on Monday morning, at 10 o'clock, in order to give his assent to the two bills."

The King greatly perplexed as to giving his Assent thereto.] The king being much perplexed between the clamours of a discontented people and an unsatisfied conscience, Rushworth tells us, "That the day before, being Sunday, his majesty called his privy council at Whitehall, and proposed several scruples unto them, concerning this bill of Attainder. Some of the judges* and bishops were present also, to whom his majesty imparted his doubts and had their opinions therein. The arguments, pro and con, upon this very remarkable occasion, collected from the several Cotemporary Writs,† may, perhaps, be no disagreeable digression: the earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain, told him, 'That should he deny this, it would be construed, that he loved his enemies, and hated his friends; and that if he did not speak comfortably to the people, they would desert him; which would be worse than all the evils that had befallen him in his life.' The bp. of London (Dr. Juxson) resolutely told him, 'That if he were not satisfied in his conscience, he ought not to do it whatsoever happened.' But the bishop of Lincoln (Dr. John Williams) endeavoured to persuade the king, 'That there was a private and a public conscience; that his public conscience as a king, might not only dispense with, but oblige him to do that which was against his private conscience as a man; and that the question was not, Whether he should save the earl of Strafford; but, Whether he should perish with him? That the conscience of a king to preserve his kingdom, the conscience of a husband to preserve his wife, the conscience of a father to preserve his children (all which were now in danger) weighed down abundantly all the considerations the conscience of a master, or a friend, could suggest to him for the preservation of a friend or servant.'

* Nalson and Whitlocke say, "There were 26 for the earl, and 26 against him; which agrees with the Lords Journals. The noble historian is very inaccurate in regard to the votes of parliamentary proceedings."

* The king complained of the judges, that, by their dubious answers, they only abused him, not eased him of his scruples.—Nalson, Vol. II. p. 192.

And by such unpretential, ignominious arguments (says lord Clarendon) he, in plain terms, advised him, even for conscience sake, to pass that act.' He adds, 'Though this bishop acted his part with more prodigious boldness and impiety; others of the same function (for whose learning and sincerity the king and the world had greater reverence) did not what might have been expected from their calling or their trust.'—Mr. Whitlocke adds, That the chief motive was a Letter which the earl of Strafford sent to the king,* wherein we find the following remarkable passage, viz. "With much sadness, I am come to a resolution of that which I take to be best becoming me, to look upon that which is most principal in itself; which, doubtless, is the prosperity of your sacred person and the commonwealth, infinitely before any private man's interest: and therefore, in few words, as I did put myself wholly upon the honour and justice of my peers so clearly, as to beseech your maj. might please to have spared that declaration of yours on Saturday last, and entirely to have left me to their lordships; so now, to set your majesty's conscience at liberty, I do most humbly beseech your majesty, in prevention of mistakes which may happen by your refusal, to pass this bill; and, by this means, to remove (praised be God, I cannot say, this accursed, but I confess) this unfortunate thing forth out of the way, towards that blessed agreement, which God, I trust, shall ever establish between you and your subjects. Sir, my consent shall more acquit you herein to God, than all the world can do besides. To a willing man there is no injury done."

In fine, the king gave orders for a commission to empower the earl of Arundel, the lord privy seal, and other lords, to give the royal assent to the bill for the Execution of the earl of Strafford; as also to another bill, for the 'Continuance of the present parliament;' on which Mr. Whitlocke observes, "Great censures were past upon the king's passing these bills, the one being against his most faithful servant, and the other against himself; and that he should ever be brought to it, was admired by most of his subjects, as well as foreigners." He adds, "That when the earl read the news of the king's having passed the bill, (as not believing he would have done it) he rose up from his chair, lift up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand on his heart, and said, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation."

May 10. In consequence of this commission, a message was sent from the lords to the commons, by the gentleman usher of the black rod, signifying, "That his majesty's assent to the bill of Attainder was then to be given, and that the king did expect the Speaker and the house of commons to come up." After the commons were come, a commission was read, under the great seal, directed to the lord privy seal, the lord great chamberlain, and the lord steward, or any two of them, for giving the royal assent to two bills; the one entitled, 'An Act of Attainder of Thomas earl of Strafford, of High Treason;' the other, 'An Act to prevent Inconveniences which may happen by the untimely adjourning, proroguing, or dissolving of this present Parliament:' but before this commission was read, the lord privy seal declared to both houses, "That it was his maj.'s intent to have come himself, as this day, to give his assent, in person, to the two bills; but some important occasions had prevented him, and so he had sent a commission for that purpose."

The King's Letter to the Lords for respiting the Execution of the earl of Strafford.] May 11. The King sent a Letter, written with his own hand, to the house of lords, by his highness the prince; which was delivered to the lord keeper, and read in hæc verba:

"My lords; I did yesterday satisfy the justice of the kingdom, by passing the bill of Attainder against the earl of Strafford: but mercy being as inherent in, and inseparable from a king as justice, I desire, at this time, in some measure to shew that likewise, by suffering that unfortunate man to fulfil the natural course of his life in a close imprisonment; yet so that, if ever he make the least offer to escape, or offer directly, or indirectly to meddle in any sort of public business, especially with me, either by message or letter, it shall cost him his life, without further process. This, if it may be done without the discontentment of my people, will be an unspeakable contentment to me. To which end, as in the first place, I by this letter, do earnestly desire your approbation; and, to endear it the more, have chosen him to carry it, that of all your house is most dear to me: so I desire that, by a conference, you will endeavour to give the house of commons contentment; likewise assuring you, that the exercise of mercy is no more pleasing to me, than to see both houses of parliament consent, for my sake, that I should moderate the severity of the law in so important a case. I will not say that your complying with me, in this my intended mercy, shall make me more willing, but certainly it will make me more cheerful, in granting your just Grievances: but, if no less than his life can satisfy my people, I must say, fat justitia. Thus, again, recommending the consideration of my intentions to you, I rest

Your unalterable and affectionate Friend, Whitehall the 11th CHARLES R. of May, 1641.

"P. S. If he must die, it were charity to reprieve him till Saturday."

This letter having been read a second time, after serious consideration, the house resolved, "Presently to send 14 of the peers, messengers to the king, humbly to signify, that neither of the two intentions expressed in the letter, could, with duty in them, or without danger to himself, to his dearest consort the queen, and all the young princes, their children, possibly be complied with :” all which being done accordingly, and the reasons shewn to his majesty, he suffered no more words to come from them ; next, out of the fulness of his heart to the observance of justice, and for the contentment of his people, told them, “That what he intended by his letter was with an if, if it may be done without discontentment of my people ; if that cannot be, I say again, the same that I writ, ut Justitia. My other intention, proceeding out of charity for a few days respite, was upon certain information that his estate was so distressed, that it necessarily required some few days for settlement thereof.” Whereunto the lords answered, “ Their purpose was to be suitors to his majesty for favour to be shewn to his innocent children ; and if himself had made any provision for them, that the same might hold.” This was well liking to his majesty, so thereupon parted from the lords. At his majesty’s parting they offered up into his hands a Letter itself which he had sent ; but he was pleased to say, “ My Lords, What I have written to you, I shall be content it be registered by you in your house. In it you see my mind. I hope you will use it to my honour.” Upon the return of the lords to their house, and the report of this made, it was ordered, That if any copies of the king’s Letter were raised, the foregoing lines, which were the consequences of the letter, should be added to it.”

The same day the lords came to a resolution, to be suitors to his majesty in behalf of the king’s daughters and lady of the earl of Strafford ; and in case there be no provision made for them by the said earl, to present them to the king’s wisdom, and that he will be pleased to take them into his mercy and consideration : likewise to desire his majesty, That the creditors of the said earl, and those that have petitions depending in this house for reparations from him, for which there is a provision, or order, made in this house, may be taken into his majesty’s consideration.

May 12. This day, at noon, the earl of Strafford was beheaded on Tower-hill. “ His discourse on the scaffold,” says Huine, “ was full of decency and courage. He feared, he said, ‘ that the omen was bad for the intended reformation of the State ; that it commenced with the shedding of innocent blood.’ Having said a last adieu to his brother and friends who attended him, and having sent a blessing to his dearer relations who were absent, ‘ and now,’ he said, ‘ I have nigh done ! One stroke will make my wife a widow, my dear children fatherless, deprive my poor servants of their dutiful master, and separate me from my affectionate brother and all my friends ! But God be to you and them all in all.’ Going to the block, and prepare himself for the blow, he said, ‘ thank God, said he, ‘ that I am nowise afraid of death nor am daunted with any terror ; but do as cheerfully lay down my head at this time, as ever I did when going to repose !’

With one blow was a period put to his life by the executioner.”

The Proceedings against Mr. Burton reversed with Damages.] March 24. The commons resolved, 1. “ That the sentence in the Star-Chamber against Mr. Burton, is illegal, and without any just ground, and ought to be reversed, and he to be freed from the fine of 5000*l.* and imprisonment by that sentence. 2. That he ought to be restored to his degrees taken in the university, orders in the ministry, and to his benefice in Friday-street London. 3. That the order of the council-board for transferring him from the castle of Lancaster to the isle of Guernsey, and his imprisonment there, is against the law, and liberty of the subject. 4. That he ought to have reparations and recompences for the Damages sustained by his said imprisonment, loss of his ears, exile, and other evils sustained by the said unjust and illegal proceedings.”

March 30. A bill for reforming the unlawful acts and proceedings of the Privy Council, and the court called the Star-Chamber, was brought into the house of commons, and read a first time : also a bill to restrain Bishops, and others in Holy orders, from meddling with Secular Affairs.

The Earl of Holland appointed to disband the Armies.] April 15. At a conference of both houses about the Satisfying and Dissolving of the three Armies, which were suddenly to be disbanded, the e. of Holland declared, “ That his majesty had been pleased to nominate him as general for that purpose ; upon which he spoke very learnedly in the way of all acknowledgment of so great a favour cast upon him, many of that honourable assembly being more deserving, as he said, and more capable than himself ; nevertheless accounted himself very happy to be made an instrument of so much good, for the quiet and peace of the kingdom ; and that his greatest care should be to perform the said trust faithfully, and in duty to the king, and the good of his country.”

Resolutions in favour of Mr. Prynne, and Dr. Leighton.] April 20. Mr. Rigby reported from the committee, to whose consideration it was referred, the Case of Mr. Wm. Prynne, of Lincoln’s-Inn : whereupon the commons resolved, 1. “ That the Sentence given against him in the Star-Chamber, Feb. 17. Anno 9. Car. is illegal, and given without just cause, and ought to be reversed ; and that he ought to be discharged of the fine of 5000*l.* imposed by the said Sentence, and of all extents thereupon, and of his imprisonment decreed by that sentence. 2. That he ought to be restored to his degrees in the university of Oxford, and to the society of Lincoln’s-Inn, and to the exercise of his profession of an utter barrister at law, and to his chamber again in Lincoln’s-Inn. 3. That he ought to have reparation for such damages and prejudice, as he hath sustained by the said Sentence and Proceedings. 4. That the Sentence given against him in the Star-Chamber, 14 Junii, 1637, Anno 13. Car. is illegal, and given without any just cause or ground, and therefore ought to be reversed; and that he ought to be discharged of the fine and imprisonment thereby decreed; and that he ought to have reparation and recompence for the damages sustained by that sentence and the execution thereof. 5. That the warrant, dated 27 Aug. Anno 13. Caroli, made for transporting of him from Carnarvon castle to the isle of Jersey, and his imprisonment there, and other restraints therein mentioned, are against the law and liberty of the subject; and that he ought to be discharged of that imprisonment, and to have reparations for the damages sustained thereby. 6. That his imprisonment, by warrant, dated Feb. 1, 1632, under the hands of Thomas lord Coventry, lord keeper of the great seal of England, Rd. lord abp. of York, Henry earl of Manchester, Edw. earl of Dorset, Henry lord viscount Falkland, Wm. lord bishop of London, Edw. lord Newburgh, and sir Tho. Jermyn, is unjust and illegal; and that they ought to give him satisfaction for the damages sustained by his imprisonment. It was also ordered, "That a Charge be drawn up against Dr. Heylin, touching his promoting his suit in the Star-Chamber against Mr. Prynne."

The next day Mr. Rouse reported the Case of Dr. Leighton; when the house came to the following Resolutions: 1. That the attaching, imprisoning, and detaining Dr. Leighton in prison, by warrant from the high commissioners, is illegal. 2. That the breaking open his house, and taking away his papers by Edmund Wright, then sheriff of London, and now lord mayor, is illegal. 3. That the said Edm. Wright ought to give reparations to him for his damages sustained by the breaking open his house, and taking away his papers, and other goods as aforesaid. 4. That the abp. of Canterbury, then bishop of London, ought to give satisfaction to him for his damages, sustained by 15 weeks imprisonment in Newgate, upon the said bishop's warrant. 5. That the great fine of 10,000*l.* laid upon him by a sentence in the Star-Chamber, is illegal. 6. That the sentence of corporal punishment imposed upon him, the whipping, branding, smiting his nose, cutting off his ears, setting in the pillory, and the execution thereof and imprisonment thereupon, are illegal. 7. That he ought to be freed from the great fine of 10,000*l.* and from the sentence of perpetual imprisonment; and to have his bonds delivered up, which he entered into for his true imprisonment. 8. That he ought to have good satisfaction and reparation for his great sufferings and damages, sustained by the illegal sentences in the Star-Chamber."

Order for Divine Service to be performed according to Law.] April 22. Upon an Information to the house of lords, That some disorders have lately happened in several churches within the county Palatine and city of Chester, whereby the Divine Service hath been disturbed, or otherwise neglected and disquieted; it is therefore thought fit and ordered, "That the Divine Service be performed as it is appointed by the acts of parliament of this realm; and all such as shall disturb this wholesome order, shall be severely punished according to the laws; and the parsons, vicars, and curates, in several parishes, shall forbear to introduce any rites or ceremonies that may give offence, otherwise than those which are established by the laws of the land."

Resolution against the Court at York.] April 24. A committee of the commons having been appointed to inquire into the legality and proceedings of the High Commission-Court at York; this day Mr. Hyde, (afterwards earl of Clarendon,) reported the case of it to the house; when it was resolved; 1. "That the Commission and Instructions, whereby the President and Council in the North exercise jurisdiction, is illegal, both in the creation and execution. 2. That the court of the president and council in the North, is unprofitable to his majesty. 3. That the said court is inconvenient and grievous to his majesty's subjects in those parts."

Petition from the Citizens of London concerning Grievances, &c.] This day the following Petition from divers Citizens of London (subscribed, as Rushworth says, by 20,000 persons of good rank and quality) was presented to both houses, and was as follows:

"To the Most honourable assembly of the lords and commons in this parliament assembled, The HUMBLE PETITION of divers Citizens of London,

"Sheweth, That notwithstanding his majesty's gracious Answer to the humble Petition of his loyal subjects, in summoning the parl. with the great care and endeavour pains taken by both houses, for the removing the heavy Grievances in Church and Commonwealth; whereof the petitioners have already received some fruit, for which they desire to return their most humble and utmost thanks; yet, nevertheless, they are enforced, with all humility, to represent to this most honourable assembly, some of those obstructions which do still hinder that freedom and fullness of Trade in this city which they formerly had, and without which, considering the numerous multitudes thereupon depending, they conceive this city cannot comfortably subsist.—As the unsettled Condition of the Kingdom, ever since the Troubles in Scotland, hath caused both strangers, and also some of our own, who did furnish great sums of money to use, to call it in; and remit much of it, by exchange, into foreign parts, who stand now in expectation of what the issue of the thing may be.—The stopping Money in the Mint; which, till then, was accounted the safest place, and surest staple in these parts of the world, still doth hinder the importation of bullion; the Scots now disabled to pay such debts as they owe to the petitioners and others in the city; and, by reason of the oppressions exercised in Ireland, their debts also are detained there. The English Trade, by reason of our general distractions and fears, is so much decayed, that country tradesmen cannot pay their debts in London as formerly. —The great sums of Money unduly taken by his majesty's officers and farmers, for impositions upon Merchandize exported and imported, and the want of relief in Courts of Justice against them. The drawing out from the city great sums of money (which is the life and spirit of trade) for his majesty's service in the North; and being there employed, is not yet returned. —Besides all which, from what strong and secret opposition the petitioners know not, they have not received what so much time and pains might give them cause to hope; but till incendiaries of the kingdom, and other notorious offenders, remain unpunished: the Affairs of the Church, notwithstanding many petitions concerning it, and long debates about it, remain unsettled: the Papists still armed; the laws against them not executed; some of the most active of them still at court; Priests and Jesuits not yet banished; the Irish Popish Army not yet disbanded; courts of justice not reformed; and the earl of Strafford, (who, now appears, hath counselled the plundering of this city, and putting it to fine and ransom, and said, 'It never would be well till some of the aldermen were hanged up,' because they would not yield to illegal levies of money) hath drawn out and spent time in his business, to the very great expence and charge of the whole kingdom, and his endeavour to obtain yet more time: all which makes us fear there may be practices now in hand to hinder the success of your great endeavours; and that we lie under some more dangerous plot than we can discover. —All which premisses, with the fears and distractions growing therefrom, and from things of the like nature, the petitioners humbly offer to the most grave consideration of this most honourable assembly; as being the true causes of Decay of Trade, Discouragement of Tradesmen, and of the great Scarcity of Money, with other ill consequences they labour under; and do humbly pray, that their said Grievances may be redressed; the causes of their fears removed; justice executed upon the said earl, and other incendiaries and offenders; and be rather, in regard, till then, the petitioners humbly conceive, neither religion, nor their lives, liberties, or estates, can be secured. And, as in duty bound, they shall ever pray."

This Petition being read, after some debate hereon, the lord Russel, son to the earl of Bedford, was sent by the commons with a message, to desire a conference, by a committee, of both houses thereupon; and it was resolved, to renew their request to the lords to join with them in another Petition to the King, concerning disbanding the Irish army, banishing Recusants, and removing Papists from Court.

Mr. Hyde's Speech against the Court of York.] April 26. The lord Falkland was sent up with a message to the lords, to desire a conference. The heads of this conference, to be managed by Mr. Hyde, were concerning the Court of the President and council of the North; upon which occasion.

Mr. Hyde delivered himself as follows:—
"My Lords; I am commanded, by the knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons, to present to your lordships a great and crying Grievance; which, though it be complained of, in the present pressures, but by the Northern parts, yet, by the consequence of it, is the grievance of the whole kingdom: the Court of the President and Council of the North, or, as it is more usually called, the Court of York; which, by the spirit and ambition of the ministers trusted there, or by the natural inclinations of courts to enlarge their own power and jurisdiction, hath so prodigiously broken down the banks of its first channel, in which it ran; that it hath almost overwhelmed that country under the sea of arbitrary power, and involved the people in a labyrinth of distemper, oppression, and poverty. —Your lordships will give me leave (not presuming to inform your great understandings; but that you may know what moved the house of commons to their Resolutions) to remind your lordships of the foundation and erecting of this Court, and of the progress and growth of it. —Your lordships well know, that, upon the suppression of all Religious Houses to such a certain value, in the 27th Hen. 8. from that time to the 30th of that king's reign, many, not not fewer than six, insurrections and rebellions were made in the Northern parts, under pretence of that quarrel; most of them under the command of some eminent person of that country; the which being quieted before the end of the 31st year, that great king (well knowing his own mind, and what he meant to do with the great Houses of Religion in the year following) for the prevention of any inconvenience that might ensue to him upon such distemper, did, in the 31st year of his reign, grant a Commission to the bishop of Mlandaff,† the first president, and others; for the quiet government of the counties of York, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, the bishoprick of Durham, the county of the city of York, and towns of Kingston upon Hull, and Newcastle upon Tyne. But, my lords, this Commission was no other than a commission of Oyer and Terminer; only it had a clause, at the end of it, for the hearing of all causes real and personal 'quando ambæ partes vel altera pars sic gravata Paupertate fuerit, quod commode jus suum, secundum legem regni nostri, aliter persequi non possit;' which clause, how illegal soever, (for that it is illegal and void in law little doubt can be made) yet whether they exercised that part of the commission at all, or so sparingly exercised it, that poor people found ease and benefit by it, I know not; but, at that time, I find no complaint against it. Till the coming in of king James the commission continued still the same; and that, in the first year of his reign, to the lord Sheffield, varied no otherwise from the former, save only that it had reference to Instructions which should be sent; though whether any new ones were sent or not is uncertain, but we can find none.—In June, in the 7th year of the reign of king James, a new commission was granted to the same person, the lord Sheffield, very different from all that went before; it being left out, that they should inquire ‘per Sacramentum bonorum, & legalium hominum,’ and to hear and determine ‘secundum leges Angliæ’; relation being had, only, to the Instructions; which were the first Instructions we can find were sent thither. Though I told your lordships there was mention of some Anno 1 Jac. I shall not trouble your lordships with these Instructions, nor with the other that followed in 7 Jac. to the lord Sheffield; nor in 16 Jac. when a new commission was granted to my lord Sunderland; nor, indeed, with any till we come to these present Instructions and Commissions, under which that part of the kingdom groans and languisheth.—My lord Strafford came to that government in Dec. 4 Caroli; and since then the commission hath been three several times renewed; in the 5th year, in March; in the 8th, in Nov.; and in the 13th year of his majesty’s reign. A new clause was screwed into the commissions of the 8th and 13th, for, granting, sequestrating, and establishing possessions according to certain Instructions; which crowded in a mass of new, exorbitant and intolerable power. Though our complaint be against this Commission itself, and against the whole body of those Instructions, I shall not mispend your lordships precious time in desiring to have the whole read; but shall presume to trouble your lordships only with 5 or 6 of the Instructions; that, by the vast irregularity of these, your lordships may judge how insupportable the whole burden is. I shall not trouble your lordships with the 9th Instruction, though it be but short, which introduceth that ‘miseram servitutem, ubi jæs est vagum, & incognitum’; by requiring an obedience to such ordinances and determinations, as be, or shall be, made by the council-table or high commission-court. A grievance, my lords, (howsoever ‘Consuetudo & peccantium claritas nobilitaverit hanc culpam’) of so transcendens a nature, that your lordships noble justice will provide a remedy for it; with no less care, I doubt not, than you would rescue the life-blood of the commonwealth.—Read only the 19th, 22d, 23d, 24th, 29th, and 30th: I will not trouble your lordships with reading more; there being among them, in the whole, 58 Instructions, scarce one that is not against, or beside, the law.

Whether his majesty may canton out a part of his kingdom to be tried by commission, though according to the rules of law, (since the whole kingdom is under the laws and government of the courts established at Westminster, and that, by this reason, the several parts of the kingdom may be deprived of that privilege) will not now be the question. That his maj. cannot, by commission, erect a new court of Chancery, or a proceeding according to the rules of the Star-Chamber, is most clear to all who have read Magna Charta; which allows no proceedings, ‘nisi per legale judicium plarium, & per legem terræ’ for our court of Chancery here, by long usage and prescription, is grown to be, as it were, lex terræ. But, my lords, the 30th Instruction goes further, and erects such an empire, such a dominion, as shall be liable to no controul.—The courts of Westminster, my lords, have superintendencies over all inferior courts, to regulate their jurisdictions, if they exceed their limits; as, to hold pleas of greater value, or the like, in the exercise of their jurisdiction. The judges are sworn to grant and send prohibitions in this case: and to stop the granting of these prohibitions, or to neglect them when they are granted, is the greatest and noblest scorn of the law and the law-makers, that can be imagined.—The king’s courts at Westminster have been, always, of that awful and reverent esteem with inferior judges, that the instances of such contempts against them are very rare; and very exemplary are the punishments of this offence. The bishop of Norwich, in Trinity term, in the 20th Edw. 3. in Rot. 269, in the Common-Pleas; and, in Hilary term 21. in the King’s-Bench was attached for disobeying a Prohibition at the suit of Stracil. Upon full and solemn discussion of the whole matter, the court resolved, That the proceedings of the bishop were ‘Inobedientiam, diminutionem Domini Regis & potestatis Regiæ, autoritatis sue rejectionem, & coronæ sue exhereditationem manifestam, &c.’ as the words of the record are: and therefore adjudged the temporalities of the bishop to be seized into the king’s hands, and great, very great, damages to be paid to the plaintiffs. And whosoever gave directions for these stout Instructions might have remembered, that no longer since than 7 Eliz. rot. 31. an attachment was granted against the abb. of York, then President of that council, for forbidding the goaler of York to deliver one Lambert his prisoner, who was sent for by a Habeas Corpus from the King’s Bench. And if they would have believed the Resolution of all the Judges in England, in Trinity Term, in the 6th of king James, they would have known how unfit it had been to enlarge that jurisdiction; since most of their proceedings, being of an inferior nature to what they are now grown, were then declared to be illegal, and inconsistent with the liberty of the subject.—And can such a Court as this, my lords, deserve to live? What a compendious abridgement hath York gotten of all the courts in Westminster.

hall? Whatsoever falls within the cognizance, or jurisdiction, of any court there, is completely determinable within that one court at York; besides the power it hath with the ecclesiastical and high commission courts.—What have the good Northern people done, that they, only, must be disfranchised of all their privileges granted by Magna Charta and the Petition of Right? For to what purpose serve these statutes, if they may be fined and imprisoned without law, according to the discretion of the commissioners? What have they done, that they, and they alone, of all the people of this happy island, must be disinherited of their birth-right, of their inheritance? For Prohibitions, writs of Habeas Corpus, and writs of Error, are the birth-right, the inheritance of the subjects.—And 'tis here worth your lordships' observation, that to those many Prohibitions, which have been formerly granted from above, (for, till of late, the Court of York had not the courage to oppose Prohibitions; nor indeed, till our courts here had not the courage to grant them) it was never known that the Court of York pleaded the jurisdiction of their council. This, without doubt, they would have done, having the advantage of many great persons, under whose protection they have always been screened, had they not known that the law could not be misinterpreted enough to allow it.—Your lordships remember the directions I mentioned of Magna Charta, That all proceedings shall be 'per legale iudicium parium, & per legem terræ': now these Instructions tell you 'You shall proceed according to your discretion'; that is, you shall do what you please: only, that we may not suspect this discretion will be gentler and kinder to us than the law, special provision is made, That no fine, no punishment, shall be less than by the law is appointed; no, by no means; but as much greater as your discretion shall think fit: and, indeed, in this improvement, we find arbitrary courts are very pregnant; for if the law requires my good behaviour, this discretion makes me close prisoner; if the law sets me upon the pillory, this discretion appoints me to leave my ears there.—But this proceeding, according to discretion, is no new expression; it was in the first commission I told your lordships of in the 31 Hen. 8. That they should proceed, 'secundum legem & consuetudinem regni Angliæ; vel aliter, secundum sanas discretionones vestras;' which, in the interpretation of the law, and that is the best interpretation, signifies the same thing: for to proceed according to discretion, is to proceed according to law, which is 'summa discretio'; but not according to their private conceit or affection: for 'talis discretio,' says the law, 'discretionem confundit;' and such a confusion hath this discretion, in these instructions, produced, as if discretion were only one remove from rage and fury; no inconvenience, no mischief, no disgrace, that the malice, or insolence, or curiosity of these commissioners had a mind to bring upon that people, but, through the latitude and power of this discretion, the poor people have felt. This discretion hath been the quick-sand, which hath swallowed up their property, their liberty. I beseech your lordships' rescue them from this discretion.—Besides the charge that this Court is to his majesty, which is near 1300*l.* per ann. you will easily guess what an unsupportable burthen the many officers (whose places are of great value) the attornies, clerks, registers, and above 1000 solicitors that attend the courts, must be to that people; insomuch that, in truth, the country seems to be divided into officers and dependents upon that court, and the people upon whom the officers of that court prey and commit rapines; as is said in Petronius, 'Omnes hic aut captantur, aut captant; aut cadavera quæ lacerantur, aut corvi qui lacerant.' Truly, my lords, these vexed, worn-out people of the North are not suitors to your lordships, to regulate this court, or to reform the Judges of it, but for extirpating these Judges, and the utter abolishing of this court: they are of Cato's mind, who would not submit to Cæsar for his life, saying, He would not be beholden to a tyrant for injustice, for it was injustice in him to take upon him to save a man's life, over whom he had no power.' So these gentlemen desire not to be beholden to this court, hereafter, for justice; the very administration of justice itself, founded upon such illegal principles, being a grievance and oppression to the subject. 1st. Upon the whole matter, the house of commons are of opinion; That the Commission and Instructions, whereby the President and Council of the North exercise jurisdiction, is illegal, both in the creation and execution. 2d. That it is unprofitable to his majesty; for besides so much, near 1300*l.* taken out of his majesty's revenues every year; his majesty loseth the great benefit which would accrue to him upon writs and upon fines, upon out-laws, and other profits, which redound to his maj. out of his courts here: and (which I had almost forgot to tell your lordships of) that his maj. may be sure to have no benefit from this Court, notable care is taken, by the 53d Instruction, That if any money remain over and above all disbursements, it shall be bestowed in providing household-stuff and furniture for the house, where the lord president and council use to be. Lastly, That it is inconvenient and grievous to his majesty's subjects in these parts.—Therefore, they are humble suitors to your lordships, and the house of commons, on this behalf, That since this people do, and have, in all matters of duty and affection, contended with the best of his majesty's subjects, that they may not be distinguished from them in the manner of his majesty's justice and protection: and since this Court, originally instituted, and continued by his maj. for the ease and benefit of his poorer subjects, is apparently perverted to the burthen and discomfort of them; that your lordships will join with the house of commons in beseeching his majesty, That the prosent Commission may be revoked, and no more such granted for the future.

Lord Clarendon tells us, "That this speech and argument of Mr. Hyde's (for when he speaks of himself he always does it in the third person) met with good approbation in both houses; where he got great credit by it: and that the house of peers fully concurred with the commons in their vote. So that there was not, in many years after, any attempt, or so much as mention of another Commission."

Mr. Gervaise Hollis's Speech against the Treaty with the Scots.] This day great offence was taken by the commons, at words spoken by Mr. Gervaise Hollis, in a speech concerning the Scots Propositions; 'That some of them were dishonourable; and that this house had not only entertained them half-way, but had embraced them.' Mr. Hollis was first heard to explain himself, and then commanded to withdraw. The speech was as follows:—'Mr. Speaker; I have with much difficulty, persuaded myself to offer any thing. My stock is little to this reckoning; yet, since I have adventured to rise, I shall take the liberty, with your favours, to deliver myself freely. I have a blunt way in speaking my heart. It may be, peradventure, a folly in me; but it is a folly I love so well I will not part with it.—Sir, we are now upon the 5th Article of the Scots; which, as it was expressed by a noble lord at the conference, is a very pregnant and teeming Article: it hath produced many other; and they such as I must confess and affirm, whatsoever fucus or artifice they be slighted over with, I do not like their countenance: they may well be our younger brother of Scotland; but, like Jacob, they seem to me as if they had an aim to supplant us, and take away our birth-right.—Sir, there is no man that hath a more charitable construction of intentions than I had, whilst they made their addresses in humble distance, as befitting subjects to their sovereign. Whilst they bounded their desires within the due limits of their ancient liberties, and seemed to wish nothing but the just freedom of subjects and christians in their laws and consciences, my heart went along with them, and I wished them satisfaction: but now, sir, when I see them swell in their demands beyond all proportion; when I hear them enlarge upon their first propositions, and require things unfit for a king to grant, and dishonourable for this nation to suffer, I cannot but fix a mark of danger upon them. I fear we have nourished in our bosoms those that will sting us to death.'—[Here being interrupted, yet the house commanding him to go on, he proceeded:]—'Sir, I am sorry for this interruption; much more sorry if I have given a cause for it, for the clearness of my own thoughts acquit me. I brought no intentions here but such as were full of fidelity and zeal for the service of this house and my country, and shall always do so: and now, if you please to command me to express myself like an Englishman, and an honest man, I shall proceed; otherwise I shall testify my obedience by my silence.'—[Then he was commanded to proceed, which he did as followeth:]—'The miseries and calamities which this poor kingdom hath thus long suffered, have hung like weights upon my soul, and I have groaned under the oppression; for it was a great one: but these, as they call them, Propositions, I must call them Commands: and I fear they will prove so. They threaten yet more; it is to unman us quite, and leave us in a condition of all others the most despicable: for these appear to me like the demands of Naash to the men of Jabesh, putting out our right eyes.—Sir, our ancestors have not been acquainted with so much tameness, as to hear of such demands at a distance; and it cannot but trouble me, that we should not only meet them at the half-way, but embrace the bearers.—Sir, we are the offspring of those ancestors; their blood runs in our veins, and I hope, as yet, it is not all, turned to water. There are spirits of life and activity in us, and these will revive and speak plain English to us, whatever damp or apoplexy this spirit of slumber hath cast upon us; and I hope we shall either yet live with honour, or take our honorable farewell, and so be honest and gallant men: betwixt these two there is not much difference.—Therefore, sir, my humble motion is this, That such of the Propositions may be committed to a select committee to consider of, as carry reason and modesty with them; that such may be presented here as are fitting to be granted, and that those which are of another insinuation may be rejected: and if a firm peace may be had upon honest and honourable terms, I will cherish the thoughts of it; if not, there are but two ways left worthy the entertainment of this nation; that is, to stand or fall with honour. God, I hope, and our English virtues, will secure the first; if otherwise, he is neither worthy of life nor memory, that shall not bury himself in the ruins of his country.'

Mr. Hollis being withdrawn, it was resolved, 1. "That Mr. Gervaise Hollis shall be called to the bar, for the offence he hath given this house, by words spoken by him this day. 2. That the said Mr. Hollis shall be forthwith suspended this house, during this session of parliament." He was, accordingly, called to the bar, and there kneeling, the Speaker pronounced the Sentence upon him.

A Bill for fining the Members of the late Convocation.] April 27. The commons resuming the consideration of their former votes concerning the Convocation, and the Canons made by them, which the house had declared to be against the right of parliament and property of the subject, ordered a bill to be brought in 'For punishing and fining of the Members of the late Convocation of the Provinces of Canterbury and York;' which was this day read a 2nd time, and committed. No notice is taken of the report of this committee in their Journals; but Rushworth informs us, 'That when the committee met upon the same, they passed several votes as to fines to be imposed upon them.' He then proceeds to give a list of the members of the Convocation, with the respective sums assessed; but there being a great number of blanks therein, we think it sufficient to take notice of the principal dignitaries only; they were the abp. of Canterbury, 20,000*l.* the bps. of London and Ely, 10,000*l.* each; Bath and Wells, Worcester, Litchfield and Coventry, Salisbury, Norwich, Chichester, 5000*l.* each; Hereford and St. David's, 3000*l.* each; Gloucester, 2000*l.* Peterborough, Bristol, Oxford, Bangor, and Llandaff, 1000*l.* each: the dean of Exeter, 2000*l.* of Canterbury, Winchester, Worcester, Salisbury, Bath and Wells, Christ-Church Oxford, Hereford, Ely, Chichester, Lincoln, Westminster, and Windsor, 1000*l.* each; Gloucester, Norwich, Bristol, Rochester, Peterborough, St. David's, Bangor, and St. Asaph, 500*l.* each. All the bishops of the province of York are omitted; as are the deans also, except Durham, who was fined 2000*l.*

The King's Answer to the Petition against Recusants, &c.] April 30. The Speaker of the house of commons reported the king's speech to both houses in Whitehall, on presenting the Petition against Recusants, &c. viz.

"My lords and gentlemen; Having considered your three desires, I give you this short and clear answer: 1. Concerning the Removal of Papists from court: I am confident you know very well what legal trust the crown hath in this particular: therefore I shall only need to assure you, that I shall govern it so, that there shall be no just cause of Scandal. 2. I am contented that the Papists be disarmed according to law. 3. For the Irish Army; you must understand that I am already upon the disbanding of them; but find many difficulties in the way of doing it: therefore it is not only requisite to wish it, but to shew the way how it shall be done; therefore, in this, I shall not be unwilling to have your advice and assistance. But this is not all that I desire; for I do wish that the same peace and tranquillity be restored in my dominions, which my father, of happy memory, left me: and, to that end, I desire you, according to that duty which you owe to God and your country, that you concur with me for the speedy disbanding of the two other Armies that are in England; to which end there are two things necessary, Money, and the conclusion of the Scots Treaty. I am sure you are masters of the one, and, with me, you are judges of the other; this being a fitting time for me to put you in mind of it, because you have now all the Treaty before you; assuring you, that none of you shall shew more industry and willingness, for the settling of all things, in a peaceable way, than myself."

Bp. Hall's Speech against the Bill for restraining Bishops, &c. from intermeddling with Secular Affairs.] May 1. A bill, 'To restrain Bishops, and others in Holy Orders, from intermeddling with Secular Affairs,' passed the commons, and was sent up to the lords; where it was read a first time. Upon this occasion,

The Bishop of Exeter, (Dr. Joseph Hall,) spoke as follows: * 'My Lords; This is the strangest bill that ever I heard since I was admitted to sit under this roof; for it strikes at the very fabrick and composition of this house, at the stile of all laws; and therefore were it not for that it comes from such a recommendation, it would not, I suppose, undergo any long consideration; but coming to us from such hands, it cannot but be worthy of your best thoughts: and truly, for the main scope of the bill, I shall yield to it most willingly, 'That Ecclesiastical and Sacred persons should not ordinarily be taken up with Secular Affairs.' The minister is called vir Dei, a man of God: He may not be vir Sæculi; he may lend himself to them upon occasion, but not give himself over purposely to them: in short, he may not so attend worldly things, as that he do neglect divine things: this we gladly yield. Matters of justice therefore are not proper, as an ordinary trade, for our function; and, by my consent, shall be, in general, waved and deserted; which, for my part, I never had meddled with but in a charitable way, with no profit, but some charge, to myself; whereof I shall be glad to be eased: — 'Tractent fabrilis Fabri.'

But for any man hence to infer, that some spiritual person may not, occasionally, be in a special service of his king or country; and, when he is so required by his prince, give his advice in the urgent affairs of the kingdom (which, I suppose, is the main point driven at) is such an inconsequence, as, I dare boldly say, cannot be made good, either by divinity or reason, by the laws either of God or man; whereas the contrary may be proved and enforced by both.—As for the grounds of this bill, 'That the minister's duty is so great, that it is able to take up the whole man; and the Apostle saith, 'tis impossibile, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' And that he who warfares to God, should not entangle himself with this world; it is a sufficient and just conviction of those who would divide themselves betwixt God and the world, and bestow the main part of their time upon secular affairs: but it hath no operation at all upon this tenet which we have in hand, That a man, dedicated to God, may not so much as, when he is required, cast a glance of his eye, or some minutes of time, or some motions of his tongue, upon the public business of his king and country.—Those that expect this from us, may as well, and upon the same reason, hold, That a minister must have no family at all, or, if he have one, must not care for it; yea, that he must have no body to tend, but be all spirit. My lords, we are men of the same composition with others, and our breeding hath been accordingly; we cannot have lived in the world, but we have seen it, and observed it too; and our long experience and conversation, both with men and books, cannot but have put something into us for the good of others: and now having a double capacity, 'quasi cives, quasi ecclesiastici,' as members of the commonwealth, as ministers and governors of the church, we are ready to do our best service in both: one of them is no way incompatible with the other; yea, the subjects of them both are so united with the church and commonwealth, that they cannot be severed; yea so, as that not the one is in the other, but one is the other, is both: so as the services which we do, upon these occasions, to the commonwealth, are inseparable from our good offices to the church: so as, upon this ground, there is no reason of our exclusion.—If ye say, That our sitting in parliament takes up much time which we might have employed in our studies or pulpits; consider, I beseech you, that whilst you have a parliament, we must have a convocation; and that our attendance upon that will call for the same expence of time, which we afford to this service; so as, herein, we have neither got nor lost. But I fear it is not, on some hands, the tender regard of the full scope to our calling that is so much here stood upon, as the conceit of too much honour that is done us, in taking up the room of peers, and voting in this high court; for surely those that are averse from our votes, yet could be content we should have place upon the Woolsacks, and could allow us ears, but not tongues. If this be the matter, I beseech your lordships to consider that this honour is not done to us, but to our profession; which, whatever we be in our several persons, cannot easily be capable of too much respect from your lordships, 'Non tibi sed Isidi.'—Neither is this any new grace that is put upon our calling, (which, if it were now to begin, might perhaps be justly grudged to our personal unworthiness) but is an antient right and inheritance, inherent in our station; no less antient than these walls wherein we sit; yea, more.—Before ever there were parliaments, in the Magna Concilia of the kingdom we had our places; and as for my predecessors, ever since the Conqueror's time, I can shew your lordships a just catalogue of them that have sat before me here; and truly, though I have just cause to be mean in my own eyes, yet why, or wherein, there should be more unworthiness in me than the rest, that I should be stripped of that privilege which they so long enjoyed though there were no law to hold me here, I cannot see, or confess.—What respects of honour have been put upon the prime clergy of old, both by Pagans and Jews, and Christians, and what are still, both within Christendom and without, I shall not need to urge; it is enough to say, This of ours is not merely arbitrary; but stands so firmly established by law and custom, that I hope it neither will, nor can be removed, except you will shake those foundations, which, I believe, you desire to hold firm and inviolable.—In short then, my lords, the church craves no new honour from you, and justly hopes you will not be guilty of pulling down the old: as you are the eldest sons, and, next under his majesty, the honourable patrons of the church, so she expects and beseeches you to receive her into your tenderest care; so to order her affairs, that ye leave her to posterity in no worse case than you found her. It is a true word of Damascus, 'Uti vilescit nomen episcopi, omnis statua perturbatur ecclesiæ.' If this be suffered, the misery will be the church's; the dishonour and the blur of the act, in future ages, will be yours.—To shut up therefore. Let us be taken off from all ordinary trade of Secular employments, and, if you please, abridge us of intermeddling with matters of common justice; but leave us possessed of those places and privileges in parliament, which our predecessors have, so long and peaceably, enjoyed.

Informations of desperate Designs against the Parliament.] May 3. Mr. Pym acquainted the house, 'That there were divers informations given of desperate designs, both at home and abroad, against the parliament and the peace of the nation; and that the persons engaged therein are under an oath of secrecy: that there is also an endeavour to disaffect the army, not only against the parliament's proceedings, but to bring them up against the parliament, to over-awe them: that there was also a design upon the Tower, and endeavours used for the earl of Strafford's escape. That these combinations at home, have a correspondence with practices abroad: that the French are drawing down their forces to the sea-side; so that there was cause to fear their intent was upon Portsmouth: that divers persons of eminency about the queen, as by good information appears, are deeply engaged in these plots: that it is necessary the ports be stopped; and that his majesty be desired to command, That no person, attending upon the king, queen, or prince, do depart without leave of his majesty, with the humble advice of his parliament.'

Protestation to be taken, for the Defence of the Protestant Religion, &c.] Upon this speech, the house fell into a serious debate: wherein

Sir John Wray spoke as follows:—Mr. Speaker; If ever we intend to perfect and finish the great work we have begun, and come to our journey's end, let us take and follow the right way, which is via tuta; and that is, in a word, to become Holy Pilgrims, not Popish; and to endeavour to be loyal Covenanters with God and the king: first binding ourselves by a Parliamentary and National Oath, (not a Straffordian nor a Prelatical one) to preserve our Religion entire and pure, without the least compound of superstition or idolatry: next to defend the defender of the faith, his royal person, crown, and dignity; and to maintain our sovereign in his glory and splendour, which can never be eclipsed, if the balance of justice go right, and his laws be duly executed. Thus doing, Mr. Speaker, and making Jerusalem our chiefest joy, we shall be a blessed nation, and a happy people: but if we shall let go our Christian bold, and lose our parliament proof and old English well-tempered mettle, let us take heed that our buckler break not, our parliaments melt not, and our golden candlestick be not removed; which let me never live to see, nor England to feel the want of. This is my prayer, with which I conclude my motion.

The house being generally of opinion, That it was necessary to enter into a common resolution for the common safety, a Protestation was agreed on to be drawn up in form, by a committee; and this, being read and assented to by the whole house, was, with its preamble, in these words: "We the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house in parliament, finding, to the grief of our hearts, that the designs of the Priests and Jesuits, and other adherents to the see of Rome, have been of late more boldly and frequently put in practice, than formerly, to the undermining and danger of the ruin of the true Reformed Religion, in his majesty's dominions established; and finding also, that there hath been, and having cause to suspect there still are, even during the sitting of parliament, endeavours to subvert the fundamental laws of England and Ireland, and to introduce the exercise of an arbitrary and tyrannical government, by most pernicious and wicked counsels, plots, and conspiracies; and that the long intermission, and unhappier breach of parliaments, hath occasioned many illegal taxations, whereupon the subjects have been prosecuted and grieved; and that divers innovations and superstitions have been brought into the church; multitudes driven out of his majesty's dominions; jealousies raised and fomented between the king and people; a Popish army levied in Ireland, and two armies brought into the bowels of this kingdom, to the hazard of his majesty's royal person, the consumption of the revenue of the crown and the treasure of this realm; and lastly, finding the great causes of jealousy, endeavours have been and are used, to bring the English army into a misunderstanding of this parliament, thereby to incline that army, by force, to bring to pass these wicked counsels; have therefore thought good to join ourselves in a Declaration of our united affections and resolutions, and to make this ensuing

PROTESTATION:

"I, A. B. do, in the presence of Almighty God, promise, vow, and protest, to maintain and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, power, and estate, the true Reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish innovations, and according to the duty of my allegiance to his majesty's royal person, honour, and estate; as also, the power and privilege of parliament; the lawful rights and liberties of the subjects, and every person that maketh this Protestation, in whatsoever he shall do, in the lawful pursuance of the same: and to my power, as far as lawfully I may, I will oppose, and, by good ways and means, endeavour to bring to condign punishment, all such as shall by force, practice, counsel, plots, conspiracies, or otherwise, do any thing to the contrary in this present Protestation contained. And, further, I shall, in all just and honourable ways, endeavour to preserve the Union and Peace betwixt the three kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland; and neither for hope, fear, or other respect, shall relinquish this promise, vow, and protestation."

This solemn affair was then put to the question, and resolved, That it was fit to be made, and forthwith taken, by every member of the house. The names of all which next occur in the Journals; and it appears, by a strict scrutiny that was taken next day, and compared with the list of the knights and burgesses of the house, that not one dissented.

The same day, in the afternoon, a great number of the citizens who had assembled themselves in the Palace-yard, came up to the door of the house of lords, desiring an Answer to their Petition, formerly presented to both houses of parliament, and subscribed by many hands: the lords, hereupon, took the Petition into consideration; and, being read, it was ordered to be committed to a committee of the whole house; and that the gentleman-usher should call half a score of them in, to receive this Answer: "That their lordships had taken their Petition into consideration, and have now read it again: that they are resolved to do in it that which shall be honourable and just, and that with all expedition." After which, the lord chancellor desired them to acquaint the rest, and cause them to depart to their own habitations.

The King's Message to the Lords for suppressing the Tumults. Presently after this, a message was brought from the king to the house of lords, signifying, "That his majesty, taking notice of the great tumult and concourse of people that assembled together in these parts, had called, this day, his council to advise what course is fit to be taken therein. And it was his majesty's command to let both houses know, that it is his pleasure they take into consideration some speedy course to settle peace and prevent these tumults."

A Conference thereupon with the Commons. May 4. A committee of the commons meeting the lords at a conference, the lord privy seal acquainted them with his majesty's Message about the Tumults, and what they had done in that business: then added, "That that house being the representative body of the commons of this kingdom, who have brought in the bill against the earl of Strafford, their lordships thought fit to let them know, that they are going on to the final conclusion of the great business concerning the earl: that are so compassed with multitudes, that their lordships may be conceived not to be free, unless these companies of people be sent home; whose flocking hither doth only hinder their lordships from going on with that great business: and therefore the lords desire the commons to consider with them, how this matter, of such importance, may be first expedited, and not interrupted by the concourse of such numbers of people; it having no other hindrance but their coming about both houses in such a manner." To this the commons only said, "That they could not now give an Answer; but would return to their house, and send one in due time."—No further notice is taken of this business in either of the Journals.

The Commons' Protestation sent up to the Lords, and taken by them.] This day, the commons sent up their Protestation to the lords by Mr. Maynard and Mr. Denzil Hollis. Upon presenting thereof,

Mr. Denzil Hollis spoke as follows:—“My lords; The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, having taken into their serious consideration the present estate and condition of this kingdom, they find it surrounded with a variety of pernicious and destructive designs, practices, and plots against the well-being of it, nay, the very being of it; and some of these designs hatched within our own bowels, and, viper-like, working our destruction. They find Jesuits and Priests conspiring with ill ministers of state to destroy our Religion. They find ill ministers conjoined together, to subvert our laws and liberties. They find obstructions of Justice, which is the life-blood of every state, and (having a free passage from the sovereign power, where it is primarily seated, as the life-blood in the heart, and thence derived through the several judicatories, as through so many veins, into all the parts of this great collective body) doth give warmth and motion to every part and member, which is nourished and enlivened by it: but being once precluded, stopped, and seared up, as the particular must, of necessity, faint and languish; so must the whole frame of government be dissolved; and consequently sovereignty itself (which, as the heart in the body, is ‘primum vivens, & ultimum moriens’) must die and perish in the general dissolution; and all things return, as in the beginning, in antiquum chaos.—They find the property of the subject invaded and violated; his estate rent from him by illegal taxations, impositions, monopolies, and projects, (almost upon every thing which is for the use of man) not only upon superfluities, but necessities; and this is to enrich the vermin and caterpillars of the land, and to impoverish the good; ‘to take the meat from the children, and give it to dogs.’—My lords, if we find these things so, we must conceive they must be ill counsels which have brought us into this condition. These counsels have put all into a combustion; have discouraged the hearts of all true Englishmen, and have brought two armies into our bowels, which (as the vulture upon Prometheus) eat through our sides, and gnaw our very hearts. ‘Hinc dolor, sed unde medicina?’—Heretofore parliaments were the Catholicon, the balm of Gilead, which healed our wounds, restored our spirits, and made up all the breaches of the land; but of late years they have been like the fig-tree in the gospel, without efficacy, without fruit, only destructive to the particular members who discharge their duties and consciences, no way beneficial to the commonwealth: ‘Nobis exitiabile, nec reipublicæ profuturum,’ as is said in Tacitus; commonly taken away, as Elias was, with a whirlwind; never coming to any maturity or to their natural end: whereas they should be like that blessed old man which dieth (plenus dierum) in a full age, after he had fought a good fight, and overcome all his enemies; as the shock of wheat, which cometh in due season, to fill our granaries with corn, upholds our lives with the staff of bread: for parliaments are our panis quotidianus, our true bread; all other ways are but quelques choses, which yield no true nourishment, breed no good blood.—This very parliament, which hath sat so long, hath all this while but beaten the air, and striven against the stream; for I may truly say, wind and tide have still been against us. The same ill counsels which first raised the storm, which almost ship-wrecked the commonwealth, do still continue; they blow strong, like the east wind that brought the locusts over the land. These counsels cross our designs, cast difficulties in our way, hinder our proceedings, and make all that we do to be fruitless and ineffectual; they make us to be not masters of our business, and so not masters of our money; which hath been the great business of this parliament, that we might pay the armies according to our promises and engagements.—For, my lords, our not effecting of the good things which we had undertaken for the good of the church and commonwealth, hath wounded our reputation, and taken off from our credit. Is it not time then, my lords, that we should unite and concentrate ourselves, in regard of this Antiperistasis and Circumvallation of hurtful and malicious intentions and practices against us? My lords, it is most agreeable to nature, and I am sure, most agreeable to reason, in respect of the present conjuncture of our affairs; for one main engine by which our enemies work our mischief, is by infusing an opinion and belief into the world, that we are not united amongst ourselves; but that, like Sampson’s foxes, we draw several ways, and tend to several ends.—To defeat then the counsels of these Achitophels, which would involve us, our religion, our king, our laws, our liberties, all that can be near and dear unto us, in one universal and general desolation; to defeat, I say, the counsels of such Achitophels, the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons (knowing themselves to be specially entrusted with the preservation of the whole; and, in their consciences, persuaded, that the dangers are so imminent, that they will admit of no delay) have thought fit to declare their united affections; by entering into an association amongst themselves, and by making a solemn Protestation and vow unto their God, That they will unanimously endeavour to oppose and prevent the counsels and counsellors which have brought upon us all these miseries, and fears of greater; to prevent the ends, and bring the authors of them to condign punishment, and thereby discharge themselves both before God and man. The Protestation your lordships shall have read unto you, together with the grounds and reasons which have induced the house of commons to make it; which are prefixed before it by way of preamble.*

Then the Protestation, with the Preamble to it, was read by Mr. Maynard. Afterwards it was, upon the question, resolved, nem. con. "That every lord of this house shall take this Protestation." Next follow the titles of all the peers, bishops included, then present, who took and subscribed this instrument; and the rest of the lords did the same, in the succeeding days, as they came to the house*.

May 5. The house of commons ordered, "That the Protestation aforesaid, with the preamble to it, should be printed together; and that the knights, citizens, and burgesses may have copies of them to send down to the sheriffs and justices of peace of the several counties, cities, boroughs, &c. in England;† and that they intimate to them, with what willingness the members of this house made this Protestation; and, as they justified the taking of it in themselves, so they cannot but approve the same in others.

Ordered also, "That all the members that are in town, and not sick, do appear here to-morrow, at 8 o'clock; and their non-appearance shall be accounted a contempt of this house; upon which the house shall proceed as against a person not worthy to sit here: and

* Lord Clarendon says, "The earl of Southampton and the lord Roberts only refused it; alledging, There was no law that enjoined it, and the consequence of such voluntary engagements might produce effects that were not then intended." Vol. I. p. 198. Dr. Nalson adds, "That divers Recusant lords declared to their house, That they were ready to take the Protestation, so much as concerns the civil part of it, so they might be dispensed with for the Matter of Religion, which binds their consciences; which the house giving way to, the lord marquis of Winchester, the earl Rivers, and the lord Audley made the Protestation accordingly."—Collections, Vol. II. p. 237.

† This day, in the afternoon, one Mr. Henry Berkley was committed to the Gate-House, for saying, "That the house of commons deserved to be hanged better than the earl of Strafford, and that if he had seen one of the Protestations sticking up, he would have plucked it down, and wiped his breech with it."—Diurnal Occurrences, p. 92.

Orders and Resolutions of the Commons for putting the Kingdom in a State of Defence. Ordered, also, "That all the knights of shires, citizens, and burgesses of every county, should meet, this afternoon, to consider in what state and condition their several counties, cities, and boroughs are, in respect of Arms and Ammunition; and in what condition for lord lieutenants, or deputy lieutenants, whether they be persons well-affected to religion and to the public peace; and to present the names of them to this house: and likewise to consider what forts and castles there are in their several counties, &c. and who are the governors of them; and who are the governors of the islands, and the castles and forts there."—Resolved, upon the question, "That this house doth declare, that whosoever doth give any counsel or assistance, or join, in any manner, to bring any foreign force into the kingdom, unless it be by command of his majesty, with the consent of both houses of parliament, shall be adjudged and reputed a public enemy to the king and kingdom."

All this was previous to a message sent, this day, to the lords by Mr. Hollis, "That the house had received such information, as doth give them just cause to suspect, that there have been, and still are, secret practices to discontent the Army with the proceedings of parliament, and to engage them in some design of dangerous consequence to the state; and, by some other mischievous ways, to prevent the happy success and conclusion of this parliament. And because the timely discoveries and prevention of these dangerous plots doth so nearly concern both the safety of the king and kingdom, they desire their lordships would appoint a select committee, to take the examinations, upon oath, of such persons, and upon such interrogatories as shall be presented unto them by the direction of the house of commons, and in the presence of such of the members of that house as shall be thereunto appointed; with injunction of such secrecy as a business of this nature requires.—They have also ordered, That such members of their house as may be thought fit, shall, upon notice, be ready to be examined; and they desire their lordships will be pleased to order the like for the members and assistants of their own house. And further, it is desired, that their lordships will forthwith send to his majesty, to beseech him, in the name of the parliament, upon this great and weighty occasion, That no servant of his maj. the queen, or the prince, may depart the kingdom, or otherwise absent himself, without leave from his maj. and with the humble advice of parliament until these examinations be perfected."

When Mr. Hollis had read this Message to the lords, they returned for Answer, "That they would join with the commons in all they desired." And immediately ordered a committee of ten lords to take examinations, upon oath, of such persons as shall be presented to them by the members of the other house. And a Memorandum is entered, "That whereas none of the lords the bishops are joined in this commission, it was declared by the house, that it should be no prejudice to their rights, as peers of parliament."—After this the lords sent a Message to the King by three great officers of state, and some other lords, about the request the commons made relating to his majesty's servants, and those of the queen and prince. The Answer was reported back by the earl of Dorset, "That his majesty very willingly granted it; and gave present command to these great officers, that attended him on this occasion, to take notice thereof to all under their charge, that none do depart the kingdom without the king's licence, but be forthcoming upon demand."

The lords of the committee for examining witnesses were enjoined strict secrecy in that affair; and the attorney general, with one of the king's serjeants, who were to attend them, took an oath, there entered, to the same purpose.

May 5. p. m. An order was made by the lords, to empower the constable of the Tower to send to the lord Mayor for the assistance of such a number of the Trained Bands as he shall have need of, in case of any sudden accident that may hereafter happen. The lord mayor also had power given him, by this order, to raise and arm any such number of the Trained-Bands, with powder and ball, as the said constable shall require, for the safe-guarding and keeping the said Tower, when need shall require it. Soon after the lord mayor's power was enlarged, by consent of the king, That, upon any sudden commotion or insurrection, he may draw out so many of the Trained Bands, as may be thought sufficient to suppress it.*—This afternoon, also, the com-

* "This day there was a great hubbub raised in the city, occasioned by a report of a design to blow up the parliament: notice whereof was taken in the house of commons, by sir Walter Erle. Mr. Middleton and Mr. Moyle, two very corpulent men, with some others, standing up to hear him, a board in the gallery broke, and gave such a crack, that some apprehended the house was blown up indeed: and sir John Wray crying out, 'He smelt Gun-Powder,' they hurried out of the house, and frightened the people in the lobby, who ran into the hall crying, 'The Parliament House was falling, and the Members slain:' and, the people running in confusion through the hall, sir Robert Mansel drew his sword, and bid them stand for shame, 'for, he saw no enemy to hurt the parliament, and that there was no danger:' but some of the zealots by water gave the alarm, so that the drums beat, and a regiment of Trained-Bands marched as far as Covent-Garden, and the rabble of Volunteers down to the house, to save the parliament." Nelson's Collect, Vol. II. p. 191.

mons resolved, "That a bill shall be prepared to declare and assure the Continuance of this present Parliament, from adjourning, proroguing, or dissolving, without the consent of both houses." Mr. Whitlocke to prepare this bill.[†]

Sentence against Lilburn in the Star-Chamber, voted illegal.] Mr. Rouse having reported the case of John Lilburn, it was resolved, 1. "That the Sentence in the Star-Chamber given against John Lilburn, is illegal, and against the liberty of the subject; and also bloody, wicked, cruel, and tyrannical. 2. That reparation ought to be given to Mr. Lilburn, for his imprisonment, suffering, and losses, sustained by that illegal sentence."†

The Commons Suspicion of Discontents in the Army.] May 6. A conference with the lords was desired by the commons, and assented to; the lord Wharton reported the substance of it to this effect: "That the house of commons have lately presented to their lordships some information which they received, concerning ill counsels and practices which have been given to discontent the English Army with the proceedings of parliament, and to engage them in some design of dangerous consequence, &c. The commons have now great cause to increase their jealousies; for, having sent for certain persons to be examined in that business, they are not to be found; and the answers returned are so various, that they have great cause to believe they are fled. In particular they named Henry Percy, esq. Henry Jermyn, esq. sir John Suckling, Wm. Davenant, and capt. Billingsly; therefore they desired the lords would join with them, that all the ports may be stopped, and some course taken to find them out. And whereas they are informed, that the queen intends to take a journey to Portsmouth, they desire, (out of the service and respect they owe to her majesty and the safety of her person) that the king may be moved to desire the queen to defer her journey to Portsmouth, until the bottom of this business be fully known. Lastly, That some course may be taken to satisfy the English Army: and, if there be any there who have been carried away by ill counsel, to let it be known amongst them, that, if they will come in and discover the rest, they shall be spared."—Hereupon it was ordered, "That this house doth join with the house of commons in every thing they ask."

A Letter sent by the Speaker, to assure the Army of their Pay.] The ports were immediately ordered to be stopped, and circular letters to be sent for that purpose. None to be suffered to pass, except sir Thomas Roe, and his

* Mr. Whitlocke remarks, "That this motion was so well liked by many parliament men, who, upon passing such a bill, would sit the surer and the longer in their saddles; and they were so hot upon it, that the committee brought it in the very next morning."

attendants, who was going ambassador abroad; particularly the persons abovenamed, to be apprehended, and safely conducted to this house. The members of the last committee were ordered to frame a Letter to the English Army, to take away all misunderstandings that might have been raised amongst them; as follows:

"Sir; We have had cause to doubt that some ill-affected persons have endeavoured to make a misunderstanding in the Army, of the intention of the parliament towards them. To take away all misunderstanding in that kind, the house of commons have commanded me to assure you, that they have taken the affairs of the Army into their serious care; and though, for the present, their monies have not come in as was wished, and as was due; by reason of the many distractions and other impediments which this house could no ways avoid; yet the Army may rest most assured, that they shall not only have their full pay, but the house will take their merits into their further consideration; in regard they take notice, that notwithstanding their wants, and the endeavours of those ill-affected persons, they have not demeaned themselves otherwise than as men of honour, and well-affected to the commonwealth; which this house takes in so good part, that we have already found out a way to get money for a good part of their pay, and will take the most speedy course we possibly may for the rest. So I remain, Your very loving friend,

WM. LENTHALL.

From my House at Charing-cross, the 8th of this present month of May, 1641.—P. S. 'Tis the pleasure of this house, that this Letter be communicated to the Army, to the end their Intentions may be clearly understood."

May 7. The commons having appointed a committee to take into consideration the printing of the Preamble and Protestation, with the lord Digby's last Speech, and several other speeches of members of their house; and to have power to send for parties, witnesses, books, and papers: this day the lords also ordered the bishops who were on the committee for Religion, to have power, from that house, to inquire after the printing and publishing of News-Books that are lately printed, full of innovations of doctrine, &c. with liberty to send for the printers, and examine them; and afterwards to report the same to the house.

A Conference concerning the present Dangers of the Kingdom.] Another conference was desired, this day, with the lords, the report of which by the lord privy seal, was to this purpose: That it was said by the commons at this conference, that 7 or 8 persons, that would have been material witnesses in this great business, are fled and run away, upon their sending for them; and therefore their suspicions are much confirmed concerning the design to seduce the king's army, and bringing them hither to join with other forces, to the disturbance of the parliament: also, that they have

probable information of some forces, now at the sea side, in France, designed for Portsmouth: therefore they desire their lordships to join with them, in all convenient ways, for the discovery of this business, not doubting but these designs are united together. And it is their desire that three persons, one member of this house and two of the commons, be sent forthwith to Portsmouth, with a commission to examine the governor of that fort upon interrogatories; and, if any cause of jealousy be to suspect the governor, forthwith to command him to come to parliament; one of the commons to come up with him, and the other to stay there to make as good provision as they can for that place, till they hear from hence. If the governor refuse to come up to London, that there be some speedy course taken to prevent further mischief.—Next, that there may be some forces drawn out into Wiltshire and Berkshire, inland counties, to secure Portsmouth. Then to take care that provision be made for the isles of Guernsey and Jersey; and that the Train-Bands of Hampshire, Sussex, and Dorset, may be in readiness; also, that orders may be taken that the ships at Portsmouth may be put into a good posture for defending that town, and that the lord admiral be requested to put commanders of trust and fidelity into those ships: that a letter be sent down, signed by the two Speakers of the lords and commons, to the commanders of the army, to satisfy them, and to think of some fit way how the bottoms of this plot may be discovered.—That the commons have appointed some members of their house to go into Dorsetshire, for drawing up the men to be ready on occasion: and likewise they have sent down to the king's army in the North other members of theirs, for satisfying the army, and to endeavour to discover these counsels and plots in hand. Lastly, That the commons have voted, That whosoever hath counselled, assisted, or joined to bring in any foreign force, but by the leave of the king and advice of parliament, shall be accounted as an enemy to the king and kingdom."

The lords complied with every article of this request of the commons. They first passed the same vote, nem. con. against counsellors or assistants. Next, the lord Kimbolton was deputed to go to Portsmouth; to whom were joined, in commission, sir John Clotworthy and sir Philip Stapleton, of the commons. They ordered also a Proclamation to be issued out against Percy, Jernyn, sir John Suckling, &c. and sent into all the counties in England, summoning them to surrender themselves within ten days of the date thereof, to the lords in parliament at Westminster, under such a penalty as that house should think fit to inflict upon them: and that Mr. Attorney shall present the same to be signed by the king.

The Commons pass the Bill for Continuance of the Parliament.] This day also the commons read a third time, passed, and sent up to the lords the bill, 'To prevent Inconveniences by adjourning of the Parliament ;' which their lordships read a first and second time this afternoon, and ordered back to the commons, with some amendments.

A second Letter to the Army.] May 8. To prevent further discontents in the Army, another Letter was this day sent from the commons, with the consent and concurrence of the lords, to sir Jacob Ashley and sir John Conyers, to be communicated to the Army in the North ; which was as follows :

" Sir ; Whereas there have been just causes of jealousy, that there have been some secret attempts and practices, to infuse into the Army a dislike of this parliament, to some dangerous intents and purposes against the state ; and that now the matter is grown unto a strong presumption, upon further discoveries ; and, by reason that some of those which were suspected to have been active therein are fled, upon the first stirring thereof, before ever they were once named ; it hath pleased this house to declare, That notwithstanding they intend to search into the bottom of this conspiracy ; yet, purposing to proceed specially against the principal actors therein, this house hath resolved, (whereunto the house of peers hath likewise consented) that for such of the Army as the conspirators have endeavoured to work upon, if they shall testify their fidelity to the state, by a timely discovery of that which they know and can certify therein ; they shall not only be free from all punishment, but also shall be esteemed to have done that which is for the service of the state, in discovery of so dangerous a plot against it : and for such of the Army, as are and shall be found no ways tainted with this dangerous design, or, knowing anything thereof, shall make such discovery as aforesaid ; as this house shall no ways doubt of their loyalty and fidelity, so it shall have an especial care not only to satisfy all such arrears as this house hath formerly promised to discharge ; but also give a fair testimony of the sense they have of their present and past wants. And it is ordered by this house, That, immediately after the receipt hereof, you should communicate this their Declaration unto all the officers and members of the army under your command."

The Bill for continuing the Parliament, passed.] The same day the commons returned the bill, 'To prevent Inconveniences by adjourning of the parliament,' to the lords, with this answer, "That they had debated their lordships amendments to it ; and find them not material : and therefore desire that the bill may pass without them." On which the bill was read a third time, and being put to the question, the house divided, and it was carried, "That the bill pass into a law, by the major part of the peers," as their Journals express it.*

* The principal amendments were, "That the time should be limited and not left indefinite ; and that it should not be dissolved

The Avenues to the Parliament House searched on the Apprehensions of a Plot.] May 10. The house of commons seemed to be under some consternation and dread of another Gunpowder-Plot ; for this day the serjeant at arms was ordered to get the holes in the floor of Westminster-hall searched into, and stopped up ; and a committee of five was appointed to take care and search the houses, rooms, and places about the parliament-house, to prevent the designs and danger that may happen by persons ill-affected.

May 11. The commons went into a committee, Mr. Hyde in the chair ; and, when the house was resumed, it was resolved, upon the question, "That the sum of 400,000*l.* should be raised for the great and pressing affairs of the kingdom"

A Conference concerning the Stoppage of the Ports : and also relating to the Queen-Mother.] A conference was held this day between the two houses, and Mr. Pym reported part of it to the commons, viz. "The earl of Dorset told them, That the lords had received many petitions from merchants, ready to send their ships to sea, which they cannot do by reason of the Ports being stopped, whereby they lose their voyage, with other cross accidents on that occasion. The lords conceived that the reason for stopping the ports was to prevent some particular men, shewing a guilt by their flights, from going over, and not of merchants in general : however, that the lords would not open them till they had acquainted this house with it."—The second part of the conference was reported by Mr. Treasurer Vane, to this effect : "That the earl of Holland said, the lords had been informed what fears the Queen's Mother was in, by reason of the disorders of the people, and desired a guard. That he, being lord lieutenant of Middlesex, had appointed a guard of 100 musqueteers for that purpose : that he found great unwillingness in some of them to go ; they said they thought it fitter to do other things than guard strangers : that since the mob talked of coming the next day into St. James's fields ; and if anything should happen to the Queen-Mother of France, it would be a great dishonour to this nation, she being here for protection from the king and queen : that she is to be considered as a lady, who is mother to the greatest princess in Christendom : besides, she had lived here with such modesty and moderation, as every body near her did wonder at : that there had not a person, belonging to her family, been complained of or punished : that she had often desired his maj. would so govern as to gain the affections of his people, particularly by parliament." Another circumstance the earl delivered, "That the disorders of the multitude were much in-within two years, except by consent of both houses ; that time being sufficient to provide against any accidents that were then apprehended."—Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 205.

creased: that the city marshal had informed them, that last night there marched towards the Tower, a thousand sailors and others, with a flag of a ship before them, who pulled down two houses: that the Trained Bands opposed, fired, and killed two of them: therefore they desired our advice how to prevent these tumults."

It was afterwards ordered, by consent of both houses, "That the Ports should be forthwith opened, and that two Proclamations should be put forth: the one to declare, That the king had taken the Queen-Mother into his royal protection; that the Trained Bands should be appointed for her guard; and that a list may be taken of her servants: the other to prohibit all Tumults and Drawing together of People, under severe penalties."

A Committee appointed to open all Foreign Letters.] At the request of the commons, the lords ordered, "That the Postmaster for foreign Letters should bring, or cause to be brought, to a committee appointed for that purpose, all such letters, imported or to be exported, which come to his hands: and the committee were ordered to open the said letters, peruse them, and report them to the house."

Petitions from the Universities in favour of Deans and Chapters.] May 12. The commons took into consideration the Affair of Deans and Chapters, &c. when two Petitions from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were read, and are as follows:*

"To the High and Honourable Court of Parliament: The humble PETITION of the University of Oxford,

"Sheweth, That whereas the University hath been informed of several Petitions concerning the present Government of this Church and Maintenance of the Clergy, which of late have been exhibited to this Honourable Assembly; we could not but think ourselves bound in duty to God and this whole nation, charity to ourselves and successors, who have, and are like to have more than ordinary interest in any resolution that shall be taken concerning Church Affairs; in all humility to desire the continuance of that form of government which is now established here, and hath been preserved in some of the Eastern and Western Churches, in a continued succession of bishops, down from the very Apostles to this present time; the like whereof cannot be affirmed of any other form of government in any church: upon which consideration, and such other motives as have already been represented to this honourable parliament from other persons and places, with whom we concur, in behalf of episcopacy, we earnestly desire that you would protect that antient and apostolical order from ruin or diminution.

* From the Collection of Petitions, published by the King's command. London; printed for William Sheares. 1642.

And we become further suitors for the continuance of those pious foundations of Cathedral Churches, with their lauds and revenues; as dedicated to the service and honour of God, soon after the plantation of Christianity in the English nation: as thought fit and useful to be preserved for that end, when the nurseries of superstition were demolished; and so continued in the last and best times, since the blessed Reformation, under Edw. 6. Elizabeth, and James I. princes renowned through the world for their piety and wisdom: as approved and confirmed by the laws of this land, antient and modern; as the principal outward motive and encouragement of all students, especially in divinity, and the fittest reward of some deep and eminent scholars; as producing or nourishing, in all ages, many godly and learned men, who have most strongly asserted the truth of that religion we profess, against the many fierce oppositions of our adversaries of Rome; as affording a competent portion, in an ingenious way, to many younger brothers of good parentage, who devote themselves to the ministry of the gospel; as the only means of subsistence to a multitude of officers and other ministers, who, with their families, depend upon them, and are wholly maintained by them; as the main authors or upholders of divers schools, hospitals, high-ways, bridges, and other public and pious works; as special causes of much profit and advantage to those cities where they are situate, not only by relieving their poor, and keeping convenient hospitality, but by occasioning a frequent resort of strangers from other parts, to the great benefit of all tradesmen and inhabitants in those places; as the goodly monuments of our predecessors piety, and present honour of this kingdom in the eye of foreign nations; as the chief support of many thousand families of the laity, who enjoy fair estates from them in a free way; as yielding a constant and ample revenue to the crown; and as by which many of the learned professors of our university are maintained. The subversion or alienation whereof must, as we conceive, not only be attended with such consequences as will redound to the scandal of many well-affected to our religion, but open the mouths of our adversaries and of posterity against us; and is likely, in time, to draw after it harder conditions upon a considerable part of the laity; an universal cheapness and contempt upon the clergy; a lamentable drooping and defection of industry and knowledge in the universities; which is easy to foresee, but will be hard to remedy.—May it therefore please this honourable assembly, upon these and such other considerations as your great wisdoms shall suggest, to take such pious care for the continuance of these Religious Houses, and their Revenues, according to the best intentions of their founders, as may be most to the furtherance of God's glory and service, the honour of this church and nation, the advancement of religion and learning, and the encouragement of the modest hopes and honest endeavours of many hundred students in the universities, who do and shall ever pray, &c. Dat. anno Dom. 1641, e domo convocationis, in celebri conventu doctorum ac magistrorum, omnibus & singulis assentientibus."

"To the honourable the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons assembled in Parliament, The humble PETITION of the university of CAMBRIDGE,

"Sheweth, That your petitioners having heard of divers suggestions offered to this honourable court, by way of remonstrance, tending to the subversion of Cathedral Churches, and alienation of those lands by which they are supported; being the antient inheritance of the church, founded and bestowed by the religious bounty of many famous and renowned kings and princes of this land, and other benefactors, both of the clergy and laity, and established and confirmed unto them by the laws of this kingdom; and so accordingly have been employed to the advancement of learning, the encouragement of students, and preferment of learned men, besides many other pious and charitable uses:—May it please this hon. court, out of their great wisdom and tender care for the cherishing of learning, and furtherance of the studies and pains of those who have, and do devote themselves to the service of the church, graciously to protect and secure those religious foundations from ruin and alienation, and withall to take order that they may be reduced to the due observation of their statutes; and that all innovations and abuses, which have, by some men's miscarriages, crept in, may be reformed; that so the students of our university, who, by the present fears, both are and will be much discouraged, may be the better invited to pursue their studies with alacrity; and the places themselves disposed to the most serviceable and deserving men, according to their first institution. And your Petitioners shall ever pray," &c.

Explanation of a Passage in the late Protestation.] This day, the commons resolved, "That whereas some doubts have been raised by several persons, out of this house, concerning the meaning of these words contained in the Protestation lately made by the members of this house, viz. 'The true Reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the doctrine of the church of England, against all Popery and Popish Innovations within this realm, contrary to the same doctrine,' this house doth declare, That by those words was and is meant, only, the public doctrine professed in the said church, so far as it is opposite to Popery and Popish innovations; and that the said words are not to be extended to the maintaining of any form of worship, discipline, or government, nor of any rites or ceremonies of the said church of England."

Bill for restraining Bishops, &c.] May 14. The commons, in a committee of ways and means for raising the 400,000*l.* tax, lately agreed to, resolved, upon the question, 'That every man's land, of what degree soever, or in whose possessions the said lands are, shall be rated towards the raising the aforesaid sum.'

This day, a bill from the commons, 'For restraining of Bishops, and others in Holy Orders, from intermeddling in Secular Affairs,' was read a second time by the lords, and committed. Upon this occasion,

Lord viscount Newark spoke as follows:*

'My lords; I shall take the boldness to speak a word or two upon this subject; first as it is in itself, then as it is in the consequence. For the former: I think he is a great stranger in antiquity, that is not well acquainted with the bishops sitting here: they have done thus, and in this manner, ever since the conquest; and, by the same power and the same right, the other peers did, and your lordships now do: and to be put from this their due, so much their due, by so many hundred years strengthened and confirmed; and that without any offence, nay pretence of any, seems to me to be very severe if it be just, I dare boldly say, it is sumum. That this hinders their ecclesiastical vocation, an argument I hear much of, hath, in my apprehension, more of shadow than substance in it: if this be a reason, sure I am it might have been one 600 years ago. A bishop, my lords, is not so circumscribed within the circumference of his diocese, as that his absence, sometimes, can be termed (no, not in the most strict sense) a neglect or hindrance of his duty, no more than that of a lieutenant from his county; they both have their subordinate ministers, upon which their influences fall, though the distance be remote. Besides, my lords, the lesser must yield to the greater good; to make wholesome and good laws for the happy and well-regulating of the church and commonwealth, is certainly more advantageous to both, than the want of the personal execution of their office, and that but once in 3 years; and then, peradventure, but a month or two, can be prejudicial to either. And now, by your lordships good leave, I shall speak to the consequence, as it reflects both on your lordships and my lords the bishops. Dangers and inconveniences are ever best prevented é longinquo. This precedent comes near to your lordships, and such a one, that, 'mutato nomine, de vobis.' Pretences are never wanting; nay, sometimes, the greatest evils appear in the most fair and specious outsides; witness the Ship-Money, the most abominable, the most illegal thing that ever was; and yet this was painted over with the colour of law. What benefit is secure, if to alledge be to convince? And which of your lordships can say then, He shall continue a member of this house, when, at one blow, 26 are cut off? It then behoves the neighbour to look about him,

'cum proximus ardet ualegon.'—And for the bishops, my lords, in what condition will you leave them? the house of commons represents the meanest person, so did the master his slave; but they have none to do so much for them: and what justice can tie them to the observation of those laws, to whose constitution they give no consent? The wisdom of former times gave proxies unto this house, meely upon this ground, that every one might have a hand in the making of that which he had an obligation to obey. This house could not represent, therefore proxies, in room of persons, were most justly allowed.—And now, my lords, I beseech your lordships to cast your eyes upon the church, which I know is most dear and tender to you. You will see her suffer in her most principal members, and deprived of that honour which, here and throughout all the christian world, ever since christianity, she constantly hath enjoyed: for what nation or kingdom is there in whose great and public assemblies, and that from her beginning, she had not some of hers? If I may not say as essential, I am sure I may say as integral, parts thereof: and truly, my lords, christianity cannot alone boast of this, or challenge it only as hers, even heathenism claims an equal share. I never read of any of them, civil or barbarous, that gave not thus much to their religion; so that it seems to me to have no other original, to flow from no other spring, than nature itself. How it may stand with the honour and justice of this house to pass this bill, I most humbly submit unto your lordships, the most proper and only judges of them both.'

May 17. The commons entered into debate about the Propositions concerning Religion, delivered in by the Scots commissioners; and it was resolved, "That this house doth approve of the affection of their brethren of Scotland, in their desires of a conformity in church government between the two nations, and doth give them thanks for it; and as they have already taken into consideration the reformation of Church government, so they will proceed therein in due time, as shall best conduce to the Glory of God and the peace of the Church."

Several great Officers resign.] Whitlocke tells us, "That this day, divers great officers of state surrendered their places, either accounting themselves insecure, or to satisfy others. Lord Cottington resigned the office of master of the Court of Wards to the lord Say and Seal: Dr. Juxson, bishop of London, delivered up his staff as lord High Treasurer; and that office was put into the hands of five commissioners, the lord Keeper, lord Privy Seal, lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, lord Newburgh, and secretary Vane: The earl of Leicester was made lord lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the late earl of Strafford: The earl of Essex, lord Chamberlain of the Household, on the removal of the earl of Pembroke: And the marquiss of Hertford appointed governor to the prince; in the room of the earl of Newcastle."

The Commons propose that the Queen-Mother should leave this Kingdom.] May 18. Mr. Martin reported from the committee of commons, concerning the Queen-Mother, what was proper to be delivered to the lords at the next conference, both for the safety of her person, and about the Tumult which lately happened near Tower-Hill, to this effect. "That they could not but join with their lordships in apprehension of danger; and therefore should agree to all good means that might conduce to the safety of her majesty's person; holding themselves obliged thereto, as well by the rules of public faith and honour, as for that special interest this kingdom hath in the queen her daughter and the royal issue: But fearing that all the care that can be used, may prove insufficient for the assurance of her protection, and desirous to prevent the blemish that may fall upon this nation by any ill accident, the commons do intreat their lordships humbly to represent these things to his majesty, that the queen may be moved to depart this kingdom; the rather, for the quieting of the jealousies in the hearts of his majesty's well-affected subjects, occasioned by some ill instruments about the queen's person; by the crowding of Priests and Papists to her house, and by the use and practice of the idolatry of the mass and exercise of other superstitious services of the Romish church to the great scandal of true religion, &c."

Debate in the Lords on the Bill for restraining Bishops &c. from intermeddling in Secular Affairs.] May 24. The lords in a grand committee, took into consideration the bill, 'For restraining Bishops, and others in Holy Orders, from intermeddling in Secular Affairs, when

The Bishop of Lincoln* made the following Speech: † My Lords, I shall desire as much time of your lordships, as you can well afford in a committee, because all that I intend to speak in this business must be to your lordship's only; as resolved, for mine own part, to make hereafter no remonstrance at all to his most excellent majesty, for these several Reasons: 1st. That I have had occasion, of late, to know, that our sovereign, a man of most upright, dainty, and scrupulous conscience ‡, and afraid to look upon some actions, which other princes abroad do usually swallow up and devour. I know, for I have the monuments in my own custody ||, what oath, or rather oaths, his maj. hath taken at his coronation, to preserve all the rights and liberties of the church of England: and you know very well, that churchmen are never sparing in their rituals or ceremonials, to amplify and swell out the oaths of princes in that kind. Your lordships, then know right well, that he is sworn, at that time, to observe punctually the laws of king Edward. The first law thereof, as you may see in Lambard's Saxon Laws, is to preserve entirely the peace, the possessions, and the rights and privileges of the church; and truly I shall never put my master's conscience, that I find resenting and punctilious when it is not bound up with oaths and protestations, to swallow such gudgeons, as to fill itself with these doubts and scruples.—2ndly, 'That if his maj. were free from all these oaths and protestations, I durst not, without some fair invitation from himself, advise him to run shocks and oppositions against the votes of both these great houses of parliament.—3rdly and lastly, 'If I were secretly invited to move his maj. to advise upon the passing of the bill, yet, speaking mine own heart and sense, and not binding any of my brethren in this opinion, if I found the major part of this house to pass this bill without much qualification, I should never have the boldness nor desire to sit more, in any judicial place, in this most honourable house.— And therefore, my lords, here I have fixed my Areopagus, and dernier resort, being not like to make any further appeal. I will therefore cast this whole bill into six several heads, wherein I hope to comprehend all that I shall say, in this bill. The 1st is the Rise or Motive of this bill; which is the duty of men in Holy Orders; for the words are, persons in Holy Orders ought not to intermeddle, &c. And this duty of ministers may be taken, in this place, two several ways; either for their duty, in point of divinity or in point of convenience, which we commonly call policy. In regard of either of these duties, it may be conceived that men in Holy Orders ought not to intermeddle in Secular Affairs, &c. And this is the motive, rise and ground of this Bill.— The 2nd point is, the Persons concerned in this bill; which are archbishops, bishops, parsons, vicars, and all others in Holy Orders.— The 3rd contains the things inhibited, from this time forward, to such persons by this bill; and they are of several sorts and natures: 1. Freeholds and rights of such persons; as their suffrages, votes, and legislative power in parliament. 2. Matters of princely favours: as to sit in the Star-Chamber, to be called to the Council-Board, to be Justices of the peace, &c. 3. Matters of a mixed or concrete nature, that seem to be both freeholds, and favours of former princes; as the Charters of some of the Bishops, and some of the ancient Cathedrals are conceived to be. And these are all the matters, or things, inhibited those persons in Holy Orders, by this present bill.—4thly, The Manner of this Inhibition, which is of a double nature 1. Under a high and severe penalty; and, 2. Under a Cain's mark; an eternal kind of disability or incapacity laid upon them from enjoying, hereafter, any of these freeholds, rights, favours, or charters of former princes; and that, which is the heaviest point of all, without killing of Abel, or any crime laid to their charge, more than that, in the beginning of the bill, it is said, roundly, and in the stile of Lacedæmon, 'That they ought not to intermeddle in Secular Affairs.'—The 5th point is a salvo for the two Universities, but none for the bishops of Durham, or bp. of Ely; nor for the dean of Westminster, their next neighbour, who is established in his government by an especial act of parliament, that of the 27th of Queen Elizabeth.—The 6th and last point is a salvo for dukes, marquisses, earls, viscounts, barons or peers of this kingdom, that either may be, or are such, by descent. This clause, I hope in God, will prove not only a salvo to those honourable persons, (whereof if we of the clergy were but so happy as to have any competent number of our coat, Thebarum portæ, vel divitis ostia Nili? this bill surely had perished in the womb, and never come to the birth;) but I hope that this clause will prove to this tho' a Felo de se, a murderer of itself; and tho' intended for a salvo for noble ministers only, prove a salvo for all other ministers that be not so happy as to be nobly born; because the very poor minister, for ought we find in Scripture, or common reason, is no more tied to serve God in his vocation, than these wise, and nobly-born ministers are: and therefore I hope these noble ministers will deal so nobly, as to pull their brethren, the poor ministers, out of the thorns and briars of this bill.—These are all the true heads and contents of this bill: and amongst these 6 heads your lordships shall be sure to find me, and I shall expect to find your lordships, in the whole tract of this committee. And now, with your leave and patience, I will run them over, almost as briefly as I have pointed and pricked them down.—For the 1st, the Rise and Motive of this bill; which is the duty of men in Holy Orders not to intermeddle with Secular Affairs: It must arise either from a point of divinity, or from point of convenience, or of policy: and I hope in God, it will not appear to your lordships that there is any ground, either of divinity or policy, to inhibit men in orders so modestly to intermeddle with secular affairs, as that the measure of intermeddling in such affairs, shall not hinder and obstruct the duties of their calling. They ought not so to intermeddle in secular affairs, as to neglect their ministry: no more ought layman neither; for they have a calling and vocation, wherein they are to walk, as ministers have; they have wife and children and families to care for; and they are not to neglect these to live upon warrants and recognizances; to become a kind of sir Francis Mitchel* or an ignotus nimis, as Solomon calls it.—That place,

‡ This probably alludes to the king's doubts and perplexities about giving his assent to the Bill of Attainder against the earl of Strafford, which was passed only fourteen days before this Speech. See the bishop's arguments upon that occasion, p. 758.

2 Tim ii. 4. 'No man that wars, entangles himself with the affairs of this life,' will be found to be applied, by all good interpreters, to laymen as well as churchmen; and under favour, nothing at all to this purpose. Besides that the word, ἐνταναρ, doth point at a man that is so wholly taken up with the affairs of this life, that he utterly neglects the offices and duties of a Christian man; and so I leave that place as incapable of any other exposition, nor ever otherwise interpreted, but by Popes, Legates and Canonists, that make a nose-of-Wax of every place of Scripture they touch upon. But that men in holy orders ought not, in a moderate manner, together with the duties of their calling, to help and assist in the government of the common-wealth, if they be thereunto lawfully called by the sovereign prince, can never be proved by any good divinity: for, in the law of nature, before the deluge, and a long time after, it is a point that no man will deny me, That the eldest of the family was both the priest and the magistrate.—When the people were taken out of Egypt, by Moses and Aaron; 'Moses and Aaron amongst his Priests,' as it is in the book of Psalms: then there was a form of common-wealth, fetched from heaven indeed, and planted upon the earth, and judiciary laws dictated for the regulation of the same. Nor do I much care though some men shall say, That persons in holy orders ought not to intermeddle in secular affairs, when the great God of heaven and earth did appoint them to intermeddle with all the principal affairs of that state; witness the exorbitant power of the high priest in secular matters, the Sanhedrim, the twenty-three the Judges of the Gate, which were, the most of them, priests and levites. And the churchmen of that state were not all butchers and slaughtermen, for they had their tabernacle, their synagogues, their prayers, preaching, and other exercises of piety. In a word; we have divinus, but they had operosius ministerium, as St. Augustin speaketh: our ministry takes up more of our thoughts; but theirs took up more of their labours and industry. Nor is it any matter that this common-wealth is no more in being; it sufficeth it hath been once, and that planted by God himself, who would never have appointed persons in holy orders to intermeddle with things they ought not to intermeddle withall.—I will go on with my chronology of persons in holy orders, and only put you in mind of Eli and Samuel, amongst the Judges; of Zadock's employment under king David; of Jehoiadas under his nephew king Joash; and would fain know what hurt those men in holy orders did, by intermeddling in secular affairs at that time?—Now we are returned from the captivity of Babylon; I desire you to look upon the whole race of Macchabees, even to Antigonus the last of them all, taken prisoner by Pompey, and crucified afterwards by Mark Anthony: and shew me any one of those princes (a woman or two excepted) that was not a priest and a magistrate.—We are now come to Christ's time, when, methinks, I hear St. Paul, in the 23d of the Acts, excuse himself for reviling of the high priest: 'I wist not brethren, that he was the high priest, for it is written, 'Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.' Where observe, that the word 'Ruler,' in the Greek, is ἀρχὴ the very same word that is used by St. Paul, Rom. xiii. 3. where this word ἀρχὴ is translated, by Beza, 'Magistrates.'—Next, you must be pleased to imagine the church asleep, or almost dead, under persecution, for almost 300 years, until the happy days of the emperor Constantine, and not expect to find many magistrates among the christians: yet shall you find St. Paul, 1. Cor. vi. 5. offend against this bill and intermeddle, knuckle deep, with Secular Affairs, by inhibiting the Corinthians very sharply, for their chicanery, their pettifoggery, and common battery, in going to law one with another. Besides that, as all learned men agree, both the Apostles and Apostolical men that lived presently after them, had a miraculous power of punishing exorbitant crimes, which supplied the power of the ordinary magistrate; as appears in Ananias and Saphyra, the incestuous Corinthian, and many others.—Then from Constantine's age, till the Reformation begun by Luther, churchmen were so usually employed in managing of Secular Affairs, that I shall confess ingenuously, it was far too much; there lying an appeal from the courts of the empire to the bishop's judicatory, as you shall find it every where in the code of Justinian. So was it under Carolus Magnus and all the Carolovingian Line of our neighbour country of France. So, and somewhat more, it was with us, in the Saxon Heptarchy; the bishop and the sheriff sitting together, cheek by jowl, in their towns and courts. But these exorbitant and vast employments in secular affairs I stand not up to defend, and therefore I will hasten to the Reformation.—Mr. Calvin, in the fourth book of his Institutions, and 11th Distinction, doth confess, that the holy men heretofore did refer their controversies to the bishop, to avoid troubles in law; and you shall find that, from Luther to this present day, in all the flux of time, in all nations, in all manner of reformations, persons in holy orders were thought fit to intermeddle with secular affairs. Brentius was a privy counsellor to his duke and prince: Functius was a privy counsellor to the great duke of Borussia. Calvin and Beza, whilst they lived, carried all the counsel of the state of Geneva under their own gowns; and Bancroft (in his Survey, cap. 26.) observeth, 'that they were of the council of state there, which consisteth of threescore.' I have myself known Abraham Scultetus a privy counsellor to the prince Palatine: The rev. M. Du Moulin, for many years together, a counsellor to the princess of Sedan: his brother-in-law, M. Rivel, a great learned personage now in England, of the privy council of the prince of Orange. You have all heard (and I know much good by his former writings) of a learned man called Mr. Henderſon; and moſt of your lordſhips underſtand, better than I, what employment he hath at this time in this kingdom. And, truly, I do believe, that there is no reformed church in the world, ſettled and conſtituted by the ſtate, wherein it is held for a point in divinity, That perſons in Holy Orders ought not to intermeddle with Secular Affairs.—Now I come to the 2nd duty of men in Holy Orders, in point of Convenience or Policy. I am clearly of opinion, that, even in this regard and reflection, they ought not to be debarred from moſtly intermeddling in ſecular affairs: for, if there be any ſuch inconvenience, it muſt needs ariſe from this, That to exerciſe ſome ſecular juriſdiction muſt be evil in itſelf, or evil to a perſon in holy orders; which is neither ſo nor ſo: for the whole office of a ſubordinate civil magiſtrate is moſt exactly deſcribed in Rom. xiii. 3, 4. and no man can add or detract from the ſame. The civil power is a divine ordinance, ſet up to be a terror to the evil, and an encouragement to good works. This is the whole compaſs of the civil power: and therefore I do here demand (with that moſt learned biſhop Davenport,* that within a few days did ſit by my ſide, in the 11th Queſtion of his determinations :) what is there of impicity, what of unlawfulness, what unbecoming either the holineſs or calling of a prieſt, in terrifying the bad, or comforting the good ſubject; in reſpreſſing of ſin, and puniſhing of ſinners? For this is the whole and intire act of civil juriſdiction. It is, in its own nature, repugnant to no perſon, to no function, to no ſort or condition of men; let them hold themſelves never ſo holy, never ſo ſcrupulous, it becomes them very well to reſpreſs ſin, and puniſh ſinners; that is to ſay, to exerciſe in a moderate manner civil juriſdiction, if the ſovereign ſhall require it. And you ſhall find that this doctrine of debarring perſons in holy orders from ſecular employments, is no doctrine of the Reformed, but the Popiſh church; and firſt brought into this kingdom by the popes of Rome and of Lambeth; as Lanfranc, Anſelme, Stephen Langton, and the reſt, together with Otho and Othobon; and to this only end, that the man of Rome might withdraw all the clergy of this kingdom from their obligations to the king and nobility, who were moſt of them great princes in thoſe times, and thereby might eſtabliſh and create (as in a great part he did) regnum in regno, a kingdom of ſhavelings in the miſt of this kingdom of England: and hence came thoſe Canons of mighty conſequence, able to ſhoot up a prieſt, at one ſhot, into Heaven; as that he muſt not meddle with matters of blood; that he muſt not exerciſe civil juriſdiction, not be a ſteward to a nobleman in his houſe, and all the reſt of this pulea and garbage: that is, in plain Engliſh, the prieſt muſt no longer receive obligations from either king or lords, but wholly depend upon his holy fathers, the pope of Rome and the pope of Lambeth; or at leaſt wiſe pay them ſoundly for their diſpenſations and abſolutions, when they preſume to do the contrary. In the mean time here is not one word or ſhew of reaſon, to inform an underſtanding man, that perſons in holy orders ought not to terrify the bad, and comfort the good; to reſpreſs ſin, and chaſtiſe ſinners; which is the ſumma totalis of the civil magiſtracy; and conſequently ſo far forth, at the leaſt, to intermeddle with ſecular affairs.—The ſecond point conſiſts of the perſons reflected upon in this bill; which are ‘Archbiſhops, Parſons, Vicars, and all others in Holy Orders.’ Of this point I ſhall ſay little; only finding theſe names huddled up in a heap, it made me conceive, at firſt, that it might have ſome relation to Mr. Bagshaw’s reading in the Middle-Temple; which I ever eſteemed to have been very inoffenſively delivered by that learned gentleman, and, with little diſcretion queſtioned by a great eccleſiaſtic, then in place: for all that he ſaid amounted only to this, ‘That when the temporal lords are more in voices than the ſpiritual, they may paſs a bill without conſent of the biſhops;’ which is an aſſertion ſo clear in reaſon, and ſo often practiſed upon the records and rolls of parliament, that no man, any way verſed in either of theſe, can make any doubt of it; nor do I: though I humbly conceive no precedent can be found that the prelates were ever excluded, otherwiſe than by their own folly, fear, or headineſs. As for the point of being juſtices of the peace, the gentleman confeſſeth, ‘He never meddled with archbiſhops, nor biſhops, nor with any clergyman, made a juſtice by his majeſty’s commiſſion.’ In the ſtatute made 34 Edw. 3. c. 1. he finds, aſſignees for keeping of the peace, one lord, and, with him, three or four of the moſt worthy men of the county: the troublesome times did then ſo require it; and if God do not bleſs us with the riddance of theſe two armies, the like provision will be now as neceſſary. He finds theſe men included, but doth not find churchmen excluded; no not in the ſtatute, 13 Rd. 2. c. 7. that requires juſtices of peace to be made of knights, eſquires, and gentlemen of the law, of the moſt ſufficient of each county: in which words the gentleman thinks clerks were not included; and I clearly ſay, by his favour, they are not excluded; nor do the learned ſages of the law conceive them to be excluded by that ſtatute. If the king ſhall command the lord keeper to fill up the commiſſions of each county with the moſt ſufficient knights, eſquires, and gentlemen of the law, ſhall the lord keeper thereupon exclude the noblemen and the prelates? I have often, in my days, received this command, but never heard of this interpretation before this time; ſo that I cannot conceive from what ground this general ſweepſtake of archbiſhops, biſhops, parſons, vicars, and all others in holy orders, ſhould proceed.—I have heard, ſince the beginning of my ſickneſs, that it hath been alledged in this houſe, that the clergy, in the 6th of Edw. 3. did diſavow that the cuſtody of the peace did belong to them at all; and I believe that such a thing is to be found amongst the notes of the privileges of this house: but first you must remember, that it was in a great storm, and when the waters were much troubled, and the wild people unapt to be kept in order by mitres and crosier-staves: but yet if the noble lord, who urged this argument, shall be pleased to cast his eye upon the roll itself, he shall find that this poor excuse did not serve the prelates turns; for they were compelled, with a witness, to defend the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, for their part, as well as the noblemen and gentry; and you shall find the ordinance to this effect set down upon that roll. I conclude, therefore, that the sweeping of all the clergy out of temporal offices, is a motion of the first impression, and was never heard of in the English commonwealth, before this bill.—I come, in the 3rd place, to the main part of this cause, the things to be severed from all men in Holy Orders, which are, as I told you, of three kinds. 1. Matters of freehold; as the bishop's votes in parliament and legislative power. 2. Matters of favour; as, to be a judge in the Star-Chamber, to be a privy-counsellor, to be a justice of peace, or a commissioner in any temporal affairs. 3. and mixt Matters of Freehold and Favour too; as the Charters of some Bishops, and many of the antient Cathedrals of this kingdom, who allow them a justice or two within themselves, or their close, as they call it; and exempt those grave and learned men from the rudeness and insolency of tapsters, brewers, innkeepers, taylors, and shoe-makers, which do integrate and make up the bodies of our country cities and incorporations. But now is the axe laid to the very root of the ecclesiastical tree; and, without your lordships justice and favour, all the branches are to be lopt off quite, with these latter clauses; the stock and root itself is to be quite grubbed and digged up, by that first point of abolishing all votes and legislative power in all clergymen; leaving them to be no longer any part of the people of Rome, but meer slaves and bondmen to all intents and purposes: thus will the priests of England be one degree inferior to the priests of Jeroboam, being to be accounted worse than the tail of the people.—Now I hope no Englishman will doubt, but this vote and representation in parliament is not only a freehold, but the greatest freehold that any subject in England, or in all the Christian world, can brag of at this day; that we live under a king, and are to be governed by his laws; that is, not by his arbitrary edicts or rescripts, but by such laws confirmed by him, and assented to by us, either in our proper persons, or in our assignees and representations.—This is the very soul and genius of Magn. Charta; and without this one spirit, that great statute is little less than littera occidens, a dead and useless piece of paper.—You heard it most truly opened unto you, by a wise and judicious peer of this house, that legem patere quam ipse tuleris, was a motto

Vol. II.

wherein Alexander Severus had not more interest than every true-born Englishman. No forty shillings man in England but doth in person, or representation, enjoy this freedom and liberty. The prelates of this kingdom, as a looking-glass and representation of the clergy, (a third estate, if we may speak either with sir Edw. Coke, or antient acts of parliament) have been in possession hereof these 1000 years and upwards. The princes of the Norman race, for their own ends, and to strengthen themselves with men and money, erected the bishopricks, soon after the conquest, into baronies, and left them to sit in that house with their double capacities about them; the latter, invented for the benefit of the prince, not excluding the former, but remaining always, from the beginning, for the profit of the state ecclesiastical; which appears, not only by the Saxon laws set forth by Mr. Lambard and sir H. Spelman, but also by the bishops writs and summons to parliament, in use to this very day.—We have many precedents upon the rolls, that in vacancy of episcopal sees, the guardian of the spirituals, though but a simple priest, hath been called to sit in this honourable house, by reason of that former representation; and such an officer I was myself over that see (whereof I am bishop) some 25 years ago; and might then have been summoned by writ unto this house, at that very time, by reason of the spirituality of that diocese, which then I did, by virtue of the aforesaid office, represent.—Most noble lords, look upon the ark of God representative, that at this time floats in great danger, in this deluge of waters: if there be any Cham, or unclean creature therein, out with him, and let every man bear his own burthen; but save the ark, for God and Christ Jesus his sake, who hath built it in this kingdom, for saving of the people. And your lordships are too wise to conceive that the word and sacraments, the means of our salvation, will be ever effectually received from those ministers, whose persons shall be so vilified and dejected, as to be made no parcels or fragments of this commonwealth: 'No,' saith Gregory, 'the last trick the devil had in this world was this, that, when he could not bring the Word and Sacraments into disgrace by errors and heretical opinions, he invented this project, (and much applauded his wit therein) by casting slight and contempt upon the preachers and ministers.—My noble lords, you are too wise to believe what the common people talk, that we have a vote in the election of knights and burgesses, and, consequently, some figure and representation in the house of commons. They of the ministry have no vote in these elections, they have no representation in that house; and these contrary assertions are so slight and groundless, as I will not offer to give them any answer: and therefore, my lords, have a special care of the Church of England, your mother, in this point; and as God hath made you the most noble of all the peers of the Christian world, so do not you give way, that our nobility shall be taught henceforth, as the Romans were, in the time of the first and second Punick wars, by their slaves and bond-men only; and that the church of God, in this island, may come to be served by the most ignoble ministers that ever have been seen in the Christian church, since the passion of our Saviour.—The next thing to be severed from persons in Holy Orders by this bill, is of a much baser metal and alloy, 'Sitting in the Star-Chamber, Sitting at Council-Table, Sitting in Commissions of the Peace, and other Commissions of Secular Affairs.' These are such favours and graces of Christian princes, as the church may have a being and subsistence without them: the fortunes of our Greece do not depend upon these spangles; and the sovereign prince hath imparted and withdrawn these kind of favours, without the envy or regret of any wise ecclesiastical persons. But, my noble lords, this is the case; our king hath, by the statute, restored unto him the headship of the church of England; and, by the word of God, he is 'Custos utriusque tabulæ:' and will your lordships allow this ecclesiastical head, no ecclesiastical senses at all? No ecclesiastical person to be consulted withal, not in any circumstances of time and place? If Crammer had been thus dealt withal, in the minority of our young Josias, king Edward 6. of pious memory, what had become of that great work of our reformation, in this flourishing church of England? But I know before whom I speak. I do not mean to dine your lordships with colic-worts: the harsh consequences of this point your lordships do understand as well as I.—The last robe that some persons, in Holy Orders, are to be stript of, hath a kind of mixture of freehold and favour; proper right, and of the graces of the king. These are certain old Charters, that some few Bishops, and many antient and Cathedral Churches have purchased or procured from the antient kings, before and since the Conquest, to enable them to live quiet in their own precincts and close (as they call it) under a justice or two of their own body, without being abandoned, upon every slight occasion, to the injuries and vexations of mechanical tradesmen; of which, your lordships best know these country incorporations do most consist. Now, whether these few charters have their foundation by favour or by right, I should conceive, it is neither favour nor right to take them away, without some just crime objected and proved: for, if they be abused in any particular, Mr. Attorney General can find an ordinary remedy to repair the same by a writ of Ad quod damnum, without troubling of the two houses of parliament.—And now I come to the fourth part of this bill, which is the 'Manner of Inhibition;' heavy every way, heavy in the penalty, heavier a great deal in the incapacity, the most weighing of all penalties. Will you consider, I beseech you, the small wires, that is, poor causes, that are to induce the same, and then the heavy lead that hangs upon these wires. It is thus, If a natural subject of England, interested in Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, as well as any other, yet being a person in Holy Orders, shall happen unfortunately to vote in parliament; to obey his prince, by way of council; or, by way of commissioner, be required thereunto; then is he presently to lose and forfeit, for his first offence, all his means and livelihood for one year; and, for the second, to forfeit his freehold, in that kind, for ever and ever. I do not believe that your lordships ever saw such an heavy weight of censure hang upon such thin wires of reasons, in any act of parliament made heretofore. This, peradventure, may move others most, but it does not me. It is not the penalty, but the incapacity, and, as the philosophers call it, the natural impotency, imposed by this bill on men in Holy Orders, to serve the king or the state in this kind, be they otherwise never so able, never so willing, nor never so virtuous; which makes me draw a kind of Timantbes's Veil over this point, and leave it, without any amplification at all, unto your lordships wise and inward thoughts and considerations.—The fifth point is the 'Salvo' made for the two Universities, to have justices of the peace amongst them of their own heads of houses; which I confess to be done upon mature and just consideration: for, otherwise, the scholars must have gone for justice to those parties to whom they go for their mustard and vinegar: but yet, under favour, the reasons and inducements cannot be stronger, than may be found out for other ecclesiastical persons; as the bishop of Durham, who was, ever since the days of king John, suffered by the princes and parliaments of England, to exercise justice upon the parties in those parts, as being in truth the king's subjects, but the bishops tenants; and therefore not likely to have their causes more duly weighed, than when the balance is left in the hand of their own proper landlords. The case of the bishop of Ely, for some parts of that isle, is not much different; but, if a little partiality doth not herein cast some mist before mine eyes, the case of the dean and city of Westminster, where this parliament is now sitting, is far more considerable, both in the antiquity, extent of jurisdiction, and the warrants whereupon it is grounded, than any one of those places before-mentioned: for there is a clear statute made, in 27 Eliz. for the drawing all Westminster, St. Clement's, and St. Martin's le Grand, London, into a corporation, to be ruled by a dean, a steward, 12 burgesses, and 12 assistants. And if some salvo, or plaister, shall not be applied unto Westminster in this point, all that government and corporation is at an end: but this I perceive, since, is taken into consideration by the house of commons themselves.—I come now to the last point, and the second, 'Salvo' of this bill; which is for dukes, marquisses, earls, viscounts, barons, or peers of this kingdom, which is a clause that looks with a kind of contrary glance upon persons in holy orders. It seems to favour some; but so that thereby, and in that very act, it casts an aspersion of baseness and ignobility upon all the rest of that holy profession: for if no persons in Holy Orders ought to intermeddle in secular affairs, how come these nobles to be excepted out of that universal negative? Is it because they are noble-born? Then, surely, it must be granted that the rest must be excluded, as being made of a rougher and baser piece of clay: for the second part of this reason, in the beginning of the bill, can never bear out this Salvo, 'That the office of the ministry is of so great importance, that it will take up the whole Man, and all his best endeavours.' Surely the office of the ministry is of no greater importance in a poor man, than in a nobleman; nor doth it take away the whole man in the one, and but a piece of him in the other. I cannot give you many instances herein out of scripture, because you know that, in those days, 'not many mighty, not many noble were called.' But when any noble were called, I do not find but they did put more of the whole man and their best endeavours upon the ministry than other men in Holy Orders, are, at the least in Holy Scripture, noted to have done. I put your lordships in mind of those noblemen of Beræa, compared with those of Thessalonica, in the 7th of the Acts of the Apostles: so that this Salvo for the nobility must needs be, a secret wound unto the rest of the ministry; unless your lordships, by your great wisdom, would be willing to change it into a panacea and common plaister, both to the one and the other; and, I conceive it may be done upon a very forcing argument. The office of the ministry is of equal importance, and takes up the whole man and all his best endeavours in the noble-born, as well as in the mean-born minister: but, if it is lawful, all this notwithstanding, for the noble-born ministers to intermeddle with secular affairs; is it not likewise lawful for the mean-born so to do? In my conscience I speak it, in the presence of God and your lordships, it is most lawful for them to intermeddle with secular affairs; if they be not so intangled, as the Apostle calls it, with this intermeddling, as to slight and neglect the office of their calling, which no minister, noble or ignoble, can do without grievously sinning against God and his own conscience. It is lawful for persons in Holy Orders to intermeddle; it is without question; but for them to make provision of meat and drink, as Beza interprets the place, it is not lawful for them to be thus intangled and bound up with secular affairs.—And thus, my noble lords, I shall, without any further molestation, and with humble thanks for your great patience, leave this great cause of the church to your lordships wise and gracious consideration. Here is my Mars-Hill, and further I shall never appeal for justice. Some assurance I have, from the late solemn vote and protestation of both houses, for the maintaining and defending the power and privileges of parliament, that if this bill were now to be framed in the one house, it would never be offered without much qualification, as I persuade myself it will not be approved, in the other.—Parliaments are indeed omnipotent, but no more omnipotent, than God himself; who, for all that, cannot do every thing. God cannot but perform his promise. A parliament, under favour, cannot unswear what it hath already vowed. This is an old maxim, which I have learned of the sages of the law, 'A parliament cannot be felo de se: it cannot destroy or undo itself.' An act of parliament (as that made in the 11th, and another in the 21st Rd. 2.) made to be unrepealable in any subsequent parliament, was, ipso facto, void in the constitution. Why? Because it took away the power and privileges; that is, not the plumes and feathers, the remote accidents, but the very specifical form, essence, and being of a parliament: so, if an act should be made to take away the votes of all the commons, or of all the lords, it were absolutely a void act. I will conclude with the first Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. xii. 15. 'If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? V. 20. But now are they many members, yet but one body. V. 21. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again the head unto the feet I have no need of you.'

The Lord Say and Sele spoke in answer, as follows: * 'My lords; I shall not need to begin as high as Adam, in answer to what hath been drawn down from thence, by a bishop, concerning this question; for that which is pertinent to it will only be what concerns bishops, as they are ministers of the gospel; what was before, being of another nature, can give no rule to this. The question that will lie before your lordships in passing of this bill, is not, Whether episcopacy (I mean this hierarchical episcopacy which the world now holds forth to us) shall be taken away root and branch; but whether those exuberant and superfluous branches, which draw away the sap from the tree, and divert it from the right and proper use, whereby it becomes unfruitful, shall be cut off, as they use to pluck up suckers from the root? The question will be no more but this, Whether bishops shall be reduced to what they were in their first advancement over the presbyters, (which although it were but a human device for the remedy of schism, yet were they in those times least offensive) or continue still, with the addition of such things as their own ambition, and the ignorance and superstition of succeeding times, did add thereunto, and which are now continued for several politic ends: things heterogeneous, and inconsistent with their calling and function, as they are ministers of the gospel; and thereupon, such as ever have been, and ever will be hurtful to themselves, and make them hurtful to others in the times and places where they are continued; these things, alone, this bill takes away; that is their offices and places in courts of judicature, and their employments, by obligation of their office, in civil affairs.—I shall insist upon this, to shew 1st, how things hurt themselves; and, 2dly, how they these have made, and ever will make them hurtful to others. They themselves are hurt thereby in their consciences and in their credit: in their consciences, by seeking or admitting things which are inconsistent with that function and office which God hath set them apart unto. They are separated unto a special work, and men must take heed how they misemploy things dedicated and set apart to the service of God. They are called to preach the Gospel, and set apart to the work of the ministry: and the Apostle saith, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' shewing that this requireth the whole man, and all is too little. Therefore, for them to seek, or take, other offices which shall require and tie them to employ their time and studies in the affairs of this world, will draw a guilt upon them, as being inconsistent with that which God doth call them and set them apart unto. In this respect our Saviour hath expressly prohibited it, telling his apostles, 'That they should not lord it over their brethren, nor exercise jurisdiction over them,' as was used in civil government among the heathens. These were called gracious lords, and exercised jurisdiction as lords over others; and sure they might lawfully do so: but, to the ministers of the gospel, our Saviour gives this rule, 'It shall not be so among you.' And, in another place, he saith, 'He that putteth his hand to the plough, and looketh back' (to the things of this world) 'is not fit for the kingdom of God;' that is the preaching of the gospel, as it is usually called.—To be thus withdrawn by intangling themselves with the affairs of this life, by the necessity and duty of an office received from men, from the discharge of that office which God hath called them unto, brings a woe upon them. 'Woe unto me,' saith the Apostle, 'if I preach not the Gospel.' What doth he mean? If I preach not once a quarter, or once a year, in the king's chapel? No; he himself interpreteth it; 'Preach the Word; be instant, in season and out of season; re-buke, exhort, or instruct, with all long suffering and doctrine.'—He that hath an office must attend upon his office, especially this of the ministry. The practice of the apostles is answerable to the direction and doctrine of our Saviour. There never was, nor will be, men of so great abilities and gifts as they were induced withal; yet they thought it so inconsistent with their callings to take places of judicature in civil matters, and secular affairs and employments upon them, that they would not admit of the care and distraction that a business, far more agreeable to their callings, than these would cast upon them; and they give the reason of it in the 6th of Acts, 'It is not reason that we should leave the Word of God, and serve tables.' And again, when they had directed their disciples to choose men fit for that business, they instituted an office for taking care of the poor, lest they, by it, should be distracted from the principal work of their calling; and then shew how they ought to employ themselves. 'But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the Word.' Did the Apostles, men of extraordinary gifts, think it unreasonable for them to be hindered from giving themselves continually to preaching the Word and Prayer, by taking care for the Tables of the poor widows; and can the bishops now think it reasonable, or lawful, for them to contend for sitting at council-table; to govern states; to turn statesmen instead of church-men; to sit in the highest courts of judicature, and to be employed in making laws for civil polities and government? If they shall be thought fit to sit in such places, and will undertake such employments, they must not sit there as ignorant men, but must be knowing men in business of state, and understand the rules and laws of government; and thereby, both their time and studies must be necessarily diverted from that which God hath called them unto: and this, sure, is much more unlawful for them to admit of, than that which the apostles rejected as a distraction unreasonable for them to be interrupted by.—The doctrine of the apostles is agreeable to their practices here in; for Paul when he instructeth Timothy for the work of the ministry, presseth this argument from the example of a good soldier: 'No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life.' Hence I conclude, that what is, by the commandment of our Saviour, by the practice and doctrine of the apostles, and I may add, by the canons of ancient councils grounded thereupon, prohibited to the ministers of the gospel, and shewed to be such a distraction unto them from their callings and function, as will bring a woe upon them, is not reasonable for them to admit of: and if they shall, notwithstanding, entangle themselves withal, and enter into, it will bring a guilt upon their souls, and hurt them in respect of their consciences.—In the next place, it doth blemish them, and strike them in their credit. So far from truth is that position which they desire to possess the world withal, 'That unless they may have these outward trappings of worldly pomp added to the ministry, that calling will grow into contempt, and be despised:' for the truth is, these things cast contempt upon them in the eyes of men; they gain them cap and courtesy, but they have cast them out of the consciences of men. The reason of this is plain: every thing is esteemed as it is eminent in its own proper excellency; the eye in seeing, not in hearing; the ear in hearing, not in speaking; the one would be rather monstrous than comely; the other is ever acceptable, being proper. So is it with them: their proper excellency is spiritual; the denial of the world, with the pomp and preferments, and employments thereof. This they should teach and practice: but when they, contrary hereunto, seek after a worldly excellency, like the great men of the world, and to rule and domineer as they do, contrary to our Saviour's precept, 'It shall not be so amongst you'; instead of honour and esteem they have brought upon themselves, in the hearts of the people, that contempt and odium which they now lie under: and that justly and necessarily, because the world seeth that they prefer a worldly excellency, and run after it, and contend for it, before their own; which being spiritual, is far more excellent; and which, being proper to the ministry, is that alone which will put a value and esteem upon them that are of that calling.—As these things hurt themselves in their consciences and credit, so have they made, and, if they be continued, still will make them hurtful to others: the reason is, because they break out of their own orb, and move irregularly, there is a curse upon their leaving of their own place. The heavenly bodies, while they keep within their own spheres, give light and comfort to the world; but if they should break out, and fall from their regular and proper motions, they would set the world on fire: so have these done. While they kept themselves to the work of their ministry alone, and gave themselves to prayer, and the ministry of the word, according to the example of the Apostles, the world received the greatest benefits by them; they were the light and life thereof: but when their ambition cast them down, like stars from heaven to earth, and they did grow, once, to be advanced above their brethren, I do appeal to all who have been versed in the ancient ecclesiastical stories, or modern histories, whether they have not been the common incendiaries of the Christian World; never ceasing from contention, one with another, about the precedency of their sees and churches; excommunicating one another; drawing princes to be parties with them, and thereby casting them into bloody wars. Their ambition, and intermeddling with secular affairs and state business, hath been the cause of shedding more Christian blood than any thing else in the Christian world; and this no man can deny that is versed in history. But, we need not go out of our own kingdom for examples of their insolency and cruelty. When they had a dependency upon the Pope and any footing thereby out of the land, there were never any that carried themselves with so much scorn and insolency towards the princes of this kingdom, as they have done: some of these the bishop, that last spake, hath named; but instances of many more may be given, whereof there would be no end.—Although the Pope be cast off, yet now there is another inconvenience, no less prejudicial to the kingdom, by their sitting in this house; and that is, they have such an absolute dependency upon the king that they sit not here as freemen. That which is requisite to freedom, is to be void of hopes and fears. He that can lay down these is a freeman, and will be so in this house: but for the bishops, as the case stands with them, it is not likely they will lay aside their hopes, greater bishopricks being still in expectancy: And for their fears, they cannot lay them down, since their places and seats in parliament are not invested in them by blood, and so hereditary; but by annexation of a barony to their office, and depending upon that office; so that they may be deprived of their office, and thereby of their places, at the king's pleasure. They do not so much as sit here dum bene se gesserint, as the judges now, by your lordships Petition to the king, (See p. 702), have their places granted them; but at will and pleasure: And therefore, as they were all excluded by Edw 1. as long as he pleased, and laws made exclusio clero; so may they be by any king, at his pleasure in like manner. They must needs, therefore, be in an absolute dependency upon the crown, and thereby at devotion for their votes; which how prejudicial it hath been, and will be, to this house, I need not say. I have now shewed your lordships how hurtful to themselves and others these things, which this bill would take away, have been. I will only answer some Objections which I have met withall, and then crave your pardon for troubling you so long. Obj. 1. It will be said that they have been very antient. 2. That they are established by law. 3. That it may be an infringement to the privileges of the house of peers, for the house of commons to send up a bill to take away some of their members. To these 3 Objections the Answers will be easy. To the 1st; Antiquity is no good plea: for that which is, by experience, found to be hurtful, the longer it hath done hurt, the more cause there is now to remove it, that it may do so no more: Besides, other irregularities are as antient which have been thought fit to be redressed; and this is not so antient, but that it may truly be said, non fuit sic ab initio. 2. For being established by law: The law-makers have the same power, and the same charge to alter old laws that are inconvenient, as to make new that are necessary. 3. For privilege of the house: It can be no breach of it; for either estate may propose to other, by way of bill, what they conceive to be for public good; and they have power, respectively, of accepting or refusing.—There are two other Objections which may seem to have more force but they will receive satisfactory Answers. The one is, 'That if they may remove bishops, they will, next time, remove barons and earls.' For Answer to this: The reason is not the same; the one sitting by an honour invested in their blood, and hereditary; which though it be in the king to grant alone, yet, being once granted, he cannot take away: The other sitting by a barony depending upon an office which may be taken away; for if they be deprived of their office, they sit not. And their sitting is not so essential, for laws have been, and may be made, they being all excluded; but it can never be shewed, that ever there were laws made by the king and them, the lords and earls excluded. The other Objection is this, That this bill alters the foundation of this house; and innovations, which shake foundations, are dangerous.' I answer, '1. That if there be an error in the foundation, when this shall be found, and the master-builders be met together, they may, nay, they ought rather to amend it, than to suffer it to run on still to the prejudice and danger of the whole structure. 2. I say this is not fundamental to this house, for it hath stood without them, and done all that appertains to the power thereof without them; yea, they being wholly excluded: and that which hath been done, for a time, at the king's pleasure, may be done with as little danger for a longer time; and, when it appears to be fit and for public good, not only may, but ought to be done altogether, by the supreme power.'

The Lord Newark spoke as follows *; 'My lords; I shall not speak to the preamble of the bill, 'That bishops and clergymen ought not to intermeddle in temporal affairs;' for truly, my lords, I cannot bring it, under any respect, to be spoken of. Ought is a word of relation, and must either refer to human or divine law: to prove the lawfulness of their intermeddling by the former, would be to no more purpose, than to labour to convince that by reason, which is evident to sense: it is by all acknowledged. The unlawfulness by the latter, the bill by no means admits of; for it excepts universities, and such persons as shall have honour descend upon them: and your lordships know that circumstance and chance alter not the nature and essence of a thing, nor can except any particular from an universal proposition by God himself delivered. I will therefore take these two as granted; 1. That they ought by our law to intermeddle in temporal affairs. 2. That, from doing so, they are not inhibited by the law of God, which leaves it, at least, as a thing indifferent.—Now my lords, I shall consider the conveniency, and that in the several habits thereof, but very briefly; 1. In that which it hath to them merely as men, qua tales. 2. As parts of the common-wealth. 3. From the best manner of constituting Laws. And, 4. From the practice of all times, both Christian and heathen. 'Homo sum, nihil humani à me alienum puto,' was indeed the saying of the comedian; but it might have well become the mouth of the greatest philosopher. We allow to sense all the works and operations of sense, and shall we restrain reason? Must only man be hindered from his proper actions? They are most fit to do reasonable things that are most reasonable. For science commonly is accompanied with conscience; so is not ignorance: they seldom or never meet. And why should we take that capacity from them, which God and nature have so liberally bestowed? My lords the politic body of the common-wealth is analogical to the body natural; every member in that contributes something to the preservation of the whole: the superfluity or defect which hinders the performance of that duty, your lordships know is what the philosopher calls luxuria vis perversa, nature's sin. And truly, my lords, to be part of the other body, and do nothing beneficial thereunto, cannot fall under a milder term. The common-wealth subsists by laws and their execution; and they that have neither hand in the making, nor hand in executing of them, confer not any thing to the being or well-being thereof. And can such be called members, unless most unprofitable ones? Only 'Fruges consumere nati?' Methinks it springs from nature itself, or the very depths of justice, that none should be tied by other laws than himself makes; for what more natural or just, than to be bound only by his own consent? To be ruled by any other's will is merely tyrannical. Nature there suffers violence, and man degenerates into beast. The most flourishing estates were ever govern'd by laws of an universal constitution: witness this our kingdom; witness senatus populusque Romanus, the most glorious common-wealth that ever was; and those many others in Greece, and elsewhere, of eternal memory.—Some things, my lords, are so evident in themselves that they are difficult in their proofs. Amongst them I reckon this conveniency I have spoken of. The long experience that all Christendom hath had thereof, for these 1300 years, is certainly argumentum ad hominem. Nay, my lords, I will go further, (for the same reason runs through all religions) never was there any nation that employed not their religious men in the greatest affairs.—But to come to the business that now lies before your lordships. Bishops have voted here ever since parliament began, and long before were employed by the public. The good they have done your lordships all well know, and at this day enjoy; for this I hope you will not put them out; nor for the evil they may do, which yet your lordships do not know, and I am confident never shall suffer. A position ought not to be destroyed by a supposition; 'et a posse ad esse non valet consequentia.'—My Lords, I have done with proving of this positively; I shall now, do it negatively, in answering some inconveniencies that may seem to arise. For the text, 'No Man that was intangles himself with the affairs of this Life,' which is the full sense of the words both in Greek and Latin, it makes not at all against them; except to intermeddle, and Intangle, be terms equivalent. Besides, my lords, though this was directed to a churchman, yet it is of a general nature and reaches to all, clergy and laity, as the most learned and best expositors unanimously do agree. To end this, 'Augmentum symbolicum non est argumentativum.'—It may be said, 'That it is inconsistent with a spiritual vocation;' truly, my lords, grace and nature are, in some respects, impossible; but, in some others, most harmoniously agree. It perfects nature, raises it to a height above the common altitude, and makes it most fit for those great works of God himself, to make laws, to do justice. There is then no inconsistency between themselves, it must arise out of scripture. I am confident it doth not, formally, out of any place there; nor did I ever meet with any learned writer, of these or other times, that so expounded any text.—But it may be said, ‘That though, in strict terms, this be not inconsistent, yet it may, peradventure, hinder the duty of their other calling.’ My lords, there is none that sits here more for preaching than I am. I know it is the ordinary means to salvation; yet I likewise know, there is not that full necessity for it as was in the primitive times. God forbid that 1600 years acquaintance should make the Gospel of Christ no better known unto us. Neither, my lords, doth their office merely and wholly consist in preaching; but partly in that; partly in prayer and administering the blessed sacraments; in a godly and exemplary life; in wholesome admonitions; in exhortations to virtue; dehortations from vice; and, partly, in easing the burdened conscience. These, compleat the office of a churchman. Nor are they altogether tied to time or place; though I confess they are, most properly, exercised within their own verge, except upon good occasion; nor then can the omission of some be termed the breach of them all. I must add one more, (an essential one, the very form of episcopacy, that distinguisheth it from the inferior ministry) the orderly and good government of the church. And how many of these (I am sure not the last) my lords, are interrupted by their sitting here once in three years; and then, peradventure, but a very short time? And can there be a greater occasion than the common good of the church and state? I will tell your lordships what the great and good emperor Constantine did, in his expedition against the Persians; he had his bishops with him, whom he consulted about his military affairs, as Eusebius has it in his Life.—Rewards and punishments are the great negotiators in all worldly businesses. These may be said to make the bishops swim against the stream of their consciences, and may not the same be said of the laity? Have these no operations but only upon them? Has the king neither frown, honour, nor offices, but only for bishops? Is there nothing that answers their translations? Indeed, my lords, I must needs say, that, in charity, it is a supposition not to be supposed; no, nor in reason, that they will go against the light of their understandings. The holiness of their calling; their knowledge; their freedom from passions and affections, to which youth is very obnoxious; their vicinity to the gates of death, which, though not shut to any, yet always stands wide open to old age: these my lords, will surely make them steer aright.—But of matter of fact there is no disputation. It is said, ‘some of them have done ill;’ but, ‘Crimine ab uno disce omnes,’ is a poetical, not a logical argument. Some of the judges have done so;

some of the magistrates and officers; and shall there be therefore neither judge, magistrate, nor officer more? A personal crime goes not beyond the person that commits it; nor can another's fault be my offence. If they have contracted any filth or corruption, through their own or the vice of the times, cleanse and purge them thoroughly: but still remember the great difference between reformation and extirpation; and be pleased to think of your Triennial Bill, which will save you this labour for the time to come. Fear of punishment will keep them in order, if they should not themselves through the love of virtue.—I have now, my lords, according to my poor ability, both shewed the conveniences, and answered those inconveniences, that seem to make against them. I should now propose those that make for them; as their falling into a condition worse than slaves, not represented by any; and then the dangers and inconveniences that may happen unto your lordships; but I have done this heretofore, and will not offer your lordships Cramben his coctail.*

The house being resumed, it was resolved, 1. “That the Archbishops and Bishops shall have suffrage and voice in the house of peers in parliament. 2. That they shall not have suffrage and voice in the court of Star-Chamber, when they are called. 3. That no archbishop or bishop, or other person in Holy Orders, shall be Justices of the Peace. 4. That no archbishop &c. shall be of the privy council to the king, or to his successors.”

May 27. The lords debated the bill ‘For restraining Bishops and others in Holy Orders, from intermeddling in Secular Affairs’ and a question arising, Whether the restraints in the said bill did extend to their right of sitting and voting in parliament, which, by the common and statute laws of this realm, and by an ancient and continued practice, was unquestionable? The lords resolved, That a conference be desired with the commons about it; and a message was sent down to them for that purpose.

Sir Edw. Dering brings in a Bill for the utter abolishing of Bishops, Deans, Prebendaries, &c.] May 27. A bill ‘For the utter abolishing and taking away of all Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries; Deans, Deans and Chapters; Arch-Deacons; Prebendaries, Chanters, Canons, and all other their Under-Officers,’ was brought into the House of Commons. It was introduced by sir Edward Dering; who, in a Collection of his Speeches, published by himself,* makes the following apology for it. “This bill was pressed into my hand by sir Arthur Haslerig, being then brought unto him by sir Henry Vane and Mr. Oliver Cromwell. He told me; he was resolved that it should go in, but was earnestly urgent that I would present it. The bill did hardly stay in my hand so long as to make a hasty perusal. Whilst I was overviewing it, Sir Edward Ayscough delivered a petition out of Lincolnshire, which was seconded by Mr. Strode, in such a sort, as that I had a fair invention to issue forth the bill then in my hand. Hereupon I stood up and said this, which, immediately after, I reduced into writing."

"Mr. Speaker; The gentleman that spake last, taking notice of the multitude of complaints and complainants against the present government of the church, doth somewhat seem to wonder that we have no more pursuit ready against the persons offending. Sir, the time is present, and the work is ready, perhaps beyond his expectation. Sir, I am now the instrument to present unto you a very short, but a very sharp, bill; such as these times and their sad necessities have brought forth. It speaks a free language, and makes a bold request: it is a purging bill. I give it you as I take physick; not for delight, but for a cure: a cure now: the last and only cure, if, as I hope, all other remedies have first been tried,

Ense recidendum est, ne pars sincera trahatur.*"
I never was for ruin, so long as I could hold any hope of reforming. My hopes that way are even almost withered. This bill is intitled, 'An Act for the utter abolishing and taking away of all Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries; Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, Prebendaries, Chanters, Canons, and all other their Under-Officers.' Sir, you see their demerits have exposed them, publici odii pinculares victimas. I am sorry they are so ill; I am more sorry that they will not be content to be bettered; which I did hope would have been effected by our last bill. When this bill is perfected, I shall give a said Aye unto it: and, at the delivery thereof, I do now profess before-hand that my former hopes of a full reformation may yet revive and prosper, I will again divide my sense upon this bill, and yield my shoulders to under-prop the primitive, lawful, and just episcopacy; yet so, as that I will never be wanting, with my utmost pains and prayers, to root out all the undue adjuncts to it, and superstructures on it. I beseech you read the bill, and weigh well the work.—The bill was read a first time, and the question being put, whether it should be then read a second time? it was carried for the reading of it, on a division, 139 against 108.

Mr. Taylor expelled for Expressions relating to Lord Strafford's Execution.] Mr. Taylor, Burgess for Windsor, was brought upon his knees in the house of commons, for speaking the following words, in disparagement of the whole house, about the earl of Strafford's death, viz. "They had committed murder with the sword of justice; and that he would not for a world have so much blood lie on his conscience, as did on theirs for that sentence:" which words being proved against him by the mayor of Windsor (to whom he spoke it) and some others, he was expelled the house, and voted incapable of ever being a parliament-man; committed to the Tower during pleasure; to be carried down to Windsor, there to make recantation for those words, and to return back to do the same at the bar; and it was ordered that a writ should presently issue out for a new election in his room.

The Lord's Reasons for retaining the Bishops Votes in Parliament.] June 3. Mr. Pierpoint reported the conference with the lords, concerning the bill for disabling Bishops to vote in the House of Peers, viz. "That their lordships conceive that the commons understand not that 'Unlawfulness to have any vote there,' means to be contrary to any law, but of convenience or inconvenience; because, if they had absolutely thought it unlawful, they would not have made exception of the universities, and of such of the nobility as should happen to be in Holy Orders. And for the bishops right to sit and vote in parliament; their lordships conceive, that, both by the common law, statutes, and constant practice, there is no question of it. As for inconveniences; their lordships did not yet understand any such, that might induce them to deprive the bishops and their successors of the right of voting in parliament; but if there be such, which they yet know not, they will be willing to hear them, and take it into consideration. For their votes in the Star-Chamber, Council-Table, or any office in Secular Affairs, they have fully consented to the desires of the commons. Their lordships have excepted the dean of Westminster, as being a corporation confirmed by act of parliament, 27 Eliz. As also that of Durham, Ely, and Hexham, and the several jurisdictions of those bishops to keep Courts Baron there by their stewards, &c. and all other courts executed by temporal officers; which their lordships conceive not to be contrary to this bill."

The Commons' Answer thereto.] June 4. The commons took into consideration the foregoing Reasons offered by the lords at the conference; and it was agreed to offer these Reasons, in Answer to them, at another conference, viz. 1. "That it was a very great hindrance to the exercise of their ministerial function. 2. Because they do vow and undertake at their ordination, when they enter into Holy Orders, that they will give themselves wholly to that vocation. 3. Because Councils and Canons, in several ages, do forbid them to meddle with Secular Affairs. 4. Because the 24 bishops have a dependency upon the two archbishops, and because of their oath of canonical obedience to them. 5. Because they are but for their lives, and therefore unfit to have a legislative power over the honours, inheritance, persons, and liberty of others. 6. Because of bishops dependences and expectancies of translations to places of greater profit. 7. That several bishops have, of late, much incroached upon the consciences and properties of the subjects; and they and their successors will be much encouraged still to encroach, and the subjects will be much discouraged from complaining against such encroachments, when they are judges of those complaints. The same reason extends to their legislative power, in any bill to pass for the regulation of their power, upon any emergent inconvenience by it. 8. Because the whole number of them is interested to maintain the jurisdiction of bishops; which hath been found so grievous to the three kingdoms, that Scotland hath utterly abolished it, and multitudes in England and Ireland have petitioned against it. 9. Because the bishops being lords of parliament, it setteth too great distance between them and the rest of their brethren in the ministry; which occasioneth pride in them, discontent in others, and disquiet in the church.—As to their having votes a long time since; the Answer is If inconvenient, time and usage are not to be considered with lawmakers; some abbots voted in parliament as ancient as bishops, yet are taken away. For particular jurisdictions, as the deanry of Westminster, the bishops of Durham and Ely, the Archbishop of York, which they are to execute on their own persons, the former reason shews the inconvenience of them. For their temporal courts and jurisdictions, which are executed by their temporal officers, the bill doth not concern them. Nor doth it reach to those certificates of plenarity of benefices, legality of marriages, and the like, which bishops make and return by course of common law. The argument taken from the canons and laws ecclesiastical, must be considered as a fight against the bishops with their own weapons; a kind of Goliath's sword, to cut off Goliath's head: not as though the house of commons did hereby justify the legality of any of them. [The proviso for the universities and temporal orders may stand in the bill, if their lordships so please. To this may be added, that there was an act preparing for regulating the universities, and this proviso is but permitted to stay there till the act be effected.]

The same day these Reasons of the commons were reported to the lords by the bishop of Lincoln. They are also entered in the Journals of the commons, with this addition, 'The question being put, Whether the two provisions in the bill, relating to the universities, and to noblemen in orders, should be laid aside? It was carried, on a division, in the affirmative, 148 against 139.'

Lay-Preachers reprimanded by the Commons. June 7. One Robinson, a clerk in the custom-house; John Spencer, a horse-courser; Adam Banks, a stocking-seller; John Durant and one Green, being complained against for preaching; being meer laymen, and who had been sent for by order of the house, were called in, and Mr. Speaker gave them a sharp reprehension, telling them, 'That the house had a general distaste at this their proceedings; and that if they should offend at any time in the like kind again, this house would take care they should be severely punished.'

VOL. II.

The Bill for restraining Bishops, &c. rejected by the Lords. The same day, the Bill 'For restraining Bishops, and others in Holy Orders, from intermeddling with Secular Affairs, was read a third time in the lords; and, the question being put, Whether the said bill should pass into a law? it was carried in the negative by a great majority. It is observable, that the house of lords had a strict call of their members the day before; so that it is probable the whole strength of each party was exerted upon this occasion.—Their lordships also "Ordered and declared, That reading of formal Speeches and Answers out of papers in this house, is no parliamentary way." Probably this was occasioned by the long speeches we have before given upon this subject.

Report from the Committee on the Plot. June 8. Mr. Fiennes, member for Banbury, reported from the secret committee matters concerning the Tower of London; the French; the flight of the gentlemen accused of a conspiracy in the army, to bring them up to awe the parliament; the earl of Strafford's design to have made his escape, had he not been prevented; the Papists resorting into Hampshire towards Portsmouth, and the fortifying of it; Mr. Jermy's desire to get Portsmouth into his hands; and the French troops drawing down to Calais, Dieppe, and Granville.

Exceptions against an Expression of Lord Digby. In the debate thereon, exceptions were taken at the lord Digby, for words spoken concerning an oath, which colonel Goring confessed he had taken to be secret, saying, 'He was a perjured man.' After a warm debate upon it, and he had in his place explained himself, by saying, 'He thought Mr. Goring deserved no better appellation, since it appeared, by his own confession, that he entered into the oath of secrecy purposely with an intention to discover the confederacy;' yet the house not being satisfied with it, he was ordered to withdraw.

Sir Wm. Widdrington and Mr. H. Price bring in Candles without an Order. The commons sitting late upon this affair of lord Digby, some members called for Candles, which the major part opposed, being inclined to rise; but, by mistake, the candles being brought in, and sir Wm. Widdrington and Mr. Herbert Price, taking them from the sergeant, without a general command, it occasioned great disturbance in the house. The next morning exceptions being taken against them, Mr. Denzil Hollis made a speech in aggravation of their offence, shewing, 'That the house of commons, being a rule and example of order, there ought to be no disorders within those walls; for that if there were such within, well might it be expected there would be without; and that it might be the occasion of shedding much blood among themselves, if, upon such a difference, parties should have sided one against another; and moved that they should, for their offence to this house, be sent to the Tower, there to remain during the pleasure of the house;' which was agreed to by a majority of 180 voices against 172. The Journals add, 'That sir Wm. Widdrington and Mr. H. Price were called to the bar, and there ordered to kneel; but because they did not kneel, they were caused to withdraw; and after debate in the house concerning their coming and kneeling, they were again called to the bar; and there, they kneeling all the while, Mr. Speaker pronounced the sentence against them.—Then it was further resolved, 'That colonel Goring, in this deposition of his, concerning this discovery, has done nothing contrary to justice and honour; but has therein deserved very well of the commonwealth, and of this house.'—The affair of lord Digby was referred to a committee.

A Narrative of the before-mentioned Plot.]

Frequent mention having been made of this Plot, which so greatly alarmed the whole nation, a brief account of it may not be improper; as tending to explain many passages in the proceedings of both houses at this juncture. This we shall do from the Memoirs of the Earl of Manchester, in his own words:—
 "To prevent the earl of Strafford's death, several designs had been upon the wheel, but all failed; therefore it was consulted how to engage the army in the North to serve the king, in order to his freedom from the parliament's fetters, 'pour mettre le Roi hors de Peine,' as the royalists termed it. This occasioned several addresses to the principal commanders in the North; but they were fearful and backward to entertain any motions or propositions, which might put them upon a breach with the parliament. But Mr. Percy and Mr. Jernyn finding a great discontent in those commanders of the army who were members of parliament; as colonels Wilmot, Ashburnham, and Pollard, who thought that their services had incurred much better of the parliament, than that the Scots officers and Scots army should be preferred before them, in their gratuities and in their pay: and these commanders owning that the parliament had disobliged them, this gave Mr. Percy a rise to press with greater earnestness his design of engaging them to serve the king; and, to that end, an oath of secrecy was framed, and others were admitted into their confederacy, as Mr. Jernyn and Mr. Goring, and propositions were framed. But it fell out in this, as in most conspiracies of the like nature, that though the same oath was taken by all that met together, yet it was not taken by all with the same persuasion or intention: for colonel Goring, whose ambition was not answered in being promised the place of lieutenant general of the army, and finding others employed whose persons he disliked, having a full information from Mr. Percy and Mr. Jernyn of all the design, thought it would tend most to his security and advantage to reveal the conspiracy; and, being versed in all the methods of falsehood, he chose the time and

means which he thought would be most acceptable and obliging to the parliament. He therefore first imparts it to the earl of Newport, who was his particular friend; and desired him to bring him to some other lords of the parliament, such as might be most likely to prevent that mischief which was intended: and, accordingly, the next day, about evening, the lord Newport brought him to the earl of Bedford and the lord Maudville, to whom he first made a protestation of his fidelity to the parliament, and of his readiness to run all hazards for the safety of it: then he imparted the substance of the design, and desired them to make what use of it they thought fit for their own and the commonwealth's security; but not to bring him as the accuser of the persons, except necessity did require it. The lords, who had this design revealed unto them, thought it necessary to discharge themselves, and communicated it to some members of the house of commons, by whose advice it was agreed, That Goring should repair to his government at Portsmouth, and that so soon as he was gone, the persons whom he had discovered to be actors in this design should be apprehended; but private notice being given to Percy and Jernyn, they prevented the justice of the parliament by the escape out of England. Mr. Percy, with some difficulty and hazard, took shipping in a private port in Sussex; Mr. Jernyn ventured upon Goring's faithfulness to him, and brought unto him a warrant, under the king's hand, to see him safely transported in one of his frigates, which he obeyed with care and readiness; though, at the same time, the parliament had sent orders to him, by commissioners authorized under the great seal, according to the king's direction, to apprehend him; but he pretended the orders came not time enough; and, at the same time, he took an oath, which was administered by the king's authority under the great seal, to be true and faithful to the king and parliament, and keep the town of Portsmouth for their use, and not to deliver it but by both their consents. The Plot being made known to the commons, they resented it as a thing of very dangerous consequence; and found it necessary therefore that Mr. Goring should own the discovery of the design. He was immediately sent for by the house, whereof he was a member; and being present there, he was commanded to declare his knowledge of the design. Upon this command he expressed himself in these terms:—

"Having been told, that there was an intention to unite the forces of our army, and to put them into a posture of being able (if not purpose of being willing) to interpose in the proceedings of parliament, I hearkened to the propositions of soliciting a redress for the miseries of the soldiery; being the first step to this, in respect of the present necessities of it, not any future consequence of trouble to those that were to procure our relief: but, lest the manner of asking this, or the effect of it being obtained, might be less just than the thing itself which was desired; and I might be involved in their crimes that had further ends, perhaps, than merely the redress of our army's grievances, I thought it not amiss to take some witness of my integrity along with me; and spake to a noble lord the very same day: I assured him there were some officers of the army, that were least thought on, that had not the greatest zeal to the proceedings of this house; and I thought there would be an occasion to let him know more of it within few days. After this, Mr. Jermyn and I were admitted into a consultation, where we were tied to secrecy by an oath, in the company of those gentlemen I have named in my depositions; where their purpose was declared to us in some propositions, which were to this effect: 1. Putting the army into a posture to serve the king. 2. Tendering a declaration to the parliament, containing, That no act of parliament should be made contrary to any former act, wherein it was expressed, that episcopacy should be kept up as it is now. 3. That the king's revenue should be established.—This I thought unlawful for our undertakings, since they intended to interpose in the determinations of this house; and it belongs to an army to maintain, not to contrive the acts of state. I objected therefore against their propositions, and more the follies and difficulties, than the irregularities of them; not only because I thought reason a greater argument with them than conscience, but because I was so unhappy, of the two, to be thought a worse commonwealth's man than a soldier; and, in that quality, could procure most credit for my words. I endeavoured to shew them, that as the design would be impious, if the most desperate counsels had been followed, so it would have been the weakest that ever was undertaken, if they were omitted. And whereas I am said to have a part in this violent counsel; till the day before this meeting I never heard a word of it; and knew not, when I came to the room, whether theirs were not the same with the other: this they may witness for me; and that I declared I would have to do with neither; and that I expressed contempt of our meeting in that manner. But I rely upon the testimony of some noble lords of his majesty's council, and others, how I protested against all those violent counsels, even in the birth of them; and with what piety I looked towards the person of his majesty, and the whole kingdom, in this business. I appeal also to them and some members of this house, what my carriage was towards these gentlemen that were embarked in these undertakings; intending rather to prevent a mischief, by abandoning their counsels, than to ruin them by disclosing them. But mistake me not; for had I known of any former Plot proceeded in, that could endanger or disturb the quiet of his majesty, or the peace of the kingdom, I should not have been contented with declaring mine own innocence; nor have staid till the commands of this house, or an oath, extorted from me a discovery; but, by a hasty open declaration, have broke the laws of amity and friendship, and all former ties, to preserve the duty of a subject; and as freely exposed the knowledge of all to the view of the world, as I have been tender in publishing these purposes, even to my nearest friends, which had weight enough to crush nothing but the undertakers of it. And certainly, if they had staid where I left them, there was no conclusion at all. It appears there were two several intentions digested by others before they were communicated to me; and I know not whether my hearkening to them was a fault, but I am sure it was a misfortune."

Lord Digby call'd up to the House of Peers.] June 10. This day the lord Digby eldest son of the earl of Bristol, one of the knights for Dorsetshire, whose case, before-mentioned, the commons had referred to a committee, was introduced into the house of lords, (his writ bearing date the day before) as appears by the Journals of that house. Dr. Nelson says, "That the very same day on which he was introduced into the house of lords, he was expelled the house of commons, as unworthy to continue any longer a member of it." But of this there is no entry in their Journals; only an Order for the issuing out a writ for Dorsetshire in his room, without the least mention whether the vacancy was occasioned by expulsion or promotion: however, we find that the same day the lords made an order, That the lord Digby be added to all their standing committees. But though his lordship was thus preferred out of the way of the commons, their resentment of his behaviour in their house did not stop here, as will appear in the sequel.

Debate on the Bill for Abolishing Bishops, &c.] June 11. The commons in a grand committee, of which Mr. Hyde was chairman, resumed the consideration of the bill against Episcopacy; after a debate, which lasted from 7 in the morning till night, it was resolved, That the preamble of the bill should be as follows: "Whereas the government of the church of England, by Archbishops, Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans, Archdeacons, and other ecclesiastical officers, hath been found, by long experience, to be a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of religion, and very prejudicial to the civil state and government of this kingdom," &c.

The next day the committee proceeded farther in the said bill: this was distinguished from the former (which was only called a bill 'For restraining of Bishops, and others in Holy Orders, from intermeddling in Secular Affairs') by the term of 'The Root and Branch Bill.' We meet with the following speeches upon this occasion, which are omitted in Rushworth's Collections:

Sir Henry Vane, member for Wilton, spoke in favour of the bill, thus: * 'Mr. Hyde: The debate we are now upon is, Whether the government by archbishops, bishops, chancellors, &c. should be taken away out of the church and kingdom of England. For the right stating whereof, we must remember the vote that passed yesterday, not only by this committee, but the house; which was to this effect, 'That this government has been found, by long experience, to be a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of religion, and very prejudicial to the civil state.—So that then the question will lie thus before us; Whether a government, which long experience hath set so ill a character upon, importing danger not only to our religion but the civil state, should be any longer continued amongst us, or be utterly abolished? For my own part, I am of the opinion of those who conceive, that the strength of reason, already set down in the preamble to this bill by yesterday's vote, is a necessary decision of this question: for one of the main ends for which church government is set up, is to advance and further the perfect reformation and growth of religion; which we have already voted this government doth contradict: so that it is destructive to the very end for which it should be, and is, most necessary and desirable; in which respect, certainly, we have cause enough to lay it aside, not only as useless, in that it attains not its end; but as dangerous, in that it destroys and contradicts it.—In the 2nd place, we have voted it prejudicial to the civil state: as having so ill and so powerful an influence upon our laws, the prerogative of the king, and liberties of the subject, that it is like a spreading leprosy, which leaves nothing untainted and uninfected which it comes near. May we not therefore well say of this government, as our Saviour speaks of salt, (give me leave upon this occasion to make use of Scripture, as well as others have done in this debate) where it is said that salt is good; 'but if the salt hath lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men.' So church government, in the general, is good, and that which is necessary, and which we all desire; but when any particular form of it hath once lost its savour, by being destructive to its own ends for which it is set up, (as by our vote already past, we say this hath) then surely, sir, we have no more to do but to cast it out; and endeavour, the best we can, to provide ourselves a better.—But to this it hath been said, 'That the government now in question may be so amended and reformed, that it needs not be pulled quite down or abolished, because it is conceived it hath no original sin or evil in it; or, if it have, it is said regeneration will take that away.' Unto which I answer, I do consent that we should do with this government, as we are done by in regeneration in which all old things are to pass away, and all things are to become new; and this we must do, if we desire a perfect reformation and growth of our religion, or good to our civil state: for the whole fabrick of this building is so rotten and corrupt, from the very foundation of it to the top, that if we pull it not down now, it will fall about the ears of all those that endeavour it, within a very few years.—The universal rottenness or corruption of this government, will most evidently appear by a disquisition into these ensuing particulars. 1st, Let us consider in what soil this root grows: is it not in the Pope's paradise? Do not one and the same principles and grounds maintain the Papacy, or universal bishop, as do our Diocesan or Metropolitan bishops? All these authorities, which have been brought us out of the Fathers and antiquity, will they not as well, if not better, support the Popedom as the order of our bishops? So likewise all these arguments for its agreeableness to monarchy, and cure of schism, do they not much more strongly hold for the acknowledgment of the Pope than for our bishops? And yet have monarchies been ever a whit the more absolute for the Pope's universal monarchy, or their kingdoms less subject to schisms and seditions? Whatsoever other kingdoms have been, I am sure our histories can tell us this kingdom hath not; and therefore we have cast him off long since, as he is foreign, though we have not been without one in our own bowels: for the difference between a metropolitan, diocesan, or universal bishop, is not of kinds but of degrees: and a metropolitan or diocesan bishop is as ill able to perform the duty of a pastor to his diocese or province, as the universal bishop is able to do it to the whole world; for the one cannot do but by deputies, and no more can the other: and therefore, since we all confess the grounds upon which the papacy stands are rotten, how can we deny but these that maintain our bishops are so too, since they are one and the same? —2. Let us consider by what hand this root of Episcopacy was planted, and how it came into the church. It is no difficult matter to find this out; for is not the very spirit of this order a spirit of pride, 'exalting itself, in the Temple of God over all that is called God? First exalting itself above its fellow-presbyters, under the form of a bishop; then over its fellow bishops, under the title of archbishops; and so still mounting over those of its own profession, under the title of cardinal, till it comes to be Pope; and then it sticks not to tread upon the necks of princes, kings, and emperors, and trample them under its feet. Also thus you may trace it from its first rise, and discern by what spirit this order came into the church, and by what door; even by the back-door of pride and ambition, not by Christ Jesus. It is not a plant which God's Right Hand hath planted, but is full of rottenness and corruption; that mystery of iniquity which hath wrought thus long, and so fit to be plucked up, and removed out of the way.—3. Let us consider the very nature and quality of this tree, or root in itself, whether it be good or corrupt in its own nature. We all know where it is said, 'A good tree cannot bring forth corrupt fruit, nor a corrupt tree good fruit. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' By its fruits therefore we shall be sure to know it; and according as the fruits of its government have been amongst us, either in church or common-wealth, so let it stand or fall with us.—As this kind of government itself came in by the back-door into the church, and was brought in by the spirit of antichrist; so it hath been the back-door and inlet of all superstition and corruption into the worship and doctrine of this church and the means of hastening us back again to Rome. For proof of this I appeal to all our knowledge in late years past; the memory whereof is so fresh, I need enter into no particulars.—One fruit of this government in the church hath been the displacing of the most godly and conscientious ministers; the vexing, punishing, and banishing out of the kingdom the most religious of all sorts and conditions that would not comply with their superstitious inventions and ceremonies. In one word; the turning the edge and power of their government against the very life and power of godliness; and the favour and protection of it unto all prophane, scandalous, and superstitious persons that would uphold their party. Thousands of examples might be given of this, if it were not most notorious.—Another fruit hath been schism and factions within ourselves, and alienation from all the reformed churches abroad. 3. The prodigious monster of the late canons, whereby they had designed the whole nation to a perpetual slavery and bondage to themselves and their superstitious inventions. These are the fruits of their government in the church.—Now let us consider these in the Civil State; as, 1. The countenancing all illegal projects and proceedings, by teaching in their pulpits, the lawfulness of an arbitrary power. 2. The overthrowing all process at common law, that reflected never so little on their courts. 3. The kindling a war between these two nations, and blowing up the flame as much as in them lay, by their counsels, canons, and subsidies they granted to that end. 4. The plots, practices, and combinations during this parliament; in all which they seem to have been interested more or less.—Thus have they not contented themselves with encroachments upon our Spiritual privileges, but have envied us our Civil freedom; desiring to make us grind in their mill, as the Philistines did Sampson, and to put out both our eyes: 'O let us be avenged of those Philistines for our two eyes!' If then the tree be to be known by its fruits, I hope you see, by this time, plainly the nature and quality of this tree.—In the last place, give me leave, for a close of all, to present to your consideration the mischiefs which the continuance of this government doth threaten us with; if, by the wisdom of this committee, they be not prevented. 1. The danger our religion must ever be in, so long as it is in the hands of such governors as can stand firmly in nothing more than its ruin; and whose affinity with the Pope's hierarchy makes them more confident of the Papists, than the professors of the Reformed religion, for their safety and subsistence. 2. The unhappy condition our civil state is in, whilst the bishops have votes in the house of lords; being there as so many obstructions, in our body politic, to all good and wholesome laws tending to salvation. 3. The improbability of settling any firm or durable peace so long as the cause of the war yet continues, and the bellows that blow up this flame. Lastly, and that which I will assure you goes nearest to my heart, is the check which we seem to give to Divine Providence, if we do not at this time pull down this government. For hath not this parliament been called, continued, preserved, and secured, by the immediate Finger of God, as it were for this work? Had we not ~~also~~ been swallowed up in many inevitable dangers, by the practices and designs of these men and their party? Hath not God left them to themselves, as well in these things, as in the evil administration of their government, that he might lay them open unto us; and lead us, as it were, by the hand, from the finding them to be the causes of our evil, to discern that their rooting up must be our only cure? Let us not then halt any longer between two opinions, but, with one heart and resolution, give glory to God, in complying with his Providence; for the good safety, and peace of his church and the state, which will be by passing this Bill we are now upon.'

Mr. Waller spoke against the bill as follows: * 'Mr. Hyde; there is no doubt but the sense of what this nation hath suffered from the present bishops, hath produced these complaints; and the apprehensions men have of suffering the like, in time to come, make so many desire the taking away of episcopacy: but I conceive it is possible that we may not, now, take a right measure of the minds of the people by their Petitions; for when they subscribed them, the bishops were armed with a dangerous commission of making new Canons, imposing new oaths, and the like; but now we have disarmed them of that power. These petitioners, lately, did look upon Episcopacy as a beast armed with horns and claws;

* This speech is not taken notice of by any of the Collectors of the times, nor is it printed amongst Mr. Waller's Works, although there are some of his speeches at the end of his Poems. The above is taken from an edition of the times, printed for Abel Roper, 1641. "Waller" says Burnet, "was the delight of the house: and even at 80 he said the liveliest things of any among them. He was only concerned to say that which should make him be applauded. But he never laid the business of the house to heart, being a vain and empty, though a witty man. He deserves the character of being one of the great refiners of our language in poetry. He was for near 60 years one of the best of our writers that way."

but now that we have cut and pared them, (and may, if we see cause, yet reduce it into narrower bounds) it may, perhaps, be more agreeable. Howsoever, if they be still in passion, it becomes us soberly to consider the right use and antiquity thereof; and not to comply further with a general desire; than may stand with a general good. We have already shewed, that episcopacy, and the evils thereof, are mingled like water and oil. We have also, in part, severed them. But I believe you will find, that our laws and the present government of the church are mingled like wine and water; so inseparable, that the abrogation of, at least, a hundred of our laws is desired in these Petitions. I have often heard a noble answer of the lords, commended in this house, to a proposition of like nature, but of less consequence; they gave no other reason of their refusal but this, 'Nolumus mutare leges Angliæ.' It was the bishops who so answered then; and it would become the dignity and wisdom of this house to answer the people, now, with a 'Nolumus mutare.'—I see some are moved with a number of hands against the bishops; which, I confess, rather inclines me to their defence: for I look upon episcopacy as a counterscarp, or outwork; which, if it be taken by this assault of the people, and, withall, this mystery once revealed, 'That we must deny them nothing when they ask it thus in troops.' We may, in the next place, have as hard a task to defend our property, as we have lately had to recover it from the prerogative. If by multiplying hands and petitions, they prevail for an equality in things ecclesiastical; the next demand, perhaps, may be lex Agraria, the like equality in things temporal. The Roman story tells us, that when the people began to flock about the senate, and were more curious to direct and know what was done, than to obey, that commonwealth soon came to ruin: their legem rogare grew quickly to be a legem ferre; and after, when their legions had found that they could make a dictator, they never suffered the senate to have a voice any more in such election. If these great innovations proceed, I shall expect a flat and level in learning too, as well as in church-preferments: honus alit artes. And though it be true, that grave and pious men do study for learning-sake, and embrace virtue for itself; yet it is as true, that youth, which is the season when learning is gotten, is not without ambition; nor will ever take pains to excel in any thing, when there is not some hope of excelling others in reward and dignity. There are two reasons chiefly alledged against our church-government. 1. Scripture, which, as some men think, points out another form. 2. The abuses of the present superiors. For Scripture, I will not dispute it in this place; but I am confident that, whenever an equal division of lands and goods shall be desired, there will be as many places in Scripture found out, which seem to favour that, as there are now alledged against the prelacy or preferment in the church. And, as for abuses, where you are now, in the Remonstrance, told, what this and that poor man hath suffered by the bishops, you may be presented with a thousand instances of poor men that have received hard measure from their landlords; and of worldly goods abused, to the injury of others, and disadvantage of the owners. And therefore, my humble-motion is, That we may settle men's minds herein, and, by a question, declare our Resolution 'To reform,' that is, 'not to abolish Episcopacy.'

The Journals inform us, that, upon Mr. Hyde's report from the grand committee, it was resolved, 'That the taking away the several offices of Archbishops, Bishops, Chancellors, and Commissaries, out of this church and kingdom, should be one clause in the aforementioned bill.'

The Lords vote the late Canons illegal. June 12. The votes of the house of commons concerning the new Canons, made at the Synod in 1640, were read in the house of lords; and their lordships voted the same verbatim, as they are in the proceedings of the other house on the 16th of December. See p. 679.

This day a bill 'For restoring in blood and honour sir Win. Wentworth, bart. and the rest of the children of the late earl of Strafford; and for settling the lands and tenements of the said late earl,' was read in the house of commons.

A Conference concerning disbanding the Army. June 14. A message being sent to the upper house from the commons, to desire a free conference about disbanding some regiments in the king's Army, the same was complied with; and the next day the earl of Bath reported it to the lords, to this effect: 'That the commons had taken into consideration the vast charge, that the kingdom laid under in maintaining the two armies: that they have used their utmost endeavours in providing money, for disbanding both of them: that necessity enforceth them to disband the king's army by parts as they shall be able to provide money, and the Scots army wholly and altogether. In disbanding the king's army, they will first disband those that lie in the more Southern parts: that they intend to disband five regiments; the regiment of Hull, and the earl of Nithsdale's company, in the regiment of sir Ch. Varasor; and so other regiments to march to give way, but not above 300 in a company.' Upon this report another conference was appointed on the same subject.

Debate on a Motion for abolishing of Deans, Chapters, &c. June 15. The commons went into a grand committee on the bill 'For the utter Abolishing of Bishops,' &c. when a motion being made for the taking away of Deans and Chapters out of the church of England,

Mr. William Thomas, member for Carnarvon, spoke as follows: 'Mr. Hyde; the office of

* From the original edition, printed by T. Harper, 1641.

Deans doth neither tend or conduce, as some have alledged, to the honour of God, the propagation of piety, the advancement of learning, or benefit of the commonwealth: but, & contra, they occasion the dishonour and disservice of God; the hinderance, if not destruction of piety; the suppression and discouragement of learning and learned men; and the detriment and prejudice of church and commonwealth.

1. I humbly crave leave to declare what deans were originally in their first birth. 2. What in their increase and further growth. 3. Their present condition, being at their full, and, as I hope, their final period.—As to their Original; it is not to be denied but themselves and their office are of great antiquity, St. Augustine declaring both; but I do not say that it is an ancient office in the church. What officers deans then were, be pleased to hear from St. Augustine's own delivery, in his book de Moribus Ecclesie Catholice. 'The monks, saith he, for their more retiredness and better contemplation, appointed officers, which they called, Decanos: the office of them, and why they were so called he delivereth in these words as near as I remember, Opus autem tradunt illis quos decanos vocant, eo quod sunt denis prepositi, ut neminem illorum cura sui corporis tangat, neque in cibo, neque in vestimento, neque si quid aliud vel quotidiana necessitate, vel mutata, ut assolet, valetudine; hi autem decani, magna sollicitudine, omnia disponentes & praeostantes quicquid illa vita, propter imbecillitatem corporis, postulet.'—Here we see the office of deans in St. Augustine's time; antiquity sufficient, but not antiquity for being officers in the church: therefore they do not rightly plead antiquity, as to the point now controverted, the question being, Whether the office, as now it is exercised, be the same that it was then? Surely they shall find it not only different, but in a manner quite contrary: They are deceived that urge it; but they are to know that this judicious house is able to discern and distinguish a counterfeit face of antiquity from the true: and in vain do they, with the Gibeonites, labour to deceive us by old sacks, old shoes, old garments, old boots, and old bread that is dry and mouldy; therefore to no purpose, and causelessly, do they charge us to affect novelty, by our offering to take away church-governors and government.—What these men, I mean deans, were originally, we see; and how they came to be presbyters, and ministers, and for what cause, I shall hereafter declare: but we may not think this charging of us as innovators strange, when Christ himself had his doctrine censured as new; 'What doctrine is this,' said the Jews, in St. Mark? We are not then to expect that we shall escape the like censure of innovating. 'The servant is not above his lord, nor the disciple above his master:' and indeed so St. Paul found it, for the Athenians made the same demand to him; 'May we,' say they, 'know what this new doctrine, whereof thou speakest, is?' Acts xvii. 19. But let us 'liberare animas nostras, conscientiae satisfaciamus, nihil infame laboremus; consentiamus in eo quod convenit, non in eo quod traditum.'—But, granting the name and office, we find them to be only caterers, or stewards, to provide food and raiment for the monks; whose garments as they were not costly, so was not their fare dainty, being but bread and water. To have the like employment now, I neither deny nor envy them.—Well now, let us see how they increased in authority, and came to be accounted officers of great dignity. Why, thus: when, for the austerity of their lives, and opinion of their sanctity, princes and others did bestow lands and revenues upon the monks; then their Præpositi, the deans, did partake of their honours and possessions; and then began the corruption and poisoning of them; 'Tunc venenum infunditum in decanos, religio peperit divitias, & filia devoravit matrem.' Answerable whereto is that of St. Hierom, 'Since holy church increased in possessions, it decreased in virtues.' The like hath St. Bernard, and many others.—Thus we see that the spring that was clear in the barren mountains, descending down to the richer vallies, becomes thick and muddy; and, at last, is swallowed up by the brinish ocean; 'Salsum perdulces imbibet æquor aquas.' But, to deliver it in the words of an honourable author: 'Time,' saith he, 'is most truly compared to a stream that conveyeth down fresh and pure water into the salt-sea of corruption, which invironeth all human actions; and therefore if a man shall not, by his industry, virtue, and policy, as it were with the oar, row against the stream and inclination of time, all institutions and ordinances be they never so pure, will corrupt and degenerate.' This we shall see verified in deans and their officers.—These deans being thus endowed with great possessions, it was ordained they should be chosen, out of the presbytery, to that place; 'Ne sit decanus nisi presbyter,' as I find in St. Bernard. Well, did they rest in this state and condition? No: they must be civil magistrates, chancellors, or keepers of the seal, lord treasurers, privy counsellors; and what have they not of lay offices, dignities and titles? I will not trouble you with enumeration of particular deans, I will only cite one, (though, if time permitted, I might cite 21) and that is the Dean of St. Paul's, who was made lord treasurer about 1197, and, carrying that office, quickly hoarded up a great treasure; at last, falling into a deadly disease past recovery, he was exhorted by the bishops and great men to receive the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, which he trembling at refused to do; but, upon the king's admonishing and commanding him to do it, he promised him thereupon to do it the next day: being advised also to make his will, he commanded all to void the room but one scribe; who beginning to write his will in the accustomed form, 'In the name of the Father, of the Son, &c.' the dean perceiving it, commanded him, in a rage, to blot it out, and

these words only to be written, 'I bequeath all my goods to my lord the king, my body to the grave, and my soul to the devil!' which being uttered, he gave up the ghost. The king hereupon commanded his carcase to be carried in a cart, and drowned in the river. Good God, what a change is this, from being humble servants to poor monks, to become proud prelates, peers to princes! 'Quantum mutati ab illis, nunc Cigni qui modo Corvi.' They now forsake their 'Templa paupertatis & templa pietatis, tanquam noxia Numina;' and only allow and make choice of 'Templa honoris & templa fortunæ.' They then took care for the poor monastery; but now poorly care for the ministry; and, to speak no less truly than plainly, they do either just nothing, or (what is worse) nothing that is just. But, not to trace them further, let us examine what their present office is, which we find so honoured and dignified.—In the constitutions of Henry 8. and Edw. 6. thus I read, 'Decani quoque, cum in clero amplam dignitatem & locum honoratum in ecclesia sortiantur, presbyteri sunt; viri graves, docti, & magna prudentia insignes, cathedrales ecclesias juxta illarum constitutiones regant; collegio, tam canonicorum quam clericorum ecclesie majoris, præsent, neque disciplinam labi sinant; provideantque, summa diligentia, ut in sua ecclesia sacri ritus, ordine ac justa ratione, peragantur; utque omni ordine & convenienti gravitate, ad fratrum utilitatem agantur; ut archidiaconi foris, sic illi domi (hoc est in ecclesia cathedrali & ejus canonicis & clericis) episcopo sint adiumento, quasi duo ejus membra utilissima & necessaria. Quare, nec decani abesse debent a sua ecclesia, sine maxima & urgentissima causa ab episcopo approbanda.'—Afterwards, in the 9th chapter, I read preaching to be part of their duty, 'Concionem habeat decanus, in ecclesia cathedrali, singulis diebus dominicis.' Thus their office is declared to be these particulars following: 1. To rule and order the church, and to look to the repair, and for the decoration thereof, as is also elsewhere enjoined. 2. To preserve discipline and holy rites. 3. To be adjuments, or assistants, to the bishops in cathedrals, as be the archdeacons abroad; part of which assistance is, as it seemeth, to preach for them; but the bishops will excuse them that service, as too painful; nay, forbid it, as too dangerous: yet, though they will not busy themselves in preaching, they have leisure to be inventive and operative in poor beggarly toys and trifles, which neither bring honour to God, nor good to the church and people. Their preaching and godly life did, antiently, win the people's hearts to love God, and them, as his ministers, whom they received as angels of God, ambassadors from Heaven.—Humility, piety, and industry, laid the foundation of all those magnificent structures, dignities, titles, places, revenues, and privileges wherewith the churchmen were antiently endowed; what hath, or is likely to waste and demolish them, is easy to conjecture: king James hath delivered it in these words, 'The natural sickness that hath ever troubled, and been the decay of all churches since the beginning of the world, hath been pride, ambition, and avarice; and these infirmities wrought the overthrow of the Popish church in this country and many others: but the reformation of religion in Scotland was extraordinarily wrought by God; though many things were inordinately done by such as blindly were doing the work of God.'—Thus far that wise and religious prince. But, lest I should forget a principal part of the office, Church Music, it shall have here the first place; the rather for that as I read the first coming in thereof was to usher in Antichrist; for I do find, in my reading, that, anno 666, (the year that was designed or computed for the coming of Antichrist) Vitalian, bishop of Rome, brought into the church singing of the service, the use of organs, &c. as we read in Platina, Baleus, and others, in the life of Vitalian, who therefore was called the Musical Pope; although, at that time there was greater occasion of sorrow, the Longobards having entered and wasted Italy; and therefore fasting and prayer had been more proper than music and melodious singing. Hereupon, saith my author, ignorance arose among the people, lulled, as it were, asleep by the confused noise of many voices. This carried a colour of advancing devotion, although it was no better, as the case then stood, than the altar erected to the unknown God, Acts xvii. Hereby the key of knowledge was hid, Luke xi. when the common people understood not what was sung, and the heat of zeal was quenched in men of understanding, whose ears were tickled, but hearts not touched; whilst, as St. Augustine complaineth of himself, most were more moved by the sweetness of the song, than by the sense of the matter which was sung unto them; working their bane, like the deadly touch of the asps, in a tickling delight; or as the soft touch of the hyena, which doth insatiate and lull asleep, and then devoureth.—If service in the Latin tongue, whereof the simplest people understood somewhat, was justly censured, certainly this manner of singing psalms and service, whereof the most learned can understand nothing, is to be condemned. I dislike not singing, though by music of organs or other instruments, but I wish that what is sung may be understood; and as Justinian the emperor commanded all bishops and priests to celebrate prayer with a loud and clear voice, non tacito modo, that the minds of the hearers might be stirred up with more devotion to express the praises of God; so wish I, that service and psalms may be so read and sung that they may be understood, and so edify the mind as well as please the ear.—Now I am to declare that this office of Deans doth neither tend to the honour of God, the propagation of piety, the advancement of learning, or benefit of the commonwealth; but to the contrary, as I have delivered, rather to the dishonour, &c.

Sir Brinj. Rudyard, member for Wilton, opposed the motion in the following Speech *
 'Mr. Hyde; We are now upon a very great business, so great indeed, as it requires our soundest our saddest consideration; our best judgment for the present, our utmost foresight for the future. But sir, one thing doth exceedingly trouble me, it turns me round about, it makes my whole reason vertiginous; which is, that so many do believe, against the wisdom of all ages, that now there can be no Reformation without Destruction; as if every sick body must be presently knocked on the head, as past hope of cure.—Religion was first and best planted in cities; God did spread his net where most might be caught. Cities had bishops and presbyters: presbyters were the seminaries, out of which were sent labourers by the bishops, to propagate and cultivate the gospel. The clergy then lived, wholly, upon the free-will offerings and bounty of the people. afterwards, when kings and states grew to be christians, the outward settlement of the church grew up with them: they erected bishopricks, founded cathedral churches, endowed them with large possessions: landlords built parish-Churches, gleaved them with some portion of land, for which they have still a right of presentation. I do confess that some of our bishops have had ambitious, dangerous aims, and have so still; that, in their government, there are very great enormities: but I am not of their opinion who believe, that there is an innate ill quality in Episcopacy, like a specifical property, which is a refuge, not a reason. I hope there is no original sin in episcopacy; and though there were, yet may the calling be as well reformed as the person regenerated. Bishops have governed the church for 1500 years, without interruption; and no man will say, but that God hath saved souls in all those times under their government. Let them be reduced, according to the usage of antient churches in the best times; so restrained that they may not be able, hereafter, to shame the calling. I love not those that hate to be reformed; and do, therefore, think them worthy of the more strict, the more close reformation; there is maintenance already provided for them. If either in bishopricks, or cathedral churches, there be too much, some may be pared off, to relieve them that have too little: if yet more may be spared, it may be employed to the setting up of a preaching ministry through the whole kingdom. And, until this be done, although we are Christians, yet are we not a Christian state. There are some such places in England as are not in Christendom, the people are so ignorant; they live so without God in the world; for which parliaments are to answer both to God and man. Let us look to it, for it lies, like one of the burdens of the prophet Isaiah, heavy and flat upon parliaments.—I have often seriously considered with myself, what strong concurrent motives and causes did meet together in that time, when abbies and monasteries were overthrown. Certainly God's hand was the greatest, for he was most offended. The prophane superstitions, the abominable idolatries, the filthy nefandous wickedness of their lives, did stink in God's nostrils, did call down for vengeance, for reformation. A good party of religious men were zealous instruments in that great work; as likewise many covetous, ambitious persons, gaping for fat morsels, did lustily drive it on.—But, Mr. Hyde, there was a principal parliamentary motive, which did facilitate the rest: for it was propounded in parliament, that the accession of abbey-lands would so enrich the crown, as the people should never be put to pay subsidies again. This was plausible to both court and country: besides, with the overplus, there should be maintained a standing army of 40,000 men, for a perpetual defence of the kingdom. This was safety at home, terror and honour abroad. The parliament would make all sure. God's part, religion, hath, by his blessing, been reasonably well preserved; but it hath been saved as by fire: for the rest is consumed and vanished. The people have paid subsidies ever since, and we are, now, in no very good case to pay an army. Let us beware, Mr. Hyde, that we do not look with a worldly, carnal, evil eye upon church-lands: let us clear our sight, search our hearts, that we may have unmixed and sincere ends, without the least thought of saving our own purses. Church-lands will still be fittest to maintain church-men, by a proportionable and orderly distribution. We are very strict and curious to uphold our own property; and there is great reason for it: are the clergy, only, a sort of men who have no property at all in that which is called theirs? I am sure they are Englishmen, they are subjects. If we pull down bishopricks, and pull down cathedral churches, in a short time we must be forced to pull down colleges too; for scholars will live and die there as in cells, if there be not considerable preferment to invite them abroad: and the example we are making now, will be an easy temptation to the less-pressing necessities of future times.—This is the next way to bring in barbarism, to make the clergy an unlearned contemptible vocation, not to be desired but by the basest of the people; and then where shall we find men able to convince an adversary? A clergyman ought to have a far greater proportion to live upon, than any other man of an equal condition. He is not bred to multiply three-pences; it becomes him not to live mechanically and sordidly; he must be given to hospitality. I do know myself a clergyman, no dignitary, whose books have cost him 1000*l.* which, when he dies, may be worth to his wife and children, about 200*l.* It will be a shameful reproach to so flourishing a kingdom as this, to have a poor beggarly clergy. For my part, I think nothing too much, nothing too good, for a good minister, a good clergyman. They ought least to want, who best know how to abound. Burning and shining lights do well deserve to be set in good candlesticks. Mr. Hyde, I am as much for reformation, for purging and maintaining religion, as any man whatsoever: but, I profess, I am not for innovation, demolition, nor abolition.

Mr. Pury, member for Gloucester, spoke thus in support of the motion * :—‘Mr. Hyde; There are some reasons stick with me, whereby I do conceive, that the deans and chapters have been, and are, part of the government of the church of England: and that the preamble and body of this bill, therein may very well stand together: for, if you take the deans and chapters in their original, who were first founded in superstition, like to your regular and secular monks; or if you consider them, as in their prime institution, to be Consilium Episcopii, to assist bishops in their government and discipline; or if you look upon those deans and chapters, of the last foundation by Henry 8. yet, certainly, they are, in all these capacities, a part of the government of the church of England; and as well the rural, as the cathedral deans are numbered by our own writers among church governors; and they are, in and among themselves, a part of the church government; and, by the Book of Reformation of Ecclesiastical laws, they are to govern themselves according to their statutes of foundation; and to keep them pure and entire, so far as they are not repugnant to the Word of God, and our constitutions of religion.—Now, for the better satisfaction of this committee and myself, here is a copy of the statutes, grant, and foundation of the dean and chapter of the city of Gloucester. I have read them over, and do find, 1. The end wherefore the lands and possessions were granted unto them; 2. The manner and form of government of themselves; and, lastly, Their several oaths to keep all the statutes prescribed unto them: And, because of my weak memory, please you to give me leave to read the words in the king’s grant, Englished thus: ‘We have erected and constituted cathedrals and colleges in the place of monasteries; to the end, that where ignorance and superstition did reign, there the sincere worship of God should flourish, and the holy Gospel of Christ Jesus should be daily and purely preached. And further, that the increase of the Christian faith and piety, the instruction of youth in good learning, and the sustentation of the poor, should be for ever there kept, maintained, and continued; and the said dean, prebendaries, canons, and all other persons belonging to the said cathedrals and colleges, are to be governed and ruled according to the statutes prescribed unto them.”—Sir, the statutes are many; I will, in brief, tell you the substance of some few of them: The said dean, prebendaries, and canons, are always to reside and dwell in the houses of the said cathedrals; and there to keep a family, good hospitality, to feed the poor, and to distribute alms unto the needy; to be careful to preach the Word of God, ‘in season and out of season;’ and to sow the seed of the Word of God abroad, but especially in the said cathedral church; and to have youth profitably taught there: and to the end that they may all serve God, as well at meals as in the church, they are to have a common table in the common hall of the said cathedral, where the said canons, scholars, choiristers, and under officers, are appointed to eat together: The said dean and chapter are also to give yearly 20*l.* to the poor, besides their own poor alms-men; and 20*l.* more, yearly, towards the repairing of bridges and highways thereabouts.—Sir, for the performance of the said statutes and premises, the said dean, prebendaries, canons, and ministers of the said cathedral do, or ought, respectively to take an oath; and thereby, in express words, do call God to witness, and do swear upon the Holy Evangelists, to rule, govern, and behave themselves well and faithfully in the said church, according to the will and statutes of the founder; and every one of them doth swear, that he will, to his utmost power, well and faithfully keep all and singular the said ordinances and statutes, as much as concerns himself; and will procure all others, as much as concerns them, to keep the same inviolably, ‘So help him God, and these Holy Gospels of God!’—Mr. Hyde, you see wherefore the lands were granted unto deans and chapters: what their statutes are, and their oaths to keep them. It might be thought that these men do know some way, another or nearer way, to Heaven than they teach us; or otherwise that they would not sit in the seat of perjury, as it may seem they do, without remorse of conscience: for it is notoriously known to the city of Gloucester, and country thereabouts, that not one of the said statutes, before-mentioned, are, or ever were, during my remembrance, kept; or the matters, contained in any of them, performed by any of the deans or prebendaries of the said cathedral. They come indeed, once a year, to receive the rents and profits of the said lands; but do not distribute unto the poor and needy their portion; neglecting altogether the mending of the highways and bridges, and do not keep any common table at all, and instead of preaching the Word of God themselves, ‘in season and out of season;’ they are, and have been the chief instruments to hinder the same in others.—Infinite are the pressures that many cities, near unto deans and chapters, have endured by them and their procurement. And whereas it was objected by a learned gentleman of the long robe, That the deans and chapters are a body corporate;

and that they have as much right unto their ay possessions as any other body politic, or any city or town corporate: I am of his opinion, or such lands and possessions (if they have any) which they bought themselves in right of their corporation; or for such lands as were given them for their own use: And I am well contented that such lands should be left unto them: But their case is far different, in my opinion; for I have shewed you before to what godly, pious and charitable uses the said lands and possessions were granted unto them: and, suitable thereunto, you may call to mind the Londoners Case, about Londonderry, in the Star-Chamber; where they were fined 70,000*l.*
 to his majesty, and the same was afterwards treated unto his majesty's Exchequer; but,
 upon the writ of extent issuing out thereupon, his majesty, as I have heard, received no benefit of any such lands, whereof the corporation was seized for the maintenance of any hospitals, bridges, or other charitable uses; nor ought to have done, as I conceive.—Seeing therefore the said deans and chapters are but Trustees, and the profits of the said lands so ill employed by them, contrary to the trust reposed in them, I am clear of opinion, that, by a legislative power in parliament, it is fit to take them away; and put them into the hands of feelees, to be disposed of to such pious, religious and charitable uses, as they were first intended.
 But it was said by a worthy knight, 'That he should be unwilling to take away their lands and possessions, until he first knew how they should be disposed of; and how the persons, who were many thousands in this kingdom, as he said, that would want bread, should be provided for.' Certainly, Mr. Hyde, although that is not the work at this time, yet I account it no difficulty to satisfy that worthy knight;
 for I find, upon the survey of the lands of the said deanry of Gloucester, that it hath above 12 rectories of good value, and about 30 vicar-ages, pensions, and portions of tythes; which being, at the first, Deo consecrata, most fit they should be still employed for the maintenance of the Gospel; and therefore if the dean and prebendaries, being but 7 in all to be now taken away, will be preaching ministers, there is, I hope, sufficient maintenance for so many of them as have not too much besides; and yet to reserve as large a salary, as now they have, for so many singing men there, not in holy orders, who cannot preach. Then there are left to be provided for, only the organist, 8 singing boys, 2 school masters, 4 poor alms men, and some under officers; whose yearly wages come unto about 100*l.* per annum. The said dean and chapter have also almost the third part of the houses of the city of Gloucester, the old part of them being, yearly, about 175*l.* which will well defray that charge, with a sufficient surplussage for repairing the highways and bridges, and 30*l.* yearly to the poor, as aforesaid.—Over and besides the said yearly revenues beforementioned, the dean and chapter of Gloucester, although but of the last foundation, and one of the least revenues in this kingdom, have 18 goodly manors, and also divers other lands, tenements, and hereditaments; besides the manors, houses, and premisses, the old rent of assize of one of the said manors being 30*l.*

 per annum. Out of these manors and lands, the said cathedral being to be made a parochial church, 200*l.* per annum, or more, may be allowed for a learned preaching minister there; and 100*l.* a year a-piece for two such others to assist him; all which stipends, within few years, some of the said manors will discharge, and also sufficiently repair the said cathedral church; and then the rest of the said manors and lands may be employed, to other godly, pious, or charitable uses, as the wisdom of the king and parliament shall think fit.
 Suitable to this, but in a more ample proportion of maintenance, will be the allowances of all other deanries in England.—Again, this,
 I conceive, will answer another objection, raised by a worthy knight at the bar, touching the poverty of the clergy of England. If this bill should take effect, surely my opinion is quite contrary; and, to that purpose, I call to mind the saying of a learned divine, chaplain to a nobleman, upon some conference with him of our wished desire to remove scandalous ministers, and to reduce the impropriations of bishops, and deans and chapters, to a preaching ministry: 'If these things,' said he, 'take effect, the universities will not be able to supply the churches.' And surely, sir, if these things take effect, I am confident we shall be so far from having a poor beggarly clergy, as that no kingdom in the Christian world will have a more rich and flourishing clergy; both for nurseries and encouragements of learning, and for their maintenance in a more plentiful manner than it is at this present. Please you to put the question, I am ready to give my aid thereunto.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr.
 Hyde reported from the committee the following Resolutions which were agreed to by the house:
 "Resolved, by the commons, 'That all Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, Prebendaries, Chanters, Canons and Petty Canons, and their Officers, shall be utterly abolished and taken away out of the church; that all the lauds, taken by this bill from Deans and Chapters, shall be employed to the advancement of learning and piety; provision being had and made, that his majesty be no loser in his rents, first-fruits, and other duties; and that a competent maintenance shall be made to the several persons concerned, if such persons appear not peccant and delinquents to this house."

On the 31st, another debate took place in the house of commons, on the bill 'For abolishing Bishops, &c.' To avoid prolixity, we shall conclude our account of this debate in the words of lord Clarendon, who was the constant chairman of this committee. "When every body expected that nothing should be mentioned in the house, but the dispatch of the Treaty of the Pacification, by the commissioners of both sides; which was the only obstruction to the discharge of the Armies, and which could be done in two days, if they pursued it; they called in a morning (May 27,) for the bill, that had so long before been brought in by sir Edward Dering, 'For the Extirpation of Episcopacy,' and gave it a second reading; and resolved, 'That it should be committed to a committee of the whole house, and that it should be proceeded upon the next morning.' It was a very long debate the next morning, after the Speaker had left the chair, who should be in the chair for the committee; they who wished well to the bill having resolved to put Mr. Hyde into the chair, that he might not give them trouble by frequent speaking, and so too much obstruct the expediting the bill; they who were against the bill, pressed and cried loud to Mr. Crew to be in the chair: but, in conclusion, Mr. Hyde was commanded to the chair; they who were enemies to the bill being divided in opinion, many believing that he would obstruct the bill more in that place, than if he remained at liberty; and they found it to be true. The first day the committee sat full 7 hours, and determined, 'That every day, as soon as the house was resumed, the chairman should report the several votes of that day to the house, which should determine them before it rose;' which was without any precedent, and very prejudicial to the grave transaction of the business: for, besides that it was a prejudging the house in its judgment, who, upon report of the committee, should have regard to the whole bill in the amendments made by them, which they were precluded from, by having confirmed the several days votes; it was so late every day before the house was resumed, (the Speaker commonly leaving the chair about 9 o'clock, and never resuming it till 4 in the afternoon) that it was very thin: they only who prosecuted the bill with impatience, remaining in the house; and the others who abhorred it, growing weary of so tiresome an attendance, left the house at dinner-time, and afterwards followed their pleasures: so that the lord Falkland was wont to say, 'That they who hated bishops, hated them worse than the Devil; and that they who loved them, did not love them so well as their dinner.'—However, the chairman gave some stop to their haste; for, besides that at the end of his report every day to the house, before the house put the question for the concurrence in the votes, he always enlarged himself against every one of them, and so spent them much time; when they were in the heat and passion of the debate, they oftentimes were entangled in their questions; so that when he reported to the house the work of the day, he did frequently report 2 or 3 votes directly contrary to each other; which, in the heat of their debate, they had, unawares, run into. And after near 20 days spent in that manner, they found themselves very little advanced towards a conclusion, and that they must review all that they had done; and the king being resolved to begin his Journey for Scotland, they were forced to discontinue their beloved bill, and let it rest; sir Arthur Haslerig declaring in the house, 'That he would never hereafter put an enemy into the chair;' nor had they ever after the courage to resume the consideration of the bill till after the war was entered into."

Further Proceedings relating to the Plot.

The house of commons now began to search into and unravel the late Plot, which they had neglected for some time: but some information having been given them of a letter sent to the earl of Northumberland from his brother, Henry Percy, esq. one of the knights for that county, wherein were some expressions of his towards making a further discovery, the house dispatched two of their members, Mr. Hollis and Mr. Hampden, to the earl, for further information about it. These gentlemen being returned, reported to the house, "That they had waited on the earl, and informed him, that the house desired to know if he had received any letter, or relation, from his brother: that they found him much troubled, conceiving that there were more doubts and jealousies raised. He said he had received no such letter, or relation; but owned to one from his brother, of his own hand-writing, in which there was something concerning a discovery. In this letter, he said, there was also somewhat of private business between him and his brother, which was the occasion of his keeping the letter; but, if the house pleased, he was willing to give them a copy of so much of it as concerns that business, which any member might compare with the original. At present, he said, his brother acknowledged the taking of an oath of secrecy: that the company concerned had tied themselves by that oath, and were resolved to assist the king, if it was denied by parliament, to maintain bishops in their votes and functions; also, the Irish army not to be disbanded till the Scots was; and to keep up the king's Revenue." The house then ordered the aforesaid gentlemen to go again to the earl, and desire a copy of so much of the letter as concerns this business.*

The next day Mr. Hollis acquainted the house, that they had waited upon the earl, then lord admiral, for a transcript from the letter, and the same was read in the house; in which was much that concerned 3 members of their body, viz. commissary Wilmot, member for Taworth, col. Ashburnham, member for Luggershall, and col. Pollard, member for Boralston. On which the two first were ordered to withdraw, and col. Pollard was examined, on interrogatories, on the spot, and afterwards the others; when it was resolved, upon the question, "That they should all 3 be committed prisoners, upon suspicion of High Treason, viz. col. Wilmot, to the Tower; col. Ashburnham, to the Gatehouse; and col. Pol-lard, to the King's-Bench."

In the afternoon of this day the two houses had another conference, in which the earl of Bristol proposed to the commons, "That a total disbanding of the armies should be made, if they were provided for it at present; and the lords would be ready to give them all possible assistance for perfecting that great work: that if the commons would make out an estimate of what would be wanting for it, the peers would join with them most readily: for, until such time that a total disbanding and disarm- ing be resolved on and declared, it was much to be doubted that there would be greater difficulty in raising money and getting credit; and therefore it was desired to employ all their joint endeavours for a total disbanding of the armies. If there be not a possibility presently to disband all the 5 regiments, it was held fit to be proposed to the Scots, that they, at the same time, at least, retire from the Tees homeward, and ship their field ordnance at Newcastle; and that the English likewise cause their ordnance to retire with the Train of Artillery." In consequence of which, 'the commons went upon ways and means to effect this necessary work, and to raise money for payment of the armies; and a committee was appointed for that purpose.

State of the Debt due to the English and Scots Armies.] June 17. Sir John Hotham, member for Beverley, reported the State and Substance of the then National Debt, on the Army's Account, to be as follows:

"The Parliament undertook to pay the Army and Garrisons upon 10th Nov. last, which, to 29th June, is 8 mon. and 7 days £.412,050

After the reading of this Account of the Public Debt, the house of commons ordered, "That all the Merchant-adventurers in town should have notice to attend the committee for raising money, in order to borrow so much of them as would serve the present occasions, at 10 per cent. interest." Another conference was also desired with the lords, and a free debate concerning the disbanding of the armies.

Act of Tonnage and Poundage passed by the Commons.] The Bill 'For granting to the king a Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage, and other sums payable upon merchandize imported or exported,' was read a third time, passed, and ordered to the lords.

Proposal for a Poll-Tax to pay the Armies.]

June 18. Sir John Hotham made another Report, from the committee for advancing Money, "That the proposition for making Spanish money current was wholly rejected. Likewise, that it was proposed from the committee, that every

and with this to have presented to your sacred majesty the triumphant palm of tranquillity in all your kingdoms: but, as a ship floating upon a rough sea, we have been cast upon the rocks of fear and dangers, and tossed on the billows of distraction and distrust of church and commonwealth; where we yet remain, hopeless ever to pass through that narrow channel which leads to the haven of peace, unless we be speedily steered on by the hand of your sacred wisdom, care, and providence. In the midst of all these troubles, and the several opinions which have been amongst us, no division had power to distract any one of us from the care and duty we owe to your sacred person. And, to that end, am I now sent by the commons of England, to present this as a mark only, whereby your sacred majesty may view the inward duties of our hearts; until time and opportunity will give leave for a further expression of our duties and affections. The acceptance of this gift will glad the hearts of your people, and your approbation (by the royal assent to this bill, being the largest for the measure which was ever given) will join wings to our desires and hopes; which shall never return without that olive leaf which may declare that the waters are abated, and that your sacred majesty may have full assurance of the faith and loyalty of your subjects."

The King's Answer.] The King's Answer was as follows:

"I do very willingly accept of your offer made at this time, as a testimony of your love and that dutiful affection you owe me; and I no way doubt but that you will perform what you have intimated unto me, in perfecting the other bills when you have leisure. Likewise, in passing this bill, you cannot but see a great testimony of the trust and confidence I have in your affections; as, since this parliament begun I have omitted no occasion, whereby I may shew such affection to my people, as I desire my people should shew to me; and not only so, but likewise in eschewing all occasions of dispute, in seeking to remove jealousies; and for this particular bill, you cannot but know that I do freely and frankly give over that right, which my predecessors have esteemed their own, though I confess disputed, yet so as it was never yielded by any one of them: therefore, you must understand this as a mark of my confidence in you, thus to put myself wholly upon the love and affections of my people for my subsistence; and therefore, I hope, in the perfecting this you have begun, you will go on the more cheerfully. And as for those rumours, which have bred suspicions concerning the Army, though I have heard some loose discourses touching it, which I never understood otherwise than as having relation to the Scots Army, or preventing of insurrections; yet they were so slight of themselves, that they vanished, by their own lightness, within few days after they were born. Wherefore, having shewed you my clearness in this, I will leave you with this assurance, that I never had other design, but to win the affections of my people by the justice of my government."

Ten Propositions of the Commons relating to the State of the Kingdom.] June 23. A paper of Instructions, given by the earl of Montrose, the lord Napier, and the lords of Keir and Blackhall, having been read in the house of commons, that body came to several Resolutions concerning the Security of Scotland. A committee of seven were appointed to withdraw immediately into the court of wards, to prepare heads for a conference with the lords about that, and other business of the nation.

June 24. The heads for a conference being read in the house by Mr. Pym, and agreed to, a message was sent up to the lords by sir John Hotham, to desire one immediately. The report of this conference was made in the upper house, that day, by the bishop of Lincoln, to this purpose: "Mr. Pym told their lordships, that he was commanded by the house of commons to present unto them their continued care and endeavour for the good of the kingdom; that as their affections were united with them to one great end, to serve God, the king, and the commonwealth, so their counsels might jointly co-operate thereunto: that there was but one end, and one foundation of all these affections and counsels, howbeit they spread themselves into many and several branches; for they were all so united and weaved with the duties which we owe to our God, our king, and our commonwealth, that we cannot duly and truly serve God, but thereby we serve our king; nor serve God and our king as we ought, without our service to the commonwealth: but, as a way to this common and general end, he was to make unto their lordships several Propositions. Because they had lately found out very malignant and pestiferous designs, set on foot, or plotted, to trouble the peace of the kingdom; the which, though they were prevented, yet were still pursued; which was the reason the house of commons did present unto their lordships these Propositions, in ten several heads, which have their branches and subdivisions made under them:

PROPOSITIONS

"Concerning Disbanding of the Armies.

I. "This in the first front, because it was first to be done and make way for all the rest; and this had 4 several branches. 1. The house of commons desired the 5 regiments to be disbanded, according to a former order agreed upon by both houses. 2. The commissioners for the Scots to be desired to withdraw some of their troops from the Teese. 3. That their lordships would join with the house of commons in an humble motion to his majesty, to declare the 5 regiments to be disbanded, and the rest of the army as soon as money can be provided; and for the punishment of those who shall refuse to disband, if any such there be. 4. That the lord general should be intreated forthwith to repair to the army, on the 30th inst. at the farthest; at which time the money would be there. And that the lord Newport, master of the ordnance, be also there, to take care of that and all other things under his charge."

II. "That his majesty would be pleased to allow a convenient time, before his journey into Scotland, that the army might be first disbanded; and that some of the important affairs, now depending in parliament, may be dispatched before his majesty's journey. This Proposition he backed with these 4 reasons:

1. The safety of his majesty's person. 2. The removing of the jealousy of his good subjects. 3. The cutting off the hopes of those who are ill-affected, and have any design of disturbing the peace of the kingdom, by means of the army. 4. The great advantage in his majesty's own affairs, and contentment of his people, if, before his going, the royal assent might pass to divers bills, concerning the reformation of the church and state, (of which some are already sent up, others in preparation) with the bill intended for the further grant of Tonnage and Poundage, and other customs: and that some time might be employed to regulate the king's estate and revenue; to free them of unnecessary burdens, and to employ them for the good of the commonwealth. All these, he said, required his presence in parliament."

"Concerning his Majesty's Council and Ministers of State.

III. "That his majesty may be humbly petitioned to remove such evil counsellors, against whom there may be any just exceptions; and for the committing of his own business and the affairs of the kingdom to such counsellors and officers as the parliament may have cause to confide in: because all the ill effects we feel are produced by these ill counsels, in all the 3 fundamentals before spoken of. 1. In matter of religion. 2. In the king's private estate. 3. In the good of the whole kingdom: all these 3, he said, were decayed; but those of another kind and allay had much prospered, of late, amongst us; as matters of Monopolies, of Projects, and new Inventions.—Here he told your lordships a tale of a gardiner, who being demanded, why the weeds grew so fast and the flowers so thin in his ground-plot? answered, the weeds were the true children, but the flowers were but so many slips and bastards. So, said he, it is written, 'That kings shall be our nursing fathers, and queens our nursing mothers:' but we have found here, of late, by reason of evil counsellors, no nurses but hirelings of the publick state. These, therefore, are especially to be removed, for the reducing the kingdom to a better condition and posture. Howbeit, this request is by the house of commons recommended but in general, for this present, without pointing out or designing of particulars, in hopes the king will find them out of himself; otherwise it will cause the house of commons to reduce this petition to names of particulars.—Therefore they desired your lordships to commend it to his majesty, That he would put the offices of the kingdom and his own into such hands, as his maj. and the parliament may confide in."

"Concerning the Queen's Majesty in several Branches.

IV. "That his majesty would be graciously pleased, by advice of his parliament, to persuade the queen to take some of the nobility and others in trust into her service, in such places as are now in her disposal; because she has shewed herself ready to do any thing for the common good of the kingdom. Of this kind are, 1. That no Jesuit be entertained in her majesty's service, nor any Priest, native of his majesty's dominions. The reason of this is, that the Jesuits are banished out of all other courts of Catholic princes; and it is against our laws that native Priests should be here. 2. That the college of Capuchins, at Denmark-house, may be dissolved, and the persons sent out of the kingdom. The reasons of which are, 1. Their being here is a scandal to religion and a danger to our peace. 2. Disaffection to the state, manifested in a letter, dated May 6th, in which many scandals are cast upon the parliament and the good subjects, under the name of Puritans, or disaffected and injurious to the queen's person; and that upon the cardinal excited to some degree against England. Next the letter of Francis Philips, wherein, by way of reproach on the parliament, he writes, 'That the Protestants taken by both houses, is like the Scots covenant, but something worse.' And that divers informations had been given of great quantities of gold transported by these priests. The branch concerning the queen, was upon the special occasion of his majesty's absence, that your lordships would join with the house of commons to advise the king, that some of the nobility and others of quality, with a competent guard, might be appointed to attend the queen; for the security of her royal person against all designs of the Papists, and other ill-affected to the peace of the kingdom. The reasons given for this branch, were, 1. To cure her from Popish attempts. 2. By the watchfulness of those worthy persons, Papists and Jesuits may be kept from court. He protested, that therein he intended nothing disrespectful: he said it was a blessed thing to be kept from temptation; and, to be near these flies, would gain the queen the love of the people in the king's absence."

"Concerning the Prince and the rest of the Royal Issue.

V. "That some person of public trust, well-affected to religion, may, by consent of parliament, be placed about the prince, who may take care of his education, especially in matters of religion; and that the like of may be taken of the rest. of his majesty's children."

"On Papists coming to Court.

VI. "1. It is humbly desired that your lordships would join with them in a petition, that his majesty would be sparing in licensing Papists to come to court. 2. That if they do come, without licence, they may be punished severely, and the laws be put in execution against them. 3. That if any English woman, that is a Papist, be about the court, she may not reside there. 4. That no pension be given to any living beyond seas, which is of dangerous consequence. 5. That English ladies, Papists, be removed from court; and the king moved for his assent, that the persons of the most active Papists be restrained, as shall be necessary for the safety of the kingdom, be they lords or others."

"Concerning the Nuncios.

VII. "That it may be declared, by an act of parliament, that if any man shall presume to come to this kingdom, with instructions from the Pope or the court of Rome, that he shall be in the case of High Treason, and out of the protection of the king and the laws."

"Concerning the Security and Peace of the Kingdom.

VIII. "1. That men of honour and trust be placed lord lieutenants in every county; and that direction be given to these lieutenants, to be careful in the choice of their deputies. 2. That the Trained Bands be furnished with arms, powder, and bullet; and that they be exercised and made ready for service. Also that an oath be prepared to ass both houses of parliament, to be taken by the lord lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, and other officers of Trained Bands, to secure their fidelity in these dangerous times. 3. That the Cinque Ports, and other ports of the kingdom may be put into good hands; and a list of those who govern them now may be presented to parliament, and those persons altered upon reason; and that special care be taken for reparation and provision of the forts. 4. That the lord admiral* (that noble lord, in whose honour the house of commons stands secure) be desired to inform the parliament in what case the Navy is; that if there be any defect, it may be provided for out of the money which is to come upon the bill of Tonnage and Poundage; and that if any suspected person have any command in any of his majesty's ships, he may be removed."

IX. "That his majesty would be pleased to give direction to his learned counsel to draw general Pardon, in such a large and beneficial manner, as may be for the security of his subjects."

X. "A select committee of the lords to join with a proportionable number of the commons, from time to time, to confer about these particular courses, as shall be most effectual for reducing of these Propositions to effect the public good."

Orders relating to disbanding the Armies.]

June 25. A committee of ten lords were sent to the king, to desire that his majesty would declare the disbanding of the five Regiments, &c. according to the tenor of the first of these Propositions; and this day the king's Answer was reported back to the house, "That his majesty gave way to their lordships desires, and to the advice of both houses of parliament; but wished them to take such care therein, that the disbanding be both honourable and safe;" adding, "That the Pope's nuncio should be presently sent out of the kingdom."

The Answer which the Scots Commissioners made to the request of both houses, about causing their army to retire from the river Teese, at the same time the English regiments were disbanding, was also reported to the lords: "That they would presently dispatch a messenger to their general, and they are confident that he will do accordingly, when he understands it: also that they agreed to a cessation of arms for 14 days longer; and, lastly, they desired that the Resolutions and votes of the house of commons, concerning an act of parliament of public faith, relating to the security of the money due to them, called 'Brotherly Assistance,' which was 220,000*l.* might pass with the consent of both houses."

The earl of Holland, lord general of the English army, reported to the house, "That, notwithstanding the king had given his consent for the disbanding the 5 Regiments, he was of opinion the army could not well be disarmed, without some power to punish such as should mutiny, or refuse to be disbanded; therefore desired the house to take this into consideration." On this a Mutiny-Act, to punish such as should be refractory, was agreed to be proposed to the commons, which was only to serve the present purpose, and die with it: but the commons thought it better to desire the general to execute martial law on such persons; who answered, "That he would go down immediately, and take all the precautions possible; and though the disbanding armies might be irksome to some who delight in action, yet, for his part, he had rather see those armies turn their backs one to another than their faces, for the quiet of the kingdom."

June 26. Notwithstanding these precautions, the house of commons seemed to be uneasy about the disbanding of these forces; for this day it was resolved, "That this house holds it fit the lords be moved to desire his majesty, that a Proclamation may presently go down, to declare, That those that should disobey the lord general, or their officers, in disbanding the Army, shall be punished severely, as in contempt of the king and parliament." Likewise it was resolved, "That a command shall be given to the high sheriff of every county, the lord lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, and the justices of peace, to give aid and assistance to the safe conduct of such soldiers as shall pass through their several counties, till they come to their own homes." Both these articles were agreed to by the king, and orders given accordingly.

The same day the lords debated the ten Propositions sent from the commons; and when they had proceeded to the 4th Article, concerning the queen, it was ordered, "That this head and branches should be laid aside, for the present, till the articles made at the marriage be seen." The rest of them were all agreed to, except some few branches, which were left to be treated of by the committee; and seven lords were appointed for that purpose, according to the tenor of the tenth Article.

The Parliament desire the King to defer his Journey into Scotland.] The lords, at the request of the commons, having sent a deputation of their house to wait upon his majesty, to acquaint him with the humble desires of both houses, that he would be pleased to defer his intended Journey into Scotland, for a time, till the great affairs of the kingdom, now in agitation in parliament, be dispatched, the earl of Warwick reported this Answer, "That his majesty had engaged himself, by proclamation published in Scotland, to be there, in parliament, at a certain day; but he would this day speak with the commissioners of Scotland, and then would give further answer to both houses."

—On the 28th, The earl of Bristol acquainted the lords, that the king had commanded him to let them know, "That he had spoken with the Scots commissioners, touching the deferring of his Journey into Scotland for a little time; and that the commissioners said, That when this motion came to them from parliament, so as it might appear that the deferring came not from the king, but from the desire of both houses to accommodate the affairs of this kingdom, they will give such an answer as shall be fitting." Hereupon the lords agreed to desire a conference with the other house, to consider of what shall be propounded to the Scots commissioners, that it may be given them in writing, and they to be desired to return their Answer in the same manner.

The Proceedings against the Archbishop of Canterbury revived.] June 28. A message was sent up from the commons, by Mr. Pym, who was commanded to let their lordships know, "That formerly they brought up an Impeachment of High Treason against the archbishop of Canterbury, which hath been asleep ever since; but now they intend to proceed and examine divers witnesses concerning that business; therefore he desired their lordships to appoint a select committee to examine such as the house of commons shall produce; and that to be in the presence of such of their own members as the house shall appoint. In all things else as in the case of the earl of Strafford." All which were agreed to by the lords.

Declaration of the English to the Scots Commissioners, in relation to the King's Journey.]

June 29. The affair of the King's Journey into Scotland came again before the lords, when the earl of Bristol reported to the house, "That the English commissioners had met with those for Scotland, and had delivered to them the Paper concerning the time of the King's Journey, which was read in these words:

"His majesty hath commanded us to let you know, that whereas he hath been petitioned by both houses of parliament, for some stay of his Journey into Scotland, until the armies are disbanded, and that divers other things, for the peace and good of this kingdom, be settled; and whereas his maj. doth acknowledge himself engaged, by his promise, by his letters, and likewise by his proclamation, declaring his resolution to be present at the holding of a parliament in Scotland, at the day limited by proclamation; his maj. being desirous to give satisfaction to the parliaments of both kingdoms, hath commanded us to declare unto you the desire of the parliament of England, and to treat with you how his going may be best fitted and accommodated to the conveniency of both kingdoms, and the desire of both parliaments."

The Scots Commissioners Answer.] The Answer of the Scots Commissioners was as follows:—"We do, with all thankfulness, acknowledge his majesty's royal and tender care of settling the affairs of his antient and native kingdom of Scotland, and the constancy of his resolution, according to his royal promise and proclamation, to be present at the day appointed. Our affection also towards the settling of the affairs of the kingdom of England, and desire of both houses of parliament, that his majesty's Journey to Scotland may be stayed for some time, to that effect, doth so far press with us, that we shall deal most earnestly with the parliament of Scotland, that they may adjourn their meeting till the 5th of August: or, if they shall find that a new adjournment of the parliament, after so many prorogations, be so prejudicial to the present condition of the affairs of the kingdom, that it cannot be granted, we will endeavour that they may, in their meetings, be only exercised in preparing matters for the parliament; and that they determine nothing, nor make any act, until the day designed for his majesty's coming: but withal we must certify, that the present constitution of that kingdom, for want of councils, sessions, and other courts of justice, and many other difficulties daily, through delays, growing greater, is such that it cannot suffer any longer delay: and therefore we desire that the houses of parliament would be pleased so far to express their reciprocal respect to our affairs, that they will give present assent to his majesty's coming in his royal person, at the day aforesaid; without which we can have no ground to deal with the parliament to the effect above written."

"ADAM BLAIR, Sec." This Answer being read, the lords resolved to have a conference with the commons concerning it; and a message was dispatched to born for that purpose: at which conference he foregoing papers were again read, and the case of the house of lords upon them. But the commons, being returned, resolved, "To desire the lords to join with them in petitioning his majesty, that he would be pleased to stay his Journey into Scotland until the 10th of August; and that, if then he shall please to take his Journey, this house shall submit unto it." Which resolution was agreed to by the lords.

July 2. The Bill for a Poll-Tax was sent up to the lords, which, with the amendments, being read, they were agreed to by that house: but a Memorandum was entered, as a Salvo, for preserving the privileges of the peers of this realm, in rating and taxing themselves, in subsidies, &c. members of that house in time of parliament.

Petition against selling Titles of Honour.] A message was sent by the lords to the other house, to desire they would join with them in Petition to the King, "That Titles of Honour may not be bought and sold for money; but that they might be conferred, by his majesty, on virtue and merit, as it antiently was." Also the house of commons were desired to join with the lords in a bill for preventing of his hereafter.

Acts passed for raising a Poll-Tax, and for taking away the Star-Chamber, &c.] July 3. This day the commons sent up three bills, which had passed their house to the lords, entitled, 1. An Act for the speedy Provision of Money, or disbanding the Armies, and settling the peace of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland: 2. An act for regulating the King's Council, and for taking away the court commonly called the Star-Chamber: 3. An act for the repeal of a branch of a statute, 1. Eliz. concerning Commissioners in Causes Ecclesiastical. And the commons desired their lordships, that the king might be moved, presently, by both houses, to give his royal assent to the bills aforesaid.—The lords, who attended the king with the above message, brought for answer, "That his majesty would come and give the royal assent to the bill concerning Poll-Money this morning; in regard it relates to the Disbanding of the Armies, and the present ease of the kingdom: as for the other two bills, in regard his majesty hath not been made acquainted with the particulars before now, he will consider of them and give in answer in 2 or 3 days."

This Answer being communicated to the commons, they immediately dispatched one of their own members to the lords again, to acquaint them, "That the commons having taken into consideration his Majesty's Answer to the message, That he will only give his royal assent, this day, to the bill for Poll-Money, they conceive that the passing the other two bills, for taking away the Star-Chamber, and the High Commission-Court, will very much conduce to the speedy payment of the Poll-Money: therefore they desired that his majesty might be moved, again, to give his royal assent to all the 3 bills together, with convenient speed." This message was sent to the king by the same committee of lords as before; to which his majesty said, "That he would be at the house that afternoon, and return an Answer himself."

The Speaker's Speech to the King, upon presenting the Poll-Tax Bill.] Accordingly in the afternoon of this day, the king came to the house of lords, when, the commons being sent for, his majesty made a short speech to both houses; not entered in either of the Journals; after which the Speaker, upon presenting the Poll-Tax Bill, made the following speech:

"Most excellent and Gracious Sovereign; The government of this common-wealth rests in the rules of order, and hath so much affinity and consent with the rules of nature, in the government of the world, that the first copy and imitation of the one may seem to be taken from the original and first model of the other. This contemplation casts our eyes upon your sacred majesty, as that celestial orb, which, never resting without the office of perpetual motion to cherish the lower bodies, not enriching itself with any treasures drawn from below, exhales in vapours, from the inferior elements, what, in due season, it returns in showers. The application makes us consider ourselves those sublunary creatures, which, having their essence and being from the influence of those beams (as the flowers of the field) open to receive the glory of the sun. In this relation both contribute to the common good; your sacred majesty, as a nursing father, designed to bestow on your people the blessings of peace and unity; and we, as the children of obedience, returning our duties and affections in aids and tributes. And thus compacted in one body by the ligaments of religion and laws, we have been the object of admiration to the whole world. Amidst the distractions of foreign nations, we only have sat under the shadow of our vines, and drank the wines of our own vintage. But our crafty adversaries (perceiving that the fervent profession of our own religion, and the firm observation of our laws, have been the pillars of our prosperity) by subtle insinuations, do pretend a politic necessity to admit of moderation in our religion, to comply with foreign princes; and suggest it as a principle in the rules of sovereignty, to require and take, not ask and have; that it must posture by power, not petere by laws; and keep up these miseries of war and calamity between nation and nation, and put us in the posture of gaze to the whole world. But when we behold your sacred majesty, descended from the royal loins of that glorious king, who by his wisdom and policy, first ingrafted the White Rose and Red upon the same stock; who sheathed the sword that had pierced the bowels of so much nobility, glutted with the blood of the people; and then laid the first hopes of the happy union between the nations: when our thoughts refresh themselves with the happy memory of that religious king, your gracious father, on whose sacred temples both diadems were placed, wreathed about with this motto, 'Faciam eos in gentem unam,' we cannot but believe that God and nature (by a lineal succession from those fathers of peace hath ordained you that lapis angularis, upon which the whole frame settles; and put into the hand of your sacred majesty the possibility and power to confirm and establish this happy union between your kingdoms; and so raise to your memory a statue of glory and wisdom from generation to generation.—In all this length of time, the assurance of this union and peace hath been the chief object of our desires; our purses have been as open as our hearts, both contributing to this great work, manifested by so many subsidies already presented, sufficient, in our first hopes, for its full perfection. But, finding that fail, have again ventured upon your people's property; and, in an old and obsolete way, new burnished by the hand of instant necessity, expressed to the world the hearts of a loyal people; and, howsoever gilded with a new name of tranquillity and peace to your kingdoms, that with more ease the people may digest the bitterness of this pill, yet still our hearts had the same aim and object. A gift suitable to a necessity of so vast extent, that time cannot parallel it by an example: and by which, if your sacred majesty vouchsafe your royal assent, which we humbly pray, we shall not doubt you may soon accomplish those happy effects, that may present your wisdom the object of wonder, and your policy to be admired amongst the nations."

The king, at this time, gave the royal assent to the Poll-Bill only: For the other two his majesty said, as before, "That he had not considered of them, being bills of great consequence: but he would inform himself concerning the particulars, and return an Answer in a few days." This delay, we are told by Rushworth and Nalson, gave great disgust to the commons, though nothing of that kind appears in their Journals.

The King's Speech at giving his Assent to the Bills for taking away the Star-Chamber, &c. June 5. The King came again to the house of lords; and, being seated on the throne, and the commons present, his majesty made the following speech:

"My Lords and gentlemen; I come to do the office which I did on Saturday last, to give the determination to these two bills; but, before I do it, I must tell you, that I cannot but be very sensible of those reports of discontent, that I hear some have taken for not giving my consent on Saturday. Methinks it seems strange that any one should think I could pass two bills of that importance as these were, without taking some fit time to consider of them; for it is no less than to alter, in a great measure, those fundamental laws, ecclesiastical and civil, which many of my predecessors have established.—If you consider what I have done this parliament, discontent will not sit in your hearts.

I hope you remember I have granted, That th Judges, hereafter, shall hold their places, quæ diu bene se gesserint. I have bounded the Forests, not according to my right, but according to the late customs. I have established the Property of the Subject, as witness the free giving up, not the taking away the Ship-Money I have established, by act of parliament, the property of the subject in Tonnage and Poundage; which never was done in any of my predecessors times. I have granted a law for Triennial Parliament; and given way to an act for the securing of monies advanced for the disbanding of the armies. I have given free course of justice against Delinquents. I have put the laws in execution against Papists.—Nay, I have given way to every thing that you have asked of me; and therefore, methinks you should not wonder, if, in some things, begin to refuse; but, I hope it shall not hinder your progress in your great affairs, and I will not stick upon trivial matters, to give you content. I hope you are sensible of these beneficial favours bestowed on you at this time.—To conclude: you know, by your consent there is a prefixed time set for my going into Scotland; and there is an absolute necessity for it. I do not know but that things may fall out that it may be shortened; therefore I hope you will hasten the dispatching of those great businesses that now are necessary to be done, and leave trivial and superficial matters to another meeting. For my part, I shall do nothing that may give you just contentment, and study nothing more than your happiness; and therefore I hope you shall see a very good testimony of it, by passing these two bills." The clerk of the parliament having pronounced the royal assent, his majesty continued as followeth: "I have one word more to speak unto you, and take now an occasion to present unto both houses, that thereby I hope all the world shall see that there is a good understanding between me and my people. It is concerning my nephew, the prince elector Palatine, who having desired me and the king of Denmark to give way to a writing concerning the Diet at Ratisbon with the emperor, I could not but send my ambassador to assist him, though I am afraid I shall not have so good an answer as I wish: which my nephew foreseeing hath desired me, for the better countenance of the same, to make a Manifesto in my name, which is a thing of great consequence; and if I should do it alone, without the advice of my parliament, it would rather be a scorn than otherwise: therefore I do propose it unto you, that if you will advise me to it, I do think it were very fit to be published in my name."

The King's Manifesto in Favour of the Elector Palatine. This Instrument ran in these words:—"Charles, by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, &c. To all to whom this present Manifesto shall come, greeting. To the end that the endeavours of our late dear father, king James, of blessed memory, and our own proceedings, since his death, in the cause of our dear and only sister, brother-in-law, and nephews, electors and princes Palatine of the Rhine, may not be forgotten, or pretendedly unknown; wherein we have studied and laboured nothing more than the peace of Christendom, and the avoiding the effusion of innocent blood, by seeking the restitution and re-establishment of the Electoral House Palatine, in their antient rights, dignities, and possessions within the empire; out of which they have been, by violence and force of arms, and other undue proceedings, expelled and banished, contrary to the antient laws and constitutions of the sacred empire: we have thought fit, for the vindication of our own honour, to call to mind, and to publish to all the world, both a summary relation of our actions and endeavours past, and our present resolutions in the same cause.—It cannot be unknown to all the princes and estates of Europe, and more particularly to those who have had any interest or relation to the public affairs of Germany, how both ourself and our father, have, for these 20 years past, by many and several ambassages, treaties, and other negotiations, to our great expence and charges, both with the late emperor Ferdinand, the king of Spain, and other princes and estates of the empire, endeavoured, by all friendly and treatable means, to procure the restitution and re-establishment of our said dear sister, brother-in-law, and nephews, in their antient rights and possessions, as the only and possible way to settle a good and firm peace in the empire, and consequently with all princes interested therein; without which it is impossible to expect or hope for a good, durable, and honest pacification of those troubles which have already almost rent, consumed, and involved all the princes of Christendom in a most bloody and destructive war. And for a clear demonstration of our sincere intentions, not only our own pious inclination, and care of the public peace, hath induced us to omit divers occasions, whereby we might, by such power as God hath put into our hands, have prevented the violences and oppressions used to our said sister and nephews; but we have been led on, and invited thereunto, by divers promises, assurances, and several letters, both from the late emperor, the king of Spain, and other usurpers of the inheritances of the electoral House Palatine, that they would at last, in contemplation of our mediation, hearken and incline to a just and honest peace, by the restitution of the estates and dignities of our dear sister and nephews; whereby we have been drawn not only to pass by our own and the public interest, and to forbear to engage our arms in so just a cause, but also have procured, by our father's and our authority, the withdrawing and disbanding of the forces of count Mansfelt out of the Palatinate; and advanced divers truces and cessations of hostility or defence, only to prepare the way of amicable composition, according to the hopes and promises to that end given us; and, particularly, have caused the surrender and deposition of some places of strength into the hands of the late Infanta of Spain, upon reciprocal assurances of a final pacification or restitution.—But what effects all these our peaceable and Christian endeavours have produced, and how all our pious negotiations have been either delayed or deluded; thereby and by process of time to root and establish the usurpations of the House Palatine, and our patience and piety thereby abused, is so manifest by the continued oppression of our said dear sister and nephews, that we are forced to protest, that there hath nothing succeeded, either to our desires or hopes, but a resolution of despair of ever obtaining, by the ways of justice, treaty, or amity, that which hath been so often promised to, and expected of, the lovers of Christian peace.—Notwithstanding we have lately received advice from our dear uncle, the king of Denmark, that, at last, by his mediation and procurement, the present emperor and the duke of Bavaria have condescended to a Treaty to be held, at the Diet of Ratisbon, upon the 6th of May last past, for the reviewing and the settling of the controversies of the House Palatine, as a preparation and inducement to a general peace and amnesty through the whole empire; and that he, with some of the electors of the empire, is accepted as a mediator of the said cause, and hath received strong and pregnant assurances of a better inclination and disposition toward the re-establishment of the electoral family, in their rights and dignities; and, to that end, hath procured convenient safe-conduct from the emperor to our nephew and his brethren, freely to come in person, or to send their deputies to that diet, at the time and place appointed; with all other clauses requisite for their safely going, abiding, or coming from thence, and there to plead the justice of their own cause; and that, in prosecution thereof, he hath instructed and dispatched his ambassadors to assist either in person, or by the deputies of our nephews, at the said treaty of pacification; and hath desired us herein to comply with him, by sending our ambassadors qualified and instructed to the same purpose of procuring a good and settled peace within the empire, according to the intimation of the princes electors, signified to him by their letters, thereby desiring us to assist in the present assembly at Ratisbon.—To which end, our nephew, the prince elector Palatine having resolved, by our counsel and advice, to send his deputies according to the invitation and hopes intimated of a good issue to be expected by the amicable way of treaty and composure, we have also thought fit not to be wanting to so good a design, so concurrent to our own and the desires of so many princes: and, in some hope of better fruit than hitherto all our endeavours have produced, have resolved to make this our last trial by the way of treaties, and to send our ambassador to the emperor and other princes in the said diet assembled:

and, to that purpose, have given him full power and instructions to contribute all our authority to the procurement and settlement of a good and blessed peace, by the re-establishment and restitution of the possessions and dignities of our said dear sister, nephews, and electoral family; without which no peace can be either honest or secure: hereby exhorting and desiring all other kings, princes, and states, our friends, allies, and confederates, who shall either be present at the said diet, or shall have their ambassadors or deputies there, that they will be assisting to the justice of so good a cause, and to so great a blessing, as the restoring of peace to the almost desolate estate of Germany.—But because we may have just cause to doubt, by many experiences of our former endeavours, that the issue and fruit of this meeting may not be answerable to our just expectation; but rather that it may produce contrary effects, to the prejudice of the justice and rights of our said nephews and their family, (which God forbid) we are hereby forced to protest against all acts, sentences, conclusions, or determinations whatsoever, which shall or may be had, made, or declared, either in confirmation of the oppressions and usurpations past, or any additions thereunto for the future, as invalid and of no power or effect. In which case, being contrary to our desire and expectation, we also further protest and declare, that we will not abandon either our own or the public interest, nor the cause, rights, and just pretences of our dear sister and nephews, and other princes and states involved within their oppressions; but that we will use and employ all such force and power wherewith God hath enabled us, both by our own arms, and the help and assistance of all our allies and friends, to vindicate our own honour, the public peace, and redress of the injuries, usurpations, and oppressions of our said dearest sister and nephews, and their illustrious family.—And hereby, as we do profess to use all our endeavour and power to promote a happy and desired peace, for the consolation of the distressed empire, so we do appeal to Almighty God, the Inspector of the hearts of all princes, and to the world, the spectator of all our just actions, that we will be innocent, before God and the world, of all the evils that may ensue, if these our last hopes shall be delayed or abused.*

This Manifesto being read, it was ordered that a copy of it be sent to the Commons.

Sir B. Rudyard's Speech in Support of the Manifesto. In compliance with his majesty's speech, the house of commons took the Prince Elector's condition into consideration: the Manifesto was read, and a debate took place upon it, at which

Sir Benjamin Rudyard made the following speech:—“Mr. Speaker; This great affair of the Palatinate concerneth this kingdom in nature, in honour, in reason of state, in religion. We all know how near in blood the Prince Elector is to his majesty. Many of us here know what solemn protestation hath been made in this place, for the recovery of the Palatinate, by which we are bound in honour to pursue it with our best assistance.* God hath so framed the powers of man, and so ordered the course of things in this world, as that, in all actions, right reason and true religion may well hold, and go together. If we consider religion according to reason of state, we shall find that Christendom divides itself into two sides; with the Pope, and against the Pope. His majesty is the greatest king of the Protestant religion, and therefore fittest to be the head of that party, which will add more greatness to him than can be gotten any other way. The means to it are, first, to preserve religion sound and entire within his own kingdoms at home. Next, to unite the homogeneal parts of it, pieces of the same, together, by alliances and confederations abroad. The good effects of this German Match was lost by the ill counsels of those times: it will be an honour to us to repair it by better. The restoring of the Prince Elector to his territory and dignity, will restore religion there; will strengthen it, may increase it further in Germany; which consideration is of a great and vast consequence, proportionable to the greatness and vastness of that country. It will likewise refresh and comfort the sorrowful heart of that most noble, virtuous, and magnanimously-suffering queen of Bohemia, his majesty's sister, his highness's mother; who is ever to be highly and tenderly regarded by this house, by this kingdom. This is a fit conjuncture of time to begin it in, whilst the king of Spain hath so much to do of his own, as he is not able to afford his usual aids to the Emperor; which probably may induce the Emperor to abate of his former resolutions. That which is now propounded is only a Manifesto, to express and declare our zeal and heartiness to the cause, and thereby to give it countenance and reputation in the present Diet at Ratisbon. Reputation in matters of state doth many times prevail as much as substance. His majesty's father, of blessed memory, and himself, have, for many years, mediated and treated with the successive emperors, by all fair and amicable ways. They have been deluded, they have been neglected. It behoves us, Mr. Speaker, to be Englishly sensible of the injustice, of the indignity. Wherefore my humble motion is, That the house will be pleased, presently, to name a select committee, to compose a Declaration suitable to the importance of the cause.—But the further consideration of this Manifesto was deferred till the 21th.

This day, Mr. Treasurer (sir H. Vane) acquainted the house, that Rosetti, the Pope's Nuncio had left England.—A message was also delivered from the king, concerning the Queen-Mother, who was very desirous to de-part the kingdom; only money was wanting to defray her charges, which would amount to no less than 10,000*l.* Upon which the commons immediately consented that there should be so much paid out of the Poll-Money for that service.

Articles of Impeachment against Dr. Wren, Bishop of Ely.] July 5. p. m. Sir Thomas Widdrington brought in 95 Articles against Matthew Wren, late bishop of Norwich, now bishop of Ely; which being read, and singly voted, were ordered to be engrossed. These Articles were as follows:

“ The said Matthew Wren, being popishly and superstitiously affected, did, at his first coming to be bishop of Norwich, in 1635, endeavour, by sundry ways and means, to suppress the powerful and painful preaching of the word of God; did introduce divers orders and injunctions, tending to superstition and idolatry; did disturb and disquiet the orderly and settled estate of the ministers and people, and churches of that diocese, to the great prejudice of his majesty; the great grief and disquiet, and hazard of the estates, consciences and lives of many of his loyal subjects there; to the manifest bringing in, and increasing of prophane-ness, ignorance, and disobedience in the common people, as by the particulars ensuing may appear. I. Whereas many chancels of churches, during all the time of queen Eliz. king James, and of his maj. that now is, had laid and been continued even and flat, without any steps ascending towards the east-end of the same; and are, by the rubrick in the book of Common-Prayer, ordered to continue as they were, and so ought to have continued: he, of his own mind and will, without any lawful warrant or authority, in 1636, being then bishop of Norwich, ordered and enjoined, that the same should be raised towards the east end, some 2, some 3, some 4 steps, that so the Communion Table, there placed Altar-wise, might be the better seen of the people. II. He, in the same year 1636, ordered, that the Communion Table (which is appointed by the said rubrick, at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion, to be placed in the body of the church or chancel, where divine service is usually read, and where the people might best hear) should be set up close under the wall, at the east-end of the chancel, altar-wise, and not to be removed from thence; whereby the minister, who is by the law to officiate at the north side of the table, must either stand and officiate at the north-end of the table, so standing altar-wise, or else, after the popish and idolatrous manner, stand and officiate at the west-side of the table, with his back towards the people.—III. He enjoined, that there should be a rail set on the top of the new raised steps before the communion table, so set altar-wise as aforesaid, which rail should reach from the south-side of the chancel to the north-side; within which the minister only should enter as a place to pray for the people; and some of the people were punished for stepping into it. IV. The more to advance blind superstition, he ordered, that all the pews in the churches should be so altered, that the people might kneel with their faces eastward, towards the communion table, so set altar-wise as afore-said; and that there should be no seats in the chancel above, or on either side, even up to the said table. V. He enjoined, that every minister, after he had finished the reading of some part of the morning-prayer at the desk, should go out from the same to the holy table, set altar-wise, as to a more holy place; and there, when no communion was to be administered, read at the said table a part of the communion service, now commonly called, ‘The Second Service,’ whereby the consciences, both of the minister and people, have been not only very much offended and grieved; but also the service itself was made very unprofitable to the people, who could not hear what was said or prayed in that place. VI. That both he in his own person, his chaplains, and others of the clergy following his example, did, ever after the table was so set altar-wise, use and perform such, so many, and so frequent bowings and adorations before and towards the said table, as have been dangerous examples to draw others to the like superstitious gestures; and have given great scandal and offence to the sound, sincere, and well-affected Christians. VII. He enjoined all the people to come up to the rail to receive the holy communion, and there kneel, and do reverence before the holy table, placed altar-wise; and gave directions to the ministers not to administer the communion to such people as should not so come up, and do such reverence as afore-said; and that the minister should, within the rail, deliver the bread to such people only as should so come up and kneel before the said table as aforesaid. This was to the offence of the consciences of many good people; who, for fear of idolatry and superstition, durst not come to kneel at the said rail before the table so placed altar-wise; and many people not coming up thither, though presenting themselves upon their knees in the chancel, have not had the communion delivered unto them; and afterwards, for not receiving, have been excommunicated. VIII. He did enjoin and command, that there should be no sermons on the Lord’s days, in the afternoon, or on the week days at all, without his licence. And also enjoined, that there should be no catechizing, but only such questions and answers as are contained in the book of the Common Prayer; not allowing the ministers to expound, or open, the same to the people; he and his under-officers affirming in public places, that such an exposition might be as ill as a sermon. And, the more to hearten and confirm the people in prophaning the Lord’s day, he enjoined the ministers to read publicly, in their churches, a book published ‘Touching Sports on the Lord’s day,’ for not reading whereof, some ministers were, by the command and directions of the said bishop, suspended, some deprived, and some otherwise troubled. By all which, knowledge was suppressed, and ignorance and prophaneness introduced in that diocese.—IX. There having been formerly two kinds of ringing of bells, and calling people to the church, in that diocese, viz. one kind when there were only prayers to be read, and another kind when there were both prayers to be read and a sermon preached; whereby the people did apply themselves to the service of God in those places, where both prayers and preaching was to be: he, to hinder the people in their good desires of serving of God and edifying their souls, did command and enjoin, that there should be no difference in ringing of bells to church, when there was a sermon, and when there was none.—X. Whereas many godly ministers, for the preventing of the great sin in the people of unworthy receiving the holy communion of the Lord's Supper, did use to preach 2 or 3 days before every Communion, a preparation sermon, to prepare and instruct the people in the right and worthy receiving of the communion: he, the said bishop, did forbid ministers to preach any such preparation sermon in that diocese.—XI. Whereas all God's Ordinances are sanctified and made fruitful by the blessing of God upon them by prayer: he, endeavouring to suppress the power and benefit of prayer, enjoined, that no minister should use any prayer before his sermon; but move the people to pray only in the words of the 55th Canon, made A. D. 1603, (which canon was not warranted by the law,) that no prayer should be used before or after the sermon: and he, in his own person, having been at the sermon in the town of Ipswich, when the preacher did use or make any other prayer, did sit upon his seat, without using, or giving any reverence by kneeling, or otherwise, thereby to discountenance such prayer. And he, commanded and enjoined, that no prayer should be made in the pulpit for the sick; and that such as were prayed for in the Reading Desk, should be prayed for only in the two collects prescribed for the Visitation of the Sick in private houses.—XII. He, the more to alienate the people's hearts from hearing of sermons, commanded and enjoined all ministers to preach constantly in their hood and surplice; a thing not used before in that diocese, and much offensive to the people as a scandalous innovation. And the parishioners of Knatshall wanting a surplice; he did, by his officers, enjoin the church-wardens there, that no prayers should be read in that church till they had got a surplice; which they not getting for the space of two Lord's Days after, had no prayers there during that time.—XIII. That during the time of his being bishop of Norwich, which was about 2 years and 4 months, there were, (for not reading the second Service at the Communion-Table set Altar-wise; for not reading the Book of Sports; for using conceived prayers before and after sermon; and for not observing some other illegal innovations of him and his under-officers) by and upon his directions and injunctions, sundry godly and painful preaching ministers, to the number of 50, excommunicated, suspended or deprived, and otherwise censured and silenced, to the undoing of many of them, their wives and children; and they could not be absolved, without giving promise to conform to his directions, editis & edendis; by means whereof some ministers were enforced to depart this realm into Holland, and other parts beyond sea, others, of Norwich, to remove into other more peaceable dioceses; and some of them so prosecuted, as hath been suspected to be the cause of their deaths; the terror of which proceedings hath caused other ministers to leave their cures and go away; and if a stranger preached at the cure of such person suspended, the church-wardens permitting such person to preach were enjoined penance, and otherwise troubled.—XIV. That, during the time he was bishop of Norwich, he did unlawfully compel the inhabitants of the several parishes within that diocese, to raise the floors of the chancels of their respective churches; to rail in their communion-tables; to remove the pews and seats, and to make other alterations in their respective churches; in the doing whereof the said inhabitants were put to great, excessive and unnecessary charges and expences, amounting, in the whole, to 5000*l.* and upwards; which said charges and expences he did, by unlawful means and courses, enforce the said inhabitants to undergo: and such of the said inhabitants as did not obey the same, he did vex, trouble, and molest by presentments, citations, excommunications, tedious and frequent journeys, and by attendances at the courts of his chancellor, and other his officials.—XV. That, for not coming up to the rail to receive the Holy Communion, kneeling there before the table Altar-wise, for not standing up at the Gospel, and for not observing and performing of his unlawful innovations and injunctions, many other of his majesty's subjects have been, by him, his chancellors, visitors, commissaries, and officials, by his commands and injunctions, much molested, disquieted, and vexed in their estates and consciences, by the citations to courts, long attendance there, dismission, fees, excommunications, penances, and other censures. XVI. That, by reason of the rigorous prosecutions and dealings in the last preceding Articles mentioned, and by reason of the continual superstitious bowing to and before the table, set Altar-wise; suspending, silencing, and driving away the painful preaching ministers; the suppressing and forbidding of sermons and prayer; the putting down of lectures; the suppressing means of knowledge and salvation, and introducing ignorance, superstition and prophaneness, many of his majesty's subjects, to the number of 3000, many of which used trades of spinning, weaving, knitting, and making of cloth, stuff, stockings, and other manufactures of wool; some of them setting 100 poor people on work, have removed themselves, families, and estates, into Holland, and other parts beyond the seas, and there set up and taught the natives there the said manufactures; to the great hindrance of trade in this kingdom, and to the impoverishing and bringing to extreme want very many, who were, by those parties, formerly set on work, to the great prejudice of his majesty and his people.—XVII. That he, the said bishop, finding the people distaste his innovations, hath often, in public and private speeches, declared, in the said year 1636, that what he did in the same was by his majesty's command; whereby he, contrary to the duty of his place which he held under his majesty, being dean of his majesty's chapel royal, and contrary to the duty of a good and faithful subject, endeavoured to free himself from blame, and to raise an ill opinion of his royal majesty in the hearts of his loving subjects.—XVIII. That he, the said Matthew Wren, being bishop of Norwich in the said year 1636, in the Tower-Church in Ipswich, and other places, did, in his own person, use superstitious and idolatrous actions and gestures in the administration of the Lord's Supper; consecrating the bread and wine, standing at the west-side of the table with his face to the east; and, his back towards the people, elevating the bread and wine so high, as to be seen over his shoulders, bowing low, either to or before them, when he, after the elevation and consecration had set them down on the table.—XIX. That he, the more to manifest his Popish affection, caused a crucifix, that is to say, the figure of Christ upon the cross, to be engraven upon his episcopal seal, besides the arms of the see.—XX. That he hath chosen and employed such men to be his commissioners, rural deans, and to be his household chaplains, whom he knew stood affected to his innovating course, and Popish superstition, and to be erroneous and unsound in judgment and practice.—XXI. That he hath very much oppressed divers patrons of churches, by admitting, without any colour of title, his own chaplains, and others whom he affected, into livings which became void within his diocese; unjustly enforcing the true and right patrons to long and chargeable suits to evict such incumbents, and to recover their own right; some of which he did against his priestly word, given to the said patrons, or their friends, in verbo sacerdotis, not to do the same.—XXII. That he, and others, in 1635, sold or granted away the profits of his primary visitation for 500*l.* over and above the charges of the visitation; and, for the better benefit of the farmer, set forth a book, in 1636, intitled, 'Articles to be inquired of within the diocese of Norwich, in the first visitation of Matthew lord bishop of Norwich,' consisting of 139 Articles, and wherein are contained the number of 897 questions; according to all which the church-wardens were enforced to present, upon pain of perjury: and some church-wardens and others not making presentments accordingly, were cited, molested, and troubled, and enjoined penance; notwithstanding many of the said Articles were ridiculous and impossible.—XXIII. That the church-wardens and other men sworn at the visitation, were enforced to have their presentments written by clerks specially appointed by such as bought the said visitation; to whom they paid excessive sums of money for the same, some 22 shillings, some more, some less, for writing one presentment; to the grievous oppression of his majesty's poor subjects in that diocese.—XXIV. Whereas, by the laws of this realm, no tythes ought to be paid out of the rents of houses, nor is there any custom or usage in the city of Norwich for such payment; yet the said bishop endeavoured to draw the citizens, and other inhabitants within the said city, against their wills and consents, to pay 2 shillings in the pound, in lieu of the tythes of houses within the several parishes of the said city, unto the ministers there of the said respective parishes. And, the better to effect this his unjust resolution, he did, by false and undue suggestions, in the 14th year of his majesty's reign that now is, procure his majesty to declare, under his great seal of England, his royal pleasure, That if any person, within the said city, shall refuse to pay according to the said rate of 2 shillings in the pound, unto the minister of any parish within the said city, that the same be heard in the court of Chancery, or in the consistory of the bishop of Norwich: and that, in such case, no prohibitions against the bishops of Norwich, their chancellors, or commissaries in the said courts of consistory be granted: and if any such writ be at any time obtained, the judges so granting the same, upon sight of his highness's said order, shall forthwith grant a consultation to the minister desiring the same, with his reasonable costs and charges; which said order and decree, under the great seal of England, tending to the violation of the oaths of the judges, was devised, contrived, and made by the said bishop: and afterwards, by his evil counsels and false surmises, he did obtain his majesty's royal consent thereunto; and by colour of the order aforesaid, and other the doings of the said bishop, the citizens and inhabitants of Norwich aforesaid have been enforced to pay the said 2*s.* in the pound, in lieu of tythes, or else, by suits and other undue means, be much molested, and put to great expences, contrary to law and justice.—XXV. That he assumed to himself an arbitrary power, to compel the respective parishioners in the said diocese, to pay great and excessive wages to parish-clerks; commanding his officers, that if any parishioner did refuse to pay such wages, they should certify him their names, and he would set them into the high commission-court for example to the rest; and that one or two, out of Ipswich, might be taken for that purpose.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said Matthew Wren, late bishop of Norwich, and now bishop of Ely; and also of replying to the Answer that he shall make unto the said Articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or any other impeachments or accusations that shall be exhibited by them as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require; do pray that he may be called to answer the said several crimes and misdemeanors, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve; and that such further proceedings may be, upon every of them, had against him, as is agreeable to law and justice."

After reading these Articles, the commons resolved, "That Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, is, in their opinion, unfit and unworthy to hold or continue any spiritual promotion or office in the church or common-wealth; and that the lords be desired to join with this house, to move his majesty to remove the said bishop from his person and service." Upon this,

Sir Philip Parker, knight of the shire for Suffolk, took occasion to speak as follows*:—
 'Mr. Speaker; I stand not up in my own particular behalf, but in the universal and general name of the whole kingdom. Alas! Mr. Speaker, they depend all upon our exemplary justice; which, if we do fully execute, will not only give great and plenary satisfaction to our nation, but will likewise cause the land to smile hereafter with the blessed beams of prosperous felicity: but if the least error or smallest deliberation be overseen by us, (Oh! it strikes my trembling mind with horror to think on it) how will all things precipitate themselves into ruin most irrevocable? But I speak not this, as if any here would omit, or extenuate, the supremacy of justice in the least thought. To admonish you of that point, were to bid the moon keep her monthly course, the spheres to reduce themselves in their circumference, or the sun to shine upon the earth. But I speak this only to add a spur unto you, lest we should at any time languish in our Heaven-proceeding journey. The cries of the people have come up to me: the voice of the whole nation tingles in my ears; and, methinks, I hear each subject wish, that we would briefly establish the church-government with all expedition. Let us first begin to confirm our religion, and God will bless our other proceedings the better. That was always my opinion, and, I am sure, the expectation of the whole kingdom. How long have we sat here, and how little have we effected? How much time have we consumed, and what little have we performed therein? How long have we laboured in this our daily travel, and as yet have brought forth but an embryo in what we did intend? 'Tis true, I confess, we have tormented ourselves with daily troubles and vexations, and have been very solicitous for the welfare of the commonwealth; but what have we performed, what have we perfected? I will once more relate what my former opinion was: let us I say, begin in the real establishment of our religion; and, as I said, all our other determinations will succeed with a better omen; for indeed most of our delinquents are linked to this chain, they depend most on this point; therefore we should do well to enter speedily upon the work.—Mr. Speaker, excuse my zeal in this case; for my mouth cannot imprison what my mind intends to let out, neither can my tongue conceal that which my heart desires to promulge. Behold the archbishop, that great incendiary of this kingdom, lies now like a fire-brand raked up in the embers; but if ever he chance to blaze again, I am afraid that what heretofore he had but in a spark, he will burn down to the ground in a full flame. Wherefore, let us begin, for the kingdom is pregnant with expectation in this point. I confess there are many more delinquents, for the judges and other knights walk in querpō; but they are only thunderbolts forged in Canterbury's fire. I look upon them all but as polluted rivers, flowing from that corrupt fountain. Well, is it so then, that all depend on religion? Why are we then so backward in reforming the church? Why do we stick in this point, and not rather proceed in it with all expedition? For indeed, according to the laws of this kingdom, as it hath the dignity of pre-eminence, so let us give it the priority in our determinations.—Mr. Speaker, think with yourself, I pray, in what faction the church is now; in what schism; in what confusion of distracted sectaries it is promiscuously shaken: behold the Papists will have their way, the Brownists will have their way, the Anabaptists their way, the Puritans, as some call them, their way, the Jesuitical Priests their way; and, in these various ways, they make such a labyrinth of religion, that few or none scarce can find out the right way. It behoves us therefore, and is expedient, that we should add a period to these irregular ways, that the vulgar may no longer wander in these distracted paths.—Mr. Speaker, I have now unloaded my mind of her weary burthen; and I beseech you digest my words, with your serious consideration, in this respect of establishing the church government, in true, sincere, perfect, and unpolluted religion; which if we do perform, and fully effect, we shall do great honour to God, get credit to ourselves, and give great satisfaction to the whole kingdom. This is my opinion; this is my expectation; this is my prayer; and, lastly, this is my hope.'

About this time the house of commons made an Order to take away all scandalous pictures, crosses, and figures, within churches or without; and sir Robert Harley, knight of the shire for Herefordshire, was made the executioner of this order. Whitlocke adds, 'That this zealous knight, as he terms him, took down the crosses in Cheapside, Chaining-Cross, and other the like monuments, very impartially.'

Imprachment of Six of the Judges.] July 6. A conference was held between both houses, when the commons delivered in six several charges against sir John Brampton, lord chief justice of the King's-bench; sir Robert Berkeley, one of the justices of that court; sir Francis Crawley, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas; sir Humphrey Davenport, lord chief baron of the exchequer; sir Rd. Weston, and sir Tho. Trevor, barons of the said court; in relation to their behaviour in the affair of Ship-Money. Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Waller, Mr. Crew, Mr. Hyde, lord Falkland, Mr. Newport, and Mr. Gerrard were appointed to carry up the respective charges of Imprachment to the lords, and to desire that the judges might be put to their Answers. All that is entered in the Lords Journals, besides mentioning their names, is an abstract of Mr. Hollis's concluding speech, after the separate impeachments had been spoken to by the other managers. The purport of which was, after some remarks on the misconduct of the before-mentioned judges, a recommendation of sir Randolph Crew to his majesty's favour; who, by chusing rather to lose his office of chief justice of England, than subscribe to the Loan, 1mo Caroli, had distinguished himself as much an assessor of the laws, as the others, in the case of Ship-Money, had appeared the open violators of them. But of the Articles of Imprachment against these Judges we shall take no farther notice, since they are recited at large, not only in Rushworth and Nalson, but also in the State Trials, and most of the historians of these times.

Resolutions as to Breaches of Privilege, &c.] This day the house of commons fell upon the matter of their privileges, in the case of Mr. Hollis and others, 4to Caroli, and, after debate, came to the following Resolutions. 1. "That the Warrants of the Lords, and others of the privy council, compelling Mr. Hollis and others to appear before them during that parliament: that the committing of Mr. Hollis and others, by the lords and others of the privy council, 4to Caroli, during that parliament: that the searching and sealing of the chambers, studies, and papers of Mr. Hollis, Mr. Selden, and sir John Elliot, being members of parliament, and issuing out warrants for that purpose: and that the exhibiting an information, in the court of Star-Chamber, against Mr. Hollis and others, for matters done by them in parliament, being members of parliament, are breaches of privilege. 2. That sir Rob. Heath, sir Humphrey Davenport, sir Heneage Finch, Mr. Hudson, and sir Rob. Berkeley, that subscribed the said informations, are guilty of a breach of privilege. 3. That there was a delay of justice towards Mr. Hollis and others, upon the Habeas Corpora, in that they were not bailed in Easter and Trinity term, 5to Caroli. 4. That sir Nicholas Hide, then lord chief justice of the court of King's-bench; and sir Wm. Jones, one of the justices of the said court, were guilty of this delay: but that sir James Whitlocke was not guilty thereof."

Debate on the King's Manifesto concerning the Palatinate.] July 7. The commons entered into a debate concerning the King's Manifesto about the affair of the Palatinate; and being resolved into a committee of the whole house, and Mr. Whitlocke in the chair.

Sir Benj. Rudyard made the following speech:—"Mr. Whitlocke; If we may do the Prince Elector good, by our good word, I hope we shall not stick to afford it him. A word spoken in due season is worth more than gold and silver at another time. His majesty's ambassador is now at the diet at Ratisbon where the emperor and other princes are, by friendly treaties, endeavouring to make up the breaches of Germany. If this opportunity be omitted, his highness's affairs will be exceedingly cast behind-hand. It is true, that our treaties heretofore have not been prosperous; the reason hath been, because of the tinen unhappy difference between the king and his people, which brought a disvalue upon this kingdom abroad. But now, when the world shall take notice of the good understanding between his majesty and his subjects, by an earnest and solemn joining of the whole parliament with his majesty's declaration; the propositions, coming from hence, will carry with them more weight, more authority; which is the way to redeem our engagements at an easy rate, to save those great charges which come do so much fear. If we should be backward in this great work, we shall cancel the obligations of nature, of honour, of reason, of state, of religion; all which bind us to it. Wherefore, my humble motion is, That we may draw up a short round Manifesto to wait upon and affirm the King's Declaration, to be still managed by advice of parliament: this will be safe for ourselves, more powerful and effectual for the Prince Elector."

Sir Symonds D'Ewes, member for Sudbury, made a speech upon this subject as follows; which, as it is a faithful abstract of the affairs of Europe, for the last 20 years, deserves particular notice:—"Mr. Whitlocke; We have, during this parliament, fallen upon the debate of the greatest and most important affairs, concerning our own good and welfare at home, that ever were agitated and discussed, at one meeting, in the house of commons. And we are at this present, by the gracious invitation of his royal majesty, expressed in his most just Manifesto read unto us, resolved to take into consideration the most sublime and most difficult business of the Christian world abroad; which hath, for the space of above 20 years last past, drawn all the kingdoms and states of Europe into an immediate or mediate engagement; in which there have been 20 pitched battles fought, a million of men, women, and children destroyed by the sword, by the flames, by famine, and by pestilence; and that, sometimes, populous and fertile empire of Germany reduced to a most extreme and calamitous desolation. I have, in those few spare hours I could borrow yesterday from the public service of the house, recollected some few particulars, which may conduce to the clearing of this great cause; being drawn out of the autographs themselves, or out of our records at home, or out of the writings of our very adversaries, and others abroad. I shall, therefore, begin at the original itself of the never-enough to be lamented loss of the prince Palatine's dominions and electoral dignity; that so we may take along with us, in our intended disputes, not only our affections, but our consciences. It is therefore very manifest to all, that are but meanly versed in the cabinet affairs of Christendom, that the Jesuits have consulted, for many years last past, as well before as since the furious wars of Germany, by what means to ruin the evangelical princes and party there. Their chief aim hath been, so to divide the protestant princes amongst themselves, as they might be made use of against each other, for each others ruin.—The first occasion that offered itself within our memories, was the pretences of several competitors to the dukedoms of Cleves and Juliers; and they failed, but a very little, to have executed their intended design upon that occasion: but their hopes failing in it, they apply themselves integrally to Ferdinand of Austria, duke of Gratz; a prince, not long since, so poor, and of so mean a consideration to add the weight of but one grain to the down balancing of the affairs of Christendom, as his name was scarce heard of. They find him a fit subject for them to work upon, having, from his cradle, been bred up in an extreme hatred of the Protestant party, who professed the truth. They resound nothing into the ears of the old emperor Matthias, but his cousin Ferdinand's high merits; so that he, passing by his own natural brothers, and the head of his house the Spanish king, adopts Ferdinand of Gratz for his son: so to prepare a way to make him the successor of his sceptre, crown and purple.—Then were the sacred diets of the empire, the antient means to reconcile differences and prevent jealousies, as often dissolved abortively as called insincerely. Rumours were spread of practices and designs against the Protestant princes and cities: and that those rumours might not vanish in smoke, the liberties of the great and antient city of Strasburg were oppressed. The Protestant princes, seeing materials and engines on every side prepared for their ruin, were necessitated to meet at Heidelberg, and there to conclude an union amongst themselves. This gave the

Jesuits an assured hope of making Germany speedily miserable by a calamitous war; for not only the pontifical princes took the opportunity to settle a Catholic League, as they called it, amongst themselves; but also the elector of Saxony, like a true Pseudo-Lutheran, neither Protestant nor Papist, shews as good an affection to the catholic league as the evangelical union.—The old emperor Matthias begins now to act his part, and the Jesuits spur on their ready scholar, Ferdinand of Gratz, to ascend the bloody theatre they had so long designed him. Through the old Emperor's intercession, abusing the Bohemian Protestants credulity, with sugared flatteries and large promises, he is admitted to the crown of that rich kingdom; which soon after made way for him unto the crown of Hungary also.—The Jesuits and the Spaniards did, now, only want a fair occasion to begin a war in Germany. The emperor Matthias labours with the Protestant princes to dissolve their union; which not taking effect, the bishop of Spiers is encouraged, underhand, to pick a quarrel with the prince elector Palatine, and to build a strong fortress upon his neighbour's territories; pretending he had a right to that plot of ground upon which the said fortress was raised: but an higher providence did not suffer this spark to set Germany on fire, though it had been kindled at the prince elector's own doors, to affront and provoke him; for he, by an incredible celerity, did cause the said fortress to be demolished, before the enemy could fit and furnish it for his intended use, which made him sit still and study for a new occasion: and, that it might not be long wanting, the liberties and privileges of the Protestants in Bohemia, contrary to their new king Ferdinand's oath, were temerated; and, by that means, in the year 1619, the greater part of the estates of that kingdom were necessitated, after mature deliberation, to abdicate him, and to elect Frederick, prince elector Palatine, for their king.—And thus are arrived at that sad period of time, upon which so many fatalities have ensued; in which we may see evidently, that the prince elector Palatine was not, wilfully, guilty of any part of that ocean of blood that hath been since spilt in Germany, as the Pontifical side pretend to be. The scene was, long before, prepared by the enemies of the truth; and the kingdom of Bohemia was filled with arms and hostilities, divers months before his accepting of that crown; when himself laboured, by an earnest mediation, to have given a peaceable issue to those bloody beginnings. It was the honour and greatness of that matchless princess that he gained here, and the considerable succours they expected from hence, that especially drew the Bohemians to that choice. It therefore concerns us now at length to provide, that the prince elector himself, and the other princely branches of that great family, (being the second without question, if not the first and most antient of the empire) extracted, by their last match, from the royal line of Great Britain, should not, under colour of their father's accepting that crown, to which they now pretend no title, be for ever despoiled of their ancient inheritance and electoral dignity; to which calamity they had never been reduced, had not the French king, at that time, forgo ten the old maxim of his predecessors, which was, 'To keep even the balance of Germany;' to which also did most fatally concur the duke of Bavaria's ambition, betraying his own blood, and the duke of Saxony's taking arms against the evangelical party. By this means, and the advancing of Spinola with the Spanish army out of the Netherlands, not only the kingdom of Bohemia was lost in a few months; but the Palatinate also, excepting some few places of strength, invested by the enemy; and that poor people left to slaughter, calamity, and desolation. The correspondence of some ill ministers of this state abroad with those of foreign states here, assisted by some fatal instruments at home, furthered all this mischief; at that instant putting this state in hope of a Match, when supplies should rather have been sent from hence, to have preserved, at least, the electoral territories from an invading power. It is true that the Spanish Match had been, generally, treated of some 5 or 6 years before this fatal fire kindled in Germany, being first set on foot by the duke of Lerma, under Philip of Austria, late king of Spain; but now it was effectually advanced, and fortified with a conjoined Treaty of accommodating the Palatinate's cause, without effusion of blood. This and much more appears in the original Journal Books of the two houses of parliament, anno 21 Jacobi Regis, which I have so far perused, as so short a time would give leave: and though these matters are there set down at large, especially in the records out of the house of peers; yet I have abstracted them into so narrow a compass, as may well sort with the little spare time of this house to hear it. The relation was first made at Whitehall during that parliament, in the presence of the greater part of both the said houses, Feb. 24: * It was afterwards reported upon the 27th in the house of lords, by the then lord keeper; and, in the house of commons, by sir Rd. Weston, at that time chancellor of the exchequer. It is there at large set forth, That his majesty's royal father, having had several fair promises from the emperor Ferdinand II. and the king of Spain, of a peaceable restitution of the Palatinate, caused not only such considerable forces, as were then remaining in Germany under the prince Elector's ensigns, to disband; but procured also some places of strength in the Palatinate itself, to be surrendered and consigned over to the late Infanta of Spain. But in 1622, our late royal sovereign king James, upon his ambassador's return from Brussels, having discovered the emperor's intentions to be full of insincerity and deceit, wrote his princely letters, bearing date at Hampton-Court, Oct. 3, 1622, to the (then and still) earl of Bristol; his majesty's extraordinary ambassador in Spain, to let him know, That he now perceived little sincerity in all the Spanish king's promises for the peaceable restitution of the Palatinate, by whose only means he had suffered the same to be lost to the Emperor; and that therefore he should presently press that king, either to give a full and direct answer, under his hand and seal, for the restitution thereof, or else to join his arms with his majesty against the Emperor, for the recovery of the same. But this matter, as it further appears by the original Journal Books of the house of lords, being either not thoroughly pressed, or notably dissembled; so many delays ensued one upon the neck of another, as, in the issue, it drew his royal majesty, then prince of Wales, to undertake that dangerous and remote Journey into that nation, which hath been the long and hereditary enemy of England. This Journey was chiefly undertaken by so great a prince to give an end, one way or other, to that unfortunate Treaty; and his stay in Spain did wholly proceed from his earnest desire to have effected a peaceable restitution of the Palatinate; and therefore I doubt not but he shall now live to verify that excellent and heroic expression, which he made to the Comte d'Olivarez, a little before his coming out of that kingdom, 'Look for neither marriage nor friendship, without the Restitution of the Palatinate.' And I assure myself, that the force and power of Great Britain, which was lately, by subtle and wicked instruments, divided against itself, being now united in one again, will be able to effect such great and considerable actions, as shall render his majesty's name and reign glorious to all posterity. The two houses of parliament, at that time, received the before-mentioned declaration with so much resentment, that, having rendered glory to God that had so seasonably discovered the Spanish frauds, and, next, their humble acknowledgments to their then gracious sovereign, for requiring their counsels in a business of so great importance; they did unanimously advise him to break off the said two Treaties, touching the Marriage and Restitution of the Palatinate; engaging no less than their persons and purses for the Recovery of the then prince elector's antient and hereditary dominions *.—It appears also in the original Journal-Book of this house, Anno 1. Caroli, that this great business was again taken into consideration, but was finally intombed with other matters of great moment, by the fatal and abortive dissolution of that parliament. If therefore this great council of the kingdom did, in those two former parliaments, account the restitution of this illustrious and princely family to be of such great necessity for the preserving of true religion abroad, and securing ourselves at home, as to engage themselves for an assistance therein;

* See vol. 1 p. 1332,

* See the Address of both Houses, on this subject, in vol. 1. p. 1388, certainly we may, upon much better grounds, undertake the same now, when I assure myself we may go as far with 1000*l.* for the present, as we could have done with 10,000 at that time; for let us but take a short view of the estate of Christendom, what it was then, and what it is now, and we shall easily perceive a great alteration in the balance thereof.—In France, where M. de Luynes did then rule all, being himself acted by the Pope's legate, that king, contrary to the examples of Francis I. Henry II. and of Henry the Great, his own father, and contrary to the maxims and interests of that state, and his own safety, advanced the formidable power and spreading greatness of the house of Austria; but now the French king's eyes have been so opened, that, shaking off that former unhappy slumber he was in, he hath, by his arms and power, to his immortal honour and glory, for divers years last past, endeavoured to restore again that liberty to the German empire, in the ruin of which himself had so fatally before concurred.—The Swedes were then involved in several wars, or jealousies, with the Poles, and inforced to keep at home to defend their own; but now have a strong army, and possess divers places of important consequence within the very bowels of the empire. The episcopal electors, with the other Pontifical princes and prelates, the sworn enemies of the Protestant religion, were then rich and potent; but, since, most of their countries and territories have tasted of the same calamities of war, which they had formerly brought upon their neighbours; so that now they are, most of them, scarce able to defend their own, much less to offend any other. The Pseudo-Lutheran elector of Saxony, (that is actually guilty, more than any other single person living, of all those calamities and slaughters, which have for so many years wasted Germany; and was then so liberal of his treasure, and so forward with his arms to facilitate the emperor's designs, to the almost utter subversion of the true religion in Germany) is now, after the reiterated temeration of his faith and promises, the fatal survivor of the several devastations of his own country and dominions; so that all those vast difficulties and great dangers, which might well have retarded the forwardness of those two former parliaments, the first being held in the 21st year of his majesty's royal father, and the latter in his own first year, being now removed, we have greater encouragements than ever, to concur with our sacred sovereign, in asserting this his most just and princely Manifesto.—For my own part, I expect no good issue of the present Treaty at Ratisbon: I know the duke of Bavaria's ambition too well, ever to imagine he will part with those large revenues, and much less with the Septem-viral dignity, and suffrage he hath obtained by the prince elector's calamity and misfortune, unless it be extorted from him by force of arms.—My humble advice therefore is, That we send up to the lords to desire a speedy conference with them; in which we may acquaint their lordships how far we have proceeded in our appropriation of his majesty's most royal Manifesto, and to move them to concur with us therein.

After long debate the commons came to the Resolution, "That this house doth approve of his majesty's pious intention, in behalf of his royal sister the queen of Bohemia, and his nephew the prince elector Palatine, and the rest of the princes of that family; and of the publishing his Manifesto to that purpose: and this house will be ready to give his majesty such advice and assistance therein by parliament, as shall stand with his honour, and the interest and affection of this kingdom, if the present treaty shall not succeed."

Further Resolutions as to Breaches of Privilege, &c. July 3. The commons resumed the debate about Mr. Hollis, and others, imprisoned and fined, 4to Caroli, and came to the following Resolutions: 1. That sir George Crooke, one of the justices of the King's-bench, was not guilty of the delay in granting the Habeas Corpus to Mr. Hollis, &c. 2. That the continuance of Mr. Hollis, &c. 5to Caroli in prison, by the then judges of the King's-bench, for not putting in sureties for their good behaviour, was without just or legal cause. 3. That the exhibiting the Information against Mr. Hollis, &c. in the King's-bench, being members of parliament, and for matters done in parliament, was a breach of privilege of parliament. 4. That the over-ruling of the plea, pleaded by Mr. Hollis, &c. upon that information, to the jurisdiction of the court, was against the law and privilege of parliament. 5. That the judgment given upon nihil dicit, against Mr. Hollis, &c. and the fines thereupon imposed, and their several imprisonments thereupon, was against the law and the privileges of parliament. 6. That the proceedings against Mr. Hollis, &c. by committing them, and prosecuting them in the Star-chamber and King's-bench, is a grievance. 7. That Mr. Hollis, Mr. Strode, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Long, and the heirs and executors of sir John Eliot, sir Miles Hobart, and sir Peter Hayman, respectively, ought to have reparation for their respective damages and sufferings, against the lords and others of the council, by whose warrants they were apprehended and committed; against the council that put their hands to the information in the Star-chamber; and against the judges of the King's-bench. 8. That Mr. Laurence Whittaker, being a member of the parliament, 4to Caroli, and entering into the chamber of sir John Eliot, being likewise a member of that parliament, searching of his trunk and papers, and sealing of them, is guilty of a breach of privilege of parliament, this being done before the dissolution of the parliament. 9. That Mr. L. Whittaker, being guilty of the breach of privilege of parliament, as aforesaid, shall be sent forthwith to the Tower, there to remain a prisoner during the pleasure of this house." Whereupon Mr. Whittaker being called down, and kneeling at the bar, Mr. Speaker pronounced this sentence against him. Mr. Whittaker then desired permission of the house to speak for himself; which being granted, he did not deny the matter of fact, but did endeavour to attenuate it by the confusion of the times, at that time; the length of time since the crime was committed, being 13 years; the command that lay upon him, being commanded by the king and 28 privy counsellors. But all this availed him nothing, for he was immediately sent to the Tower.

The Commons resolve to vest the Lands, &c. of Archbishops, &c. in Feoffees.] July 9. This day Mr. Hyde made a report from the grand committee, to whom the bill concerning Episcopacy was referred; when the following Resolutions were agreed to by the house: 1. "That all the lands, possessions, and rights of all deans, and deans and chapters, shall, by this bill, be committed to the hands of feoffees, to be nominated in the bill. 2. That all the lands and possessions of all the archbishopricks and bishopricks of England and Wales, (except the impropriations and advowsons) shall, by this act, be given to the king. 3. That all the impropriations and advowsons, belonging to the aforesaid bishopricks, shall be committed into the hands of feoffees, in the same manner as the lands of deans and chapters are appointed to be."

The next day the debate was resumed; and on the report, from the same chairman, it was resolved, "That a competent maintenance shall be allotted out of the lands and possessions of the cathedral churches, for the support of a fit number of preaching ministers, for the service of every such church; and a proportionable allowance for the reparation of the said churches. Also, that such ecclesiastical power, as shall be exercised for the government of the church, shall be transferred, by this act, into the hands of commissioners to be named in the act."

Mr. Hollis's Speech, at a Conference on behalf of the Palatine Family.] July 10. The commons had desired a conference, with a committee of the lords, concerning the Manifesto from the king, relating to the Palatine family; the report of which was made, in the upper house, by the lord privy seal, this day; who told them, that Mr. Hollis, from the commons, in an elegant expression and true resentment of the case of a distressed prince, had acquainted them with the particulars thereof:

Mr. Hollis spoke as follows* "My lords; The knights, citizens, and burghesses of the house of commons, have commanded me to let your lordships know, that they have taken into their serious consideration, his majesty's proposal unto them of the Manifesto; in which he is graciously pleased to declare his pious intentions concerning his royal sister, the prince Palatine her son, and the rest of the Electoral family. They do, with all humbleness, acknowledge his majesty's favour, in communicating unto them any part of his royal thoughts; and asking their advice and counsel, in a business that doth so nearly concern him, as needs must the happiness, nay the subsistence, of these distressed princes of so glorious an extraction; their veins being enriched with the same blood of royal ancestors, which is derived, with glory, into his sacred person. And, in that relation, the house of commons look upon them with an eye of tenderness; wishing that every drop of that princely blood may ever be illustrated with honour and happiness; that his majesty may be crowned with this blessing, to see nothing but glory in himself, and in all that bow unto him.—To hear then, that these princes, so nearly allied unto the king, should suffer that which is so unworthy of them; instead of honour, of greatness, to find oppression; instead of a fortune answerable to their birth and relation, to have their ancient patrimony torn from them, and detained by a hand of violence; is a thing which makes our ears to tingle, and our hearts to rise within us.—My lords, the loyal subject of England is so well tuned in a sweet agreeing harmony to the person of his prince, that he is affected with the least touch upon any part of the princely string, and answers it instantly with a sound proportionable; if it be good and pleasant, with joy and exultation; if harsh and displeasing, with sorrow and lamentation; a sorrow not womanish and faint, but accompanied with indignation, with vigorous, magnanimous resolution to be avenged upon whosoever dare give offence to our royal sovereign.—This then is enough to make us zealous for the redress of the Prince Elector's wrongs, and to desire, with impatience, to see him re-invested in his rightful possessions; were there nothing else to move us to it, but our love, our affection, and our duty to the king.—But, my lords, there is yet another motive, which hath a strong irresistible operation with us; and it is the consideration, how much this is of importance to the good of Religion, the advancement of the Protestant party, and the redeeming many souls from their Antichristian bondage. This hath a double aspect, and relates to us, not only as we are fellow-members with them of the true church; which obliges us to a care and defence of them, and gives us an assurance of a reward in heaven: but doth more particularly concern us, in point of policy and reason of state, by supporting our allies, to advance this kingdom to the highest pitch of greatness and reputation; to make us formidable abroad to the enemies of our church and state; and so enjoy peace, safety, and tranquillity at home. For, my lords, the Protestant religion and this kingdom are like Hippocrates's twins, that must both live and die together. It is madness to think this state can subsist, if religion be subverted; and as great madness to think our religion can continue here, if we suffer it to be destroyed and eradicated out of our neighbour countries; which can no more be, (that is, our religion and this kingdom be preserved) when our neighbours of the same religion and belief with us be consumed, than a fort can hold out, when all the out-works are taken; or the heart preserved, when a gangrene hath seized on the outward parts of the body.—My lords, as the true religion is, in fact, the heart of England, which gives it life, and makes it flourish with strength and power; so is England, in politic respects, the heart of the Protestant religion in all the other parts of Christendom; and, upon occasion, must send out supply into all the neighbouring countries professing the same religion with it; which (to be themselves in safety) must be under the protection of this fort, under contribution to this garrison. And, on the other side, if these countries be, one after another, invaded and possessed by the enemies of our religion, that great tie of religion between us and those bonds, which only can unite and strengthen our mutual affections and relations, will be dissolved; and if they get one part, their appetite will increase soon to swallow up another; as, first the Palatinate; then the other parts of Germany; afterwards the Low Countries; and then let us think in what condition England will stand. It will be left as a cottage in a vineyard; as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers; as a besieged city, when all the defences are gone: it will soon fall to be a prey to the enemy.—My lords, this consideration likewise works with the commons of England; and as the wise man is to have his eyes in his head, and look before him; so they do look before them, and had rather see this evil met half-way, than stay till it comes to them; rather see the eating gangrene of the Austrian ambition in Germany, than tarry till it seizes upon the vital parts of this Island, when the death of religion must inevitably follow. This business took up a serious debate; and, after much time and many arguments spent upon the subject, the knights, citizens, and burghes assembled in parliament, came to a resolution.' (Here the Resolution of the 7th of July was read, and then Mr. Hollis proceeded thus:) This Resolution, my lords, they have commanded me to represent unto your lordships, and desire you will join with them in a tender of the like advice unto his maj. and approbation of his royal intendments: and likewise, that his maj. may be moved, in the name of both houses, to recommend this business unto his parliament of Scotland, to have the consent and furtherance of that kingdom; that, as we are brethren in mutual affection, in an equal tie of duty and allegiance unto the king our sovereign; so we may be brethren also in the same tender care, and loving zeal for the good and support of his majesty's kindred, their restitution to their ancient inheritance, and the safety of the Reformed Churches.'

July 11. The lords, by a general vote of their house, concurred with the commons; and likewise ordered a committee to attend the king, to know when he would be waited on, by both houses, on this occasion.

Report of a Conference concerning the Ten Propositions.] July 12. Several debates had happened in the house of lords, concerning the Ten Propositions sent up some time ago, from the commons; and all of them had been agreed to, except that in which the queen, her domestics and chaplains were concerned. This day, the earl of Bristol reported the effect of a conference with the commons on this subject; in which it was argued by them, first, That the college of Capuchins, at Denmark-House, should be sent out of the kingdom, because they are conceived to be busy men in giving intelligence to foreign states: and the house of commons are induced to believe this, because they understand that the letters of the Capuchins, which were imported and exported in one week, came to 3*l.* 10*s.* the carriage. Next, they conceive, that there are some things contained in the Articles of Marriage with France, contrary to law. Concerning the education of the prince, they said they would consult further about it. As to licences granted to Recusants, they desire his majesty may be moved that none may be granted hereafter. Concerning the removal of Popish Recusant ladies from court, they say they mentioned no particulars, but spoke in general. Touching that which concerns the queen, they conceive they have had no full answer yet. As to an explanation of who are active Papists, they mean those Recusants who are rich and have most power in the counties where they live, as well peers as others; whom they desire may be disarmed according to law. Touching the Pope's Nuncio, the house of commons are preparing a bill against him. As to what concerns lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants, considering the state of this kingdom, as it now stands, the commons desire they may be such persons as both houses approve of; and, that they may be the more enabled to act for the defence of this kingdom, there will be a course taken for the supplying them with monies out of the subsidies. And the commons desire that the king may be moved to let them have such quantities of powder out of his stores as may be spared, and they will pay after the rate of 10*d.* a pound for it, as soon as they can get money. And further, to move his majesty, That the arms, which have been taken out of the several counties, may be restored to them; and if the king can spare any arms, out of his stores, they will buy them to furnish these southern parts.'

The Bill for Tonnage, &c. passed.] This day Mr. Hampden carried up to the lords another bill for granting to his majesty a subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage, and other sums of money payable upon merchandizes imported and exported; which was read 3 times in that day, and, being put to the question, was accordingly passed into a law.

Address of both Houses on the Manifesto relating to the Palatinate.] A committee of lords having waited on the king to know his pleasure, when both houses should attend him with their address on the Manifesto, the king appointed 5 that afternoon for this purpose: accordingly, at that hour, both houses went up to the Banqueting-Room Whitehall; when the Speaker of the house of lords delivered himself to the king in these words:—"Your majesty, in your royal person, was pleased to recommend the manifesto, touching the Palatinate, to be read in full parliament, and to be advised of by both houses. Both houses have since seriously considered of it, and have commanded me to present their humble advice unto your sacred majesty, which is expressed in the Declaration, that hath passed the votes of both the houses, and which I am commanded to read unto your majesty." Then he read the Resolution of the house of commons on the 7th of July, and the lords concurrence with it on the 10th, after which he said, "I am likewise commanded to present the humble desires of both houses of parliament, that your majesty would be pleased to recommend this Manifesto, unto the parliament of Scotland, to have the concurrence of that kingdom."

To which the king returned the following Answer: "We take very thankfully the concurrent advices of both the houses of parliament, in so great and pious a work, declared in these Votes and Resolutions, which you have read unto us. We will also take care to recommend this Manifesto, unto the parliament of Scotland, to have the concurrence of that kingdom, which we doubt not but they will perform."

The Speaker was also ordered to press the king for an Answer to the Third of the Ten Propositions, concerning the Removal of Counsellors, to which he said, "My answer is, That I know of none; the which, methinks, should both satisfy and be believed; I having granted, hitherto, all that hath been demanded by parliament: nor do I expect that any should be so unadvised, as, by slander, or any other ways, to deter any that I trust in my public affairs, from giving me free counsel; especially since freedom of speech is always demanded, never refused, to parliaments."

Both houses being returned, the lords sent a message to the commons, to desire a conference on his majesty's Answer to the Third of the Ten Propositions, as lately delivered.

The Royal Assent given to the Tonnage Bill.] About the same time another message came up to the lords by sir Henry Vane, jun. to desire that the bill for Tonnage and Poundage might be delivered unto them, to be brought up and presented by their Speaker, in regard it was a free gift of the commons of England; with the commission under the great seal annexed. But the lords taking this message into consideration, and perusing the commission, found, by the tenor of it, that the said bill could not pass the royal assent by virtue of this commission, if they were separated. Therefore, to remove all ambiguities, it was resolved to send some lords to desire his majesty would be pleased to come in person, presently, and give the royal assent to the bill. Upon this information the king came down immediately to the house, and having sent for the commons, the bill was delivered to their Speaker, who presented it to his majesty, and the royal assent was given to it. At the same time the king signified, "That lest, in his Answer, this day, to both houses concerning the Third Head, there should be any mistake upon the word 'Slander,' his majesty declared, that he did not mean it of either house of parliament, or any member thereof."

Resolutions of the Lords against the Court of the North.] July 13. The lords took into consideration the court of the lord president at York, and to give Judgment therein; for a free debate whereof the house was put into a committee, and the votes of the house of commons about it were read. After debate, the lords came to the following Resolutions. 1. "That the commission and instructions, whereby the president and council of the North exercise a jurisdiction, are illegal, both in creation and execution. 2. That the commission and jurisdiction is unprofitable to his majesty. 3. That the commission and jurisdiction is inconvenient and grievous to his majesty's subjects of those parts. 4. That the house doth join with the house of commons, in beseeching his majesty that the present commission and instructions may be revoked, and no more such granted for the future. Lastly, It was declared, That seeing the commission and instructions of the Court of York are illegal in the creation and execution, that the former judges in the said court, who have given judgment, and proceeded as they thought in their consciences, upon true and legal grounds, shall not be liable to punishment for the time past, unless it be for corruption; and also that all judgments and decrees in that court shall not be liable to question, but in case of injustice; and that none in that case shall be barred of their appeal. And if it appear that there is a necessity, for the ease of that country, to have a court, this house will advise with the house of commons how one may be established, by law, for that purpose."—A committee of lords were appointed to draw up some heads for a conference with the commons on the aforesaid particulars; that so the persons that were judges, and the acts of that Court, might have a saving for them.

The officers, who had been employed in the court of Star-Chamber, having petitioned the lords for some relief, the house did conceive no fitter relief for these poor officers, the king's servants, than to remit them to the king's mercy, That he would be graciously pleased to allow somewhat proportionable to their losses, out of such fines as may accrue to him in the high court of parliament.

The Commons order the Lord Digby's Speech to be burnt.] The commons had some time before, appointed a committee to consider about the printing and publishing a Speech made by the lord Digby, on the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford (p. 749), and this day a report of it being made by sir John Evelyn, it was resolved "That sir Lewis Dives and John Moore as also Thomas Parslow, printer of the said speech, are delinquents, in printing and publishing thereof; and that this book, thus printed, deserves the brand of this house." After which they made the following orders. "Whereas, on the 21st of April last past, there was a speech spoken, in the house of commons, at the passing the bill of attainder against Thomas earl of Strafford, by the lord Digby, then a member of the said house; the which speech contained in it matters untrue and scandalous, as they have reference to the proceedings of the committees of both houses, and to the evidence of the witnesses produced in that cause: and whereas the said speech was published by the lord Digby, after the bill of attainder was passed by vote in this house, and after great offence had been taken to the speech, and the same questioned in the house; to the scandal of the proceedings of this house, and to those of his majesty and both houses of parliament: it was therefore ordered, that the said books should be publicly burnt, part of them in the New Palace-Yard, Westminster, others in Cheapside, London, and the rest in Smithfield, by the hands of the common hangman. And the sheriffs of London and Middelsex were to take care to see this order executed."

Then it was farther resolved, "That this house shall move the lords to join in a petition to his majesty, that he will be pleased to forbear to confer any honour or employment upon the person of the lord Digby, who has deserved so ill of the parliament."

* In lord Digby's Apology (printed in January, 1641, by Thomas Walkley) he gives the following account of the printing and publishing this speech: "I did not find only that it was unfaithfully reported, and uncharitably interpreted, but was informed, that copies went abroad of it so falsely and maliciously collected, as made the whole speech a justification of my lord of Strafford's innocence; and sir Lewis Dives having heard of such a copy in the house of a citizen of good quality, where he heard me mentioned as a person fit to have his name fixed upon posts, that I might be torn in pieces by the people; upon that reason earnestly desired me to give him a true copy of what I had said in that argument, which I did; and he forthwith gave direction for the printing it, without any privacy of mine; yet, if I had consented to it, and directed it, I profess I should little have imagined, that (at a time when there was such an universal licence taken to print every thing, of how great irreverence soever, either to church or state, with (impunity) a speech made in the house of commons, a speech so narrowly and severely sifted and examined there, and yet let pass

Petition to the King against the Queen's going abroad.] July 14. A message was brought from the commons to the lords to desire a conference, presently, by committees of both houses, concerning the Queen's intended Journey to the Spa in Germany. This conference being held, it produced a Petition from both houses, which was presented to the king the day following, and was in these words.

"Your majesty's most loyal subjects, the lords and commons, taking notice of an intention of the queen's majesty to pass beyond the sea, whereby the kingdom will be deprived of the comfort of her majesty's presence, have thought good to express their humble duties and affection for your majesty, and to the royal person of the queen, in some considerations which they do now present unto you, as they conceive very important to the good of this kingdom, and the safety and contentment of her majesty; whose honour and happiness shall always have a chief place in their estimation and desires: which considerations are these following; 1. There is great cause to doubt lest the papists have some design upon her majesty's journey, because the house hath been informed that divers of them have sold off their lands to a good value, and used other means to get ready money. 2. It is observed that some of them have been very diligent in gathering great quantities of gold. 3. It is informed that more than an ordinary number of Papists are gone beyond sea already, and those of the better sort. 4. The great number of English fugitives now beyond the seas, who, by their late designs and practices, are known to be full of malice to the state, and will, no doubt, seek all opportunities of access to her majesty; and as much as they can, labour to mix into her such evil counsels as may trouble the peace of the kingdom; whereof, at this time, there is more danger, because the affairs of the kingdom are not yet fully settled; and, upon disbanding the army, all parts are like to abound with soldiers, and such others as will be apt to be provoked to tumults, and seditions, especially in the time of the king's absence in Scotland. 5. That the house of com-without the least censure, either on the speech itself or the author: that the printing, I say, of such a speech should rise to so high a nature, as to make me for ever incapable of any honour or employment in the common-wealth, I profess could hardly have fallen within my reason or fears to suspect: and yet 3 months after the fact committed; after the printing of an hundred speeches more by other men; after my having several times sued and pressed for hearing, whilst I was of the house of commons; after, by his majesty's favour, I had sat 6 or 7 weeks a member of the house of peers; after all this no less a judgment, as far as the vote of the house of commons could contribute to it, passed upon me, unheard, over and above the shame of having the speech itself burnt by the hand of the hangman."

mons have received information of great quantities of treasure, in jewels, plate, and ready money, packed up, to be conveyed away with the queen; not only in such a proportion as the present occasions, with due respects to her majesty's honour, may seem to require, but a far greater quantity; and that divers papists and others, under pretence of her majesty's goods, are like to convey very great sums of money, and other treasure, beyond the seas, which will not only impoverish the state, but may be employed to the fomenting some mischievous attempts, to the trouble of the public peace. 6. That, as it will be a great dishonour to the state, if her majesty should not be attended and furnished suitably to her quality; so it will be a very heavy burden, in this time of great necessity, and occasions of other public charges, if she shall be provided in so royal a manner as shall be fit for her majesty, and the honour of the king and kingdom. 7. That because we understand, by sir Theodore Mayerne, that the chief cause of her majesty's sickness and distempers proceed from some discontent of her mind, the house of commons have thought good to declare, That if any thing within the power of parliament may give her majesty contentment, they are so tender of her health, both in due respect to his most excellent majesty and herself, that they will be ready to further her satisfaction in all things, so far as may stand with that public * to which they are obliged. 8. That the house of commons conceive it will be some dishonour to this nation, if her majesty should, at this unseasonable time, go out of the kingdom, upon any grief or discontent received here; and therefore they shall labour, by all good means, to take away and prevent all just occasion of her majesty's trouble, in such manner as may further her content, and therein her health, which will be a very great comfort and joy, both to ourselves and the rest of his majesty's loving subjects. All which they humbly commend to your majesty's princely wisdom; beseeching your majesty, that, by your allowance they may represent their humble desires at such time, and with such numbers of both houses, as her majesty shall please to appoint."

The Queen's Answer.] July 10. Six lords and 12 commoners waited on the Queen, by her appointment; when the lord keeper delivered the desire of both houses to her majesty, in much the same words as are contained in the latter part of their address to the king; to which the queen returned the following Answer: "I give many thanks to both houses of parliament, for their great care of my health, and their affection to me, hoping I shall see the effect of it. Truly, nothing but my health could have made me to resolve of this journey; and, if I thought I could serve the king and this kingdom with the hazard of my life, I would do it. And I hope you will believe that I have so much interest in the good of this kingdom, that I shall never wish any thing to the prejudice of it. You will pardon the imperfectness of my English; I had rather spoken in any other language, but I thought this would be most acceptable."

Sir T. Widdrington's Speech, on delivering the Articles against the Bp. of Ely.] July 20. The commons sent up their Charge against Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, by sir Thomas Widdrington, member for Berwick; who, upon presenting the same, made the following speech: "My Lords; I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burgesses now assembled for the commons in parliament, to deliver to your lordships these Articles against Matthew Wren, D.D. late bishop of Norwich, and now bishop of Ely; may it please your lordships to hear them read. [Here the Articles, given before at p. 801, were read.] My lords, these articles are dipped in those colours in which this bishop rendered himself to the diocese of Norwich: they need no gloss nor varnish. In them you may behold the spirit and disposition of this bishop; hear the groans and cries of the people; see a shepherd scattering (I had almost said devouring) his own flock. He that was desired to paint Hercules, thought he had done enough, when he had made a resemblance of the lion's skin, which he was wont to carry about him as a trophy of his honour. I will not say, in these, you will find a resemblance of the lion's skin. I am sure you will find the resemblance of the skins, (that is to say, the tattered and mired fortunes) of poor innocent lambs, who have extremely suffered by the violence of this bishop. In 1635, this man was created bishop of Norwich. He is no sooner there, but he marcheth furiously. In the creation of the world, light was one of the first productions. The first visible action of this bishop, after his creation into this see, was to put out many burning and shining lights; to suspend divers able, learned, and conscientious ministers. He, that should have been the golden snuffer of these lights, became the extinguisher; and, when these are taken away, where shall poor men light their candles?—My lords, this was not all: he puts out lights, and sets up firebrands in their places; suspends painful ministers, and sets up idle, factious and superstitious priests (to use their own favourite word) in their places; yet it is the fortune of these men, at this time, like rivers in the ocean, to be buried in the extreme activity of their diocesan. He made a scourge, not of small cords, but of new injunctions and numerous articles, tied about with a strong twist of a most dangerous oath; and with this he whips, not buyers and sellers, but the faithful dispensers of the word, out of their churches, out of their estates, out of their dear country. This Noah (if I may so call him without offence) as soon as he entered into the ark of this diocese,

* Hiatus in Orig.

he sends; nay, forces doves to fly out of this ark; and when they return unto him with olive branches in their mouths of peaceable and humble submission, he will not receive them into this ark again; unless, like ravens, they would feed upon the carrion of his new inventions, they must not have any footing there. He stands as a flaming sword, to keep such out of his diocese.—My lords, unless he had done this, he could never have hoped to have brought that great work, he undoubtedly aimed at, to any perfection. Whilst the Palladium of Troy stood, that city was impregnable. The Greeks had no sooner stolen that away, but they instantly won the city: so then he first put out the candles, then was the opportunity to shuffle in his works of darkness: he first beats off the watchmen and seers; then was likely to follow that which the impiety of some was pleased to stile, ‘The piety of the times.’ This being done, he then begins to dress out God’s worship, according to his own fancy. This he expresseth in injunctions and directions, the Minervas of his own brain. We find them stiled, ‘Regales injunctiones domini episcopi;’ a stile too sacred to baptize his brats withall: I shall be bold to call them ‘Tyrannicas injunctiones domini episcopi.’—Stories afford not a more barbarous cruelty, than to join a dead and a living body together; the one is miserably killed with the stench of the other. This bishop, who, like Aaron, should have stood between the living and dead, hath joined to lively ordinances many dead and venomous ceremonies; which have no other life than what they received from the breath of his injunctions; and these are pressed upon the consciences; even these must be observed, as moral laws. An arbitrary government in the church is more dangerous, more grievous than that in the state: this is exercised upon men’s consciences, the most tender parts; and is the very pinnacle of tyranny, and of all others the most intolerable. That blow, which will hardly be felt by the arm, will put out the eye. My lords, in the time of Richard I. one of this man’s predecessors, a valiant bishop, went into the Holy War: This bishop hath raised a war at home in his own diocese; a war not against Saracens, Barbarians, Turks, or Infidels, but against good and well disposed people. I know not what stile to give this war: without doubt, my lords, this was no Holy War. The weapons used in this war were 28 Injunctions, 139 Articles, containing 879 Questions. The soldiers were chancellors, commissaries, officials, commissioners, rural deans, &c. Himself commanded in chief. The ways of assault and killing were by ex-communications, suspensions, denigrations.—I stop here. ‘Mille modis moritur mortales.’ The magazine, wherein all these were originally hatched and lodged, was the superstitious and malicious breast of this bishop. His diocese was the stage where the direful tragedies of this war were acted, by the space of two years and upwards. Thus did he trouble Israel, in the time of peace; nay, by these, he put some of the chariots and horsemen of Israel to flight; out of these he raiseth a farm of 500 l. for his primary visitation. If it be considered, con pertinentiis, it was not dear, yet well improved; for it was but 40 l. in the time of some of his predecessors. Will it please your lordships, with patience, to cast your eyes upon the model of this bishop’s zeal, piety, and religion: let his affection to Prayer and Preaching speak for all the rest. First, for Prayer. It was his hap to find a prayer, which is no prayer; pretended to be prescribed by a canon, which is no canon; I mean the 35th canon, set forth in 1603; and no other prayer must be used in his diocese before sermon.—That monster of conceived prayer (pardon the expression, it is not mine own) seemed as but to him as a spell or charm. It must not be used upon any occasion. Without doubt he would never have been so strait faced and severe in this particular, if he had but dreamed of that strait which a minister, a friend of his, was put unto by this means: the story is short. A butcher was gored in the belly by an ox; the wound was cured; the party desired public thanksgiving in the congregation: the minister, finding no form for that purpose, read the collect for churching of women.—Next for Preaching. That he is most able in this kind is agreed on by all: but that he ever preached himself in his diocese, saving once, I never heard affirmed by any. His next care was that others should not preach too often; if they did, they must be put into his black bill. He changed that golden sentence of ‘Vae mihi si non prædicavero,’ into ‘Vae mihi si prædicaverint.’ He was so far from the practice of St. Paul, the great preacher of the Gentiles, who, we read, preached till midnight, that there must be no sermons in the afternoon; but there may be, nay there must be, sports and pastimes then. And, as if he had stood in fear of the inarticulate language of bells which might foretell a sermon, he cannot endure the noise of a sermon in the toll of a bell. In a word: he adorned churches, at the charge of others; and spoiled pulpits, which ought to have been the greatest part of his own charge.—My lords, you have now presented to your lordships a brother, nay, one whose place engaged him to be a father of the clergy; yet one who, like Joseph’s brethren, hath taken the coats from Joseph; nay they were forced to fly from him as Joseph from his mistress, or else they must taste of his forbidden waters; but, in their going away, he rent their skirts, nay their whole garments and livelihood from them. He hath taken the lock from many Sampsouns, and done what he could to put out their eyes, and to make them grind in the mill of his pernicious and dangerous innovations. He should, like Moses, have led his flock. Moses led the children of Israel through the Red Sea; this man drives part of his flock over the sea, but went not himself. Like Nimrod, he hath invaded the laws and liberties of the subject: he hath been as great a robber as ever was presented to your lordships: he hath robbed the king of his subjects, the greatest glory of kings; the kingdom of trade, of its tradesmen, the supporters of it. He that deprives the king of one subject, you know his punishment; and what shall be the punishment of him who hath robbed the king of so many subjects?—In the 16th of Hen. 3. we find a tenant in dower punished in action of waste, because she had destroyed so rich villains, and made them beggars. I appeal to your lordships, what is his offence who hath committed so much wilful waste and spoil, beggared hundreds, not villains, but freeborn subjects. He robbed souls of that sweet Manna, which is Pabulum Animarum, the Word of God.—My lords, I have not yet recounted all his robberies: he hath robbed God of part of his day, making part of that, a day of sports; he hath robbed the subjects of their undubitable birthright, the laws of the kingdom. The citizens of Norwich must pay tythes for the rents of houses; there is no law in England, nor custom in Norwich for it: nay, and that they may be sure to be robbed of justice too, the suit for these tythes must be in his own consistory, from whence there must be no appeal, no prohibition. The true patrons of churches; they are robbed of their presentations; others, who had none or small pretence of right, are admitted upon this unhalloved maxim, That if he should institute those who had right, the pretender was without remedy. By this he inverted a fundamental law of this nation, to invest remediless rights in unjust possessors.—My lords, I cannot tell you all, but you can measure a lion by the paw. I am commanded to lay this great malefactor at your doors; one who hath been a great oppugner of the life and liberty of religion; and who set a brand of infamy (to use his own words) upon Ipswich education. In sum: one who is a compleat mirror of innovation, superstition, and oppression. He is now in the snare of those Articles, which were the works of his own hands. The rod of Moses, at a distance, was a serpent; it was a rod again when it was taken into his hand: This bishop was a serpent, a devouring serpent, in the diocese of Norwich; your lordships peradventure will, by handling of him, make him a rod again; or, if not, I doubt not but your lordships will chastise him with such rods as his crimes shall deserve. My lords, I am commanded by the house of commons to desire your lordships, that this bishop may be required to make Answers to these Articles; and that there may be such proceedings against him, as the course and justice of parliament doth admit.

The Commons present to the Lords 5 additional Propositions.] A priest of the Venetian Ambassador's having been seized and imprisoned for being an Englishman born, it occasioned a representation to the king about it, who referred it to parliament. This brought on a conference between the two houses, at which time the commons presented to the lords five Heads to be added to the other ten formerly mentioned; with a desire that their lordships would join with them to move his majesty therein, viz. That the house of commons doth desire, 1. "That no foreign ambassador whatsoever may shelter or harbour any Popish Priests or Jesuits, that are natives of the king's dominions, under pretence of being their servants, or otherwise. 2. That care may be taken concerning several commissions granted for the levying of men in Ireland, to the number of 14,000, as they are informed, and all of them Papists, in order to be transported, as is conceived, to princes not well affected to this kingdom; and that Popish commanders may not have such power, by commissions, as is, of late, granted to them. 3. Also that no Papist, hereafter, may have the keeping of any castle, fort, chase, forest, park, or walk, within England or Wales; and that such as are in possession may be put out, according to law. 4. That the king may be moved to let the house of commons have such gunpowder out of his stores as may be spared, and they will pay after the rate of 10d a pound for it, as soon as they can get money. 5. To move the king that the arms, which have been taken from the several counties, may be restored to them; and if his majesty can spare any arms out of his stores, they will buy them."

The lords, taking these five Propositions into consideration, ordered, To join with the house of commons, humbly to move his majesty, that he would be pleased to assent to them. A committee was appointed for that purpose, and the king readily consented to them all.

The Queen's Message signifying that she has put off her Journey.] July 21. This day the Queen sent another message to both houses, concerning her majesty's going abroad, which was in these words:—"When the parliament did, the other day, express their affection to me, by taking into consideration the Journey which I had resolved on for the recovery of my health; and represented a desire of my stay; with a tender care of removing all occasions of my indisposition; I could not then give a positive answer, such as I desired, for their satisfaction, because I knew not if my health would give way to it; but, since that time, I have resolved to venture my health, and, for complying with their desires, not to go, since my presence here will be acceptable unto them, and that they conceive it will be for the good of the kingdom; for I desire nothing more than to let them see, that I shall, in all things, be ready to gratify them, and to serve the state, though, as I then said, with the hazard of my life."

In return for this message, the house of commons instantly went upon a bill they had had a long time before them, about settling the Queen's Jointure. Afterwards both houses, agreed, at a conference, to return thanks to her majesty; which was delivered by the earl of Essex, in these words:—"Both houses of parliament have, with very much comfort and thankfulness, received that gracious message, whereby your majesty hath been pleased to declare your resolution of staying your intended journey, at their humble desire; which they hope will be no prejudice to the recovery of your health, but rather an advancement of it, by that contentment which you will receive from the continual expression of their affection and zeal to do you service. And they have commanded me, in their names, to declare, that both their prayers and endeavours shall concur in all things tending to your majesty's welfare and prosperity; which they shall esteem as a very great blessing, both to the kingdom and to themselves."

To which Address the Queen gave the following Answer:—"I am very glad that both houses of parliament have taken my resolution of staying my journey in so good part. They may see by it, I have preferred their content before my own health. I shall still continue to do all that lies in my power to serve the king, for the good of the kingdom, and to please them, as they have already seen."

A Conference on the King's Journey to Scotland.] The time of the king's going into Scotland approaching, the house of commons were apprehensive of an adjournment. On this subject a conference was held with the lords, and this day the earl of Bristol reported it to that house, to this purpose: "That, at this time, there being so many great and important causes depending in both houses of parliament, wherein both houses were equally interested for the public good, and many emergent occasions may happen and be known to one house before the other; therefore the desire of the house of commons is, that each house may acquaint the other, by conference, before any recess be resolved on." The lords considered of this proposal; and, after some debate, it was ordered, "That this house shall not resolve of any recess, unless there be two days warning given, and then they would acquaint the house of commons with it."

Resolutions relating to the Army Plot.] July 26. The house of commons, this day, began to resume the affair of the Plot, so long neglected; and several Resolutions of this house were made against Henry Percy, esq. sir John Socklyn, Mr. Wm. Davenant, Henry Jetmyn, esq. commissary Henry Wilmot, colonel Wm. Ashburnham, sir John Berkeley, colonel Hugh Pollard, and Daniel O'Neal, esq.; who were voted to be concerned in a conspiracy, to disaffect the army towards the parliament, and to work a belief in the said army, that the king and parliament would disagree; and so, under pretence of adhering to his majesty, to incense the said army against the parliament, thereby the better to compass their wicked design; and further endeavoured to persuade the army, that all the French about London would assist them; and, to the great scandal of the king and his government, that the prince and the earl of Newcastle were to meet the said army at Nottingham, with 1000 horse, &c. But nothing farther was done, than an order made to proceed in the another time.

The E. of Essex appointed Captain-General South of Trent.] July 28. The lord keeper told the house of lords, "That his majesty had commanded him to acquaint them, that because he intended his Journey towards Scotland, on Monday, August 7; and in regard he hath heretofore left two commissions, the one directed to the lords of the privy council, for the ordering of the affairs of state, and the issuing out of proclamations on emergent occasions; the other authorizing a person of honour to be captain-general, for the levying forces on this side Trent, if there should be any necessity, for the safety of the kingdom; his majesty now thinks fit to issue out the first commission for the said public services, in his absence, with some variations and omission according to the occasion; and hath named the earl of Essex, lord chamberlain, to be captain-general on this side Trent; but his majesty would execute nothing therein, till he had made the same known to both houses of parliament, desiring to have their concurrence and assistance in all his great affairs."—A message was immediately sent to the house of commons to desire a conference on this occasion, and the king's nomination of the earl of Essex was approved of by both houses.

A Conference relating to disbanding the Army.] July 29. The commons being willing to have both armies disbanded before the king's going into Scotland; and having at length raised money for that purpose, a conference was held; wherein it was proposed, 1. "That the 9th of August next should be the day appointed for the marching away of the Scots army. 2. That the money due for the relief of the Northern counties being ready, if they shall desire any reasonable guard for the conveyance of it, they shall be assisted in the best manner they can. 3. The house of commons desired that the English lords commissioners may move the Scots to put off the time for the payment of the 80,000*l.* part of the Brotherly Assistance Money, till the 1st of Sept. next: but, notwithstanding, they would pay it sooner if they could. 4. That after the Scots had declared their assents for disbanding, that then our army should be disbanded with all possible speed; the horse to be first disbanded." All which propositions were assented unto by the lords; who did further order, "That the lords commissioners do resume the Treaty with the Scots, and prepare it for a conclusion; and that the select committee of both houses for the ten Heads, be desired to finish and close up this Treaty."

A Conference concerning the Appointment of a Custos Regni.] July 30. Another conference was held between the two houses, on the subject of his majesty's going to Scotland. The lord privy seal made the report of it as follows: "That the commons desired that lordships to join with them in a petition to the king, that he would be pleased to grant a commission, to one or more person or persons, to have the power of a Custos Regni, or Lacum-tenens, during his absence out of the kingdom; and, amongst other things, especially to grant to such person, or persons, power to give the royal assent, in parliament, and to do such other things as the king might do in parliament, was he present: and also that his majesty may be petitioned for an act of parliament to pass to this effect, That such a commission shall not be determined until his majesty's return from Scotland to the cities of London and Westminster, or he present in full parliament."—Ordered, 'That the business of a Custos Regni shall be debated on the 2d of August; and a committee of lords were appointed to peruse some records, which Mr. Seiden had quoted in the conference concerning this matter.' The same day a bill from the commons, 'For the general taking of the late Protestation,' being read in the house of lords, it was, by their lordships urged, That though they approved of the taking of it by the members of each house, yet they did not of the general taking of it throughout the kingdom. Upon this the bill was dismissed; of which the commons having notice, they presently laid it upon the Bishops and Popish lords in the house, and came immediately to these votes upon it: 1. "That this house doth conceive that the Protestation, made by this house, is fit to be taken by every person that is well-affected in religion, and to the good of the commonwealth; and therefore doth declare, that what person soever that shall not take the Protestation, is unfit to bear any office in the church or commonwealth. 2. That the knights, citizens, and burgesses, and the barons of the Cinque Ports respectively, shall forthwith send down to the several places for which they serve, copies of this vote of the house concerning the Protestation.' 3. That these votes shall be printed, and attested under the clerk's hand."

Impeachment ordered against the Bishops. It was also ordered, "That a committee shall prepare an Impeachment against the Bishops, the makers of the New Canons and Oath, upon the votes that have passed both houses concerning these canons and oath; and that no Popish lords ought to have vote in the house of lords in matters of religion."

Answer of the Scots Commissioners as to disbanding their Army. July 31. The earl of Bristol reported the Answer from the Scots Commissioners, about the removal and disbanding of their Army, which was read in the house of lords, declaring, "That they had sent to acquaint the lord-general and the army's commissioners with it, from whom they expected very satisfactory answers. They desired that the arrears might be sent to Newcastle, that they might finish their accounts and pay their debts in those counties, and be better prepared for disbanding: but they conceived the non-timous delivery of the arrears would be the greatest impediment in their removal, &c."—However the English parliament having taken care to satisfy all the demands the Scots could make, both armies were disbanded in the beginning of next month.

A Conference about printing the late Protestation by Order of the Commons. August 2. The commons received a message from the lords, "That they desired a conference, by committee of both houses, in the Painted-Chamber, presently, if it might stand with their convenience." The messengers were told, "That this house had taken their lordships message into consideration, and would return an answer by messengers of their own." Afterwards Mr. Pym was sent up to the lords with this message:

"Whereas this house hath received a message from your lordships for a present conference, without any expression of the subject, or matter of that conference, which is contrary to the constant course of either house; therefore this house cannot yield to a present conference."—Another message was soon sent from the lords, declaring the subject of the conference; on which it was agreed to by the commons. The business of it was about a printed paper, published in the name of the house of commons, enforcing the taking of the late Protestation, which the lords desired to know whether it was by their order or not.—The commons taking time to consider of it, at another conference, the next day,

Mr. Hollis made the following speech* in justification of the votes of the commons, concerning the general taking of the Protestation:—"My Lords; I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burgesses to present unto your lordships their Answer to what was proposed yesterday. They take notice of your lordships desire, that a true intelligence may be kept between the two houses, for so your lordships did express it. In this they do, with all cheerfulness, concur with your lordships; as knowing this conjunction, between your lordships and them, is the golden chain which binds up, in one Gordian knot, the strength, the beauty, the happiness of this kingdom; which, so knit together, is not to be broken in sunder by the fiercest violence. Therefore, he who desires to unlink this chain, and dissolve this knot, or fails of his part to the preserving and continuing it fast, firm, and entire, let the sin of it lye at his door; nay, let it come into the midst of his house and consume it; let him perish, and his posterity inherit only his shame. So careful will the house of commons be to cherish and maintain this good correspondency with your lordships in all things. Next, for the business about which your lordships were then pleased to confer with them; which was a printed Paper you had met withal, as you said, in your house, setting forth some Resolutions of the house of commons, concerning which you have put unto us these two interrogatories, viz. 1. Whether those printed papers were the votes of the house of commons? 2. Whether they were printed by their command? They answer, That not finding this paper attested by their clerk's hand, they could not judge of it: they had resorted to his book, wherein their orders and votes are entered, and where they found their votes concerning their late Protestation, taken both by your lordships and them; and they found the contents of this paper to agree in terms with what is entered in their clerk's book. Then they called to mind what had passed in the house upon that occasion, when those Resolutions of theirs were voted; how they had considered of that Protestation, that it bound all men to defend the religion here established, &c. This they conceived to be a true test of every good subject, a Shibboleth to distinguish the Ephraimites from the Gileadites; that whosoever was well-affected in religion and to the good of the commonwealth, would make this Protestation; and, on the other side, who would not make it, was not well-affected. They held it their duties, in discharge of the trust reposed in them by the whole body of the kingdom, all the commons of England; who have sent them out as so many sentinels to watch for them, to give them notice of the good or the evil, friends or enemies, coming towards them. They held it, I say, their duties to declare their opinions, that such a man was not their friend, was unfit to bear office either in church or state; and therefore they passed this vote, 'That it was a thing fit and necessary to be done by them, and for such they do avow it.'—And besides, they thought it fit to give an account to those who had employed them, the several counties and burroughs that had sent them, to give them a mark, by which they might know who were good men, lovers of their country, fit to be entrusted with offices, or with the oversight of any part of church or state; and therefore they gave order this vote should be sent down unto all the parts of this kingdom. And lastly, That it might be done speedily, and not stay the writing out of so many copies, they gave order it should be printed, and be attested under their clerk's hand. The copies of which three Orders your lordships have in this printed paper, which the commons have commanded me to signify unto your lordships; and that the passing of these votes they do own, they do avow, they do justify.'—With these reasons, after some debate, the lords seemed satisfied.

Serjeant Wyld's Speech at presenting the Impeachment against the Bishops.] August 3. The commons received a report from their committee appointed to prepare an Impeachment against the Bishops concerned in making the new canons, by serjeant Wyld, one of the knights of the shire for Worcestershire; and, next day, the said gentleman was sent with it to the Lords. Upon delivering the said Impeachment at the bar, he spoke as follows:

My lords; The knights, citizens, and burghers of the common house of parliament being sensible of the great infelicities and troubles which the common-wealth hath sustained by the exorbitant courses of the Bishops; and knowing well what the Wise Man saith, 'Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil,' (the timely redress whereof doth better become the wisdom of a parliament than a too late woful repentance) have commanded me to represent unto your lordships, That Walter, bishop of Winchester, Robert, bp. of Coventry and Litchfield, Geoffrey, bp. of Gloucester, Joseph, bp. of Exeter, John, bp. of St Asaph, William, bp. of Bath and Wells, George, bp. of Hereford, Matthew, bp. of Ely, William, bp. of Bangor, Robert, bp. of Bristol, John, bp. of Rochester, John, bp. of Peterborough, Morgan, bp. of Landaff, together with William, archbishop of Canterbury, and others of the clergy of that province, at Convocation or Synod for the same province begun at London, in the year 1640, did continue, make, and promulge several Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, containing in them divers matters contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, to the rights of parliament, to the property and liberty of the subjects, and matters tending to sedition and of dangerous consequence. And to add more weight and efficacy to this monstrous designs, they did, at the same synod, under a specious and fair title, grant a Benevolence, or contribution, to his majesty, to be paid by the clergy of that province, contrary to law. It rested not there; for though it had been enough to have affrighted and terrified the king's people with strange apprehensions and fears; yet, that these might not seem to be contrivances of the brain or fancy only, they were put in execution, and were executed upon divers with animosity and rigour, to the oppression of the clergy of this realm and of his majesty's subjects, and in contempt of the king and of the law. Whether those persons, my lords, that are culpable of these offences, shall be thought fit to have an interest in the legislative power, your lordships wisdom and justice is able to judge. But, for these matters and things, the knights, citizens, and burghers of the commons house in parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the commons of England, do impeach the said Bishops before-named, of the crimes and misdemeanours before expressed; and do therefore pray, That they may be forthwith put to their Answer, that no further proceedings may be had against them, as to law and justice shall appertain.

Conference concerning the appointment of Custos Regni.] August 5. A message from ends to desire a conference on a former message from the commons, concerning a Custos Regni, or Vice-Roy, in the king's absence: Mr. Pym reported it back to the house, "That the lord privy seal told them, that commissioners were to be appointed in the king's absence to pass the following bills: 1. The act of treaty. 2. Any bill for raising Money, as there shall be occasion. 3. For raising of forces for service at sea and land, and to resist foreign invasions and seditions at home; with all things necessarily incident thereunto. 4. Any bill for Tonnage and Poundage, or other Duties upon the Exportation or Importation of Commodities. 5. For the preservation of the Salt-petre Mines, and making of Gunpowder for the service of the kingdom. 6. A power to pass a bill concerning the 8 Subsidies from the clergy. A short act to be drawn to authorize the passing of these bills. Mr. Pym added, at the lord Say said, "The lords intended it to conclude for this house; but that they might add what they should think necessary to be expedited in the king's absence." A committee was immediately ordered to consider of this bill, and meet this afternoon about it.

The Impeached Judges forbidden to go the circuit.] A conference was also held this day between the two houses, about commissions being granted to the impeached Judges to go a circuit; which the commons urged would be very disagreeable to the several counties, to have persons sent down to them, as Judges men's lives and estates, who are themselves impeached. The lords considered of this, and desired the lord keeper to take care, That the Judges, so impeached, should have no commissions to go the circuits; and, if any were granted already, to recall them.

The next day Mr. Glynn reported from the committee, "That this house shall desire the lords to join with them to pray his majesty to appoint a Custos Regni, in his absence, according to their former proposition. In ancient and constant course, from and in times, has been always to have a locum tenens, in the king's absence, the parliament sitting, not limited to any particular matter."

The Commons Reasons for desiring the King delay his Journey.] August 7. The commons were still very anxious about the king's Journey, a time assigned for it now drawing nigh; and humbly desired the lords to join with them, in, to petition for the king's stay 14 days longer; the Reasons for which Mr. Denzil Holles delivered in a speech to the lords at a conference:—"My Lords, I am commanded to your lordships in mind of what hath passed on this occasion before, concerning the king's journey to Scotland, That both houses did intent to petition his majesty not to begin his journey till the 10th of August, and to acquaint the Scots commissioners therewith; who afterwards desired this house to express their petitions in the affirmative: upon which the house of commons passed a resolution, 'That then, if his majesty pleased to go, they would submit unto it. I am commanded to declare unto your lordships, that the house of commons is desirous to submit unto his majesty's good pleasure in all things; but such is the present condition of this business, as it now standeth, that they are enforced to present some further considerations unto your lordships: 1. That, when they gave this assent, they were in hopes both armies would have been disbanded by that time; but though there hath been all possible means used to that end, yet it could not be fully effected: so the same inconvenience doth still continue. 2. The treaty cannot in so short a time, be finished, being returned from Scotland but 3 days since; but since it is ready to be finished, and monies are provided, the armies will be disbanded by the time we desire his majesty to take his Journey. 3. The distempers and jealousies of the kingdom are such, that they cannot be composed by passing some acts, unless his majesty stay the desired time. 4. No course is yet taken for the government of the kingdom in his majesty's absence, there being so many weighty things to be taken into consideration. Upon these Reasons the house of commons have thought fit to move your lordships to join with us in a petition to his majesty, to stay his Journey for 14 days longer; and we make no doubt but our brethren in Scotland will consider the strait we are in, and, for our safety, condescend to our desires: and if his majesty yield thereunto, then we shall desire your lordships to join with us in sending an express messenger to the parliament in Scotland, for the king's stay for that time; which we hope will give them satisfaction."

The Royal Assent given to several Bills.] But, to put an end to any more petitions of this kind, in the afternoon of this day, the king came to the house of lords; and sending for the commons, his majesty gave the royal assent to the following public bills: 1. An act against divers Encroachments and Oppressions in the Stannary Courts. 2. An act for the securing of such monies as are or shall be due to the inhabitants of the counties of York, and those adjoining, wherein his majesty's Army is or hath been billeted, for the billet of the soldiers there; as also to certain officers of that army, who do forbear part of their pay, &c. 3. An act for declaring unlawful and void the late Proceedings about Ship-Money, and for vacating of all records and processes concerning the same. 4. An act for ascertaining the limits and bounds of Forests. And to 7 private acts.—After this the lord keeper made a short speech, and then the king bid the parliament farewell, and so departed.

The Reasons of both Houses for sitting on a Sunday.] When the commons returned to their house, it was first resolved, "That this house should sit to-morrow, being Sunday, at 8 o'clock; and ordered Mr. Strode to go up to the lords, and acquaint them with it," and to desire their lordships to do the same; which the lords consented to.

Ordered, "That all the members of this house, in regard of the great and weighty affairs that import the safety of the kingdom, do repair hither, to attend the service of the commonwealth, with all possible speed, upon pain of incurring the displeasure of the house for their neglect." This order was printed, and sent to all the returning officers in the kingdom. A Call of the House was peremptorily ordered for the 17th instant.

August 8. This day, being Sunday, the commons went down, by 6 o'clock in the morning, to St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, and heard prayers and a sermon, and returned to the house about nine. Ordered, "That this house shall enter into consideration of no business whatsoever upon this day, but such as shall immediately concern the good and advancement of religion, and the safety of the kingdom." And, accordingly, both houses agreed in a Declaration, which was printed and published in these words:

"Whereas both houses of parliament found it fit to sit in parliament upon the 8th day of August, being the Lord's Day, for many urgent and unexpected occasions, concerning the safety of the kingdom; they being so straitened in time, by reason of his majesty's resolution to begin his Journey towards Scotland on Monday following, early in the morning, that it was not otherwise possible for to settle and order the affairs of the kingdom, either for the government thereof in the king's absence, or for the present safety, as was requisite upon these present necessities: though the houses thought it necessary to sit, yet the lords and commons, now assembled in parliament, think it meet to declare, that they would not have done this, but upon inevitable necessity, the peace and safety both of church and state being so deeply concerned; which they do hereby declare, to the end that neither any other inferior court or council, or any other person, may draw this into example, or make use of it for their encouragement, in neglecting the due observation of the Lord's Day."

Both Houses petition the King to delay his Journey.] The lords sent a deputation of their body to the king, to know his pleasure when the two houses should wait upon his majesty with their petition, who appointed 4 o'clock that afternoon for the purpose. Several reasons were also agreed upon to be given to the commissioners for Scotland, for staying the king's journey. At the time appointed a committee of lords waited on the king at Whitehall, with the joint Petition of both houses, to which his majesty returned the following Answer:

"That the importance of your desires would require some time of deliberation, if the urgent necessity of the business did not press the contrary; the same necessity teacheth me what to answer, which is two-fold. First, and chiefest, Is my public faith given to my kingdom of Scotland, to be present at the parliament; and never any prince was so strictly bound in honour as I am to do this. Secondly, the urgency of my affairs there, which indeed are very great. To comply with both which, I can stay no longer than Tuesday: and so long I think fit to stay, that the gentlemen of the house of commons may so hasten the Treaty with Scotland, that I may give the royal assent thereto, some time to-morrow; for, otherwise, I shall be forced to pass it by commission which I leave behind me; but the earnest desire I have to pass this important bill, personally, makes me stay thus long, which I know will be very inconvenient to me. To conclude: I desire your kindness to remember, that, upon your request, have already stayed one month, and that, by public promise, engaged not to urge any longer than to-morrow; therefore, remaining all engagements, I expect that ye press no more in this; and for the government of the kingdom, I hope I shall leave behind such commissions as will serve, especially while the parliament is sitting."

The Scots commissioners also returned an Answer to the parliament's last proposal, wherein they informed the reasons for his majesty's going; and concluded, That the affairs of the kingdom were so pressing, as could not, without danger of irreparable loss, suffer any longer delay.

August 10. The king came to the house of lords in the morning, and sending for the commons, his majesty gave the royal assent to 1. An act for the confirmation of the treaty of pacification, between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. 2. An act for securing public faith, the remainder of the Friendly assistance and relief, promised to our brethren of Scotland. 3. An act for bringing in of Gun powder and Salt-petre from foreign parts. 4. An act for prevention of vexatious proceedings touching the order of knighthood. 5. An act for the better ordering and regulating the Office of Clerk of the Market, and for the Reformation of false Weights and Measures. Then the king took his leave a second time of the parliament telling them, "That he hoped to see good expedition in disbanding of both armies, and would make all haste he could to return before Michaelmas." About two of the clock in the afternoon the king set out for Scotland, accompanied with the elector Palatine, and the duke of Lenox, who, the day before, was introduced into the house of peers as duke of Richmond.

The first thing the commons did, after their return to their house, was to take into consideration the way of putting the kingdom into posture of defence, and to settle some orders of government both in church and state; but nothing particular was done in the business at this time. They likewise sent up a bill to the lords, intitled, 'A Subsidy to be granted to the king of Tonnage and Poundage, and other duties of money payable upon Merchandises imported and exported,' which they desired might pass by commission; and that the same might be issued before his majesty be out of the kingdom.

Proceedings in relation to the Impeached Bishops.] Aug. 11. The lords received a message from the commons to put them in mind of the impeachment brought up against 13 Bishops; and to let the lords know that the commons were ready to make good the said impeachment at their bar, and to appoint a time when the said Bishops shall make their Answers in that house in the presence of the commons. Upon this message the lords fell into a debate, whether the impeachment against the Bishops was not too general for them to answer; and resolved to have a conference with the other house about it. At this conference the lord privy seal told the commons, That they had received an Impeachment against 13 Bishops, delivered at the bar by word of mouth, accusing them of many great crimes and misdemeanors, to which they required the bishops to answer. That these were matters of great consequence; and coming from the house of commons, they were very serious not to proceed, but in a parliamentary way, upon good consideration. That the charge was in generals only; and since there were two ways of proceeding, by transmission from this house, or a charge by word of mouth; in the latter, the course is to appoint some of the king's counsel to draw up particular charges out of the general. That the lords would propose no way till they had acquainted them with it; and desired the commons to consider, whether they would stand to the charge already transmitted.

August 12. The house of commons resumed the affair of the Army-Plot against the parliament, and voted Henry Percy and Henry Jerbyn, esqrs. with sir John Sockling, knt. guilty of High Treason. A public thanksgiving was also ordered to be observed on the 7th of September next, for the happy conclusion of the peace.

August 13. The commons prepared a new charge against the 13 Bishops, much in the same words as before, and sent it up to the lords by serjeant Wyld.

Complaint against the Capuchins belonging to the Queen.] The same day the father-absolute of the Capuchin Friars, belonging to the queen at Denmark-House, with the rest of that brotherhood, were complained of by the commons, as dangerous and active in seducing the king's people from the Protestant religion. Hereupon the lords ordered the earl of Dorset to demand the queen, and humbly to desire her majesty, That the said Friars may be kept in, and not suffered to go abroad to pervert the people, and draw them to be reconciled to the church of Rome. And farther, that the said lord do send for the chief of the Capuchins, and give him warning that he obey this command.

Aug. 17. This day the earl of Dorset appeared to the house of lords, "That he had waited on the queen, and acquainted her majesty with the humble desires of this house, touching the restraining of the Capuchin Friars in Denmark-House from tampering with and withdrawing the king's people." Her majesty says, "It is much against her will that they have gone abroad, or have endeavoured to pervert any from their religion; and her majesty is also very unwilling that any English people should resort there to chapel; but her majesty will give orders to prevent these for the future." And the earl of Dorset said, "He would obey their lordships command, and send for the chief of the Capuchins; and give him a strait command, not to suffer any of the Friars to go abroad, nor any English people to come to them, or to hear mass there."

Orders of the Lords concerning the impeached Bishops.] The same day, the lords ordered the impeachment against the 13 Bishops to be read; then went into a debate about it, and came to these Resolutions: 1. "That the lords the Bishops who are impeached, may sit in the house, without voting, when it is in debating whether they shall have further time to answer or not. 2. That such of the Bishops who are impeached, shall not sit in the house when the merits of the cause are in debate." Afterwards the time for the Bishops to give in their Answer to the Impeachment, was fixed for the 10th of Sept. next.

Aug. 18. That the bishops might be the better prepared to give in their Answer to the impeachment against them, it was this day ordered by the house of lords, "That the bishop of Rochester, with one other of the bishops, may have free access, twice, unto the lord archbishop of Canterbury, to speak with him concerning their Answer to the Impeachment brought up against them from the house of commons, for making a Book of Canons, &c. and they are to speak with the said archbishop of Canterbury about no other business." It was also ordered, "That the lords, the Bishops, may have access unto, and have copies of all such acts and records, as are in any of his majesty's courts of justice and public offices, which may make for their defence or answers to the Impeachments brought against them from the house of commons."

Commissioners to attend the King into Scotland.] A letter to the king, by way of petition from both houses, was read, in which William earl of Bedford, Edward lord Howard, sir Wm. Airmy, bart. sir Philip Stapleton, knt. Nath. Fiennes and John Hampden, esqrs. were appointed Commissioners to attend his majesty in Scotland; and that he would graciously permit the said persons to follow the Instructions there given them by parliament, viz.

I. "To take care of the ratification of the Treaty, and of those acts which concern both nations, and to bring with them an authentic exemplification of the same. II. That they see the Commission settled concerning Trade, and of keeping good correspondency between both kingdoms for a public Peace, according to the Articles of the Treaty. III. To demand satisfaction for such Debts as shall remain due from the Scots unto the Northern counties, for provision and monies raised and taken up, for the Scots army. IV. To clear the proceedings of the parliament of England towards the parliament of Scotland, if they shall find any false reports, which may breed a misconstruction between both kingdoms. V. To assure them of the good affection of the parliament of England in all things, so far as concerns the service of his majesty, and the peace and prosperity of both nations. VI. To certify the parliament, from time to time, of their proceedings, and of all occurrences which shall concern the good of this kingdom. VII. That they shall put in execution such further Instructions, as they shall receive from both houses, and as his majesty shall approve of. VIII. That they proceed not in the Treaty with the parliament of Scotland, till warrant and commission be sent down unto his majesty, by a messenger on purpose, and a return with the warrant to pass the commission under the great seal of England."

Ordered, by the commons, "That Mr. Anthony Nichols, member for Bodmyn, be the messenger to Edinburgh, to carry the Petition, Commission, and Instructions, then read, for his majesty's approbation; and that the sum of 1000*l.* be allowed for the commissioners charges.

The Lord General ordered to disband the Army.] August 19. A conference between the lords and commons, about the speedy disbanding of the English Army, to which the king had given his consent, particularly the horse; and an order was made, to be sent to the lord general, That all further delays and excuses set apart, he do, forthwith, disband all the horse troops of the army, before any of the foot; and command the officers of them to depart, as a matter of great importance to the commonwealth. Mr. Rushworth, author of the Collections, was sent post to York by the commons with this order to the lord general, and also letters from the parliament to the lord Fairfax, sir Arthur Ingram, and Mr. Mallory, to see this order punctually obeyed.

August 25. A messenger had been sent down by the lords, to bring up Dr. Roger Manners, bishop of St. David's, who returned and said, that he could not be found; on which the lords ordered, "That his temporalities should be seized into the king's hands, until the said bishop should appear, and attend the commands of that house."

State of the Navy.] The commons took into consideration the State of the Navy, and found, That the arrears due to the officers of the Navy were very great; and the provisions in the magazines decayed. That for the guarding of the narrow seas this year, the house of commons had set forth ten of the king's navy and ten merchant ships, the charge whereof did amount to 57,000*l.* and for payment of which there is only advanced 1200*l.* out of the money granted to the king for Tonnage and Poundage; and considering the seamen, what they come home, will want their pay, and not to remain in pay till they receive their wages, which will grow to an excessive charge, unless some course be taken to provide the said 57,000*l.* Therefore it was ordered, That the farmers of the customs pay 15,000*l.* a month to the treasurer of the navy, towards the discharge of that debt.

A Recess resolved on.] Aug. 27. A conference was this day held between the two houses, in which the commons represented to the lords, That since the Scots army was almost disbanded, and that the plague increases in the cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjoining; they have therefore thought of a Recess for the two houses, from the 8th of Sept. to the 20th of Oct.; to which they desired their lordships consent. On consideration of this, the lords thought proper to propose the Recess to be from the first of Oct. to the 1st of Nov.; which the commons refused for the following reasons:—"As, first, the nature of the Causes which are depending in both houses, some thereof being for the Treasons, and the Impeachment of the Judges, the inspection of which business they deem might be before next term. 2dly, The next Payment of the Money, promised to the City of York, falls out to be before the 1st of Nov. therefore they desire their lordships to have recess only to the 20th of Oct. next;" to which the lords agreed.

Sir B. Rudyard's Speech against suffering the French or Spaniards to hire disbanded soldiers.] Aug. 28. The affair of the French and Spanish Ambassadors hiring forces from the disbanded Irish Army, was considered of by the commons. Upon this occasion

Sir Benj. Rudyard made the following speech: "Mr. Speaker, This is a business of great consequence, and therefore requires well advised resolution. I will put France and Spain together, and take them both before me, because the reasons will serve the one and the other, as they stand in relation to us. We are so bounded by the nature of our situation, that we are not so proper to extend ourselves upon the firm land as our neighbours; our approach is rather to balance; which, being rightly managed, may make the king the great arbiter of all the affairs of Christendom, by assisting, withholding, or opposing. Henry 8 is an example of this; he was sometimes on the side of the emperor, other times of the French party, according to the side either side of the scales to weigh heavier or lighter. Some might think this to be instability in him; but it was certainly out of true and peculiar understanding of his power. By the present state of Christendom it is apparent, that the house of Austria begins to enervate, as in Spain, so consequently in Germany, that the French do swell and enlarge themselves, if they grow and hold, they will be to us our Spain nearer hand. Alliances do serve well to make up a present breach, or mutually to strengthen those states who have the same ends: but politic bodies have no natural affections, they are guided by particular interest, and beyond that are not to be trusted. Although it may be good policy to breed a militia at the charge of other states abroad, for our own use and occasions at home, yet that ought rather to be done amongst friends of the same way; and the Low Countries have been an academy for us. His majesty hath now an ambassador meeting with the Emperor about the Palatinate. If we send away our men, it will so damp and discountenance the affairs of the prince Elector, as the world will believe we never had, nor ever shall have, any intentions to assist him at all. I have observed, for divers years, that England is not so well peopled, as we do want work-folks to bring in harvest: our disbanded soldiers will least dislike that kind of work; and if they be speedily dissolved, that employment will entertain them for the present, and intire them to labour for hereafter. Upon these considerations I cannot give my advice to add more strength to France, by weakening both ourselves and our friends.—As for sending the Irish into Spain; truly sir, I have been long of opinion, that it was never so to suffer the Irish to be promiscuously made soldiers abroad, because it may make them slier to trouble the state when they come home. Their intelligence and practice with the princes whom they shall serve, may prove dangerous to that kingdom; they may more profitably be employed upon husbandry, whereof that kingdom hath great need. Besides, it will be exceedingly prejudicial to us, and to our religion, if the Spaniard should prevail against the Portuguese. It were better for us he should be broken into lesser pieces, as power shivered. If the king of Portugal had desired these Irish, I should rather have given my vote for him than the king of Spain, because it will keep the balance more even. Spain hath had too much of our assistance and assistance heretofore: I am sure it lost us the Palatinate. Now that it is come to our turn of advice, I hope we shall not do over other men's faults again. If the present government of Ireland be not able to restrain their disorderly people, there is a noble lord already designed to that charge, who, by his knowledge in martial affairs, and his other great abilities, will be, no doubt, abundantly capable to reduce them to a due obedience. Wherefore, Mr. Speaker, upon the whole matter, my opinion is, That we should not be forward to spend our men, but rather to preserve and husband them for our own use and employment, for our friends, for our religion.

After which the house came to these votes; Resolved 'That this house holds it not fit, that there should be any levies of men in Ireland for the service of the king of Spain; nor in any of his majesty's dominions for the French king's service.' This was confirmed by the lords, who ordered, that a letter should be sent to the king to inform him of these Resolutions.

The King's Letter relating to the Scots Treaty.] August 30. The lord keeper acquainted the lords, that he had received a Letter from the King, by the return of their messenger, Mr. Nichols, which was read in these words:

"Right trusty and well beloved, we greet you well; Whereas we have understood, by a Petition of both houses of our parliament in England, which Anthony Nichols, esq. hath been employed to bring us, that they have resolved to send down certain of their members for to see the ratification of the Treaty of Pacification by the parliament here; and, to that end, have desired a commission under our great seal; we do not hold it necessary to sign any such commission, but are graciously pleased to give leave to the said members to come and attend us here in Scotland, to see the ratification of the said Treaty, and what else belongs thereunto. And thus we require you to signify to both the houses from us. Given under our signet at our court at Edinburgh, the 25 of August."

After the reading of this Letter, the house resolved to communicate the contents of it to the commons. Mr. Nichols also brought with him the king's Reasons for refusing to grant a commission, which were as follow: 1. "His majesty conceives the Treaty of Pacification, between the two kingdoms, is already ratified by the parliament of Scotland. 2. It would be a means to keep his majesty longer there, than he intended to stay. 3. For if this commission should be granted, it would beget new matter. 4. That the Scots army is over the Tweed; and that the lord general hath almost disbanded all our army, and hath begun with the horse." These Reasons seemingly contented both houses, for we hear no more of the matter.

The French Ambassador insulted.] Upon information that the French Ambassador and his servants had been lately assaulted in his own house, by a company of rude insolent people, to his excellency's insufferable wrong, injury, and dishonour; the lords made an Order to find out the malefactors and punish them severely, for a fact so much to the dishonour of the king and kingdom.—On the 6th of Sept. the lords ordered 3 of the rioters, concerned in attacking the French ambassador's house, to be committed to Bridewell; to stand in the pillory and be publickly whipped before the said house; and afterwards ask his pardon on their knees: but, at the instance of the ambassador, the whipping was remitted. Complaint was also made, that the Portuguese Ambassador's chapel, in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, had been since assaulted by the mob.

Resolutions relating to the Communion-Table, Crucifixes, &c.] Aug. 31. The house of commons began their first reformation in Church Affairs; and came to a resolution "That this house holds it fit, that the church-wardens of every parish church, or chapel, do forthwith remove the Communion-Table from the east-end of the church, chapel, or chancel, where they stand altarwise, and place them in some convenient place of the church or chancel; and take away the rails and level the chancels, as heretofore they were before the late innovation."

Sept. 1. Some further regulations, as to Churches, were made by the commons, with this preamble to them: "Whereas divers innovations, in or about the worship of God, have been lately practised in this kingdom, by enjoining some things and prohibiting others, without warrant of law, to the great grievance and discontent of his majesty's subjects; for the suppression of such innovations, and for the preservation of the publick peace, it is this day ordered by the commons:" Then follows the Resolution of yesterday; and next, "That all Crucifixes, scandalous pictures of any one or more persons of the Trinity, and all Images of the Virgin Mary, shall be taken away and abolished; and that all tapers, candlesticks, and basons be removed from the Communion-Table. That all corporal bowing at the name of Jesus, or towards the east-end of the church, chapel, or chancel, or towards the communion-table be henceforth forborne. That the Lord's Day shall be duly observed and sanctified; all dancing or sports, either before or after divine service, be forborne and restrained; that the preaching of God's Word be permitted in the afternoon, in the several churches and chapels of this kingdom, and that ministers and preachers be encouraged thereunto."—These Orders were also to be strictly observed in both the universities; and all mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, &c. were enjoined to see them put in execution. But a debate arising, Whether an Addition, relating to the Book of Common-Prayer, should be made to these orders, the house divided, and it was carried, in the affirmative, 55 against 37. Resolved, upon the question, "That the committee yesterday appointed to prepare an order for taking away all superstition, shall take into consideration to propound unto the house an Addition to the Order for preventing all contempt and abuse of the Book of Common-Prayer, and all tumultuous disorders that might arise in the church thereupon."—So that, by the thinness of the house, the church-party got the better at this time.

Sept. 8. The commons sent up to the lords their former orders about a Reformation in Churches; the first three of which the lords having taken into consideration, came to these Resolutions. 1. "That where there are rails already, they are to be removed with the Communion-Table; but where there are none, they shall not be enforced upon any; and that all steps in the chancel, raised within these 15 years shall be removed. 2. "That Crucifixes, and scandalous pictures of the Trinity, be abolished, without limitation of the time since their erection; and all Images of the Virgin Mary set up within 20 years last past. 3. "As to the custom of Bowing at the name of Jesus, it shall not be enjoined nor prohibited to any man."

The same day the commons went one step farther in their intended Reformation, by ordering "That it shall be lawful for the parishioners of any parish, in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, to set up a Lecture and maintain an Orthodox Minister, at their own charge to preach every Lord's Day, when there is no preaching; and to preach one day in every week, where there is no weekly lecture."

Farther Proceeding concerning colonels Ashburnham and Pollard. On a division, Whether colonels Ashburnham and Pollard, who had been voted to be concerned in the late Army-Plot, should have their pay? it passed in the negative, 40 against 41. Lord Clarendon gives as the following account of the debate on this question: "Very many positively alledged, 'That such men ought not to receive their pay, who had forfeited their trust yet there wanted not many who alledged, 'That they had the security of an act of parliament for their payment; and that in justice it could not be detained from them: That they lay under the displeasure of the house they were so far from a judgment yet, that it was not so much as a charge against them, but that they were at liberty under bail; and therefore they could not be said to have forfeited any thing that was their own.' In this debate the house seem'd equally divided till one (Mr. Seiden) who knew well what he said, said to them, 'That there could not be any reasonable pretence for detaining their due, as well for the reasons that had been given, as that they were absolutely pardoned by the late act of oblivion and pacification between the two kingdoms. The which was no sooner said, than many of those who were before inclined to the gentlemen, changed their opinions, and without much as calling to have the statute read declared, 'That they could have no benefit by that act of parliament; because then the same might be as well applied to the archbishop of Canterbury.' And so, without further weighing the law, or the reason, it was thought sufficient, not only to exclude them from that benefit, but to bar them from their money; lest they might be thought to be admitted to it for that reason, which might prove an advantage to another, whom they had no inclination to be just to. But the noble historian takes no notice of this following remarkable circumstance, That in the afternoon of the same day, the motion concerning these gentlemen being allowed their pay was again put to the question, when it was solved, by 39 against 22, 'That they shall have their Pay, notwithstanding any such Order.'"

Orders relating to the Plagues. The Plague which had infected the cities of London and Westminster, increasing, there were by agreement of both houses of parliament, certain Orders made to prevent the spreading of the infection, which were as follows: "1. That the words, 'Lord have Mercy upon us,' with a large red cross, be set upon the door of every house infected with the plague. 2. That if the stuff in the house, where any have been infected with the plague, be well aired before it be discharged, or the house opened. 3. The house visited with the plague to be shut up, whether any persons therein do die or not, and the persons so shut up to bear their own charge, if they be of ability. 4. No person to be removed out of any infected house, but by leave of the magistrate. 5. If any person fly out of any house infected with the plague, at or before the death of any in the house, such persons being flying to be pursued by hue and cry; and the house where they shall be found to be shut up, and they returned back to the place whence they fled. 6. That the decree, Quia Elix. imprinted, inter alia, for the relief of the poor, who are driven to live by begging, or to be relieved by alms, and have been taken into new erected tenements and divided houses, be taken into consideration during the time of infection; and the landlords of such tenements to be rated, according to the said decree, with the parishioners where such buildings and divisions are, as if they were dwelling in the said parish; for that, otherwise, the said ratings will be an insupportable charge to the parish, and the poor people turned out into the streets in this time of infection. 7. That the pavements in the streets be made sufficient, and so continued, and the kennels kept sweet and clean, the soil of the said streets to be carried away, and all annoyances to be removed; and such inhabitants as shall refuse to pay the reasonable rates assessed on them for payment of the scavengers, which shall clean and carry away the soil, be distrained by their pods for the payment thereof. 8. That if any person shall turn out of their houses any servant or lodger, being sick, power be given to the magistrate, or officer, to put them in their said house again, or otherwise the said persons to provide sufficient maintenance for them; and, upon their refusing so to do, being able persons, to distrain the goods of such persons, but shall so turn them out of doors, for the discharge. 9. If, by order of the magistrate, any persons so visited be removed out of their house or lodging to the pest-house, or other place; when they be recovered, and in perfect health, the said magistrate to have power and full authority to return and settle the said persons in their houses or lodgings, from whence they were so taken out, without contradiction if their landlords or any others. 10. That all such magistrates, or other persons, that shall be trusted with this service, may be enabled to do all other things necessary and pursuant to the execution of these Orders, as occasion shall require: and be out of the danger of misconstruction, seeing they hazard their particular offices to provide for the public."

Orders of the Lords concerning Divine Service. The lords went upon settling Religious Affairs; and, on a division voted "That an Order made Jan. 16, 1640, by that house, concerning Divine Service to be performed, as it is appointed by several acts of parliament of this realm, and all that disturb that wholesome order shall be severely punished, according to law, &c. be again printed and published. A Protest of some lords is entered in their Journals against it: which Protest is the first of this kind we have yet met with:

Peers Protest against it. "After the debate for printing and publishing the order of the 16th of Jan. last," [Here the order is recited as before] "it being put to the question, Whether the said Order shall be printed before a conference held with the commons about it, we whose names are here under-written did dissassent: and having, before the putting the question, demanded our right of protestation, do accordingly make our protestation, That we hold it fit and necessary to have the consent of the house of commons in these things, which concern so nearly the quiet and government of the church; and therefore we desired to have a conference with the commons, before any conclusive Order was printed and published herein; especially the house of commons having but lately brought to us, and desired the consent of our house unto, certain votes of theirs against Innovations, in or about the Worship of God, lately practised in this kingdom, without warrant or law; and therefore to acquit ourselves of the dangers and inconveniences, that might arise by the printing and publishing of the said Order, as binding to the whole kingdom, without the desiring the consent of the house of commons: we do protest our dissassents to this vote, and do thus enter it as aforesaid." BEDFORD, WARWICK, CLARE, NEWPORT, WHARTON, KIMBOLTON."

The lords also sent a message to the commons to desire a conference about the Instructions and Ordinance sent up by the latter this morning; and, also, concerning a committee to be appointed to meet, during the time of the recess, to receive and answer the Letters which shall come from the committees in Scotland; and to do such other things as shall be desired by the houses; which was agreed to. After this the lords resolved to have another conference with the commons, to desire them to join with their house in the foregoing Order concerning Divine Service; and a message, to that purpose, was sent accordingly. We do not find that a conference was held, between the two houses, on this subject; but that, when the message abovesaid was received by the commons, they instantly resolved, "That this house doth not consent to these Orders, or to any of them." And immediately appointed a committee to draw up a Declaration of their own, against the other; which, being read in the house, was approved on, and ordered to be printed and published.

Committee appointed to act during the Recess. Both houses appointed Committees, during the Recess; for the lords there were the lord keeper, lord privy-seal, lord chamberlain; earls of Warwick, Clare, Denbigh, and Cleveland. Those for the commons were Mr. Pym, sir Gilbert Gerrard, sir John Frankland, sir John Colepeper, Mr. Wheeler, sir Hen. Mildmay, Mr. Bridgman, Sir Tho. Bowyer, sir Tho. Barrington, sir Edw. Hales, sir Wm. Litton, sir Rd. Cave, Mr. Rob. Goodwin, sir Sam. Luke, Mr. Wingate, sir Rob. Pye, alderman Soames, alderman Pennington, captain Venn, Mr. Vassal, lord Falkland, capt. Rainsborough, Mr. Bence, sir Peter Wroth, Mr. Holland, Mr. Winwood, Mr. Scawen, Mr. John Goodwin, sir Tho. Dacres, Mr. Morley, Mr. H. Martin, Mr. A. Goodwin, sir John Clotworthy, Mr. White, Mr. Solicitor St. John, Mr. Spurstow, Mr. L. Whitaker, Mr. Serj. Wyld, Mr. Strode, sir Hen. Vane, Mr. Glynn, sir Symonds D'Ewes, sir Wm. Drake, Mr. Beddingfield, sir G. Pickering, Mr. Blackston, Mr. Waller.—This committee of the commons was to act according to the following Instructions:—"To meet on Saturday next, in the Exchequer-Chamber, at 9 in the forenoon, and every Tuesday and Saturday in every week, and at such other times as they shall think fit, during the recess; and they, or any six of them, to have power to meet with the committee of the lords, appointed during their recess, at such times as they shall appoint. To have power to receive and open such letters as shall come from the committees in Scotland; and to give answers according to the former Instructions and Orders of this house. To take care that the orders of this house be punctually observed, concerning the Disbanding of the Army, Train of Artillery and Garrisons; and for the issuing and sending down of Money for those purposes accordingly. To have power to recall the committees in Scotland, if they see cause. To have power to go on in preparation of proceedings against the principal of such delinquents as are already voted or complained against in the house; and to report any offers which they shall make to the house. That upon information of any riots or tumults, to have power to send to all sheriffs, justices of peace, and other officers, to stir them up to their duty in repressing them; and to report to the house any failure of obedience to such sending. To examine the entries of the Clerk's book; and, to that end, that the committee may not mistake any past action of the house, a clerk to be left there with his books. To take care of the preparation of his majesty's Revenues; and to take into consideration any accounts to his majesty. To go on in prosecution of the consideration of a West India Company. To take into consideration the Fishing upon the coasts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. To take into consideration the Resolution of the Abuses in exchanging and transporting of Money, and the regulating of the par betwixt this and other kingdoms. To prepare the Irish Causes depending, to be either, at the access, transmitted to the lords, or recommended to the Irish parliament. To consider about Salt-petre and Gun-Powder.

To send for any persons, writings, and records. To prepare a Discharge for the earl of Warwick, according to those acquaintances he hath given concerning the Northern counties."

This day also the lords ordered, That the Impeached Bishops should bring in their Answers to the said Impeachment on the 10th of Nov.: after which both houses adjourned to 20th of October.

Whitlocke writes, "That the state of affairs, in the recess of parliament, seemed to be in a calm, but soon broke out into hideous storms, which threatened the long enjoyed peace of the kingdom. That discontents at government, and distractions in opinion concerning religion, put the whole kingdom into a spirit of distrust and contradiction. Insolences and disorders, unpunished or connived at, mightily increased; the successes of the Scots animated other subjects to illegal pretences and impious actions; and, what made things infinitely worse, in the time of the king's absence in Scotland, the Irish rebellion broke out." How far the account of this last affair came before the English parliament, will appear in the sequel.

Mr. Pym's Report of what had been done by the Committee during the Recess. Oct. 10. Both houses met pursuant to adjournment when

Mr. Pym, one of the Committee of the commons, appointed to sit during the Recess, made a Report to that house of what had happened in that interval as follows:—"The first thing we had in charge, was concerning the Declaration of the house relating to innovations: the committee have sent divers of them into the country; and have found, that in some places where there were good ministers they were entertained; and in some other places they were neglected; but, for the most part, it is by those that have been questioned here for other matters. The committee took into consideration the intention of the house, concerning the publishing of the Declaration: therefore they gave directions to require the publishing thereof in churches; and that the church-wardens might see the execution thereof. Some particulars concerning this will come in a special Report, which shall now only touch upon in the general, in regard of the great importance of the business first to be considered of this day, touching the Troubles in Scotland; of which I shall give you an account.—The next thing the committee took into consideration, was the correspondence with the committee in Scotland, in receiving Letters from them, and sending answers unto them. I shall not need to produce their several letters now, it will take up too much time; but the chief point was touching the Disbanding of the Army, and the two garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle. For Carlisle it is totally disbanded, and the soldiers sent to Ireland, to be placed there, as they were before in the king's army; for we did conceive fitter, those new men, now in the king's army there, should be dismissed, and these that were formerly taken from thence should be retained again; for we hear a good report of our carriage at Carlisle: as for the garrison at Berwick; that required longer time of consideration at the committee; for, besides the demolishing of the works (which was much used by the Scots, and seconded by a letter from his majesty out of Scotland) there was a want of money; yet the committee got sufficient to disband all, and sent it down: and because the Scots commissioners desired to know certain day of our disbanding, and then they said, upon knowledge of that, disband their men; thereupon the committee set down 15 tobacis to be the last day of disbanding. And the letter yesterday received from sir Michael Ernley sheweth, that he hath money enough to disband all; and the horse are disbanded, and 5 companies of foot: and that on Friday last the other companies of foot remaining had been disbanded, but a letter came from Henry Vane, in his majesty's name, requiring to stay the disbanding of the rest till further order, of which you shall hear more particularly, when I come to that part of my report.—For the Arms and Ammunition at Carlisle; the committee gave order for the king and safe-laying of them up, to be well kept till the next spring, when it will be more reasonable to send for them away, they being now 5 or 6 miles from the sea-side; which would have taken now too much time to have shipped them: and sir George Dalston, and others, members of the house, are desired to take care of the safe-keeping of them in the mean time.—For the Ammunition at Berwick; the committee have sent 6 ships to transport the same to the Tower; and agreed with them for a certain sum for the doing thereof within such a time; and if they stayed longer, to have so much per diem for demurrage.—The next thing we took into consideration at the committee, was concerning Tumults; though we cannot say there were any great tumults, yet there were seeds sown, which might have occasioned some, in the execution of the Order of the house touching Innovations: as I shall make a particular report of those places where they were at blows, and likely to come to blows, if the committee had not sought the prevention of it; which was the reason why the committee entertained their petition.—There was another like trouble and sign of tumult, by the frequent resort of Troops to town, and to the committee; who delivered 30 several petitions to the committee, in their own names, and the names of other discontented persons in the army. We could not refuse to accept their petitions, lest they should grow to tumults; and of their complaints, and the nature of them, I shall give a particular report; but the committee did vote nothing concerning them. It will be very fit.

to resolve something concerning them, that they may depart the town; for, under the name of soldiers, many robberies are done; which occasioned the committee to give order; that all of them, that desire to have passes to go beyond sea, might have the same: but that would not serve their turn, unless they might have liberty to receive pay here, to go in companies, under conduct, to the service of foreign princes; which the committee could not give way unto, in regard of the Ordinance of both houses to the contrary. There is another head the committee had in charge, concerning the King's Revenue: all we could do in that, (which I did by the direction of the committee) was to take care for a balance touching the same: and accordingly I spoke with the king's officers about it; and a balance will be ready when you please to call for it.—Next was, concerning the Exchange beyond sea: I think, for that, there will be a good return made for the benefit of the commonwealth. Another thing was concerning the Irish Petitions; but the gentleman that used to be in the chair for Irish affairs, (Mr. Whistler) was out of town, and had most of their petitions with him; so we could do nothing; only one Mr. Cope, and Mr. Lomach, who had long attended, had their case made known to the committee; the one desiring to have two witnesses examined, upon a petition here depending, who are ready to go to sea; and the other, Mr. Cope, of English parents and great family, is a petitioner for recovery of an estate of a great value, which he conceives hath been long kept from him wrongfully; and desires that a committee may but consider of the depositions already taken, touching the same, in several courts of records, whether there be not just cause for him to have relief, and matter of ground to proceed on his petition; and, if not, he will desist in petitioning the house.—The next thing in charge, was concerning Delinquents: in that we made but a small progress; for we had a desire to have perfected the charge against my lord archbishop of Canterbury; but in regard those of the long robe of the committee were for the most part absent, we could not proceed therein.—Next there came to me, to my lodgings at Chelsea, sir John Berkeley and serjeant major O'Neal; who said they heard they were accused, and had rashly withdrawn themselves; but, upon better consideration, they were returned to submit to the pleasure of the house. I thought it my duty to make some privy-counsellor acquainted therewith; whereupon I went to my lord Willmot with them, who undertook they should attend the committee the next sitting; which they did accordingly: and, in pursuance of the order and warrant of the house for the apprehending of them, they were both attached by the serjeant's deputy: so the house may be pleased to send for them, and to do therein as they see cause.—For the Letters last received out of Scotland from the committee; they speak of something intended to be done there upon the persons of divers lords of Scotland: and, in regard some of the parties, suspected to have a hand in that design, are suspected to be Papists, the committee did conceive they might have correspondency with the like party here; and therefore commanded me, yesterday, to write to my lord mayor of London, to place convenient guards in several places of the city, till he received further directions from the parliament; and likewise to the justices of peace for Middlesex, Westminster, and Southwark; and to observe such further direction as they should receive from the earl of Essex, who, in his majesty's absence, is appointed general on this side Trent.—I forgot to report one thing, That, upon Tuesday last was seven-night, the committee here agreed, and so ordered, That the committee in Scotland should, unless they see cause to the contrary, return home; and, lest our letters might miscarry, commanded me to send an express messenger to them, and I did so; and writ also, by the weekly post, of our Order, as also of the lords Order for their commissioners to come home. The party I sent, who was commended to me for a very honest man, should have been there on the Monday following, which he easily might have done, if he had been well; but on Friday last he was not come to Edinburgh, neither could he be heard of in all the road; so that we may justly fear some misfortune is befallen him; that he is knocked on the head, and his letters taken from him."

Upon this Report it was resolved, "That a conference be desired with the lords, concerning the security of the kingdom and parliament."—Resolved also, "That sir John Berkeley be sent prisoner to the Tower, and Daniel O'Neal to the Gatehouse."

The same day Mr. Pym reported the heads for the said conference, as follows: "That the committee, in the first place, do conceive, that the Letter from the committee be read (dated 14th Octobris) at the conference: and that this house hath taken into consideration, 1. That when there was a design, somewhat of the same nature, in this kingdom, to seduce the king's army to interrupt the parliament here, there was the like design at that time in Scotland. Next, the principal party named in that design in Scotland, is a person suspected to be popishly affected; and therefore may have correspondency with the like party here. 3. That it hath been published here lately, that some things were to be done there, in Scotland, before it broke out there; therefore we may suspect some correspondency here: so, upon these grounds, to propound, 1. That a strong guard be kept in the city of Westminster and London. 2. That care be taken for the future for the defence of the whole kingdom: but this in general. Next, that these two gentlemen, sir John Berkeley and serjeant-major O'Neal, did come in during the recess; and that the one is committed to the Tower, and the other to the Gatehouse: and therefore to desire their lordships that they may be examined, according to the former manner for the examination of the other parties accused for the same crime, by the committee of the lords appointed for that purpose. Next, to let them know the garrison of Carlisle is totally disbanded; and that, of the garrison of Berwick, there remaineth only 5 companies of foot, all the horse being disbanded: and to acquaint them with his majesty's direction, sent by secretary Vane for the stay of those soldiers: and that the money designed for that service, to disband that garrison, was proportioned only until 15th Octobris: that the commonwealth should be at no further charge concerning the same, either for the men or shipping that are to stay there still; order being taken, and money sent down, for their disbanding 15th Octobris, according to the Treaty."

Oct. 21. The commons resolved, "That another head of the foregoing conference shall be, To move that an express messenger be sent to the committees of both houses in Scotland, to let them know, that the parliament takes well their advertisement; and that they conceive the peace of that kingdom concerns the good of this kingdom; and that, if there be any tumult to oppose the acts confirmed by both kingdoms, and his majesty will command any assistance to suppress them, both houses will be ready to maintain his majesty in his greatness, and to suppress those that are disturbers of the peace."

The Heads thus prepared for a conference, were afterwards communicated to the lords, who were very sensible of the matters to them reported; and, speedily taking the same into consideration, agreed to all the proposals made by the commons.

Bill to disable the Clergy from exercising any Temporal Jurisdiction.] Oct. 23. A bill 'For disabling all persons in Holy Orders to exercise any Temporal Jurisdiction or Authority,' was passed and sent up to the lords by sir Gilbert Gerrard, with a desire that it might be proceeded in with all expedition. The following is a copy of this extraordinary bill.—"Whereas Bishops, and other persons in Holy Orders, ought not to be intangled with secular jurisdiction, the office of the ministry being of such great importance that it will take up the whole man: and for that it is found, by long experience, that their intermeddling with secular jurisdiction hath occasioned great mischief and scandal both to church and state; his majesty, out of his religious care of the church, and the souls of his people, is graciously pleased, that it may be enacted, and, by the authority of these presents, be it enacted, That no Archbishops or Bishops, or any other person that now is, or hereafter shall be, in Holy Orders, shall, at any time after the 10th day of Nov. 1641, have any suffrage or vote, or use or execute any power or authority, in the parliament of this realm, nor shall be of the privy council of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or justices of the peace of ayer and terminer, or goal delivery, or execute any temporal authority, by virtue of any commission; but shall be wholly disabled and be incapable to have, receive, use, or execute any of the said offices, places, powers, authorities, and things aforesaid. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said 10th day of Nov. all acts which shall be done by any archbishops or bishops, or other persons whatsoever in Holy Orders, and all and every suffrage or vote given or delivered by them, or any other thing done by them, or any of them, contrary to the purport and true meaning of this present act, shall be utterly void to all intents, constructions, and purposes."

Tumults and Disorders.] Great mutinies and disorders were now on foot by the disbanded soldiers, who came in companies to the parliament house, and demanded their pay. The Trained Bands of Westminster attended all day in arms, in the Palace-yard, till both houses rose. Afterwards they received directions from the earl of Essex, lord-general in the king's absence, to divide their company into two parts, to the end that 100 might attend for the day, and be relieved by the like number at night. Many Orders are in the Journals of both houses about quieting the disbanded troops.

The King's Letter from Edinburgh.] Oct. 26. The lord keeper signified to the lords, that he had received a Letter from the king, written all with his own hand, which he read in hac verba:—"My lord keeper; Since that, by the necessity of my affairs, I am detained here so long, that I cannot be down at the sitting of the parliament; I have thought fit, by these lines, to direct you to let both houses know, in my name, that as this my long absence is beyond my expectation, so it is against my desire; and that I will make all the diligence that the weightiness of these affairs will possibly permit to return; and so I rest your assured friend,"

Proceedings against Judge Berkeley.] This day sir Robert Berkeley, one of the Judges of the King's-bench, was brought to the bar of the lords as a delinquent; when the lord keeper told him, "That he was now to hear the charge of High Treason, brought up against him by the house of commons, read; and that the lords expected his Answer thereunto." Which being read, he gave their lordships humble thanks for their justice in calling him to make his Answer; and acknowledged the justice of the house of commons, that they have desired he might make his Answer to their charge, and be proceeded against according to law. Withal, he made it his humble request to their lordships, that they would permit him a little time now, to speak somewhat to the particulars of the charge; and, having obtained leave of the house so to do, he made a long speech on the particular Articles of his Impeachment; and concluded, that he is not guilty in manner or form as was laid against him in the said Impeachment. He then presented to the house the following Petition, humbly desiring their lordships to take the particulars into consideration:

"To the right hon. the Lords assembled in Parliament, the humble PETITION of Sir ROBERT BERKELEY, knight, one of the Judges of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench.

"Your lordships having, as your petitioner conceiveth, appointed the 2nd of Nov. next for his trial, he most humbly prayeth, that your lordships would be pleased to grant unto him your lordships present warrant for such Witnesses as he shall have cause to use at his trial. That your lordships would be pleased to admit, and, if need be, to assign him counsel, for his necessary defence, in point of law, which may happen upon the matter of High Treason, of which he is impeached; and, in point of law and facts, upon the matters and misdemeanors, of which he is also impeached. That for the few days, till the time of his trial, he may remain in custody of the sheriff of London, where he hath been a true prisoner near three quarters of a year; in whose house all his collections and papers are for his defence: and that he may have your lordships licence to go, with a keeper, to Serjeants'-inn, to look out some papers which he hath there, and shall have occasion to produce at his trial; as also there to confer or advise with such counsel, as your lordship shall think fit to admit or assign unto him. And your petitioner, &c.

"ROBERT BERKELEY."

Hereunto were added the names of 8 lawyers to be assigned as counsel to the petitioner; but, before the lords gave any answer to it, it was first carried, That the bishops should not be present in the debate on the matter of High Treason, in this cause, but for misdemeanor only they were to be admitted. After which, every Article which the Judge had petitioned for, was granted him; and a message agreed upon to be sent down to the Commons, that he had pleaded Not Guilty to their Impeachment.—Two days after, this trial was, at the instance of the house of commons, for want of witnesses, put off by the lords to an unlimited time.*

A Conference concerning the 13 Bishops, and a Bill for taking away the Votes of their whole Order.] This day it was resolved by the commons, to have a conference with the lords concerning the Sequestering the 13 Bishops, accu-

* Whitlocke says, "That Sir Robert Berkeley was a very learned man in our laws, a good orator and judge, and moderate in his ways, except his desires of the court-favour: that he redeemed himself, afterwards, by supplying the parliament's occasions with ten thousand pounds, and ended his days in a private retirement; yet not without considerable gains by his chamber practice, and left a plentiful fortune to his family." Memorials, p. 59.

sed by them, from their Votes in parliament. Likewise to desire their lordships to sequester the rest of the bishops from their votes, upon the particular bill sent from that house, for the taking away of all their votes in parliament. A select committee was named and ordered to prepare Heads for this Conference.

Oct. 27. The lord privy-seal reported the conference yesterday with the house of commons concerning Bishops, as follows :

“ Mr. Pym declared, from the house of commons, that there is nothing of greater importance to the safety and good of the kingdom, than that this high court of parliament, which is the fountain of justice and government, should be kept pure and uncorrupted, free from partiality and by-respects : this will not only add lustre and reputation, but strength and authority to all our actions. Herein, he said, your lordships are especially interested, as you are a third estate by inheritance and birth-right ; so the commons are publicly interested by representation of the whole body of the commons of this kingdom, whose lives, fortunes, and liberties are deposited under the custody and trust of the parliament. He said, The Commons have commanded him, and his colleague, Mr. Solicitor-General, to present to your lordships two Propositions, which they thought very necessary to be observed and put in execution at this time : 1. That the 13 Bishops, which stand accused before your lordships for making the late pretended Canons and Constitutions, may be excluded from their votes in parliament. 2. That all the Bishops may be suspended from their votes upon that bill intitled, ‘ An Act to disable all persons in Holy Orders to exercise any Jurisdiction or Authority Temporal.’ The 1st of these was committed to his charge; and he said, he was commanded to support it with 3 reasons. 1st. ‘ That the 13 Bishops have broken that trust to which every member of parliament is obliged ; which trust is to maintain, 1. The prerogative of the king, 2. The privilege of parliaments. 3. The property of the subject. 4. The peace of the kingdom. And this trust they have broken, not by one transient act, but by setting up Canons in nature of laws, to bind the kingdom for ever.—That the Canons are of this nature appears by the votes of both houses ; and that they were all parties to the making thereof, appears by the Acts of that Synod. The book itself the commons cannot tender to your lordships, because they sent for it, but he that hath the book in custody was out of town ; but a member of their own house, upon view of it, is ready to depose, That their names were entered among those that did subscribe to it.—Wherefore the house of commons desire your lordships, in the first place, to consider Whether they that take to themselves a legislative power, destructive to parliaments, be fit to exercise that power of making laws, which only belongs to the parliament. 2dly, Whether it be safe for the commonwealth, that they should be trusted with making laws, who, as much as in them lay, have endeavoured to deprive the subject of those good laws which are already made. A third reason is this, That they stand accused of crimes very heinous ; that is, of sedition, and of subversion of the laws of the kingdom. This will easily appear in the nature of the causes themselves, as also by the votes to which your lordships and the commons have already agreed. [Here the Votes of both houses were read by Mr. Goodwin.] For the second Proposition, he said, That should be handled by one that will do it with more advantage of reason and learning than he could do, therefore he would leave to it him.”

Then Mr. Solicitor-General (St. John) informed their lordships, “ That the excluding of the Bishops from votes in parliament was not of so general consequence, as that, by it, the whole clergy of England were excluded. The first reason he offered was this, That the Bishops did not vote for the whole clergy ; but that if it should be so, then the clergy of England would be twice represented and twice voted for in parliament. 1. This appears by all the ancient writs of Summons ; which, till of late, went to this effect : a writ of Summons went to the bishop commanding him summonire all the clergy of his diocese to appear by proxies of their choosing. What to do ? ‘ Ad consentiendum in quæ de communi concilio regni ordinari consuegerit.’ So that if the bishops do represent the clergy, then the clergy are twice represented, first by the proctors, and again by the bishops. Now, although the form of the writs be altered yet the reason holds, and still remains. 2. If they vote for the clergy, then they are to be elected by the clergy, as the members of the commons house now are ; but your lordships voting only for yourselves, need no election. 3. If they voted for the clergy as a third estate, then it would follow that no act of parliament could be good where they did dissent ; but many acts of parliament are passed, where all the clergy dissented : and the last, he said, that came to his memory, was the statute of 1 Eliz. establishing the Book of Common Prayer, to which all the bishops did dissent. The entry in the roll is, ‘ Discontentibus Episcopis ;’ and yet that statute is holden for a good law to this day. This was offered to shew, That it might not be conceived, that the denying the bishops to have votes in this bill now before your lordships, was of such general influence as to take from the clergy any interest or privileges that formerly belonged to them. In the second place, he said, He was to present the sense of the whole house of commons to your lordships. That the prelates have not so absolute a right of peerage for voting in parliament, as the temporal lords have out of parliament. This appears by that instance of highest consequence, that they are not triable by their peers for their lives, but by an ordinary jury. In parliament they have no vote in judgment of blood, life, or member : but if their peerage were so inherent in them as it is the temporal peers, no ecclesiastical canons shall take it from them. Besides, in point of fact, it hath been resolved by all the judges of England, 7 Hen. 8. in Keilway's Reports, that the king may hold his parliament by the lords temporal and commons, without calling of the bishops; and that, upon several occasions, specially concerning the Pope or themselves, the Bishops have been excluded, and their votes not admitted herein.' He said, he was commanded to offer some precedents to your lordships upon the sudden. In the parliament of Edw. I. the Bishops refused to join with the lords and commons in granting of Subsidies for the good of the kingdom. This was holden at Bury; and, exclusive Clero, many acts were then made, never since questioned. In 85 Edw. I. at the parliament at Carlisle, divers petitions were there exhibited by the commons concerning the prelates and lord abbots, for oppressing the poor clergy; and several laws were made for their relief: But by whom? by the king, earls, barons and other nobles, and the commons only. Now, in respect the several ranks of the nobility are named, it is evident the bishops did not consent; because that, in all other acts where they do consent, they are particularly named. And if it be objected, 'That they might be there and might give a negative, and therefore were not named among them that did consent;' it appears, that in the Tractatus cum Comitibus, Baronibus, & ceteris Communitatibus, the king did enact those things, and never called the Bishops to be debated: This appears in the Parliament-roll.—In 20 Edw. 3. the commons petitioned that no allowance be made to the cardinals that had been in France for treating of peace: that the roll it is thus entered, 'Assented unto as reasonable by the dukes, earls, barons, and other the lay gentz,' without ever naming the bishops. Now these words 'other lay gentz,' shew that the bishops were none of the number that voted in that law. And it is to be noted, that in acts, where the particular ranks are set down, none of the temporal ranks have ever been omitted; and if the spirituality had voted, they should have been named, though a vote they had dissented. Eodem Anno, there being two other several acts made upon petitions of the commons, the one against provisions as to some cardinals, and the other to restrain the carrying of money to Rome; the answer is made as before, by the dukes, earls, barons, and commonalty, never mentioning the lords spiritual. In 3 Rd. 2. cap. 3. and 7 Rd. 2. cap. 12. there are, in print, acts made by the king and lords temporal only, without the lords spiritual. The statute of 7 Rd. 2. recites the former statute of 3 Rd. 2. which said, 'Our lord the king by the advice and common assent of all the lords temporal, and commons being in this parliament assembled, hath ordained', ut sequitur in the act. And these acts made by the king, the lords temporal and commons only, were upon the clamorous complaints of the commons, about the giving of the benefices of England to strangers and others, who never were resident upon their benefices."

This Report being made, the lords took the same into consideration; and, for the better debate thereof, the house was adjourned into a committee during pleasure. And the question being put, Whether those 13 Bishops, that are impeached of crimes from the house of commons, should be suspended from their votes in that house, whilst they stand recti in curia? a long debate ensued; which ended with an order, "That the further consideration of this matter, and the Exclusion-Bill, should be referred to the 10th of Nov."

Oct. 28. A select committee of the commons was chosen to prepare, out of the whole debate which happened this day, a Petition to be presented to his majesty, To prevent the mischiefs that may happen to the commonwealth, by the choice and employment of evil counsellors, ambassadors, judges, officers, and other ministers of state.

Mr. Smith's Speech concerning the Distractions of the Times.] We meet with the following speech in the house of commons, made by one Mr. Smith, dated as this day, occasioned by the distracted State of these Times: 'Mr. Speaker, The last time we assembled we sat like a college of physicians, upon the life and death of three great patients, whose bleeding hearts lay prostrate before us, and were arrived at that critical minute, either to receive relief or eternal destruction. The three unfortunate nations were presented to us in all their distractions; and grown to such a superlative height in their miseries, that, like nursing-mothers bereaved of their tender infants, they were careless of what might happen to them, Quia perdidierant libertates. These three kingdoms, whose peace and amity filled the remaining World with envy and emulation; and were like that happy trinity of faith, hope, and charity, in a perfect union; had but now their swords edged to each other's confusion. O, Scelus hominum; Height of impiety? Kalends Tillus! said Cæsar in the senate: It was not his death that grieved him, but that his son should advance his hand to his slaughter. How many sons and Nero's had we, whose earnest endeavours were to rip up their mother's womb, and, like vipers, eat through her bowels, and to lay desolate their father's house!

'Quis talia fando,

Temperet à lachrymis?'

And yet all this had been but a prologue to our Tragedy, had not God Almighty been pleased to interpose his hand; to have been a pillar of fire betwixt us and our captivity, and to have wrought our deliverance by his great instrument the parliament; whose constant labour it hath been, for this year past, to create a true understanding and firm peace between the nations; which I hope is so accomplished, that it is not in the power of the devil, or all his works, ever to dissolve it. This, I say, was the work of our last sitting. Give me leave now, sir, I beseech you, to deliver what I conceive convenient to be of this; 1. To give God his due. 2. To establish the Rights between king and people. And, 3. To compose things amongst ourselves.—That first, we may give God his due, we must advance his worship, and compel obedience to his commands, wherein he hath been so much neglected. Honour and riches have been set up for gods, in competition with him: Idolatry and superstition have been introduced, even into his house; the church and he expulsed: his name hath been blasphemed, and his day prophaned, by the authority of that unlawful Book of Sports; and those, who would not tremble thus to dishonour God, would not scruple to do it to their parents, or injure their neighbours, either by murder of them, or by adultery, David's great crimes. They have not only robbed God of his honour, but men of their estates, and part of themselves; members and ears having been set to sale, even to the deforming that creature whom God had honoured with his own Image. That they might colour this their wickedness, perjury and false testimony have been more frequent with them than their prayers: and all this proceeded out of an inordinate desire of that which was their neighbour's; and thus God, in all his commandments, hath been abused. Can we then wonder at his judgments, or think he could do less than he hath done to right himself upon such a rebellious people?—I beseech you, Sir, let us do something to seat him in his throne, and worship him all with one mind; and not that every one shall go to God a way by himself. This uncertainty staggers the unresolved soul, and leads it into such a labyrinth, that, not knowing where to fix, for fear of erring, it adheres to no way; so it dies ere it performs that for which it was made to live. Uniformity in his worship is that which pleaseth him; and, if we will thus serve him, we may expect protection from him.—The next thing that I conceive fit to be considered, is, 'To cause the rights both of the king and people truly to be understood.' And, in this, to give that authority to the prerogative which legally it hath, and to uphold the subjects liberty from being minced into servitude.—That the king should have a prerogative, is necessary for his honour, it distinguishes him from his people; but, if it swells too high, and makes an inundation upon his subjects liberty, 'tis no longer then to be stiled by that name. 'The privilege of the subject' is likewise for his majesty's honour. King David gloried in the number of his people; and queen Elizabeth delivered, in a speech in parliament, 'That the greatness of a prince consisteth in the riches of his subjects;' intimating, That then they stood like lofty cedars about him, to defend him from the storms of the world; and there were ample demonstrations of this in that renowned queen's reign. But what encouragement can they have either to increase their numbers or estates, unless they may have protection both for themselves and estates? Therefore the privilege and greatness of the subject are, relatively, for the honour of the prince.—Prerogative and Liberty are both necessary to this kingdom; and, like the sun and moon, give a lustre to this benighted nation, so long as they walk at their own distances: but when one of them shall venture into the other's orb, like those planets in conjunction, they then cause a deeper eclipse: what shall be the compass then by which the two must steer? Why, nothing but the same, which they subsist, the law; which, if it is run in the free current of its purity, without being poisoned by the venomous spirits of ill-affected dispositions, would so fix the king to his crown that it would make him stand like a star, the firmament, for the neighbour-world to hold and tremble at.—That they may be better acted, I shall humbly desire, that, as so many times, that great Charter, the Liberty of the Law, may be reviewed; the Liberty of the Subject explained, and be once more considered; Penalties imposed on the breakers; and let him die with the bargain that dares stretch the act.—The last thing that falls into consideration, is, 'To set things right amongst ourselves the subjects of England.' And, in this, to provide, that the Mæcenæ's of the times, do not, like great jacks in a pool, devour their inferiors, and make poverty a pavement to themselves to trample on. This hath been a burthen we have long groaned under; for great one did but say the word, it was sufficient to evict my right, even from my own inheritance. They had both law and justice so string, that they could command them without nod; and thus people have been dishonoured of their common right, the law, which is as to them as the air they breathe in.—On the other side, we must take care, that the common people may not carve themselves out justice, by their multitudes. Of this we have frequent experience, by their breaking down inclosures, and by raising other tumults to our purposes; which if they be not suddenly suppressed, to how desperate an issue this will grow, I will leave to your better judgments. A humble motion, therefore, is, That an invitation may go forth into the country, to those that are injured to resort to the court of law; and, if there they fail of justice, in parliament they may be confident to receive it.

Oct. 29. At this time there being a vacancy in the church, of 5 Bishops Secs; and the king purposing to fill them up at his return, a petition was made in the commons, That a conference should be had with the lords, to desire them to join with that house in a Petition for his majesty, to stay the making of these Bishops, until further consideration be had with both houses about it. A debate arising on this, the house divided; when it was carried conference, 71; against it, 53; and a committee was appointed accordingly.

Conference concerning the Safety of the Prince, &c.] Oct. 30. The house of commons sent up a message to the lords to desire a present conference touching the Safety of the kingdom, and the Security of the Prince's Person. The lords agreed to this conference; and, being returned from it, the lord keeper reported the substance of it to the lords, to this effect:

"That the house of commons were full of tenderness for the king's honour, and duty to be king's person and his posterity. It was said, that it was no news now-a-days, to hear of dangerous designs, therefore the house of commons have reason to look into every corner whence danger may come. And, upon information, that house understands that the Prince, of late, hath been much from his house, at Watland, out of the custody of his governor. They do not doubt of the motherly affection and care of the queen towards him; but there were dangerous persons at Oatlands, Priests and Jesuits, as hath of late appeared by some examinations taken; and that some of them were sent for by the house of commons. Upon these reasons that house desires that a message may be sent to the marquis of Hertford, from both houses, that he would, forthwith, take the Prince into his custody and charge, and attend upon him in person; and to desire that the Prince would make his ordinary abode and residence at his own house, at Richmond; and that his lordship would place such persons about him as he will be answerable for to both houses."

Hereupon the lords, taking this Report into consideration, resolved to send the marquis of Hertford and the earl of Holland, to acquaint the Queen with it, and present to her majesty the Reasons aforesaid for it. They then made the following order; which was agreed to by the commons, and sent to the marquis:

"The desire of both houses of parliament is, That the lord marquis of Hertford, governor to the prince, will take care that his ordinary residence and abode be at his own house; and that no such person, as may give cause of distrust of meddling with him, either in any point against his religion, or against the security of his person, be admitted about him; and, to this purpose, that the said marquis do diligently attend him in person; and this care both houses respect that his lordship will take, as he will answer it to the king and kingdom."

The Queen returned for Answer, "That she gave the parliament thanks for their care of her son. The occasion why she sent for him, was to celebrate the birth-day of one of his sisters; but that he should be presently sent back to Richmond." And added, "That she made no doubt but, at the king's return, the parliament would express the same care of his majesty's honour and safety."

A Committee of Lords acquaint the Commons with the Rebellion in Ireland.] Nov. 1. This day the lord keeper, the lord privy seal, the earl marshal, the lord admiral, the lord chamberlain, the earls of Bath, Dorset, Leicester, Warwick, Holland, Berks, and Bristol, with the lords Say and Sels, Mandeville, Goring, and Wilmot; all lords of the privy council, came into the house of commons, and informed the members of certain Intelligences which were lately come, of a great Treason and general Rebellion of the Papists in Ireland, and a design of cutting off all the Protestants there, and seizing of all the forts in that kingdom. The Letters and Examinations that expressed the nature of these Treasons, were all read publicly in the house, in presence of the said lords, who had chairs set on purpose for them; and after they had been there a little while, Mr. Speaker desired them to sit and be covered. These Letters and Examinations are entered as length in the Lords Journals for this day: but as they are too long for our purpose, we shall omit them; and only give the Resolutions of the commons on this important occasion:—On the lords withdrawing, the commons went immediately into a committee to take this affair into consideration, and to provide for the safety of both kingdoms; and, after some time spent therein it was resolved, "That 50,000*l.* be forthwith provided: that a conference be desired with the lords, to move them, that a select committee of both houses may be appointed to go to the city of London, and acquaint them with the business in Ireland: and that the lending of money at this time will be an acceptable service to the common-wealth: to propose unto them the loan of 50,000*l.* and assure them that they shall be secured, both for principal and interest, by act of parliament. That another head of this conference shall be to desire the lords, that a select committee of both houses may be named, to consider of the Affairs of Ireland, and of the raising and sending of men and ammunition thither from hence: a Declaration of both houses to be sent into Ireland; and that this committee may have power to open such packets as come from thence, or go from hence thither. That Owen Conelly, who discovered the great Treason in Ireland, shall have 500*l.* presently paid him, and 200*l.* per annum, pension, until provision may be made of Inheritance, of greater value; and to be recommended to the lord lieutenant there for some preferment. That the persons of Papists of quality may be secured, in the several counties of this kingdom where they reside; and that such English Papists as have, within one year last past, removed themselves into Ireland, except such persons as have ancient estates and habitations there, may, by proclamation, be recalled, within one month after the publication of it in that kingdom; or else some course be taken, by act of parliament, to sequester their estates."—There were some other Resolutions made, relating to the dissolution of the Capuchin House in the Strand: to desire that the Ambassadors may be sent to, to deliver up such Priests, as are the king's subjects, in their houses: that a list may be brought in of the queen's Priests, and other her servants, with those of the Prince, and all such as are about the king's children. A Proclamation, commanding all strangers, that are not Protestants, to deliver in tickets of their names, within two days, or else to depart the kingdom. All Inn-keepers, and others that entertain lodgers, to give in tickets of the names of all such as lodge in their houses, to the lord mayor and aldermen of London, or to the next justices of peace in Middlesex, &c. All which Resolutions were agreed to by the lords at the conference.

A Member expelled for selling Protections.]

Nov. 2. The commons expelled Mr. Henry Benson, member for Knaresbrough, for granting and selling Protections, and a writ was ordered to chuse a new member in his room.

Proceedings relating to the Irish Rebellion.]

Nov. 3. Several Orders were made, by both houses, relating to the Irish Rebellion, and a Letter ordered to be written to the king in Scotland, pressing his speedy return to this kingdom. The houses meet with some reluctance, in the city of London, concerning the Loan of 50,000*l.* as demanded. The commons order 20,000*l.* to be forthwith had out of the ready money in the treasury; and vote that 6000 foot and 2000 horse, be speedily raised and transported into Ireland: that a convenient number of ships shall be provided to guard the Irish coasts; and that magazines of victuals, &c. shall be placed in the several ports of this kingdom, ready for transporting to Ireland; with other articles of the like nature: to all which the lords agreed.

Instructions from the Parliament to their Commissioners in Scotland.] Nov. 10. The commons went upon two great points, the framing of new Instructions to be sent to their Commissioners in Scotland, and preparing a Declaration, or Remonstrance, of the State of the kingdom. The latter of these was read the first time, in the commons, the day before; when several more Grievances were given in, and ordered to be added to it: and the Instructions were reported to the house of lords as follows:

I. You shall humbly inform his majesty, that the Propositions made to the parliament of Scotland, concerning their assistance for suppressing the Rebellion in Ireland, hath been fully considered and debated by both houses of parliament here; and their wise and brotherly expressions and proceedings are apprehended and entertained here by us, not only with approbation, but with thankfulness: wherefore we desire that his majesty will be pleased, that you, in the name of the lords and commons of England, give public thanks to the states of the parliament of Scotland, for their care and readiness to employ the forces of that kingdom for the reducing the rebellious subjects of Ireland to their due obedience to his majesty and the crown of England. II. You shall further make known to his majesty, that (in the great and almost universal revolt of the natives of Ireland, cherished and fomented, as we have cause to fear, by the secret practices and encouragements of some foreign states, ill affected to this crown; and, that the Northern parts of that kingdom may with much more ease and speed be supplied from Scotland than from England) we humbly desire and beseech his majesty to make use of the assistance of his parliament and subjects of Scotland, for the present relief of those parts of Ireland which lie nearest to them; according to the Treaty agreed upon, and confirmed in both parliaments, and their affectionate and friendly disposition now lately expressed, as is more particularly specified in the 5th Article. III. You shall present to his majesty the Copy inclosed of the Declaration, which we have sent into Ireland, for the encouragement of his good subjects there, and for the more speedy and effectual opposing of the rebels; and, in execution and performance of our expressions, therein made, of zeal and faithfulness to his majesty's service, we have already taken care for 50,000*l.* to be presently borrowed and secured by parliament: we have likewise resolved to hasten the earl of Leicester, lord lieutenant of Ireland, very speedily to repair thither; and forthwith to raise a convenient number of horse and foot, for securing Dublin and the English pale, with such other parts as remain in his majesty's subjection, intending to second them with a far greater supply. IV. We have further ordered and directed, That his majesty's arms and munition lying in the city of Carlisle, shall be transported into the north parts of Ireland, for the supply of Carrickfergus, and other his majesty's forts and garrisons there; and that a convenient number of men shall be sent from the north parts of England, for the better guard and defence of those forts and countries adjoining; and that a large proportion of arms and other munition shall be speedily conveyed, out of his majesty's stores, to West-Chester, to be disposed of according to the direction of the lord lieutenant of Ireland, for arming the men to be sent from England, and such other of his majesty's loyal subjects as may be raised in Ireland. V. And, because we understand that the rebels are like, with great strength, to attempt the ruin and destruction of the British plantation in Ulster; we humbly advise his majesty, by the counsel and authority of his parliament in Scotland, to provide, that one regiment, consisting of 1000 men, furnished and accomplished with all necessary arms and munition, as shall seem best to their great wisdoms and experience, may, with all possible speed, be transported into Ireland; under the command of some worthy person, well affected to the reformed religion, and the peace of both kingdoms, and well enabled with skill, judgment, and reputation for such an employment; which forces we desire may be quartered in those Northern parts for the opposing of the rebels, and comfort and assistance of his majesty's good subjects there; with instructions from his majesty and the parliament of Scotland, that they shall, upon all occasions, pursue and observe the directions of the lord lieutenant, his lieutenant, or the governor of Ireland, according to their authority derived from his majesty and the crown of England. VI. And, as touching his wages and other charges needful, which his assistance will require, we would have you, in our name, to beseech his majesty to commend it to our brethren, the estates of the parliament of Scotland, to take it into their care, on the behalf of his majesty and this kingdom, to make such agreements with all the commanders and soldiers to be employed, as they would do in the like case for themselves; and to let them know, for our parts, we do wholly rely upon their honourable and friendly dealing with us, and will take care that satisfaction be made accordingly. VII. You shall represent to his majesty this our humble and faithful Declaration, that we cannot, without much grief, remember the great miseries, sorrows, and distempers which have, for divers years, afflicted all his kingdoms and dominions, and brought them to the last point of ruin and destruction; all which have issued from the cunning, false, and malicious practices of some of those who have been admitted into very near places of counsel and authority about him; who have been favourers of popery, superstition, and innovation; subverters of religion, honour, and justice; factors for promoting the designs of foreign princes and states, to the real and apparent danger of his royal person, crown, and dignity, and of all his people; authors of false scandals and jealousies betwixt his majesty and his loyal subjects; enemies to the peace, union and confidence between him and his parliament, which is the surest foundation of prosperity and greatness to his majesty, and of comfort and hope to them: that, by their counsels and endeavours, those great aims which have been lately drawn from the people, have been either consumed unprofitably, or in the maintenance of such designs as have been mischievous and destructive to the state; and whilst we have been labouring to support his majesty, to purge out the corruptions, and restore the decays both of church and state; others, of their faction and party, have been contriving, by violence and force, to suppress the liberty of parliament, and endanger the safety of those who have opposed such wicked and pernicious courses. VIII. That we have just cause to believe, that those conspiracies and commotions in Ireland, are at the effects of the same counsels; and if persons of such aims and conditions shall still continue in credit, authority, and employment, the great aids which we shall be enforced to draw from his people, for subduing the Rebellion in Ireland, will be applied to the fomenting and cherishing of it there, and encouraging some such like attempt by the Papists and ill-affected subjects in England; and, in the end, to the subversion of religion, and destruction of his loyal subjects in both kingdoms; and do therefore most humbly beseech his majesty, to change those counsels from which such ill courses have proceeded, and which have caused so many miseries and dangers to himself and all his dominions; and that he will be graciously pleased to employ such counsels and ministers, as shall be approved of by his parliament, who are his greatest and most faithful council; that so his people may, with courage and confidence, undergo the charge and hazard of this war; and, by their bounty and faithful endeavours, with God's blessing, restore to his majesty and this kingdom that honour, peace, safety, and prosperity, which they have enjoyed in former times.—And if herein his majesty shall not vouchsafe to condescend to our humble supplication, although we shall always continue, with reverence and faithfulness to his person and to his crown, to perform those duties of service and obedience, to which, by the laws of God and this kingdom, we are obliged; yet we shall be forced, in discharge of the trust which we owe to the state, and to those whom we represent, to resolve upon some such way of defending Ireland from the rebels, as may concur to the securing ourselves from such mischievous counsels and designs, as have lately been and still are in practice and agitation against us, as we have just cause to believe; and to commend those Aids and Contributions, which this great necessity shall require, to the custody and disposing of such persons of honour and fidelity as we have cause to confide in."

Mr. Pym's Speech, concerning the Danger of evil Counsels.] When these Instructions were read at the conference, Mr. Pym proceeded in explaining to the lords the several steps, as they are there called, by which Evil Counsels become dangerous: 1. "That the Dangers which come to the state by ill Counsels, are the most pernicious of all others: and since it is usual to compare politic bodies with natural; the natural body is in danger divers ways, either by outward violence, that may be foreseen and prevented; or else, by less appearing maladies which grow upon the body by distempers of the air, immoderate exercise, diet, &c. and when the causes of the disease are clear, the remedy is easily applied; but diseases which proceed from the inward parts, as the liver, the heart, or the brains, the more noble parts, it is a hard thing to apply a cure to such diseases. Ill counsels are of that nature; for the mischiefs that come by evil counsel corrupt the vital parts, and overthrow the public government.—2. That there have been lately, and still are, ill counsels in this kingdom, and about the king. That there have been lately, you will not doubt, when the main course of the government hath been so employed, as Popery thereby hath been maintained, the laws subverted, and no distinction between justice and injustice: and that there are ill counsels still, is apparent by the courses taken to advance mischievous designs; but that his majesty's wisdom and goodness kept them from the heart, though they were not kept out of the court: so most principal and mischievous designs have been practised by such as had near access unto his majesty, though not to his heart; and the apologists and promoters of ill counsel are still preferred.—3. The ill counsels of this time are, in their own nature, more mischievous and more dangerous than the ill counsels of former times: former counsels have been to please kings in their vices, from which our king is free, and sometimes for racking of the prerogative. If it had gone no further it had brought many miseries, but not ruin and destruction: but the ill counsels of this time are destructive to religion and laws, by altering them both; therefore more mischievous, in their own nature, than those of former times.—4. That these ill counsels have proceeded from a spirit and inclination to Popery; and have had a dependance on Popery, and all of them tend to it. The religion of the Papists is a religion incompatible with any other religion; destructive to all others, and doth not endure any thing that opposeth it. Whosoever doth withstand their religion, if they have power, they bring them to ruin. There are other religions that are not right, but not so destructive as Popery; for the principles of Popery are destructive of all states and persons that oppose it. With the progress of this mischievous counsel they provide counsellors, fit instruments and organs, that may execute their own designs; and so turn all counsels to their own ends: and you find, now in Ireland, that those designs, that have been upon all the three kingdoms, do end in a war, for the maintenance of Popery in Ireland, and would do the like here if they were able; so intent are they to turn all to their own advantage.—5. That unless these ill counsels be changed, it is impossible that any assistance, aid, or advice that the parliament can take to reform, will be effectual; for the public orders and laws are but dead, if not put in execution. Those that are the ministers of state put things into action; but if acted by evil men, and while these counsels are on foot, we can expect no good; it is like a disease that turns nutritives into poison. 6. That this is the most proper time to desire of his majesty the alteration and change of the evil Counsellors, because the common wealth is brought into distemper by them, and so exhausted that we can endure no longer. Another reason why we cannot admit of them, is, to shew our love and fidelity to the king in great and extraordinary contributions and aids. When God doth employ his servants, he doth give some promise to rouse up their spirits; and we have reason now to expect the king's grace in great abundance. This is the time wherein the subjects are to save the kingdom of Ireland, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes; and therefore expect it from his majesty in a more large and bountiful manner than at other times. A time of great agitation and action, their state being ready, by preparation, to annoy us, ill and false counsels at home may quickly bring us to ruin. As we have weakness at home, so we ought to discern the actions abroad, where great provisions are made: and a carelessness and improvidence herein, when our neighbours are so provided, and have great fleets at sea, will open a way to sudden ruin and destruction, before we can be prepared; and therefore it is now the first time to move the king.—7. and lastly, 'That this alteration of counsels will bring great advantages to the king in his own designs. In all our actions, our prayers to God should be, that his name may be glorified; so our petitions to his majesty should bring honour, profit, and advantage to him, by a discouragement to the rebels; a great part of their confidence resting in the evil counsels at home, as by the examinations appeareth. It will be a great encouragement to the king's good subjects at home, who hazard their lives, and give aid and contribution, to have things governed for the public good. It will make men afraid to prefer servants to the king that are ill counsellors when they shall come to the examination of the parliament; for many times servants are preferred to princes for the advantage of foreign states. This will put an answer into the king's mouth against all importunities. That he is to prefer none, but such as will be approved of by parliament. Those that are honourable and most ingenious are aptest to be troubled in this kind, and not to deny: therefore the king may answer, 'He hath promised his parliament not to admit of any, but by the advice of parliament.' This will silence them all. These are domestic advantages: but it will also make us fitter to enter into union and treaty with foreign nations and states, and to be made partakers of the strength and assistance of others: it will fortify us against the designs of foreign princes. There hath been one common counsel at Rome and in Spain, to reduce us to Popery; if good counsel at home, we shall be the better prepared to preserve peace and union, and better respect from Ireland. It will also make us fit for any noble design abroad."

Sir W. Drake's Speech on the same Subject. Previous to this Conference about evil Counsellors, &c. there had been a debate in the house of commons, this day, on the same subject, in which we find a speech of

Sir William Drake, member for Agmondesham, as follows: "Mr. Speaker: If we consider those dangerous disturbances that this kingdom hath, of late years, laboured under, 'tis certain that, in a general and original consideration, we cannot but impute them to the wrath of God, for the sins of this nation; but, in a second and more particular consideration, we may properly ascribe them to the violent Counsels of some late ministers of state: who, either for want of counsel, or by malicious practice, have brought this state, from a happy, firm, and strong constitution, to so weak and be a temper, that the great physician, the parliament, cannot, but with extreme difficulty, apply remedies fit and proportionable to the disease, without they inevitably run some hazard of endangering the body itself: it being very perilous to apply strouger remedies than be strength and constitution of the patient can well bear.—Mr. Speaker; you were truly told, by a grave and worthy member (Sir B. Rudyard) at the beginning of this parliament, that it must be some extreme necessity that would rectify and recover this state; and that when that extremity did come, it would be a great hazard whether it might prove a remedy or a ruin; because violent diseases do most commonly require violent remedies, and violent remedies are ordinarily pregnant of new mischiefs; which hath caused those states, best killed in government, always to discern evil far off in their causes; and, by their wisdom and foresight, to prevent them. I am confident, had we had frequent parliaments, we should have given a timely stop to mischiefs, and never have suffered them to have broken upon us with such an inundation of distempers that, without divine prevention, may yet swallow us up.—Mr. Speaker; it is observed of the Roman Senate, a pattern of best government, so long as they held up their first virtue and valour, that, after a great defeat by Hannibal, their confederates began to forsake them. But Hiero, king of Sicily, having so piercing a judgment, that he could see through be present to the future; and observing the Romans still so considerate and constant in all their proceedings, even in this extreme exigency of their affairs; and that their laws were never more strictly observed by their magistrates, nor their people more obedient to their senate or parliament; and how their military discipline was never, likewise, more severely observed: this wise prince, seeing their foundations stood thus firm, sent them presents of great value; and corresponded with them in a stricter league of friendship than ever before: not unlike a good physician, who, seeing favourable symptoms in the strongest fit of his patient's disease, conceives firm hope of his perfect recovery.—Now Mr. Speaker, if we set before us an image or representation of those distempers we stand invironed withal, there could not possibly be that extreme danger in them, but that there might be good hopes of a speedy recovery; had we kept close and constant to those grounds of religion, laws and military discipline, which have been noted by the wisest legislators, to have been the main cause, next under God, of the strength and duration of a state.—But, sir, if we examine it, how have our very foundations been shaken? What superstition and innovations have been brought in upon our religion, of late times, by ambitious, heady, and passionate men? And from this fountain, originally, as I conceive, flows most part of our present distractions. Queen Elizabeth, of sacred and precious memory to this nation, keeping stedfast and constant to this ground of religion, kept this kingdom peaceable and united at home; afforded a comfortable influence and assistance to the Protestant parties abroad; and, after a long and happy reign went unto her eternal rest in Glory.—And truly, sir, I speak it with all humility, yet with some confidence, that I shall never expect to see the quiet settled state of this kingdom, till there be some course taken to settle Religion to some rule and uniformity; and not to be thus suffered in an uncertain condition, between illegal innovations and superstition on the one side, and I know not what lawless and irregular confusion on the other.—And let us all, I beseech you, calmly and seriously consider, how natural a motion it is to most men, not limited by some law, when they are come out of one extreme, wherein they have been held by fear, to run with as violent a course into another; from superstition and idolatry, to irreverence and contempt of God's public worship and ordinances.—For our Laws, Mr. Speaker, how have they been violated by illegal taxations, imprisonments, monopolies, and other pressures, whereby the subject hath been prosecuted and grieved? But this is so obvious to every man's understanding and sense, that I shall not insist upon it.—Mr. Speaker, I come next to our Military Discipline; and how hath this ground of strength been shaken, partly by the loss of able and experienced commanders in fruitless, if not dangerous, attempts abroad; and partly by neglect, and not duly keeping up our musters at home?—Mr. Speaker, every man may lay it as lightly to heart as he pleases; but I shall be bold to tell you, that all the laws, that we have or shall make for the defence of our religion or liberties, without provident care in this particular, will be but like to sumptuous and glorious structures without roof or covering, subject to all weather and storms that shall arise; and whatever parliaments shall, with great wisdom and providence, plant for the good estate of future times, without due provisions for our Military Defence, may be soon cut down again by the violence and malice of a stronger sword.—Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as you have taken a provident care for the securing of the havens and port-towns, so I desire there may be timely consideration had of the inland strength of the kingdom; and that musters, in all counties of the kingdom, be carefully (especially in these perilous times) kept up; and that care be taken that every county may have a sufficient proportion of powder, and other provision, for their necessary defence. That all commands may rest in faithful hands; and that certificates of the true state of all things, how they stand for defence, may, from time to time be sent either to the council of war you appoint for Ireland, or to any other whom the parliament shall think meet; and thereupon to take order, from time to time, to supply all defects, as well of captains, as of munition, powder, and other necessities.—Mr. Speaker, this point is more timely to be had in consideration, because our perils will increase, as foreign states settle and compose their affairs to their best advantage: and therefore I shall desire that our quietness may not rest any longer upon so tickle a ground as the unquietness of our neighbour kingdoms; for no state stands firm and secure, but upon its own foundations.—There is one thing more with which I will conclude; and I shall humbly represent it as, in my weak opinion, a great cause of our growing distemper: this is the abundance of humours we have stirred, and not purged away, which are but fit fuel for fresh fire to take hold of, if it should burst forth; therefore as there be great numbers in this state, ‘Qui pœnâ, à calamitate publica, impunitatem sibi spondent;’ I shall make it my humble motion and desire, That we make severe examples of some few of the most capital offenders; and either pardon the meaner delinquents, if justice will admit thereof, or at least to let them, in some reasonable time, know what they may trust to; otherwise as many as look desperately upon their own fortunes, will be too ready to give their vote for troubles, and seek their own peace in the public disturbance; the number of whom, as I conceive, should be warily prevented, especially in these times of increasing distraction.—Sir, I have troubled you too long; and am not so inconsiderate but to object to myself, that some things are of more instant and present consideration than any thing I have touched upon; as your sending provisions for Ireland: but I desire, as those affairs are in some measure settled in a way, we may timely apply ourselves to the root and causes of our distempers; begin with those of most importance; and so proceed with them to effect.

Progress of the Rebellion in Ireland.] Nov. 11. This day a Letter was read in the lords, from the Council of Ireland, shewing, That the Protestants there would be utterly destroyed, and that kingdom cut off from the crown of England, if present supply of men, ammunition and money were not sent from hence: that the rebels proceeded in their rebellion, and had seized on the houses, estates and persons of divers men and women of good quality, and have murdered many: that they are gathered, in several parts of Ireland, to the number of 30,000, and threaten that they will not leave an English Protestant there; and that they will not lay down their arms, until an act of parliament be passed for freedom of their religion: that the Council desire a speedy Supply of 10,000 men with arms, and 100,000*l.* in money.

Nov. 12. Several Resolutions were passed, in both houses, on this intelligence; the number of forces to be sent were augmented to 10,000 foot and 2000 horse; likewise the parliament of Scotland were to be desired to have in readiness 10,000 men more, to be transported to Ireland, on occasion. The letter from thence was ordered to be communicated to the city of London, and to be forthwith printed and published. The house of commons voted, that 200,000*l.* should be raised for the suppressing this Rebellion, for the security of this kingdom, and for the payment of debts.

The Impeached Bishops put in their Plea.] The same day the commons received a message from the lords, importing, That this being the day for the 13 Bishops to give in Answer to their Impeachment, 12 of them had given in a plea and a demurrer; but that Godfrey, bishop of Gloucester, had pleaded not guilty, in modo & forma.

The Londoners agree to lend Money on certain Conditions.] Nov. 13. A Report was made to the commons, “That the committee appointed to go to the city, found a great deal of readiness in them to lend money, on the security offered: but before they did lend any, they humbly proposed, 1st, That the money should be paid as soon as the act was passed. 2dly, That, by reason of the privileges of the members of both houses, and the protection granted, especially by the lords, a vast sum of money is detained from them; so that trade cannot be driven, nor are they so able to lend money for the service of the commonwealth as they desired. 3dly, They said they were sensible of the miseries of the Protestants in Ireland, and of the power of the Papists there; and therefore did press, with much earnestness, that the persons of the Papists lords, and other persons of quality here in England, might be secured; lest some design be in them here as they have cause to fear. Next, That there were divers laws and good motions sent up to the lords, for the good of the church and commonwealth; and that the great impediment that they passed not there, was from the bishops; and they did conceive, That so long as their votes were in parliament it would be a hindrance to all good laws; and therefore desired further endeavours to take away their votes.”

Mr. Serjeant Wyld reported from the committee appointed to examine into the plea and demurrer of the 12 Bishops, “That after a long debate and various opinions, they had at last concluded, that they were dilatory and insufficient; and that the 12 Bishops had made no Answer: therefore to desire the lords that the Bishops be ordered to put in a peremptory Answer, such as they will stand to.”

Informations of Plots.] Nov. 15. The parliament was this day put in great consternation, by the Information of one Beal, a taylor, of a dangerous Plot of the Papists, against the lives of several members of both houses. The deposition of this man is, at length, in the Lords’ Journals; and was so far believed, that all necessary precaution was taken to make a farther discovery and prevent the danger: but no persons being found that were named to be concerned in it, we hear no more of this matter.

Nov. 16. Other informations were sent up to the parliament from Cheshire and Lancashire, of the designs of the Papists in those counties. Upon all which, an ordinance of parliament for putting the Trained Bands of the kingdom in a posture of defence, was read and agreed to by both houses. An ordinance was also made to authorise the earl of Essex to be lord lieutenant on the south side Trent, and the earl of Holland on the north; and the house of commons, particularly, ordered a guard of halberts to be set in convenient places, for the security of their house.

Nov. 17. Several witnesses were examined before the commons, after which it was resolved, "That there is sufficient evidence for this house to believe, that there was a second design to bring up the Army against the Parliament, and an intention to make the Scots army stand neuter."

Debates in the Commons, concerning a Remonstrance on the State of the Kingdom. [Nov. 12. The commons fell briskly on their Declaration or Remonstrance. A long debate ensued on the keeping in, or leaving out, several clauses, expressions, and words in it; in which there were no less than four divisions of the house. In the two last of them, the question being out, Whether this Declaration, so amended, shall pass? it was carried, for passing 159, against 148. And, in another question, Whether the word 'published' should stand in the order for the not printing the Declaration, the Noes were 124, Yeas 101. But it was resolved, "That this Declaration shall not be printed without the particular order of this house."

We find a speech of sir Edward Dering's upon this occasion; who, though he had signified himself against the court, in the beginning of this session, yet was equally zealous against this Declaration. This speech, being very long, and printed in Rushworth, Nalson, and sir Edward's own Collections*, we cursorily pass over to avoid prolixity. But the following passages are too remarkable to be omitted.

'Mr. Speaker; This Remonstrance, whensoever it passeth, will make such an impression, and leave such a character behind, both of his majesty, the people, the parliament, and of this present church and state, as no time shall ever eat out, whilst histories are written, and men have eyes to read them. How curious then ought we be, both in the matter and the form? Herein is a severe point of conscience to be tried; let us be sure that every particular substance be a truth; and let us clothe that truth with a free language, yet a modest and a sober language.—Mr. Speaker, this Remonstrance is, in some kind, greater and more extensive than an act of parliament: that reacheth only to England and Wales; but, in this, the three kingdoms will be your immediate supervisors: and the greatest part of Christendom will quickly borrow the glass to see our deformities therein; they will scan this work at leisure, which, I hope, we shall not shut up in haste. Some pieces here are of excellent use and worth: but what is that to me, if I may not have them without other parts that are both doubtful and dangerous? The matter, form, and final end of this Remonstrance, all of them do argue with me, not to remonstrate thus. When I first heard of a Remonstrance, I presently imagined that, like faithful counsellors, we should hold up a glass to his majesty: I did not dream we should remonstrate downwards, tell stories to the people, and talk of the king as of a third person. The use and end of such a Remonstrance, I understand not; at least I hope I do not.—He then proceeds to the religious Grievances recited in the Declaration, viudicates several of the Bishops and Clergy by name, and concludes thus: 'I do beseech you all with the fervor of an earnest heart, a heart almost divided between hopes and fears, never to suffer diversion or diminution of the rents we have for learning and religion: but, besides the pulpit, let us maintain an universal militia of Theology, whereby we may be always ready and able (by strength of our own, within our own happy island at home) to stop the mouth of all errors and heresies that can arise. Never, never, let it be said that sacred learning (for such is that I plead for) shall, in one essential half thereof, be quite unprovided for in England. Sir, I have reason to be earnest in this: I see, I know, great designs drawing another way; and my fears are increased not cured by this Declaration. Thus I have done: and because I shall want champions for true Religion: because I neither look for cure of our complaints from the common people, nor do desire to be cured by them: because this house (as, under favour, I conceive) hath not recommended all the heads of this Remonstrance to the committee which brought it in: because it is not true that the Bishops have commanded Idolatry: because I do not know any necessary good end and use of this Declaration, but do fear a bad one; and because we pass his majesty and do remonstrate to the people: I do here discharge my vote with a clear conscience, and must say No to this strange Remonstrance.'

Lord Clarendon's Account of the above Debate. [Lord Clarendon, who distinguished himself in this affair, under the name, then, of Mr. Hyde, has given us the following abstract of the debate upon it.—"It contained a very bitter representation of all the illegal things which had been done from the first hour of the king's coming to the crown, to that minute; with all the sharp reflections which could be made upon the king himself, the queen and council; and published all the unreasonable jealousies of the present government, of the introducing Popery; and all other particulars that might disturb the minds of the people, which were enough discomposed. The house seemed generally to dislike it, many saying, 'That it was very unnecessary and unseasonable; unnecessary, all those grievances being already fully redressed, and the liberty and property of the subject being as well secured for the future as could possibly be done; and unseasonable, after the king had gratified them with granting every thing which they had desired of him; and, after so long absence in the settling the disorders in another kingdom, which he had happily composed, to be now welcomed home with such a volume of reproaches for what others had done amiss, and which he himself had reformed'. Notwithstanding all which, all the other party appeared passionately concerned that it might not be rejected, and enlarged themselves with as high expressions against the government as at first; with many insinuations, 'That we were in danger of being deprived of all the good acts which we had gained, if great care and vigilance were not used to disappoint some counsels which were still entertained;' making some doubtful glances and reflections upon the rebellion in Ireland, with which they perceived many good men were easily amused; and, in the end, prevailed, 'That a day should be appointed, when the house should be resolved into a committee of the whole house, and the Remonstrance to be then retaken into consideration:' and, in the mean time, they employed all their credit and interest with particular men, to persuade them, 'That the passing that Remonstrance was most necessary for the preservation and maintenance of all those good laws, which they had already made;' giving several reasons to several persons, according to their natures and inclinations; assuring many, 'That they intended it only for the mortification of the court, and manifestation that that malignant party, which appeared to be growing up in the house, could not prevail; and then, That it should remain still in the clerk's hands, and never be published. And, by these and the like arts, they promised themselves, that they should easily carry it: so that the day it was to be resumed, they entertained the house all the morning with other debates, and, towards noon, called for the Remonstrance; and it being urged by some, 'That it was too late to enter upon it,' with much difficulty they consented, 'That it should be entered upon the next morning, at 9 of the clock, and every clause should be debated, the Speaker in the chair;' for they would not have the house resolved into a committee, which they believed would spend too much time. Oliver Cromwell, who at that time was little taken notice of, asked the lord Falkland, 'Why he would have it put off, for that day would quickly have determined it?' he answered, 'There would not have been time enough; for sure it would take some debate.' The other replied, 'A very sorry one.' They supposing, by the computation they had made, that very few would oppose it. But he quickly found he was mistaken; for, the next morning, the debate being entered upon about 9 of the clock, it continued all that day; and

candles being called for when it grew dark (neither side being very desirous to adjourn till the next day, though it was evident very many withdrew themselves of it of pure faintness and disability to attend the conclusion) the debate continued till it was after 12 of the clock, with much passion; and the house being then divided upon the passing or not passing it, it was carried in the affirmative by 9 voices, and no more *. And, as soon as it was declared, Mr. Hampden moved, 'That there might be an Order entered for the present printing it,' which produced a sharper debate than the former. It appeared then, that they did not intend to send it up to the house of peers for their concurrence; but that it was, upon the matter, an Appeal to the People, and to infuse jealousies into their minds. It had seldom been the custom to publish any debates or determinations of the house, which were not first regularly transmitted to the house of peers; nor was it thought, in truth, that the house had authority to give warrant for the printing of any thing; all which was offered by Mr. Hyde, with some warmth, as soon as the motion was made for printing it; and he said, 'He believed the printing it, in that manner, was not lawful, and he feared it would produce mischievous effects; and therefore desired the leave of the house, that if the question should be put, and be carried in the affirmative, he might have liberty to enter his protestation;' which he no sooner said, than Jeffrey Palmer, a man of great reputation, and much esteemed in the house, stood up and made the same motion for himself, 'That he might likewise protest.' Many afterwards, without distinction, and in some disorder, cried out together, 'They did protest;' so that there was, after, scarce any quiet and regular debate: But the house, by degrees, being quieted, they all consented, about 2 of the clock in the morning, to adjourn till 2 the next afternoon. And as they went out of the house, the lord Falkland asked Oliver Cromwell, 'Whether there had been a debate?' to which he answered, 'He would take his word another time;' and whispered him in the ear, with some reservation, 'That, if the Remonstrance had been rejected, he would have sold all he had the next morning, and never have seen England more; and he knew there were many other honest men of the same resolution.' Rushworth says, 'That this debate lasted from 3 in the afternoon till 3 the next morning; so that one said, 'It looked like the verdict of a starved Jury.'

The King orders the Parliament's Guard to be dismissed.] Nov. 26. The lord keeper acquainted the lords, That he had received a command from the king to tell them, "That his majesty had heard both houses had appointed Guards to attend them for their security, in his absence, which he presumes they had reasons for; but now, upon his return, he hopes his presence will be a protection to them: And therefore has ordered the said Guards to be dissolved; but, if there be any occasion for it, he will take care there be sufficient Guards to secure them." This Message being communicated to the commons, the Answer returned, was, "That house desired the lords to send some few of their body, to petition the king that the Guards may stay; and, in a day or two, they would bring up reasons to satisfy his majesty about it."—The next day the king's Answer to this Petition was delivered to the lords, importing, "That he did command the Guards to be dismissed, because he knew no cause the parliament had of fears; but he well perceived the molestation that the keeping of them would bring upon those subjects of his, which were to perform that service; besides the general apprehension and jealousies, which thereby might disquiet all his people. He expressed, that when the parliament should desire of him any extraordinary thing like this, and what appears of ill consequence, that they give him such particular reasons, as might satisfy his judgment, if he did expect their desires to be granted. Yet he was so tender of the parliament's safety, that, to secure them, not only from real, but even imaginary dangers, he had commanded the earl of Dorset to appoint some of the trained Bands to wait upon the parliament for a few days; in which time, if he should be satisfied that there is just reason, he would continue them, and likewise take such a course for the safety of his own person as should be fit; of which, he doubted not, but they had as tender care as of their own." This Answer was ordered to be communicated to the commons at a conference.—Nothing done, of much consequence, in either house till November 30.

The Reasons of both Houses for the Continuance thereof.] Nov. 30. Mr. Pym, from a committee, presented the Reasons of both houses for the continuance of a Guard, which were agreed to, as follows:—"The great number of disorderly, suspicious, and desperate persons, especially of the Irish nation, lurking in obscure streets and victualling-houses, in the suburbs, and other places near London and Westminster. The jealousy conceived upon discovery of the design in Scotland, for the surprising of the persons of divers nobility and members of the parliament there; which had been spoken of here, some few days before it broke out, not without some whispering intimation, that the like was intended against divers persons of both houses; which found the more credit, by reason of the former attempts of bringing up the army, to disturb and enforce this parliament. The conspiracy in Ireland, managed with so much secrecy, that, but for the happy discovery at Dublin, it had been executed in all parts of the kingdom, upon one and the same day, or soon after; and that some of the chief conspirators did profess, that the like course was intended in England and Scotland; which being found in some degree, true in Scotland, seemed the more probable to be likewise designed for England. Divers Advertisements beyond the sea, which came over about the same time, 'That there should be a great alteration of religion in England in a few days; and that the necks of both the parliaments should be broken.' Divers Examinations, of dangerous speeches of some of the Popish and discontented party in this kingdom. The secret meetings and consultations of the Papists, in several parts: their frequent devotions for the prosperity of some great design in hand. These several considerations do move the parliament to desire a Guard; which for the most part ...* under the command of the earl of Essex: and they do conceive there is just cause to apprehend, that there is some wicked and mischievous practice, to interrupt the peaceable proceedings of the parliament, still in hand: for preventing whereof, it is fit the Guard should be continued under the same command, or such other as they should choose: but, to have it under the command of any other, not chosen by themselves, they can by no means consent to; and will rather run any hazard, than admit of a precedent so dangerous, both to this and future parliaments. And they humbly leave it to his majesty, to consider, whether it will not be fit, to suffer his high court of parliament to enjoy that privilege of providing for their own safety, which was never denied other inferior courts: and that he will be pleased graciously to believe, that they cannot think themselves safe under any Guard, of which they shall not be assured, that it will be as faithful in defending his majesty's safety, as their own; whereof they shall always be more careful than of their own."

A Committee appointed to wait upon the King, with the Petition and Remonstrance.] Dec. 1. The committee of the commons, for presenting their Petition and Remonstrance to the king, were sir Symonds D'Ewes, sir Arthur Ingram, sir James Thynne, Mr. Henry Bellasis lord Grey, sir Christopher Wray, lord Fairfax, sir Ralph Hopton, sir R. Wynne, sir John Corbet, sir Edw. Dering, sir Arthur Haslerig. Amongst these sir Edward Dering, who had so warmly opposed the passing this Remonstrance, was appointed, by the house, to read and present it to his majesty; who being out of the way, (Rushworth says on purpose) sir Ralph Hopton was ordered to do it; who, the next day, made his Report to the house in what manner they were received:—He said, "That the last night, in the evening, the committee appointed to attend his majesty, in this particular, came to Hampton-Court, and sir Richard Wynne (I may name him upon this occasion) gave his majesty notice of our being there; and, within a quarter of an hour, the king sent a gentleman to call us in; with directions that none should come in but the committee alone; who did all of them present themselves upon their knees: and myself, in obedience to the order of the house, in the absence of another designed for that service, did begin to read the Petition, knelling: but his majesty would not permit us to kneel, but commanded us all to rise; and so I read it. The first observation his majesty made was at that part of the Petition, that chargeth a malignant party with a design to change Religion: to which his majesty said, with a great deal of ferrency, 'The Devil take him, whomsoever he be, that had a design to change Religion.' I then proceeded; and when I came to that part of the Petition, for reserving the Disposal of the Lands of the Rebels in Ireland, &c. his majesty was pleased to say, 'We must not dispose of the Bear's Skin till he be dead.' After the Petition was read, his majesty desired to ask us some questions. We answered, We had no commission to speak any thing concerning this business. 'Then' said he 'you may speak as particular men;' and said 'Doth the house intend to publish this Declaration?' We answered, We could give no Answer unto it 'Well then,' said he, 'I suppose you do not now expect an Answer to so long a Petition: and this let me tell you, I have left Scotland well, and in peace; they are all satisfied with me, and I with them; and though I stayed longer there than I expected, yet, I think, if I had not gone, you had not been rid so soon of the army. I shall give you an Answer to this business, with as much speed as the weightiness of the business will permit.' And so gave us all his hand to kiss: and afterwards sent Mr. Comptroller to us with this message, to be delivered to the house, 'That there might be no publishing of the Declaration till this house had received his majesty's Answer.' We were all entertained by Mr. Comptroller with great respect, and lodged by the king's harbinger."

Since, from this Petition and Remonstrance, with the king's Answer to them at their delivery, and from the Declaration he published afterwards to the same purpose, the reader will be better enabled to form a judgment of the cause of the Civil War that ensued, and the arguments on both sides, we have printed them at large. The length of them may be more easily pardoned, since they may be justly stiled the very hinge upon which all those differences turned that, afterwards, came to be decided by the sword.

The PETITION was as follows:*

"Most gracious Sovereign; Your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, with much thankfulness and joy, acknowledge the great mercy and favour of God, in giving your majesty a safe and peaceable return out of Scotland into your kingdom of England; where the pressing dangers and distempers of the state have caused us, with much earnestness, to desire the comfort of your gracious presence, and likewise the unity and justice of your royal authority to give more life and power to the dutiful and loyal counsels and endeavours of your parliament, for prevention of that imminent ruin and destruction wherewith your kingdoms of England and Scotland are threatened. The duty which we owe to your majesty and our country, cannot but make us very sensible and apprehensive, that the multiplicity, sharpness, and malignity of those evils, under which we have now many years suffered, are fomented and cherished by a corrupt and ill-affected party; who, amongst other their mischievous devices for the alteration of religion and government, have sought by many false scandals and imputations, cunningly insinuated and dispersed amongst the people, to blemish and disgrace our proceedings in this parliament, and to get themselves a party and faction amongst your subjects for the better strengthening of themselves in their wicked courses, and hindering those provisions and remedies which might, by the wisdom of your majesty and counsel of your parliament, be opposed against them.—For preventing whereof, and the better information of your majesty, your peers, and all other your loyal subjects, we have been necessitated to make a Declaration of the State of the Kingdom, both before and since the assembly of this parliament, unto this time; which we humbly present to your majesty, without the least intention to lay any blemish upon your royal person, but only to represent how your royal authority and trust have been abused, to the great prejudice and danger of your majesty and of all your good subjects.—And because we have reason to believe that those malignant parties, whose proceedings evidently appear to be mainly for the advantage and increase of Popery, is composed, set up, and acted by the subtle practice of the Jesuits, and other engineers and factors for Rome; who, to the great danger of this kingdom, and most grievous affliction of your loyal subjects, have so far prevailed, as to corrupt divers of your Bishops and others in prime places of the Church; and also to bring divers of these instruments to light of your privy council, and other employment of trust and nearness about your majesty, the prince, and the rest of your royal children, and, by this means, have had such an operation in your council and the most important affairs and proceedings of your government, that a most dangerous division and chargeable Preparation for War betwixt your kingdoms of England and Scotland, the Increase of Jealousies betwixt your majesty and your most obedient subjects, the violent Distraction and Interruption of this Parliament, the Insurrection of the Papists in your kingdom of Ireland, and bloody Massacre of your people there, have been not only endeavoured and attempted, but, in a great measure, compassed and effected.—For preventing the final accomplishment whereof, your poor subjects are inclined to engage their persons and estates to the maintaining of a very expenceful and dangerous war, notwithstanding they have already, since the beginning of this parliament, undertaken the charge of 150,000*l.* or thereabouts, for the necessary support and supply of your majesty in these present and perilous designs. And because all our most faithful endeavours and engagements will be ineffectual for the peace, safety and preservation of your majesty and your people, if some present, real, and effectual course be not taken for suppressing this wicked and malignant party, we your most humble and obedient subjects do, with all thankfulness and humility, beseech your majesty; I. That you will be graciously pleased to concur with the humble desires of your people in a parliamentary way, for the preserving the peace and safety of the kingdom from the malicious designs of the Popish party: for depriving the Bishops of their Votes in parliament, and abridging their immoderate power usurped over the clergy, and other your good subjects; which they have most perniciously used, to the hazard of religion, and great prejudice and oppression of the laws of the kingdom, and just liberty of your people: for taking away such oppressions in religion, church government, and discipline, as have been brought in and fomented by them: for uniting all such your loyal subjects together, to join in the same fundamental truths against the Papists, by removing some oppressions and unnecessary ceremonies, by which divers weak consciences have been scrupled, and seem to be divided from the rest: for the due execution of those good laws which have been made for securing the liberty of your subjects. II. That your majesty will, likewise, be pleased to remove from your council all such as persist to stir and promote any of those pressures and usurpations, wherewith your people have beenrieved; and that, for the future, your majesty will vouchsafe to employ such persons in your most and public affairs, and to take such to be near you in places of trust, as your parliament may have cause to confide in: that, in your princely goodness to your people, you will reject and refuse all mediation and solicitation to the contrary, how powerful and near ever. III. That you would be pleased to forbear to alienate any of the forfeited and cheated lands in Ireland, which shall accrue to your crown by reason of this rebellion; that, if of them, the crown may be the better supported, and some satisfaction made to your subjects of this kingdom, for the great expenses they are like to undergo by this war.—Which humble desires of ours being graciously fulfilled by your majesty, we will, by the blessing and favour of God, most cheerfully undergo the hazard and expences of this war; apply ourselves to such other courses and counsels as may support your royal estate with honour and safety at home, with power and reputation abroad; and, by our loyal affections, obedience and service, lay a sure and lasting foundation of the greatness and prosperity of your majesty and your royal posterity in future times."

The REMONSTRANCE of the State of the Kingdom; presented with the foregoing PETITION.

"The commons in this present parliament assembled, having, with much earnestness and faithfulness of affection, and zeal to the public good of this kingdom and his majesty's honour and service, for the space of 12 months, wrestled with the great dangers and fears, the pressing miseries and calamities, the various distempers and disorders, which had not only assaulted, but even overwhelmed and extinguished the liberty, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom, the comfort and hopes of all his majesty's good subjects, and exceedingly weakened and undermined the foundation and strength of his own royal throne, do yet find an abounding malignity and opposition in those parties and factions, who have been the cause of those evils, and do still labour to cast aspersions upon that which hath been done; to raise many difficulties for the hinderance of that which remains yet undone; and also to foment jealousies betwixt the king and the parliament; that so they may deprive him and his people of the fruit of his own gracious intentions, and of their humble desires, of procuring the public peace, safety, and happiness of this realm: for the preventing of those miserable effects, which such malicious endeavours may produce, we have thought good to declare. 1st, The Root and the Growth of those mischievous Designs. 2dly, The Maturity and Ripeness, to which they had attained before the beginning of the parliament. 3dly, The effectual Means which have been used for the Extirpation of those dangerous Evils, and the Progress which hath therein been made by his majesty's goodness and the wisdom of the parliament. 4thly, The ways of Obstruction and Opposition, by which that progress hath been interrupted. 5thly, The Courses to be taken for the removing those Obstacles, and for the accomplishing of our most dutiful and faithful intentions and endeavours of restoring and establishing the ancient honour, greatness, and security of this crown and nation.—The Root of all this Mischief we find to be a malignant and pernicious design of subverting the fundamental laws and principles of government; upon which the religion and justice of this kingdom are firmly established. The actors and promoters hereof have been, 1st, The Jesuitical Papists, who hate the laws, as the obstacles of that change, and subversion of religion, which they so much long for. 2dly, The bishops, and the corrupt part of the clergy, who cherish formality and superstition, as the natural effects, and more probable supports of their own ecclesiastical tyranny and usurpation. 3dly, Such counsellors and courtiers as, for private ends, have engaged themselves to further the interests of some foreign princes or states, to the prejudice of his majesty and the state at home.—The common principles, by which they moulded and governed all their particular counsels and actions, were these: 1st, To maintain continual differences and discontents betwixt the king and the people, upon questions of prerogative and liberty, that so they might have the advantage of siding with him; and, under the notions of men addicted to his service, gain to themselves, and their parties, the places of greatest trust and power in the kingdom. 2dly, To suppress the purity and power of religion, and such as were best affected to it, as being contrary to their own ends, and the greatest impediment to that change which they thought to introduce. 3dly, To conjoin those parties of the kingdom who were most propitious to their own ends, and to divide those who were most opposite: this consisted in many particular observations, viz. To cherish the Arminian Party in those points wherein they agree with the Papists; to multiply and enlarge the differences betwixt the common Protestants and those whom they call Puritans; to introduce and countenance such opinions and ceremonies as are fittest for an accommodation with Popery; to increase and maintain ignorance, looseness, and profaneness in the people; that of those three parties, Papists, Arminians, and Libertines, they might compose a body fit to act such counsels and resolutions, as were most conducive to their own ends. 4thly, To disaffect the king to parliaments by slanders and false imputations; and, by putting him upon other ways of supply (which, in shew and appearance, were fuller of advantage than the ordinary course of Subsidies, though, in truth, they brought more loss than gain both to the king and people) have caused the great distractions under which both suffer.—As in all compounded bodies, the operations are qualified according to the predominant element; so, in this mixt party, the Jesuitic counsels being most active and prevailing, may easily be discovered to have had the greatest sway in all their determinations; and, if they be not prevented, are likely to devour the rest, or to turn them into their own nature.—In the beginning of his majesty's reign, the party begun to revive and flourish again, having been somewhat damped by the breach with Spain in the last year of king James, and by his majesty's marriage with France; (the interests and councils of that state being not so contrary to the good of religion and the prosperity of this kingdom, as those of Spain; and the Papists of England having been ever more addicted to Spain than France) yet they still retained a purpose and resolution to weaken the Protestant parties in all parts, and even in France; thereby to make way for the change of religion which they intended at home.—The first effect and evidence of their recovery and strength was, the Dissolution of the parliament at Oxford, after there had been given two subsidies to his majesty; and before they received relief in any one Grievance, many other more miserable effects followed:

The Loss of the Rochel Fleet, by the help of our shipping set forth and delivered over to the French, in opposition to the advice of parliament; which left that town without defence by sea, and made way not only to the loss of that important place, but likewise to the loss of all the strength and security of the Protestant religion in France:—The diverting of his majesty's course of wars from the West-Indies, which was the most facile and hopeful way for this kingdom to prevail against the Spaniards, to an expenceful and unsuccessful attempt upon Cadiz; which was so ordered, as if it had rather been intended to make us weary of war, than to prosper in it: The precipitate breach with France, and taking their ships to a great value; whereupon the English subjects goods were embargoed and confiscated in that kingdom, without having any recompence made them: The peace with Spain without consent of parliament, contrary to the promise of king James to both houses; whereby the Palestine's cause was deserted, and left to chargeable and hopeless treaties; which, for the most part, were managed by those who might justly be suspected to be no friends to that cause. The charging of the kingdom with billeted soldiers in all parts of it, and that countenance design of German horse; that the land might either submit with fear, or be enforced with rigour, to such arbitrary contributions as should be required of them: The dissolving of the parliament, in the 2nd year of his majesty's reign, after a declaration of their intent to grant 5 Subsidies: The exacting of the like proportion of 5 Subsidies, after the parliament was dissolved, by commission of loan; and divers gentlemen and others imprisoned for not yielding to pay that loan; whereby many of them contracted such sickness as cost them their lives. Great sums of money required, and raised by privy-seals. An unjust and pernicious attempt to extort great payments from the subjects, by way of excise; and a commission issued, under seal, for that purpose. The Petition of Right, which was granted in full parliament, blasted with an illegal Declaration, to make it destructive to itself, to the power of parliament, to the liberty of the subject, and to that purpose printed with it; and the Petition made of no use, but to shew the bold and presumptuous injustice of such ministers as durst break the laws, and suppress the liberties of the kingdom, after they had been so solemnly and evidently declared: Another parliament dissolved, 4. Caroli; the Privileges of Parliament broken, by imprisoning divers members of the house, detaining them close prisoners for many months together, without the liberty of using books, pen, ink, or paper; denying them all the comforts of life, all means of preservation of health, not permitting their wives to come unto them, even in time of their sickness: and, for the completing of that cruelty, after years spent in such miserable bondage, depriving them of the necessary means of spiritual consolation, not suffering them to

abroad to enjoy God's ordinances, in God's use, or God's ministers to come to them, to minister comfort unto them in their private umbers; and, to keep them still in this pressed condition, not admitting them to be led according to law, yet vexing them with imprisonments in inferior courts; sentencing and dragging some of them for matters done in parliament, and extorting the payments of those from them; enforcing others to put in surety for good behaviour, before they could be released. The imprisonment of the rest, who refused to be bound, still continued, (which might have been perpetual, if necessity had it, the last year, brought another parliament to relieve them) of whom one (Sir John Eliot) died by the cruelty and harshness of imprisonment; which would admit of no relaxation, notwithstanding the imminent danger of his life did sufficiently appear by the declaration of his physician: and his release, at least his refreshment, was sought by many humble petitions. And his blood still cries for vengeance, or repentance of those ministers of death, who, at once, obstructed the course both of his majesty's justice and mercy. Upon the resolution of both these parliaments, untrue and scandalous Declarations were published, to asperse their proceedings, and some of their members; unjustly to make them odious, and pour the violence which was used against them. Proclamations were set out, to the great gjeeting of the hearts of the people, forbidding them even to speak of parliaments. After the breach of parliament, in the 4th year of his majesty, injustice, oppression, and violence were done upon us, without any restraint or moderation; and yet the first project, was the great sums exacted through the whole kingdom, in default of knighthood, which seemed to have some colour and shadow of law; yet, if it be rightly examined by that obsolete law which was pretended for it, it will be found to be against all the rules of justice, both in respect of the persons charged, the proportion of the fines demanded, and the absurd and unreasonable manner of their proceedings. Tonnage and Poundage hath been received without colour or pretence of law; many other heavy impositions continued against law; and some so unreasonable, that the sum of the charge exceeds the value of the goods. The Book of Rates lately enhanced to a high proportion; and such merchants, as would not submit to their illegal and unreasonable payments, were vexed and oppressed above measure, and the ordinary course of justice, the common birth-right of the subjects of England, wholly obstructed unto them. And although all this was taken upon pretence of guarding the sea, yet a new and unheard-of tax of Ship-Money was devised, upon the same pretence. By both which, there was charged upon the subject near 700,000*l.* some years; and yet the merchants have been left so naked to the violence of the Turkish pirates, that many great ships of value, and thousands of his majesty's subjects, have been taken by them, and do still remain in miserable slavery. The enlargement of Forests, contrary to Charta de Foresta, and the composition thereupon: the exactions of Coat and Conduct-Money, and divers other military charges: the taking away the arms of the Trained Bands of divers counties: the desperate design of ingrossing all the Gun-powder into one hand, keeping it in the Tower of London, and setting so high a rate upon it; that the poorer sort were not able to buy it, nor could any have it without license; thereby to leave the several parts of the kingdom destitute of their necessary defence; and, by selling so dear that which was sold, to make an unlawful advantage of it, to the great charge and detriment of the subject: the general destruction of the king's timber, especially that in the forest of Dean, sold to Papists; which was the best store-house of this kingdom for the maintenance of our shipping: the taking away of men's right, under colour of the king's title to land between high and low water-marks: the Monopolies of soap, salt, wine, leather, sea-coal, and, in a manner, of all things of most common and necessary use: the restraint of the liberties of the subjects in their habitations, trades, and other interests: their vexation and oppression by purveyors, clerks of the market, and salt-petree men: the sale of pretended nuisances, as buildings in and about London: conversion of arable into pasture, and continuance of pasture, hath, under the name of depopulation, drawn many millions out of the subjects purses, without any considerable profit to his majesty. Large quantities of common, and several grounds, have been taken from the subject, by colour of the statute of Improvement, and by abuse of the commission of Sewers, without their consent, and against it.—Not only private interest, but also public faith hath been broken, in seizing of the money and bullion in the mint; and the whole kingdom like to be robbed at once, in that abominable project of Brass Money. Great numbers of his majesty's subjects, for refusing those unlawful charges, have been vexed with long and expensive suits; some fined and censured; others committed to long and hard imprisonments and confinements, to the loss of health in many, of life in some; and others have had their houses broken open, and their goods seized; some have been restrained from their lawful callings; ships have been interrupted in their voyages, surprized at sea, in a hostile manner, by Projectors, as by a common enemy; merchants prohibited to unlade their goods in such ports as were for their own advantage, and forced to bring them to those places which were most for the advantage of the Monopolizers and Projectors. The court of Star-Chamber hath abounded in extravagant censures, not only for the maintenance and improvement of Monopolies, and other unlawful taxes, but for divers other causes, where there hath been no offence, or very small; whereby his majesty's subjects have been oppressed by grievous fines, imprisonments, stigmatizings, mutilations, whippings, pillories, gags, confinements, and banishments, after so rigid a manner, as hath not only deprived men of the society of their friends, exercise of their professions, comfort of books, use of paper and ink, but even violated that near union which God hath established betwixt men and their wives, by forced and constrained separation; whereby they have been bereaved of the comfort and conversation one of another, for many years together, without hope of relief, if God had not, by his over-ruling Providence, given some interruption to the prevailing power and counsel of those, who were the authors and promoters of such peremptory and heady courses.—Judges have been put out of their places, for refusing to act against their oaths and consciences; others have been so awed that they durst not do their duties; and, the better to hold a rod over them, the clause, ‘Quamdiu se bene gesserit,’ was left out of their patents, and a new clause, ‘Durante bene placito,’ inserted. Lawyers have been checked for being faithful to their clients: solicitors and attorneys have been threatened, and some punished, for following lawful suits: and, by this means, all the approaches to justice were interrupted and foreclosed.—New oaths have been forced upon the subject against law; new judicatories erected without law. The council-table have, by their orders, offered to bind the subjects in their freeholds, estates, suits, and actions.—The pretended court of the Earl Marshal was arbitrary, and illegal, in its being and proceedings. The Chancery, Exchequer-Chamber, Court of Wards, and other English courts, have been grievous, in exceeding their jurisdiction. The estate of many families weakened, and some ruined, by excessive fines exacted from them for compositions of wardships. All leases of above 100 years made to draw on wardship, contrary to law. Undue proceedings used in finding of offices, to make the Jury find for the king. The Common-Law courts, seeing all men more inclined to seek justice where it may be fitted to their own desire, are known frequently to forsake the rules of the Common-Law, and, straining beyond their bounds, under pretence of equity to do injustice. Titles of honour, judicial places, serjeantships at law, and other offices have been sold for great sums of money; whereby the common justice of the kingdom hath been much endangered, not only by opening a way of employment in places of great trust and advantage, to men of weak parts; but also by giving occasion to bribery, extortion, and partiality; it seldom happening that places ill gotten are well used, commissions have been granted for examining the excess of fees; and, when great exactions have been discovered, compositions have been made with delinquents, not only for the time past, but likewise for immunity and security in offending for the time to come; which, under colour of remedy, hath but confirmed and increased the Grievance to the subject. The usual course of pricking sheriffs not observed; but many times sheriffs made in an extraordinary way; sometimes as a punishment and charge unto them; sometimes such were pricked out, as would be instruments to execute whatsoever they would have to be done.—The Bishops and the rest of the clergy did triumph in the suspensions, excommunications, deprivations and degradations, of divers painful, learned, and pious ministers, and in the vexation and grievous oppression of great numbers of his majesty’s good subjects. The High-Commission grew to such excess of sharpness and severity, as was not much less than the Romish Inquisition; and yet, in many cases, by the archbishop’s power* was made much more heavy, being assisted and strengthened by authority of the Council-Table. The bishops, and their courts, were as eager in the country; and although their jurisdiction could not reach so high in rigour and extremity of punishment, yet was they no less grievous, in respect of the generality and multiplicity of vexations; which lying upon the meaner sort of tradesmen and artificers, did impoverish many thousands, and so afflict and trouble others, that great numbers, to avoid their miseries, departed out of the kingdom; some into New-England, and other parts of America; others into Holland, where they have transported their manufactures of cloth; which is not only a loss, by diminishing the present stock of the kingdom, but a great mischief, by impairing and endangering the loss of that peculiar trade of cloathing, which hath been a plentiful fountain of wealth and honour to this nation. Those were fitted for ecclesiastical preferment, and soonest obtained it, who were most officious in promoting superstition; most virulent in railing against Godliness and honesty. The most public and solemn sermons before his majesty were either to advance prerogative above law, and decry the property of the subject; or of such kind of invectives, whereby they might make those odious, who sought to maintain the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom; and such men were sure to be weeded out of the commission of the peace, and out of all other employments of power in the government of the country. Many noble personages were counsellors in name; but the power and authority remained in a few of such as were most addicted to this party; whose resolutions and determinations were brought to the table for countenance and execution, not for debate and deliberation; and no man could offer to oppose them without dishonour and hazard to himself: nay, all those that did not wholly concur, and actively contribute to the furtherance of their designs, though otherwise persons of ever so great honour and abilities, were so far from being employed in any place of trust and power, that they were neglected, discountenanced, and, upon all occasions, injured and oppressed. as grown to that height and intireness of their work, which consisted of these three parts: 1. The government must be set free from all restraint of laws, concerning our persons and estates. 2. There must be a conjunction betwixt Papists and Protestants, in doctrine, discipline, and ceremonies; only it must not yet be called Popery. 3. The Puritans, (under which name they include all those that desire to preserve the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and to maintain religion in the power of it) must be either rooted out of the kingdom with force, or driven out with fear.

 In the effecting of this, it was thought necessary to reduce Scotland to such Popish superstitions and innovations, as might make them unwilling to join with England in that great change which was intended: whereupon new Canons and a new liturgy were pressed upon them;
 and when they refused to admit of them, an army was raised to force them to it; towards which the Clergy and the Papists were very forward in their contribution. The Scots likewise raised an army for their defence; and when both armies were come together, and ready for a bloody encounter, his majesty's most gracious disposition, and the counsel of the English nobility and dutiful submission of the Scots, did so far prevail against the evil counsel of others, that a pacification was made, and his majesty returned with peace and much honour to London.—The unexpected conciliation was most acceptable to all the kingdom, except to the malignant party, where-the archbishop and the earl of Strafford leading heads, they and their faction began to reign against the peace, and to aggravate the proceedings of the states; which so increased his majesty, that he forthwith prepared again for war. And such was their conscience, that, having corrupted and distemper-ed the whole frame and government of the kingdom, they did now hope to corrupt that which was the only means to restore all to a right frame and temper again; to which end they persuaded his majesty to call a parliament, not to seek counsel and advice of them, but to draw countenance and supply from them, and engage the whole kingdom in their quarrel; and, in the mean time, continued all their unjust levies of money, resolving rather to make the parliament pliant to their will, and to establish mischief by a law, or else to break it; and, with more colour, to go on by violence, to take what they could not obtain by consent. The ground alledged for the justification of this war was this, That the unjust demand of the parliament of Scotland was a sufficient reason for his majesty to take arms against them, without hearing the reason of those demands: and thereupon a new army was prepared against them; their ships were seized in all ports both of England and Ireland, and at sea; their petitions rejected; and their commissioners refused audience. This whole kingdom being most miserably distempered with levies of men and money, and imprisonments of those who denied to submit to those levies, the earl of Strafford passed into Ireland, caused the parliament there to declare against the Scots, to give 4 Subsidies towards that war, and to engage themselves, their lives, and fortunes, for the prosecution of it; and gave directions for an army of 8000 foot and 1000 horse to be levied there, which were for the most part Papists. The parliament met upon the 13th of April, 1640. The earl of Strafford and abp. of Canterbury, with their party, so prevailed with his majesty, that the house of commons were pressed to yield a Supply for the maintenance of the War with Scotland, before they had provided any relief for the great and pressing Grievances of the people; which being against the fundamental privilege and proceeding of parliament, was yet, in humble respect to his majesty, so far admitted, as that they agreed to take the matter of Supply into consideration, and two several days it was debated, (12 Subsidies being demanded for the release of Ship-Money alone) and a third day was appointed for conclusion;

 when the heads of that party began to fear the people might close with the king in satisfying his desire of money; but that withal they were like to blast their malicious designs against Scotland, finding them very much indisposed to give any countenance to that war:
 thereupon they wickedly advised the king to break off the parliament, and to return to the ways of confusion; in which their own evil intentions were most like to prosper and succeed.—After the parliament ended, May 5, 1640, this party grew so bold as to counsel the king to supply himself out of his subjects estates by his own power, at his own will, without their consent. The very next day some members of both houses had their studies and cabinets, yea their pockets, searched; another of them, not long after, was committed close prisoner, for not delivering some petitions which he had received by authority of that house; and if harsher courses were intended, as was reported, it is very probable that the sickness of the earl of Strafford, and the tumultuous rising in Southwark and about Lambeth, were the causes that such violent intentions were not brought to execution.— A false and scandalous Declaration against the house of commons was published in his majesty's name; which yet wrought little effect with the people, but only to manifest the impudence of those who were the authors of it.
 A Forced Loan of money was attempted in the city of London, and the lord mayor, and aldermen in their several wards, enjoined to bring in a list of the names of such persons as they judged fit to lend, and of the sum they should lend; and such aldermen as refused so to do, were committed to prison. The archbishop, and the other bishops and clergy, continued the convocation, and, by a new commission, turned it to a provincial synod; in which, by an unheard-of presumption, they made Canons, that contain in them many matters contrary to the king's prerogative; to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm; to the right of parliaments; to the property and liberty of the subject; and matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence; thereby establishing their own usurpations, justifying their altar-worship, and those other superstitious innovations, which they formerly introduced without warrant of law.—They imposed a new Oath upon divers of his majesty's subjects, both ecclesiastical and lay, for maintenance of their own tyranny; laid a great tax upon the clergy for supply of his majesty; and, generally, they shewed themselves very affectionate to the war with Scotland, which was, by some of them, stiled 'Bellum Episcopale;' they composed a prayer, and enjoined it to be read in all churches, calling the Scots, Rebels, to put the two nations into blood, and make them irreconcilable. All these pretended Canons and Constitutions were armed with the several censures of suspension, excommunication, and deprivation; by which they would have thrust out all the good ministers, and most of the well-affected people of the kingdom, and left an easy passage to their own design of reconciliation with Rome.—The Popish party enjoyed such exemption from the penal laws, as amounted to a toleration, besides many other encouragements and court favours. They had a secretary of state, sir Francis Windebank, a powerful agent for the speeding of all their desires; and a Pope's Nuncio residing here, to act and govern them according to such instructions as he received from Rome, and to intercede for them with the most powerful concurrence of the foreign princes of that religion; by whose authority the Papists of all sorts, nobility, gentry, and clergy, were convoked after the manner of a parliament; new jurisdictions were erected of Romish archbishops; taxes levied; another state moulded within this state, independent in government, contrary in interest and affection, secretly corrupting the ignorant or negligent professors of our religion, and closely uniting and combining themselves against such as were sound; in this posture waiting for an opportunity, by force, to destroy those whom they could not hope to seduce. For the effecting whereof, they were strengthened with arms and munition, and encouraged by superstitious prayers, enjoined by the Nuncio to be weekly made for the prosperity of some great design. And such power had they at court, that, secretly, a commission was intended to be issued to some great men of that profession, for the levying of soldiers, and to command and employ them according to private instructions; which we doubt were framed for the advantage of those who were the contrivers of them.—His majesty's treasure was consumed; his revenue anticipated; his servants and officers compelled to lend great sums of money; multitudes were called to the council-table, who were tired with long attendances there, for refusing illegal payments;

the prisons were filled with their commitments; many of the sheriffs summoned into the Star-Chamber, and some imprisoned for not being quick enough in levying the Ship-Money; the people languished under grief and fear, no visible hope being left, but in desperation; the nobility beginning to be weary of their silence and patience, and sensible of the duty and trust which belongs to them, some of the most eminent of them did thereupon petition his majesty, at such a time when evil counsels were so strong, that they had reason to expect more hazard to themselves, than redress of those public evils for which they interceded.—Whilst the kingdom was in this agitation and distemper, the Scots (restrained in their trade, impoverished by the loss of many of their ships; and bereaved of all possibility of supplying his majesty by any naked supplication entered with a powerful army into the kingdom; and, without any hostile act or spoil of the country as they passed, more than forcing a passage over the Tyne at Newburn, and Newcastle, possessed themselves of Newcastle and had a fair opportunity to press funds upon the king's army; but duty and reverence to his majesty, and brotherly love to the English nation, made them stay there; where the king had leisure to entertain better counsels; wherein God so blessed and directed him, that he summoned the great council of peers to meet at York, upon the 24th of September, and there declared a parliament to begin the 3rd of Nov. then following. The Scots, at the first day of the great council, presented a humble Petition to his majesty, whereupon the Treaty was appointed at Rippon; a present cessation of arms agreed upon; and a full conclusion of all differences referred to the wisdom and care of the parliament.—At our first meeting all oppositions seemed to vanish, the difficulties were so evident, which those evil counsellors produced, that no man durst stand to defend them; yet the work itself afforded difficulty enough. The multiplied evils, and corruption of 16 years, strengthened by custom and authority, and the concurrent interest of many powerful delinquents, were now to be brought to judgment and reformation. The king's household was to be provided for, the having brought him to that want, that he could not supply his ordinary and necessary expenses without the assistance of his people. Two armies were to be paid, which amounted very near to 80,000*l.* a month; and the people were to be tenderly charged, having been formerly exhausted with many burthensome projects. The difficulties seemed to be insuperable, which, by the Divine Providence, we have overcome: the contrarieties incompatible; and yet, in a great measure, we have reconciled. Six Subsidies have been granted; and a fifth of Poll-Money, which, if it be duly levied, will equal 86 Subsidies more; in all 600,000*l.* Besides, we have contracted a debt to the State of 220,000*l.* and yet God hath so blessed the endeavours of this parliament, that the king

lomb is a great gainer by all these charges. The Ship-Money is abolished; which cost the kingdom above 200,000*l.* a-year: the Coat and Conduct-Money, and other military charges, are taken away; which, in many counties, amounted to little less than the Ship-Money: The Monopolies are all suppressed; whereof some few did prejudice the subject above a million yearly; the Soap, 100,000*l.* the Wine, 300,000*l.* The Leather must needs exceed both; and Salt would be no less than that; besides the inferior Monopolies, which, if they could be exactly computed, would make up a great sum.—That which is more beneficial than all this, is, that the root of these evils is taken away, which was the arbitrary power pretended to be in his majesty, of taxing the subjects, or charging their states without consent in parliament; which is now declared to be against law, by the judgment of both houses, and likewise by an Act of parliament.—Another step of great advantage is this, the living Grievances, the evil counsellors and actors of these mischiefs, have been so punished by the justice done upon the earl of Strafford; the flight of the lord Finch and secretary Windebank; and the accusation and imprisonment of the Archbishop of Canterbury and Judge Berkeley; and the impeachment of divers other Bishops and Judges, that it is like not only to be an ease to the present times, but a preservation to the future.—The discontinuance of parliaments is prevented by the bill for a Triennial Parliament; and the abrupt dissolution of this parliament by another bill, by which it is provided, It shall not be dissolved or adjourned without the consent of both houses. These two laws well considered, may be thought more advantageous than all the former, because they secure a full operation of the present remedy, and afford a perpetual spring of remedies for the future.—The Star-Chamber, the High-Commission, the courts of President and Council in the North, which were so many sources of misery, oppression, and violence, are all taken away; whereby men are more secured in their persons, liberties and estates, than they could be by any law or example for the regulation of those courts, or terror of the judges. The immoderate power of the Council-Table, and the excessive abuse of that power so ordered and restrained, that, we may well hope, no such things as were frequently done by them, to the prejudice of the public liberty, will appear in future times, but only in stories; to give us, and our posterity, more occasion to praise God for his majesty's goodness, and the faithful endeavours of this parliament.—The Canons, and the power of Canon-making, are blasted by the Vote of both houses: the exorbitant power of Bishops, and their courts are much abated by some provisions in the bill against the High Commission Court. The authors of the many innovations in doctrine and ceremonies, and the ministers that have been scandalous in their lives, have been so terrified by just complaints and accusations, that we may well hope they will be more modest for the time to come; being either inwardly convicted by the sight of their own folly, or outwardly restrained by the fear of punishment. The Forests are, by a good law, reduced to their right bounds. The encroachments and oppressions of the Stannary Courts; the extortions of the Clerk of the Market; and the compulsion of the subject to receive the order of Knighthood against his will, paying of fines for not receiving it, and the vexatious proceedings thereupon for levying of those fines, are, by other beneficial laws, reformed and prevented.—Many excellent laws and provisions are in preparation for removing the inordinate power, vexation, and usurpation of Bishops; for reforming the pride and idleness of many of the Clergy; for easing the people of unnecessary ceremonies in Religion; for censuring and removing unworthy and unprofitable ministers; and for maintaining godly and diligent preachers through the kingdom.—Other things, of main importance for the good of this kingdom, are in proposition, (though little could hitherto be done, in regard of the many other pressing businesses; which yet, before the end of this session, we hope may receive some progress and perfection) as the establishing and ordering the king's Revenue, that so the abuse of officers, and superfluity of expences may be cut off, and the necessary disbursements for his majesty's honour, the defence and government of the kingdom, may be more certainly provided for; the regulating of Courts of Justice, and abridging both the delays and charges of Law-Suits; the settling of some good courses for preventing the exportation of Gold and Silver, and the inequality of Exchanges betwixt us and other nations, for the advancing of native commodities, increase of our manufactures, and well-balancing of trade; whereby the stock of the kingdom may be increased, or, at least, kept from impairing, as, through neglect hereof, it hath done for many years last past; for improving the Herring Fishing upon our own coasts; which will be of mighty use in the employment of the poor, and a plentiful nursery of mariners for enabling the kingdom in any great action.—The oppositions, obstructions, and other difficulties wherewith we have been encountered, and which still lie in our way, with some strength and much obstinacy, are these; The Malignant Party, whom we have formerly described to be the actors and promoters of all our misery, they have taken great heart again, and have been able to prefer some of their own factors and agents to Degrees of Honour, to places of trust and employment, even during the parliament: they have endeavoured to work in his majesty ill impressions and opinions of our proceedings, as if we had altogether done our own work, and not his; and had obtained from him many things very prejudicial to the crown, both in respect of prerogative and profit.—To wipe out the first part of this slander, we think good only to say thus much, That all that we have done is for his majesty, his greatness, honour and support. When we yielded to give 25,000*l.*

a month for the relief of the Northern counties, this was given to the king; for he was bound to protect his subjects. They were his majesty's evil counsellors, and their ill instruments, that were actors in those grievances which brought in the Scots: and if his majesty please to force those who were the authors of this war to make satisfaction, as he might justly and easily do, it seems very reasonable that the people might well be excused from taking upon them this burden, being altogether innocent, and free from being any causes of it. When we undertook the charge of the army, which cost above 50,000*l.* a month, was not this given to the king? Was not his majesty's army; were not all the commanders under contract with his majesty, at higher rates and greater wages than ordinary? And have not we taken upon us to discharge all the Brotherly Assistance of 300,000*l.* which we gave the Scots? Was it not towards repair of those damages and losses which they received from the king's ships, and from his ministers? These three particulars amount to above 1,100,000*l.* Besides, his majesty hath received, by impositions upon merchandize, at least 400,000*l.* so that his majesty hath had out of the subjects purse, since the parliament began, one million and a half; and yet these men can be so impudent as to tell his majesty, that we have done nothing for him. As to the second branch of this Slander: We acknowledge, with much thankfulness, that his majesty hath passed more good bills to the advantage of the subjects, than have been in many ages; but withal we cannot forget, that these venomous counsels did manifest themselves, in some endeavours, to hinder these good acts. And, for both houses of parliament, we may, with truth and modesty, say thus much, That we have ever been careful not to desire any thing that should weaken the crown, either in just profit or useful power.—The Triennial Parliament, for the matter of it, doth not extend, to so much as, by law, we ought to have required; there being two statutes, still in force, for a parliament to be once a year; and, for the manner of it, it is in the king's power that it shall never take effect, if he, by a timely summons shall prevent any other way of assembling.—In the bill for 'Continuance of this present Parliament,' there seems to be some restraint of the royal power in dissolving of parliaments; yet not to take it out of the crown, but to suspend the execution of it for this time and occasion only: which was so necessary for the king's own security and the public peace, that, without it, we could not have undertaken any of these great charges; but must have left both the armies to disorder and confusion, and the whole kingdom to blood and rapine.—The Star-Chamber was much more fruitful in oppression than in profit; the great fines being, for the most part, given away, and the rest stated at long times.—The fines of the High Commission were, in themselves, unjust, and seldom or never came into the king's purse. These four bills are particularly and more specially instanced; in the rest there will not be found so much as a shadow of prejudice to the crown.—They have sought to diminish our reputation with the people, and to bring them out of love with parliaments. The aspersion which they have attempted this way have been such as these, That we have spent much time, and done little; especially in those Grievances which concern Religion: that the parliament is a burthen to the kingdom, by the abundance of protections, which hinder justice and trade; and, by many Subsidies granted, much more heavy than any they formerly endured.—To which there is a ready Answer: If the time spent in this parliament be considered in relation, backward, to the long growth and deep root of those Grievances, which we have removed; to the powerful supports of those delinquents, which we have pursued; to the necessities and other charges of the commonwealth, for which we have provided: or, if it be considered in relation, forward, to many advantages, which not only the present, but future ages are like to reap by the good laws and other proceedings in this parliament, doubt not but it will be thought, by all indifferent judgments, that our time hath been much better employed than in a far greater proportion of time in many former parliaments together. And the charges which have been laid upon the subject, and the other inconveniences which they have borne, will seem very light, in respect of the benefit they have received, and may receive. And for the matter of protections: the parliament is so sensible of it, that therein they intend to give them what satisfaction case may stand with honour and justice; and are in a way of passing a bill to give them satisfaction.—They have sought, by many practices, to cause jealousies and divisions between us and our brethren of Scotland; by sowing their proceedings and intentions towards us; and, by secret endeavours, to instigate us to incense them and us one against another. They have had such a party of Bishops and Popish lords in the house of peers, as have caused much opposition and delay in the prosecution of delinquents; and hindered the proceedings of divers good bills, passed in the commons house, concerning the reformation of sundry great abuses and corruptions both church and state. They have laboured to seduce and corrupt some of the commons house, to draw them into conspiracies and combinations against the liberty of the parliament; and, by their instruments and agents, have attempted to disaffect and discontent his majesty's army, and to engage it for the maintenance of their wicked and traitorous designs, the keeping up of Bishops in votes and motions, and, by force, to compel the parliament to order, limit, and dispose their proceedings in such manner as might best concur with the intentions of this dangerous and potent faction. And when one mischievous design and another of theirs, to bring on the army against the parliament and the city of London, had been covered and prevented, they presently undertook another of the same damnable nature; with this addition to it, to endeavour to make the Scots army neutral, whilst the English army (which they had laboured to corrupt and venom against us, by their false and slanderous suggestions) should execute their malice to the subversion of our religion, and the dissolution of the government.—Thus they have been continually practising to disturb the peace, and plotting the destruction, even of all the king's dominions; and have employed their emissaries and agents, in them all, for the promoting of their devilish designs; which the vigilancy of those who were well affected hath still discovered and defeated, before they were ripe for execution in England and Scotland; only in Ireland, which was farther off, they have had time and opportunity to mould and prepare their work, and had brought it to that perfection, that they had possessed themselves of that whole kingdom; totally subverted the government of it, rooted out religion, and destroyed all the Protestants, whom the conscience of their duty to God, their king and country, would not permit to join with them; if, by God's wonderful providence, their main enterprize upon the city and castle of Dublin had not been detected and prevented, upon the very eve before it should have been executed: Notwithstanding, they have, in other parts of that kingdom, broken out into open rebellion: surprizing towns and castles; committing murders, rapes, and other villanies; and shaken off all bonds of obedience to his majesty, and the laws of the realm; and, in general, have kindled such a fire, as nothing but God's infinite blessing upon the wisdom and endeavours of this state, will be able to quench. And certainly, had not God in his great mercy unto this land, discovered and confounded their former designs, we had been the prologue to this tragedy in Ireland; and had, by this time, been made the lamentable spectacle of misery and confusion.—And now, what hope have we but in God; when the only means of our subsistence, and power of reformation, is, under him, in the parliament? But what can we the commons do, without the conjunction of the house of lords? And what conjunction can we expect there, where the Bishops and Recusant lords are so numerous and prevalent, that they are able to cross and interrupt our best endeavours for reformation; and, by that means, give advantage to this malignant party to trudge our proceedings? They infuse into the people, 'That we mean to abolish all church government, and leave every man to his own fancy for the service and worship of God; absolving him of that obedience which he owes, under God, unto his majesty;' whom we know to be intrusted with the ecclesiastical law as well as with the temporal, to regulate all the members of the church of England by such rules of order and discipline as are established by parliament, which is his great council in all affairs both in church and state. We confess our intention is, and our endeavours have been, to reduce within bounds that exorbitant power which the prelates have assumed unto themselves, so contrary both to the Word of God, and to the laws of the land; to which end we passed the bill for the removing them from their Temporal Power and Employments, that so the better they might, with meekness, apply themselves to the discharge of their functions: which bill themselves opposed, and were the principal instruments of crossing it.—And we do here declare, That it is far from our purpose or desire to let loose the golden reins of discipline and government in the church; to leave private persons, or particular congregations, to take up what form of divine service they please; for we hold it requisite, that there should be, throughout the whole realm, a conformity to that order which the laws injoin, according to the Word of God: and we desire to unburden the consciences of men of needless and superstitious ceremonies, suppress innovations, and take away the monuments of idolatry. And, the better to effect the intended reformation, we desire there may be a general synod of the most grave, pious, learned, and judicious divines of this island, assisted with some from foreign parts, professing the same religion with us, who may consider of all things necessary for the peace and good government of the church; and represent the results of their consultations unto the parliament, to be there allowed of and confirmed, and receive the stamp of authority, thereby to find passage and obedience throughout the kingdom.—They have maliciously charged us, 'That we intend to destroy and discourage learning;' whereas it is our chiefest care and desire to advance it, and to provide a competent maintenance for conscientious and preaching ministers throughout the kingdom; which will be a great encouragement to scholars, and a certain means whereby the want, meanness, and ignorance, to which a great part of the clergy is now subject, will be prevented. And we intend likewise to reform and purge the fountains of learning, the two Universities, that the streams flowing from thence may be clear and pure, and an honour and comfort to the whole land.—They have strained to blast our proceedings in parliament, by wresting the interpretations of our Orders from their genuine intention. They tell the people, 'That our meddling with the power of Episcopacy, hath caused sectaries and conventicles;' when Idolatry and Popish ceremonies, introduced into the church by the command of the bishops, have not only debarr'd the people from thence, but expelled them from the kingdom. Thus, with Elijah, we are called by this malignant party, The Troublers of the State: And still while we endeavour to reform their abuses, they make us the authors of those mischiefs we study to prevent.—For the perfecting of the work begun, and removing all future impediments, we conceive these courses will be very effectual, seeing the religion of the Papists hath such principles as do certainly tend to the destruction and extirpation of all Protestants, when they shall have opportunity to effect it:—In the first place, it is necessary, to keep them in such condition, as that they may not be able to do us any hurt: and, for avoiding of such connivance and favour, as hath heretofore been shewed unto them, that his majesty be pleased to grant a standing commission to some choice men, named in parliament, who may take notice of their increase, their counsels, and proceedings; and use all due means, by execution of the laws, to prevent any mischievous designs against the peace and safety of this kingdom. 2dly, That some good course be taken to discover the counterfeit and false conformity of Papists to the church; by colour whereof persons, very much disaffected to the true religion, have been admitted into places of greatest authority and trust in the kingdom. 3dly, For the better preservation of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, that all illegal Grievances and Exactions be presented and punished at the sessions and assizes; and that Judges and Justices be careful to give this in charge to the Grand Jury; and both the Sheriffs and Justices to be sworn to the due execution of the Petition of Right, and other laws. 4thly, That his majesty be humbly petitioned, by both houses, to employ such counsellors, ambassadors, and other ministers, in managing his business at home and abroad, as the parliament may have cause to confide in; without which we cannot give his majesty such Supplies for support of his own estate, nor such assistance to the Protestant party beyond the sea, as is desired.—It may often fall out that the commons may have just cause to take exceptions at some men for being counsellors, and yet not charge those men with crimes; for there be grounds of diffidence which lye not in proof; there are others which, though they may be proved, yet are not legally criminal. To be a known favourer of Papists; or to have been very forward in defending or countenancing some great offenders, questioned in parliament; or to speak contemptuously of either houses of parliament, or parliamentary proceedings; or such as are factors or agents for any foreign prince of another religion; such as are justly suspected to get counsellors places, or any other of trust concerning public employment for money. For all these, and divers others, we may have great reason to be earnest with his majesty not to put his great affairs into such hands, though we may be unwilling to proceed against them in any legal way of charge or impeachment. 5thly, That all counsellors of state may be sworn to observe the laws which concern the subject in his liberty; that they may likewise take an oath not to receive, or give, reward or pension to, or from, any foreign prince, but such as they within some reasonable time discover to the lords of his majesty's council; and although they should wickedly forswear themselves, yet it may herein do good, to make them known to be false and perjured to those who employ them, and thereby bring them into as little credit with them as with us:—That his majesty may have cause to be in love with good counsel and good men, by shewing him, in an humble and dutiful manner, how full of advantage it would be to himself, to see his own estate settled in a plentiful condition to support his honour; to see his people united in ways of duty to him, and endeavours for the public good; to see happiness, wealth, peace, and safety derived to his own kingdom, and procured to his allies, by the influence of his own power and government: That all good courses may be taken to unite the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, to be mutually aiding and assisting one another, for the common good of the island, and honour of both: To take away all differences among ourselves for matters indifferent in their own nature concerning Religion, and to unite ourselves against the common enemies; which are the better enabled, by our divisions, to destroy us, as they hope and have often endeavoured: To labour by all offices of friendship, to unite the foreign churches with us in the same cause; and to seek their liberty, safety, and prosperity, as bound thereunto, both by charity to them, and by wisdom for our own good; for, by this means, our strength shall be increased, and, by a mutual concurrence to the same common end, we shall be enabled to procure the good of the whole body of the Protestant profession. If these things may be observed, we doubt not but God will crown this parliament with such success, as shall be the beginning and foundation of more honour and happiness to his majesty, than ever was yet enjoyed by any of his royal predecessors."

The Speaker's Speech at presenting a Bill for Continuance of Tonnage and Poundage. [Dec. 2. The king came to the house of lords, and sending for the commons, the Speaker, with the whole house, came up with the bill of Tonnage and Poundage; when he delivered himself to the king in this speech:*

"Most Dread Sovereign; The observation, taken from the unlike compositions and various motions of the world, made the philosophers conclude that 'Tota hujus mundi concordia ex discordibus constat.' The happy conjunction of both these nations, in the triumph and joy of your sacred presence, extracted from the different dispositions and opinions, give us cause to observe and admire these blessed effects from such contrary causes: we may, without flattery, commend your sacred majesty as the glorious instrument of this happy change, whose piety and prudence, directed by the hand of God, hath contracted this union from those various discords. The story of these times will seem paradoxes in following generations, when they shall hear of peace sprung from the root of dissension; of union planted upon the stock of divisions; two armies in the field both ready to strike the first blow, and both united without a stroke. Nothing can reduce these truths into a belief, but the knowledge of your piety and justice, who have accomplished these acts of wonder, by goodness and gentleness, without force or violence. This way of conquest, this Bellum incruentum, hath been the rule of the most valiant and puissant monarchs; advancing their glory in the safeguard of one subject, more than in the death of a thousand enemies: and thus have you erected a monument of glory to your sacred memory for all generations.—And as your care and piety for the welfare of your Northern kingdom, called you to that work, for the great comfort of your people, which your wisdom hath so happily consummated; so, now, the distemper of your other kingdom, fomented by the same spirit, whose presence admits no peace in Israel, calls on your providence to heal the diseases of that nation.—The one from whence you returned, hath, with Abel, though the younger brother, offered an acceptable sacrifice; the other, with Cain, hath erected altars for blood and revenge (the old impositions of the Levitical priesthood) which invokes the necessity of your justice: the one, to a natural hath added a politic brotherhood; the other, of brothers, I am sorry to say it, are become strangers: The fidelity of the one hath written a story of admiration to the world; the disloyalty of the other hath paralliced that horrid design, matchless before amongst all generations; 1st. In their intentions, the destruction of a kingdom, even when unity and peace were tying the knot of religion and safety. 2dly. In the discovery, a moment of time prevented the execution. 3dly. In the actors, Jesuits and Priests, without whom the malice of the Devil could not have found a party in the world, fittet to act over the like bloody tragedy.—But this, among the many joys we receive by your happy return, is not the least, That the same providence which protected that gracious king, your most religious father, from their bloody attempts, and increased the blessing of a long and happy reign, hath also defended your sacred throne from all their machinations.—Thus we see Religion is the greatest policy, the never-failing support of king and kingdom; that which binds you and your posterity to your throne, and our duty and obedience to it.—Give me leave here, most gracious sovereign, to sum up the space of eleven months observation, without intermission scarce of a day, may an hour on that day, to the hazard of life and fortune; and to reduce all into this conclusion, That the endeavours of your commons assembled, guided by your pious and religious example, is to preserve Religion in its purity, without mixture or composition, against these subtle intruders; and, with our lives and fortunes, to establish this throne to your sacred person, and those beams of majesty, your royal progeny, against all treason and rebellion.—The ways that conduce to this end, are the Defence of the Land and Sea; for the one we have already voted to raise Money: for the other, this bill, in some measure, will accomplish for a little time; and, to that end, I, by the command of the commons, humbly beseech your royal-assent."

The King's Speech to both Houses on his Return from Scotland.] When the Speaker had ended, and the royal assent given to the bill, the king himself spoke as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; I think it fit, after so long absence, at this first occasion to speak a few words unto you: but it is no ways in answer to Mr. Speaker's learned speech. Albeit I have stayed longer than I expected to have done when I went away; yet, in this, I have kept my promise with you, that I have made all the haste back again, that the settling of my Scots affairs could any ways permit: In which I have had so good success, that I will confidently affirm to you, that I have left that nation a most peaceable and contented people; so that although I have a little misreckoned in time, yet I was not deceived in my end. But if I have deceived your expectations a little, in the time of my return; yet I am assured, that my expectation is as much and more deceived, in the condition wherein I hoped to have found businesses at my return: for, since that, before my going, I settled the liberties of my subjects, and gave the laws a free and orderly course, I expected to have found my people reaping the fruits of these benefits, by living in quietness and satisfaction of mind:—But, instead of this, I find them disturbed with jealousies, frights, and alarms of dangerous designs and plots, in consequence of which guards have been set to defend both houses. I say not this, as in doubt that my subjects affections are any way lessened to me in this time of my absence; (for I cannot but remember, to my great comfort, the joyful reception I had now at my entry into London) but rather, as I hope, that my presence will easily disperse these fears; for I bring as perfect and true affections to my people as ever prince did, or as good subjects can possibly desire; and I am so far from repenting me of any act I have done this session for the good of my people, that I protest, if it were to do again, I would do it; and will yet grant what else can be justly desired for satisfaction in point of liberties, or in maintenance of the true religion that is here established.—Now, I have but one particular to recommend unto you at this time: it is Ireland; for which, though I doubt not your care, yet methinks, the preparations for it go but slowly on. The occasion is the fitter for me now to mention it, because of the arrival of two lords from Scotland, who come instructed from my council there, (who now by act of parliament, hath full power for that purpose) to answer that demand, which it pleased both houses to make me, by way of Petition, that met me at Berwick, and which the duke of Richmond sent back, by my command, to my Scots council. Therefore my desire is, That both houses would appoint a select committee, to end this business with these noblemen. I must conclude in telling you, that I seek my peoples happiness; for their flourishing is my greatest glory, and their afflictions my greatest strength."

A Committee appointed to treat with the Scots.]

Dec. 3. According to the tenor of his majesty's speech, in regard to some lords coming as commissioners out of Scotland, about the Irish Rebellion, both houses thought proper to nominate some of their body, to treat with them on that business. The earl of Bedford, and the earl of Leicester, lord lieutenant of Ireland, with lord Howard of Escrick, were appointed by the lords; and Mr. N. Fiennes, sir Wm. Armin, sir Philip Stapylton, and Mr. Hampden, by the commons, to treat with the Scots commissioners, according to the king's directions. The commons, also, ordered the King's Speech to be entered in their Journals; a thing not usual in former sessions.

Dec. 8. The king sent a message to the lords, "That it was his desire both houses would consider of, and prepare, Instructions for their commissioners to treat with the Scots about the Irish Affairs, and present them to him." He also sent to inform both houses, "That the French ambassador had petitioned for 8 Priests condemned this week; and that they might be imprisoned or banished, rather than be executed, because it might concern the settling of affairs in Ireland." In this his majesty desired the advice of parliament.

The house of commons sent up the Instructions for the Treaty with the Scots; which was only to make the best agreement with them they could, for transporting five thousand men into Ireland, and paying for them; and to express the thanks of both houses, for their readiness to assist in that business.

The Irish Rebels require the free Exercise of their Religion.] This day both houses being informed, That the Irish Rebels had presented a Remonstrance for peace, the terms of which were, To have the free exercise of their religion, and a repeal of all laws to the contrary, &c. after a solemn debate, it was resolved by both lords and commons, "That they would never give consent to any toleration of the Popish religion, in Ireland, or any other of his majesty's dominions." In this debate in the house of commons,

Sir Benj. Rudyard spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; Peradventure I could have wished that toleration in religion had not, at this time, come in question; yet now that it is brought on the stage I am brought to the stake. When religion is so nearly concerned, I love not to take any civil or politic respects into consideration: reasons of state have almost eaten up all the laws and religion of Christendom. I have often heard it discoursed, Whether we should make religion an argument of any of our undertakings abroad? Herein the wiser sort have been very nice and tender; believing that the over-number of Papists would overwhelm us; yet I have been long of opinion, that our attempts and assistance have so often succeeded, because we have not boldly and publicly avowed our religion. It may be God, whom we conquer as well with few as with many, thank we are too many. Shall the Irish now make their religion the cause of their rebellion, shall we be ashamed or afraid to maintain our religion, in reducing them to their duty or obedience? God will not honour them who do not honour him. Let us remember the exhortation in the Chronicles, 'Why transgress the commands of God, so that ye cannot prosper? This is a great transgress, to shrink in God in his truth. When we deny the law of toleration, we do not withdraw the ease in favours they have heretofore enjoyed; great I am sure, than they would afford us, if we were in their power: wherefore, Mr. Speaker, let us uphold our religion, and trust God with success.'

State of the National Debt.] Dec. 9. Sir John Hotham delivered in to the commons the State of the National Accounts and Debts; by which it appears that the latter then amounted 504,044*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.* Ordered to go upon a peremptory on Munday next, the 13th instant.

Votes of the Commons concerning the condemned Priests.] Dec. 11. The king not being received any answer from the parliament concerning the condemned Priests, both houses of lords again, acquainting them, they were ordered for execution in two of time, unless reprieved. This being communicated to the commons, they went to vote these men's lives separately; on which there were three divisions in the house, and prevailed so far, that two of them were to be spared: though one had a near run of his life, the division being only 74 against. Some altercations happened, afterwards, between the houses, about these priests; but the commons sending up a letter from Ireland, the bloody massacre the rebels were making in that kingdom, both houses joined in a petition to his majesty to take off his reprieve, and let them all to be executed: but this not being complied with, they were all afterwards hanged.

Dec. 14. The king came to the house of lords, when, being seated on the throne, and the commons present, he made this Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; The last time I was in this place, and the last thing I recommended unto you, was the better settling of Ireland; whereby I was in good hope I should not have needed again to have put you in mind of that business: but still seeing the proceedings therein, and the daily distress that I have out of Ireland, of the estate of my Protestant subjects there, I am but again earnestly commend the dispatch of that expeditious unto you; for it is the chief business that, at this time, I take to heart, and there cannot, almost, be any business that I can have more care of. I might now take up some of your time in expressing my detestation of rebellions in general, and of this in particular; but knowing that deeds, and not declarations, must suppress this great insolvency, I lo here, in a word, offer you whatsoever my power, pains, or industry, can contribute to his good and necessary work of reducing the Irish nation to their true and wonted obedience.—And, that nothing may be omitted on my part, I must here take notice of the bill or pressing of Soldiers, now depending among you, my lords; concerning which, I here declare, That in case it come so to me, as it may not infringe or diminish my prerogative, I will assent it. And further: seeing there is a dispute raised (I being little beholden to him whosoever at this time began it) concerning the bounds of this ancient and undoubted prerogative; to avoid further debate at this time, I offer, that the bill may pass with a salvo jure both for king and people, leaving such debates to a time that may better hear them. If this be not accepted, the fault is not mine that this bill pass not, but theirs that refuse so fair an offer. To conclude: I conjure you, by all that is or can be dear to you or me, that, laying away all disputes, you go on cheerfully and speedily for the relief of Ireland."

The King's Speech voted to be a Breach of Privilege.] No sooner was the king departed than both houses fell warmly into debate, on that part of his Speech which mentions the Press-Act. After many disputes and some conferences about it, both houses agreed in these Resolutions; "It is their opinion, that the privileges of parliament were broken, 1. By his majesty's taking notice of the Bill for Pressing, it being in agitation in both houses, and not agreed on. 2. In that his majesty should propound a limitation and provisional clause to be added to the bill, before it was presented to him by the consent of both houses. 3. In that his majesty did express his displeasure against some persons, for matters moved or debated in parliament, during the debate and preparation of that bill. 4. That a Declaratory Protestation be entered into, by both houses, for the claim of these privileges and liberties; and that a Petitionary Remonstrance be drawn up and presented to his majesty, about them."

In the heat of these debates, in the house of lords, the lord Pierrepont happening to say, "That it was not honourable for that house to be in such a noise and tumult," the lords thought these words a great offence against so high a Court; and therefore he was committed to the custody of the gentleman-usher; but, upon his humble petition, the next day he was released.

The Commons resolve to print their Petition and Remonstrance.] The same day the commons resolved to give present orders for the printing of their Remonstrance, or Declaration, concerning the State of the Kingdom, on a division, Yeas 135, Noes 83.

The Commons having printed and published their Petition and Remonstrance, the King gave orders for printing and publishing his Answer to the Petition, and also a Declaration as follows:

THE KING'S ANSWER to the COMMONS PETITION, which accompanied their REMONSTRANCE concerning the State of the Nation, (p. 943).

"We having received from you, soon after our return out of Scotland, a long Petition, consisting of many desires of great moment, together with a Declaration of a very unusual nature annexed thereunto, we had taken some time to consider of it, as befitting us in a matter of that consequence; being confident, that your own reason and regard to us, as well as our express intimation, by our comptroller to that purpose, would have restrained you from the publishing of it, until such time as you should have received our Answer to it: but, much against our expectation, finding the contrary, that the said Declaration is already abroad in print, by directions from your house, as appears by the printed copy, we must let you know that we are very sensible of this disrespect: notwithstanding, it is our intimation that no failing on your part shall make us fail in ours, of giving all due satisfaction to the desires of our people in a parliamentary way; and therefore we send you this Answer to your Petition, reserving ourself in point of the Declaration, which we think unparliamentary, and shall take a course to do that which we shall think fit in prudence and honour.—To the Petition we say, That although there are divers things in the preamble of it, which we are so far from admitting, that we profess we cannot understand them; as, of a wicked and malignant party prevalent in the government; of some of that party admitted to our privy-council, and to other employments of trust, and nearest to us and our children; of endeavours to sow among the people false scandals and imputations, to blemish and disgrace the proceedings of the parliament: All, or any of which, did we know of, we should be as ready to remedy and punish, as you to complain of. That the prayers of your Petition are grounded upon such premises as we must in no wise admit; yet, notwithstanding, we are pleased to give this Answer to you.—To the first, concerning Religion, consisting of several branches, we say, That, for the preserving the peace and safety of the kingdom from the

* In the preamble to this bill, as sent up by the commons to the lords, it was declared, "That the king had, in no case, or upon any occasion, but the invasion from a foreign power, authority to press the free-born subject; that being inconsistent with the freedom and liberty of his person."

designs of the Popish party, we have and will still concur with all the just desires of our people in a parliamentary way: that for the depriving of the Bishops of their Votes in parliament, we would have you consider that their right is grounded upon the fundamental law of the kingdom, and constitution of parliament. This we would have you consider; but since you desire our concurrence herein, in a parliamentary way, we will give no further Answer at this time.—As for the abridging of the inordinate Power of the Clergy; we conceive that the taking away the High Commission Court hath well moderated that; but if there continue any usurpations or excesses in their jurisdictions, we therein neither have nor will protect them.—Unto that clause which concerneth Corruptions, as you style them, in Religion, in Church Government, and in Discipline; and the removing of such unnecessary Ceremonies as weak consciences might cheque at: that for any illegal Innovations, which may have crept in, we shall willingly concur in the removal of them. That if our parliament shall advise us to call a National Synod, which may duly examine such ceremonies as give just cause of offence to any, we shall take it into consideration, and apply ourself to give due satisfaction therein; but we are very sorry to hear, in such general terms, Corruption in Religion objected; since we are persuaded in our conscience, that no church can be found upon the earth that professeth the true religion with more purity of doctrine than the church of England doth; nor where the government and discipline are jointly more beautified, and free from superstition, than as they are here established by law; which, by the grace of God, we will with constancy maintain, while we live, in their purity and glory; not only against all invasions of Popery, but also from the irreverence of those many Schismatics and Separatists, wherewith, of late, this kingdom and this city abounds, to the great dishonour and hazard both of Church and State; for the suppression of whom, we require your timely and active assistance.—To the second prayer of the Petition, concerning the Removal and Choice of Counsellors: we know not any of our counsel to whom the character, set forth in the Petition, can belong. That, by those whom we have exposed to trial, we have already given you sufficient testimony that there is no man so near unto us in place or affection, whom we will not leave to the justice of the law, if you shall bring a particular charge and sufficient proofs against him; and of this we do again assure you: but, in the mean time, we wish you to forbear such general aspersions as may reflect upon all our council, since you name none in particular.—That for the Choice of our Counsellors and Ministers of State, it were to debar us that natural liberty all freemen have; and as it is the undoubted right of the crown of England, to call such persons to our secret councils, to public employment, and our particular service, as we shall think fit; so we are, and ever shall be, very careful to the election of such persons in those places of trust as shall have given good testimonies of the abilities and integrity, and against whom there can be no just cause of exception, where reasonably to ground a diffidence; and the choices of this nature, we assure you that the mediation of the nearest unto us hath always concurred.—To the third Prayer of your Petition, concerning Ireland: we understand your desire of not alienating the forfeited lands thereof to proceed from your much care and love, and likewise that it may be a resolution very fit for us to take; but whether it be reasonable to declare resolutions of that nature before the events of a war be seen, that we need doubt of. Howsoever, we cannot but thank you for this care, and your cheerful engagement for the suppression of that Rebellion; and the speedy effecting whereof, the glory of God in the Protestant profession, the safety of British there, our honour, and that of the nation so much depends; all the interests of the kingdom being so involved in that business, cannot but quicken your affections therein, and shall desire you to frame your counsels, and give such expedition to the work, as the nature thereof, and the pressure in point of time requires; and whereof you are put in mind by the daily insolence and increase of the rebels.—For conclusion, you promise to apply yourselves to such courses as may support our royal estate with honour and plenty at home, and with power and reputation abroad: this is that which we have ever promoted in ourself, both from your loyalties and affections, and also for what we have already done, and shall daily go adding unto, for the comfort and happiness of our people."

HIS MAJESTY'S DECLARATION to all his loving Subjects, published with the Advice of the Privy Council, in ANSWER to the Petition and MONSTRANCE of the Commons, (p. 946)

"Although we do not believe that our loving commons intended, by their Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, to put us to an apology, either for our past or present actions notwithstanding, since they have thought it very necessary, upon their observation of the present distempers, to publish the same, the satisfaction of all our loving Subjects, we thought it very suitable to the duty of our place with which God hath trusted us, to do our part to so good a work; in which we shall not think below our kingly dignity to descend to any particular, which may compose and settle the affections of our meanest subjects; since we are so conscious to ourself of such upright intentions and endeavours, and only of such which we give God thanks, for the peace and happiness of our kingdom, in which the prosperity of our subjects must be included, we wish from our heart, that even our most secret thoughts were published to their view and examination: though we must confess we cannot but be very sorry in this conjuncture re, when the unhappiness of this kingdom is generally understood abroad, there should such a necessity of publishing so many particulars; from which, we pray, no inconveniences may ensue that were not intended.—I shall, in few words, pass over that part of narrative, wherein the misfortunes of this kingdom, from our first entering to the crown the beginning of this parliament, are remembered in so sensible expressions: and that for, which acknowledgeth the many good things, passed by our grace and favour, in this parliament, for the security of our people; of which we shall only say thus much, That as we have not refused to pass any bill presented us by our parliament, for redress of those grievances mentioned in the Remonstrance, we have not had a greater motive for the passing those laws than our own resolution, founded upon, our observation, and understanding the state of our kingdom, to have secured our subjects, for the future, from those injuries which were grievous to them, if those laws had not been propounded; which, therefore, we shall as inviolably maintain, as we do to have our own rights preserved; not doubting but all our loving subjects will look upon those Remedies with that full gratitude and affection, that even the memory of what they have formerly undergone by the accidents and necessities of those times, will not be unpleasant to them: and, possibly, in a pious sense of God's blessing upon this nation, how we share soever we shall have of the acknowledgment, they will confess they have enjoyed that measure of happiness, even these last years, both in peace and plenty; not only comparatively in respect of their neighbours, even of those times which were justly accounted fortunate.—The fears and jealousies, which may make some impression in the minds of our people, we will suppose may be of two sorts; either for Religion, or Liberty, and their private Interests. The fears for Religion may be, not only as ours here established, may be invaded by the Romish party, but as accompanied with some Ceremonies, at which some tender consciences really are, or tend to be, scandalized; for of any other which have been used without any legal warrant or injunction, and already are, or speedily will be abolished, we shall not speak.—Concerning Religion: as there may be any suspicion of favour or inclination to the Papists, we are willing to declare to all the world, That we have been, from our childhood, brought up, and practised the religion now established in this kingdom, so it is well known we have, contented simply with the principles of our religion, given a good proportion of our time and pains, to the examination of the grounds of this religion, as it is different from that of the Jews; and are, from our soul, so fully satisfied and assured that it is the most pure and agreeable to the sacred Word of God, of any religion now practised in the Christian world, as we believe we can maintain the same by unanswerable reasons, so we hope we should readily seal it by the effusion of our blood, if it pleased God to call us to that sacrifice: and therefore nothing can be so acceptable unto us, as any proposition which may contribute to the advancement of it here, or the propagation of it abroad, being the only means to draw down a blessing from God upon ourselves and this nation. And we have been extremely unfortunate if this profession of ours be wanting to our people; our constant practice in our own person having always been, without ostentation, as much to the evidence of our care and duty herein, as we could possibly tell how to express.—For differences amongst ourselves, for matters indifferent in their own nature concerning Religion, we shall, in tenderness to any number of our loving subjects, very willingly comply with the advice of our parliament, that some law may be made for the exemption of tender consciences from punishment or prosecution for such Ceremonies, and in such cases, which, by the judgment of men, are held to be matters indifferent, and of some to be absolutely unlawful; provided that this case be attempted and pursued with such modesty, temper, and submission, that, in the mean time, the peace and quiet of the kingdom be not disturbed, the decency and comeliness of God's service discountenanced, nor the pious, sober, and devout actions of those reverend persons who were the first labourers in the blessed Reformation, or of that time, be scandalized and defamed: for we cannot, without grief of heart, and without some tax upon ourself and our ministers for the not executing of our laws, look upon the bold licence of some men, in printing of pamphlets, in preaching and printing of sermons, so full of bitterness and malice against the present government and the laws established, so full of sedition against ourself and the peace of the kingdom, that we are many times amazed to consider by what eyes these things are seen, and by what ears they are heard; and therefore we have good cause to command, as we have done, and hereby do, all our judges and ministers of justice, our attorney and solicitor general, and the rest of our learned counsel, to proceed with all speed against such and their abettors; who, either by writing or words, have so boldly and maliciously violated the laws, disturbed the peace of the commonwealth, and, as much as in them lies, shaken the very foundation upon which that peace and happiness is founded and constituted. And we doubt not but all our loving subjects will be very sensible that this busy, virulent, demeanor is a fit prologue to nothing but confusion; and, if not very seasonably punished and prevented, will not only be a blemish to that wholesome accommodation we intend, but an unspeakable scandal and imputation even upon the profession and religion of this our kingdom of England.—Concerning the Civil Liberties and Interests of our Subjects, we shall need to say the less, having erected, so many lasting monuments of our princely and fatherly care of our people, in those many excellent laws passed by us this parliament; which, in truth, with very much content to ourself, we conceive to be so large and ample, that very many sober men have very little left to wish for.—We understand well the right, and pretences of right, we departed from in the consenting to the bills for the Triennial Parliament; for the Continuance of this present Parliament; and in the preamble to the bill of Tonnage and Poundage; the matter of which, having begot so many disturbances in late parliaments, we were willing to remove, that no interest of ours might hereafter break that correspondence; abundantly contenting ourself with an assurance, which we still have, that we should be repaired and supplied by a just proportion of confidence, bounty, and obedience of our people. In the bills for the taking away the High Commission and Star-Chamber Courts, we believed we had given that real satisfaction, that all jealousies and apprehensions of arbitrary pressures, under the civil or ecclesiastical state, would easily have been abandoned; especially when they saw all possible doubts secured by the visitation of a Triennial Parliament.—These and others of no mean consideration, we had rather should be valued in the hearts and affections of our people, than in any mention of our own; not doubting but, as we have taken all these occasions to make our people happy, so they will always, in a grateful and dutiful relation, be ready, with equal tenderness and alacrity, to advance our rights, and preserve our honour, upon which their own security and subsistence so much depends. And we will be so careful that no particular shall be presented unto us, for the completing and establishing that security, to which we will not, with the same readiness, contribute our best assistance.—If these Resolutions be the effect of our present counsels, (and we take God to witness that they are such, and that all our loving subjects may confidently expect the benefit of them from us) certainly, no ill design upon the public can accompany such resolutions; neither will there be greater cause of suspicion of any persons preferred by us to degrees of honour, and places of trust and employment, since this parliament. And we must confess, that amongst our misfortunes, we reckon it not the least, that having not retained in our service, nor protected, any one person against whom our parliament hath excepted, during the whole sitting of it, and having, in all that time, scarce vouchsafed to any man an instance of our grace and favour, but to such who were under some eminent character of estimation amongst our people, there should so soon be any misunderstanding or jealousy of their fidelity and uprightness; especially in a time when we take all occasions to declare, That we conceive ourself only capable of being served by honest men, and in honest ways: however, if, in truth, we have been mistaken in such our election, the particular shall be no sooner discovered to us, either by our own observation or other certain information, then we will leave them to public justice, under the marks of our displeasure.—If, notwithstanding this, any malignant party shall take heart, and be willing to sacrifice the peace and happiness of their country to their own sinister ends and ambitions, and what pretence of religion and conscience they if they shall endeavour to lessen our reputation and interest, and to weaken our lawful power and authority with our good subjects; if they shall go about, by discountenancing the laws, to loosen the bands of government, and all disorder and confusion may break in upon us, we doubt not but God, in his good will, will discover them unto us; and the wisdom and courage of our high court of parliament join with us in their suppression and punishment.—Having now said all that we can express the clearness and uprightness of our intentions to our people, and done all we can manifest those intentions, we cannot but confidently believe all our good subjects will knowledge our part to be fully performed, in deeds past and present resolutions, whatsoever, with justice, may be required, and that their quiet and prosperity depends now, wholly upon themselves, and is in our power, by yielding all obedience and reverence to the law, which is the inheritance of every subject, and the only security he has for his life, liberty, or estate; and which being neglected or disesteemed, what specious shews soever, a great measure of infelicity, if not an irreparable calamity, must, without doubt, fall upon them: And doubt not, it will be the most acceptable declaration a king can make to his subjects, for our part, we are resolved not only to observe the laws ourself, but to maintain against what opposition soever, though at the hazard of our being.—And our belief, That not only the loyalty and good affection of all our loving subjects will concur in the constant preserving a good understanding between us and our people; but that time their own and our interest, and our compassion to the lamentable condition of our Protestant subjects in Ireland, will invite us to a fair intelligence and unity amongst ourselves; that so we may, with one heart, the relieving and recovering that unhappy island, where those barbarous rebels practice inhuman and unheard of outrages upon a miserable people, that no Christian can hear without horror, nor story parallel to; as we look upon this as the greatest favour it hath pleased God to lay upon us, so our happiness is increased, in that, by the persons at home, so early remedies have been applied to those growing evils, as the situation and necessity there requires; that on our part, as we did, upon the first acquaintance our parliament of Scotland, when there, with that rebellion, required aid and assistance, and gave like spe-nation and recommendation to our parliament here; so, since our return hither, we have been forward to all things which have been proposed to us towards that work; and have lately, ourself, offered, by a Message to our house of peers, and communicated to our house of commons, to take upon us the care to raise, speedily, 10,000 English Volunteers for that service, if the commons shall declare that they will pay them; which particulars we are, in a manner, necessitated to publish; since we are informed that the malice of some persons hath whispered it abroad, That the speedier advancing of this business hath proceeded from some want of alacrity in us to this great work; whereas we acknowledge it a high crime against Almighty God, and inexcusable to our good subjects of our three kingdoms, if we did not, to the utmost, employ all our powers and faculties to the speediest and most effectual assistance and protection of that distressed people.—And we shall now conjure all our good subjects, of what degree soever, by all the bonds of love, duty, or obedience that are precious to good men, to join with us for the recovery of the peace of that kingdom, and the preservation of the peace of this; to remove all their doubts and fears which may interrupt their affection to us, and all their jealousies and apprehensions which may lessen their hardy to each other; and then, if the sins of his nation have not prepared an inevitable judgment for us all, God will yet make us a great and glorious king, over a free and happy people.”

Protestation of both Houses on the King's Speech on the Pressing Bill.] Dec. 16. The committees appointed by both houses, brought in the form of a Protestation and a Petition of Remonstrance to the king, occasioned by his late speech relating to the Press Act; which, being read, were agreed to, and ordered to be entered in their Journals. The first was in these words:

“Whereas his most excellent majesty did, upon Tuesday last, in full parliament, in a speech to both houses, take notice of a Bill for impressing Soldiers being in agitation in the said houses, and not agreed upon; and did offer a salvo jure, or provisional clause, to be added to the said bill; and did at the same time declare his displeasure against some person or persons, which had moved some doubt or question concerning the same: the lords and commons do protest and declare, That such his majesty's speech is contrary to the fundamental, antient, and undoubted liberty and privilege of parliament; and that it doth of right belong unto them, amongst other privileges of the high court of parliament, that the king ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate, in either of the houses of parliament, but by their information or agreement; and that his majesty ought not to propound any condition, provision, or limitation to any bill or act, in debate or preparation, in either house of parliament; or to manifest or declare his consent or dissent, approbation or dislike of the same, before it be presented unto him by the consent of both houses; and that every particular member, of either house, hath free liberty of speech to propound or debate any matter, according to the order and course of parliament; and that his majesty ought not to conceive displeasure against any man for such opinions and propositions as shall be delivered in such debate: it belonging to the several houses of parliament respectively to judge and determine such errors and offences, in words or actions, as shall be committed by any of their members, in handling or debating any matters there depending. And, for the preservation of the said privileges for the time to come, they do ordain and appoint, That this their Protestation and Declaration shall be entered in both houses; and that an humble Remonstrance and Petition shall be framed and presented to his majesty, in the name of both houses, declaring this their antient and undoubted right; humbly desiring his majesty to observe and maintain the said privileges; and that he will not take notice of any particular man's speech or carriage concerning any matter in treaty and debate in parliament, or conceive any offence or displeasure for the same; but that he will discover, declare, and make known, the name or names of the person or persons, by whose misinformation and evil counsel, he was induced to the breach of the privilege of parliament aforementioned *.”

Remonstrance and Petition on the same Subject.] Dec. 17. The archbishop of York, with 17 lords and 40 commons, waited on the king, at White-Hall, with their Petitionary Remonstrance; which was read to him; in these words:

“To the King's most excellent majesty;
The Humble REMONSTRANCE and PETITION of the Lords and Commons in Parliament.

“Most Gracious Sovereign; Your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, do with all faithfulness and zeal to your majesty's service, acknowledge your royal favour and protection to be a great blessing and security to them, for the enjoying and preserving of all those public and private liberties and privileges which belong unto them: and, whensoever those liberties or privileges shall be invaded or broken, they hold themselves bound, with humility and confidence, to trust to your princely justice for redress and satisfaction. And, because the rights and privileges of parliament are the birth-right and inheritance, not only of themselves, but of the whole kingdom, wherein

* Lord Clarendon tells us, That Mr. Solicitor St. John advised the king to come to the house upon this occasion; and that what the king said were the very words he had proposed to him. Vol. I. fol. ed. p. 258.

every one of your subjects is intitled, (the maintenance and preservation whereof doth very highly conduce to the public peace and prosperity of your majesty, and all your people) they conceive themselves more especially obliged, with all tenderness and care, yea, with all earnestness and constancy of resolution and endeavours, to maintain and defend the same. —Amongst other the privileges of parliament, they do, with all dutiful reverence to your most excellent maj. declare, That it is their antient and undoubted right, that your maj. ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation and debate in either of the houses of parliament, but by their information or agreement; and that your maj. ought not to propound any condition, provision, or limitation to any bill or act in debate or preparation in either house of parliament, or to manifest or declare your consent or dissent, approbation or dislike, of the same, before it be presented to your maj. in due course of parliament; and that every particular member of either house hath free liberty of speech to propound or debate any matter, according to the order and course of parliament; and that your maj. ought not to conceive displeasure against any man for such opinions and propositions as shall be in such debate; it belonging to the several houses of parliament respectively to judge and determine such errors and offences, which, in words or actions, shall be committed by any of their members, in the handling or debating any matters there depending. They do further declare, That all the privileges above mentioned have been lately broken, to so great a grievance of your most humble and faithful subjects, in that speech which your maj. made in parliament to both houses upon the 14th day of this month of Dec. in that your maj. did therein take notice of a Bill for impressing of soldiers, being in agitation in the said houses, and not agreed upon; and that your maj. did therein offer a salvo jure, or provisional clause, to be added to that bill, before it was presented to your maj. by the consent of both houses; and did at the same time, declare your displeasure against such person or persons, as had moved some doubt or question concerning the same bill: all which they do affirm and declare to be against the antient, lawful, and undoubted privilege and liberty of parliament. — And, further, they most humbly beseech your maj. by your royal power and authority, to maintain and protect them in these and other the privileges of your high court of parliament; that you will not for the time to come, break or interrupt the same; and that none of your loyal subjects may suffer and sustain any prejudice in your majesty's favour, or good opinion, for any thing done or spoken in parliament: and, for the reparation of your loyal subjects in this just grievance and complaint for the breaches of their privileges above-mentioned, and prevention of the like for the time to come, that your maj. will be pleased to declare, and make known, the name or names of the person or persons by whose information and evil counsel your maj. was induced to the same, that so he or they may receive condign punishment, as shall appear to justice in that behalf. And this they most humbly desire, as your greatest and most faithful council; and advise your maj. to perform, as that which will be not only a comfort to themselves, but likewise a great advantage to your maj. by procuring and confirming such confidence and unity betwixt your maj. and your people, as may be a foundation of honour, safety, and happiness, to your person, and your throne, as they are bound always to pray for and endeavour."

After the lords returned to their house, the archbishop of York reported, That they waited on the king with the Remonstrance, and his majesty said 'He would send an answer to it, in writing, in convenient time.' Mr. Pyn's report of it in the house of commons was more particular; He said, 'That the committee had a sudden admittance and a gracious acceptance: that his majesty said, 'As it had taken some time to prepare, so he would take some time to answer it; and that, lest there might be some mistakes in words, he would give his Answer in writing.'

Dec. 18. A message was brought from the commons to accuse Daniel O'Neal, esq. High Treason; and that the commons would bring up particular Articles against him in due time: upon which the said O'Neal was brought to the bar of the lords, and committed to the gatehouse.

The King's Answer to the Remonstrance. Dec. 20. A committee of lords and commons was ordered to attend the king, at White-Hall, to receive his majesty's Answer to the late Remonstrance; which was soon after read to the lords, in hæc verba:

"My lords and gentlemen; In answer to your Petition, concerning our speech to both houses the 14th of Dec. last, we do declare, first, That we had no thought or intention of breaking the privileges of parliament; neither are we satisfied, that our being informed of any bill transmitted by the house of commons to the house of peers, especially where our learned counsel are admitted, by the peers, to speak for our behalf, as they were in this case, and therefore our direction necessary therein, can be judged any breach of the privileges of parliament. — And as to our taking notice thereof and desiring the insertion of a saving clause of our rights, we neither willingly nor knowingly did any thing to the breach of the privileges of parliament; but what we did therein was out of the great zeal we had, and ever shall have to the suppressing the Rebellion in Ireland, the quick dispatch of which bill contributed so much to the effecting thereof; and it could not but have received great delay, had it passed both houses in a way we could not have given our royal assent to. — Neither had we any intention to express our displeasure against any particular man, for any opinion or proposition livered, by way of debate, in either house ; our intention was to express a general desire of any questions, that should be raised, especially at this time, concerning our prerogative and the liberty of the subject ; such as this being but a preamble, which might be left without prejudice to the claim, and could be approved by us, without concluding our intent.—As to the last demand, That we should spare the persons that gave us information ; is no great wonder that we should get information of the contents of the bill, since they are published in print before we spoke of it. Yet, though we should have got notice otherwise, it is a thing much beneath us to let any that should give us information or counsel ; it being that which we do not impose on any person of honour.—Our conclusion That we had not the least thought of breaking the privileges of parliament ; but shall, by royal authority, ever protect and uphold it ; and we expect, that you will be as careful to trench upon our just prerogative, as will not infringe your just liberties and privileges : and then there will be little disagreement, hereafter, between us in that point.” This being read to the house, the lords ordered, “ That a transcript of the king’s Answer should be sent down to the commons, and that should be taken into consideration, by themselves, on the 23d.”

Further Proceedings towards suppressing the Rebellion in Ireland.] Dec. 21. Sir Philip Pympton was sent up with a message to the commons, importing, “ That the commons had, in their last conference, laid before their lordships the miserable state of that kingdom, and desired them to take the business into speedy consideration : that they now understand that Dublin is in great danger to be lost, 600 men being cut off by the Rebels in going to relieve Tredah, the commons therefore desire that all means may be used for the preservation of that kingdom ; and they conceive the best way to do it by way of diversion, to send the Scots into the province of Ulster, speedily : therefore that they desired their lordships to join with them in the Propositions received from the Scots commissioners for that purpose : the commons declaring, That, if there be any omission, they are clear themselves from any thing that may fall to Ireland.”—Upon this the lords resolved, That 10,000 English soldiers were necessary to be sent, with as many Scots, into Ireland ; but mistrusting that the commons would not agree to this, at a conference this day, the lords made the following Propositions to the other house. “ 1. They desired to know the certainty that house would give this, that the Proposition concerning the present going of 10,000 Scots, be agreed unto, 10,000 English may speedily follow. 2. Whether they would concur with this house, that one army should go as soon as the other ; and that the king may be moved to give his assent to it.” The commons taking these Propositions into consideration, at another conference the same day, returned for answer. “ 1. For the certainty which their lordships desire of sending 10,000 English into Ireland, the commons say, It is not the course of parliament, nor hath been practised for one house to capitulate with the other : that their actions are free ; as without conditions, so without capitulation ; and the house of commons desire it may be so no more. 2. The commons think they have given sufficient certainty already, having formerly voted the sending over 10,000 English, and transmitted the same to their lordships ; therefore they think it not necessary to vote it again : but do desire their lordships would vote the sending of 10,000 Scots over, by itself, without any relation to the English, and that speedily, the safety of Ireland depending upon it ; for they conceive the 10,000 English cannot go until the Press Act passes.”

After the hearing of this, the lords went into a debate of the matter, and came to this Resolution, “ That 10,000 English and 10,000 Scots shall be sent into Ireland ;” and some members of the other house waiting in the Painted Chamber for an Answer, the lords sent to acquaint them with this vote. It was likewise ordered by the lords, “ That the committee for keeping a good correspondence between both houses, should meet on Friday, to take into consideration this last message from the commons.”

Proceedings on the Dismissal of the Lieutenant of the Tower.] Dec. 23. This day, another circumstance occurred, which occasioned a fresh rupture between the two houses. The house of commons represented to the lords, That they had received information that sir Wm. Balfour, knt. lieutenant of the Tower of London, approved for his fidelity, was put out of his place, and one colonel Lunsford put in ; a man very unfit to be trusted with a post of that importance.—To back this, the commons sent up a Petition from divers common-councilmen and others of the city, giving a very bad character of the said colonel, and of which they instanced some circumstances : That he was a man of decayed and desperate fortune ; an outlaw ; and one suspected to be not right in his religion, since, in the time he was an officer in the king’s army in the North, he did not go to church, though desired : therefore they requested the lords to join with them in a Petition to the king, to remove him, and put sir John Conyers in his room. After a long debate, next day, on this affair, the question was put, Whether that house should join with the commons in the matter of this Petition ? It was resolved in the negative ; and ordered that they should be acquainted therewith.—The reason of the lords refusing to join in this Petition, was, That they took the placing or displacing of the king’s officers to be a branch of his prerogative ; and therefore they would not meddle with it.

The commons, on this refusal, passed the following vote : Resolved, nem. con. “ That this house holds colonel Lunsford unfit to be, or continue, lieutenant of the Tower, as being a person whom the commons of England cannot confide in." Another conference was also held upon this subject, which was thus reported by the lord keeper, "That the commons greatly desired, that both houses might have joined together in an humble Petition to his majesty, for removing colonel Lunsford from being lieutenant of the Tower. That they say, they find ill consequences already by his being in that office; for merchants have already withdrawn their bullion out of the mint; and strangers, who have ships lately come with great store of bullion, do forbear to bring it into the mint, because he is lieutenant of the Tower; and, by this means, money will be scarce to come by, which will be prejudicial and obstructive to the pressing affairs of Ireland. The commons took it much to heart, that their lordships did not join with them to petition his majesty: hereupon they have made a Declaration for themselves, and desire that the same may be entered into the Journal-Book of this house, as they have done the like in their house;" which was read in these words:

"We the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, being very sensible of the great and imminent danger of the kingdom, through the designs of the Papists, and other persons disaffected to the public peace; and finding, by frequent and imminent symptoms, that the same groweth very near to maturity, amongst which we reckon this not to be the least, That the Tower, being a place of such importance to the safety of the city and the whole kingdom, should be put into the hands of a man so unworthy, and of so dangerous a disposition, as, by divers testimonies, colonel Lunsford is affirmed to be; which caused us yesterday, upon the Petition of the city of London, to desire your lordships to join with us in an humble suit to his majesty, that a place of that great consequence might not be disposed in such a manner as to hazard the safety, peace, and content of the city and of the whole kingdom; and, perceiving that your lordships have refused to join with us in so important and necessary a request, do hereby declare, before God and the whole kingdom, That, from the beginning of this parliament, we have done our uttermost to preserve the state from ruin; and having, through God's blessing, prevailed so far, that the design of the Irish army of Papists; the other designs of bringing up the English army, several times attempted; a former plot of possessing the Tower, without which treason could not be so mischievous to the state, were all prevented; although strongly bent to the destruction of religion, the parliament and the commonwealth: we do now find ourselves encountered with as great difficulty as ever, the Papists rebellion in Ireland giving such encouragement to the malignant party here, and they likewise receiving such advantage, by the delays and interruptions which we have received in the house of peers, as we conceive by the great number of Bishops and Papists notoriously disaffected to the common good: and do therefore hold ourselves bound in conscience to declare and protest, That we are innocent of the blood which is like to be spilt, and of the confusions which may overwhelm this state, if this person be continued in his charge; and do intend to resort to his majesty, in an humble Petition, that he will be pleased to afford us his royal protection, that the kingdom and ourselves may be preserved from this wicked and dangerous design; and that he will grant such commissions and instructions as may enable us to defend his royal person, and his loyal subjects, from the cruelty and rage of the Papists, who have long plotted and endeavoured to bring in a bloody change of religion, to the apparent ruin of the whole kingdom; and if any of your lordships have the same apprehensions that we have, we hope they will likewise take some course to make the same known to his majesty; and will further do what appertains to persons of honour and fidelity for the common good."

After the reading of this paper it was moved, by some lords, to adjourn the debate of this matter till the 27th; others proposed it might be debated presently. And the question being put, Whether the debate upon this report shall be put off until the 27th or not? It was resolved in the affirmative. Whereupon the following Protest was entered in their Journals:

"In respect the conference brought up, and reported from the house of commons, doth, as it is thereby declared, concern the instant good and safety of the king and kingdoms; we do protest against the deferring of the debate thereof until Monday, to the end to discharge ourselves of any ill consequence that may happen. Complaint concerning a Report of some Members being in a Plot for seizing the Queen. Dec. 27. This day another affair was started in the house of lords. Information was given to that house, that some members of both houses have had false rumours reported to them: That during the time the king was last in Scotland, it was told the queen, That, at a meeting at Kensington, (where the earl of Essex, the earl of Newport, the lord Say and Sele, the lord Mandeville, the lord Wharton, members of this house; and the lord Dungarvan, Mr. N. Fiennes, sir John Clotworthy, and Mr. John Pym, members of the house of commons, were present) upon a discourse of Plots that should be done in this kingdom or in Scotland, the earl of Newport should say, "If there be such a Plot, yet here are his wife and children;" meaning that the persons of the queen and of her children should be seized upon,—Upon this the earl of Newport stood up, and gave the house this account, That, hearing of such an information which had been presented to the queen, he went with some other lords and waited on her majesty; and, with many protestations, assured her, That never any such words were spoken, nor the least thought thereof conceived of any such fact; with which the queen seemed to rest satisfied: But, upon Friday last, his majesty asked him, Whether he heard any debate at Kensington, about seizing upon the Queen and her Children; which his lordship denying, his majesty replied again, 'That he was sorry for his lordship's ill memory.'—The house considering this information to be of consequence; and, because several members of the commons were concerned in it, resolved to have a conference with that house about it, that so they might search into this business, and that the bottom of it might be found out, and the reporter of this idle rumour brought to condign punishment: and the abp. of York, the lord admiral, earl of Bristol, earl of Holland, lord Roberts, and lord Savile, were ordered to draw up heads for that conference.

The Petition of both Houses thereupon.] Dec 28. Mr. Glynn presented, from the committee appointed to meet with a committee of lords, for the drawing of a Petition to be presented unto his majesty, concerning a scandal laid upon some members of both houses, a Petition, in hæc verba; which was agreed unto:

* To the KING's most Excellent Majesty. The humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS in this present Parliament assembled.

"Whereas, during the time of your majesty's last being in Scotland, the queen's majesty received information, That, at a meeting in Kensington, where the e. of Essex, the e. of Newport, the lord Say and Sele, the lord Mandeville, the lord Wharton, members of the lords' house; the lord Dungarvon, Mr. N. Fiennes, sir John Clotworthy, and Mr. John Pym, members of the house of commons, were all present, when a discourse of some Plots, that should be done in this kingdom, or in Scotland, the earl of Newport should say, 'If there be such a Plot, yet here are his wife and children; insinuating the same to signify, that the persons of her majesty, and her children, should be seized upon. And whereas your majesty, upon Friday last, was pleased to demand of the earl of Newport, 'Whether his lordship heard any debate at Kensington, about seizing upon the Queen and her Children;' which when his lordship had denied, with many and deep asseverations, your majesty replied again, 'That he was to tell your majesty no more than you knew already;' and therefore should consider well what he should answer: and his lordship denying it the second time, your majesty, parting from him, replied, 'You were sorry for his ill memory;' seeming thereby to give credit to that information. Which information and report tend not only to the great scandal of the members of both houses of parliament before named, but express an endeavour to stir up jealousies, and work a division, between your majesty and your parliament. It is therefore the humble and instant desire of the lords and commons in this parliament, That your majesty will be pleased to declare who was the reporter, or reporters, of those words pretended to be spoken at Kensington by the earl of Newport; and that your majesty will be likewise pleased to move her majesty to discover who acquainted her therewith: and this, as your greatest and most faithful council, they advise your majesty to perform; the exigency of the affairs of both kingdoms being such as necessarily require a sudden remedy; which cannot expect any possibility of success, without a right understanding between your majesty and the parliament; the only way of effecting whereof is, by the present discovery and removal of ill counsels and false informers; which, to our great grief, we have, by experience, found to be too frequent and active in these dangerous times."

The King's Answer.] This Petition having been presented to the king, his majesty returned the following Answer:—

"My lords and gentlemen; It is true that I have heard rumours of some propositions that should have been made at Kensington, for the seizing of the persons of my wife and children. And, in things of so high a nature, it may be fit for any prince to inquire, even where he hath no belief nor persuasion of the thing; so I have asked Newport some questions concerning that business, but far from that way of expressing a belief of the thing, which Newport hath had the boldness and confidence to affirm; which I could easily make appear, but I think it beneath me to contest with any particular person. But let this suffice, that I assure you, I neither did nor do give credit to any such rumour. As for telling the name of him who informed me, I do stick to the Answer which I gave to your last Petition upon the like particular."

The Riots and Tumults about both Houses increase.] Multitudes of people being this day assembled, in all the places leading to both houses of parliament, the general cry of whom was 'No Bishops! No Bishops;' an affray ensued, in which some gentlemen, of the opposite party, drew their swords, and wounded some of the mob: hereupon the lords sent to desire a conference with the other house on these heads; 1. To desire the commons to join with them in a Declaration, to be printed and published, of their dislike of the assembling of the people in such companies, and disorders about the houses of parliament.* 2. Likewise to desire his majesty, That the houses of parliament may have a Guard; and that the commons would give an Answer with such speed as the necessity of the occasion required.—This day, also, it was resolved by the lords, “That this parliament is a free parliament at this present.”

Dec. 29. The lords ordered the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and some of the justices of peace for Westminster, to attend their house, and give reasons why they had neglected to prevent the coming of the concourse of people to that place; and why they have neglected to observe the king's writ, for suppressing and preventing of tumults and riots. They answered, ‘That the justices of the peace opened the writ, and granted out warrants to the constables, who sent guards to the houses of parliament; and, upon this, they were questioned by the commons, and the Guards dismissed.’ Hereupon the Judges were ordered to withdraw, to consider what was fit to be done; who returned for Answer, ‘That the best way to suppress tumults, was to put in execution the statute of 13 Henry 4. c. 7.’ This not being thought sufficient, they were again asked, What was the usual practice, in other courts, to prevent tumults and routs? The Judges said, ‘That it was usual in their courts, at assizes, to prevent such disorders, for the sheriff of the county to attend all the while, with a competent number of men.’ Upon which the lords ordered, ‘That the under sheriff of Middlesex, and two of the justices of peace for Westminster, should hereafter attend this house, de die in diem, and receive directions from them for the suppressing of such tumults.’

Mr. Smith's Speech on the Riots, &c. In a debate of the house of commons this day, on these riotous proceedings, we meet with a speech of one

Mr. Smith, in these words: * ‘Mr. Speaker; The business we have now in agitation (concerning the Irish affairs, and the Treaty with the Scots commissioners for their timely assistance of aid, being to be determined this day) is of great consequence and weight; even of such importance, that I have not read of greater. When the greatest troubles were in that kingdom, in queen Elizabeth's reign, of good memory, these troubles, being comparatively simlized with them, are of far greater danger: and I would to God we might so agree with the lords, that a speedy concurrence might be had with the Scots, towards the relief of Ireland. Yet, notwithstanding, Mr. Speaker, the greatness of this rebellion, and most outrageous cruelties committed daily by the rebels, hazarding nearly the loss of that kingdom, without speedy help, (which takes up himself saying, ‘God forbid the house of commons should proceed in any way to dishearten people to obtain their just desires in such a way.’

all our debates and arguments) if we remove not therewith all such impediments here at home, as do hinder our speedy proceeding, not only in that business, but in the settling of the peace and quiet of this kingdom, all our endeavours in the suppressing the rebels in Ireland will little avail.—Mr. Speaker, under favour of this hon. assembly, I intend to give you a touch of such lets which do much hinder us, as I conceive, in expediting the great affairs of church and state, and our proceedings against incendiaries and delinquents in the same. We have daily, you know, Mr. Speaker, received Petitions from the citizens of London, some of them having been delivered by good hands, and men of good worth and quality; which we have willingly taken, and I doubt not but we shall, in due time, give them good satisfaction in answering of them. Likewise we have received petitions from abrupt and disorderly persons, without any matter that may deserve our consideration; but are fitter to be rejected, as I, under favour, conceive. But, that which I intend to intimate to you, as the greatest stop to our proceedings, is the riotous and tumultuous assembly of vain and idle persons; who presume to begirt our house, not only in an irregular manner to prefer their petitions, but, with open clamour, would prescribe as what laws to enact, and what not; what persons to prosecute, and who not. These tumultuous persons take up a great deal of our precious time in answering and appeasing them; when, as I conceive, other business, more nearly concerning the welfare and security of his sacred majesty and his kingdoms, lies even as it were gasping, and ready to perish for want of our timely assistance.—Mr. Speaker, our patience, I persuade myself, is one of the greatest causes that animates and encourages these illegal outrages; and if some rebukes were ministered from the house to them, they would not, surely, be so audacious. It is true, that their trading is decayed, and it is hard for many of them to subsist with their families, occasioned by our slow proceedings against delinquents; the reason whereof they are incapable of judging, neither, as I conceive, should they be made acquainted with, otherwise than to understand that their unseasonable and unfitting repair in this house is one principal cause thereof. Therefore, sir, I conceive, the best and speediest means for suppressing of these Tumults will be, to have a strict guard kept about the house, with a command not only, by persuasion, to avert their resort hither, but to shoot at them, if they obstinately refuse to be persuaded; and likewise that, in the city of London and suburbs, diligent search may be made for Papists and Recusants, by some trusty officers appointed by the house for that purpose, who shall apprehend them, if they find them armed with any weapons, and bring them before a committee for examination, appointed for that purpose: for, Mr. Speaker, Papists, as well as others, resort hither from several places, as I am informed; which these tumultuous mons pretend is one great cause of their eating here; and when they perceive that Papists and Recusants are prosecuted according to the laws of this kingdom, in that case acted, they will have less cause to trouble. This is my humble motion.—And truly, if I may speak my mind herein, I persuade myself, that unless the laws be put in execution, and that with severity and speed, against some of the greatest Recusants, to make them amply to the rest, neither this city, nor other places of this kingdom, can be secure from their devilish practices and plots; and at our too favourable proceeding against them, if so continued, may cause our too late repentance, if any of their perverse and wicked stratagems should take effect, which God forbid. And I heartily wish that such course may be taken, by the blessing of the Almighty in our endeavours, that all the inhabitants of his majesty's kingdoms, that are true Christians and loyal subjects, may for ever lye down in peace and rise in safety, to which I shall always say, Amen.

Bp. Hall's Speech in Defence of the Church of Clergy.] We find also a speech made by Bishop Hall, about this time, in the house of commons, but the day is not mentioned. This speech is the last made in that house by one of that order. * :—'My Lords; I have long held my place, and meant to have done so still; but now, like to Cæsar's mute son, I must break silence: I humbly beseech your lordships to give me leave to take this too just occasion to shew your lordships to take into your deep and serious consideration, the woful and lamentable condition of the poor Church of England, your dear mother. My lords, this was not wont to be her style: we have heretofore liked of the famous and flourishing church of England; but now your lordships must give me leave to say, that the poor church of England humbly prostrates herself at your lordships feet, next after his sacred majesty) and humbly begs your compassion and present aid.—My lords, it is a foul and dangerous insolence this, which is now complained of to you; but it is not one of a hundred of those which have been lately done to this church and government. The church of England, as your lordships cannot chuse but know, hath been, and is miserably infested on both sides; with Papists on the one side, and Schismatics on the other. The Puritan hath, of old, distinguished the enemies of it into wild boars out of the wood, and the foxes out of the boroughs; the one where he goes about to root up the very foundation of religion; the other, to crop the branches, and destroy the blossoms, and clusters thereof; both of them inspire the utter ruin and devastation of it: as for the former of them, I do perceive a great deal of good zeal for the remedy and suppression of them; and I do heartily congratulate it, and bless God for it, and beseech him to prosper it in those hands who shall undertake and prosecute it; but for the other, give me leave to say, I do not find many that are sensible of the danger of it, which yet, in my apprehension, is very great and apparent.—Alas! my lords, I beseech you to consider what it is that there should be in London, and the suburbs and liberties, no fewer than fourscore congregations of several sectaries, as I have been too credibly informed, instructed by guides fit for them, cobblers, taylors, felt-makers, and such like trash, which all are taught to spit in the face of their mother, the church of England, and to defy and revile her government: From hence have issued those dangerous assaults of our church and governors; from hence that inundation of base and scurrilous libels and pamphlets, wherewith we have been of late over-borne, in which Papists and Prelates, like oxen in a yoke, are still matched together. Oh, my lords! I beseech you that you will be sensible of this great indignity: do but look upon these reverend persons: do not your lordships see here sitting upon these benches, those that have spent their time, their strength, their bodies, and lives, in preaching down, in writing down, Popery? And which would be ready, if occasion offered, to sacrifice all their old blood that remains, to the maintenance of that Truth of God, which they have taught and written; and shall we be thus spitefully ranged with them, whom we do thus professedly oppose? But alas! this is but one of those many scandalous aspersions, and intolerable affronts, that are daily cast upon us.—Now, whither should we, in this case, have recourse for a needful and seasonable redress? The arm of the Church is, alas! now short and sinewless; it is the interposing of your authority that must rescue us: you are the eldest sons of your dear mother the Church, and therefore most fit and most able to vindicate her wrongs: You are Amici Sponsæ; give me leave, therefore, in the bowels of Christ, humbly to beseech your lordships to be tenderly sensible of these woful and dangerous conditions of the times; and if the government of the church of England be unlawful and unfit, abandon and disclaim it; but, if otherwise, uphold and maintain it: otherwise, if these lawless outrages be yet suffered to gather head, who knows where they will end?—My lords, if these men may, with impunity and freedom, thus bear down ecclesiastical authority, it is to be feared they will not rest there, but will be ready to affront civil power too. Your lordships know, that the Jack Straws, and Cades, and Wat Tylers of former times, did not more cry down learning than nobility; and those of your lordships that have read the history of the anabaptistical tumults at Munster, will need no other item; let it be enough to say, that many of these sectaries are of the same profession.—Shortly, therefore, let me humbly move your lordships to take these dangers and miseries of this poor church deeply to heart, and upon this occasion to give order for the speedy redressing of these horrible insolencies, and for the stopping of that deluge of libelous invectives wherewith we are thus impetuously overflown: which, in all due submission, I humbly present to your lordships wise and religious consideration.*

The King's Message for raising Volunteers for suppressing the Irish Rebellion. Dec. 29. The lord chamberlain, by command, delivered this Message from the king, "That his majesty being very sensible of the great miseries and distresses of his subjects in Ireland, which daily increase so fast, and the blood which hath already been spilt, by the cruelty and barbarousness of the bloody rebels, crying so loud; and perceiving how slowly the succours, designed there, go on, his majesty hath thought good to let their lordships know, and desired them to acquaint the house of commons there-

* In a small tract, entitled 'Hard Measure', this prelate gives us the following Account of the before-mentioned Tumults. "The rout did not stick openly to profess, that they would pull the Bishops from pieces. Messages were sent down to them from the lords but they still held firm, both to the place and their bloody resolutions. It now grew to be torch-light, and one of the lords, (the marquis of Hartford) came up to the Bishops form, and told us we were in great danger, advising us to take some course for our own safety; and, being desired to tell us what he thought the best way, counselled us to continue in the parliament house all that night; For," said he, 'these people vow they will watch you at your going out, and will search every coach for you with torches, so as you cannot escape.' Hereupon the house of lords was moved for some Order for the preventing their mutinous and riotous meetings, and messages were sent down to the house of commons, to this purpose, more than once; but nothing was effected: however, for the present, (for so much as all the danger was at the rising of the house) it was earnestly desired of the lords that some care might be taken of our safety. The motion was received by some lords with a smile; some other lords, as the earl of Manchester, undertook the protection of the abp. of York, and his company, (whose shelter I went under) to their lodgings; the rest, some of them by their long stay, others by secret and far-fetched passages, escaped home: therefore it was not for us to venture any more to the house without some better assurance."—Lord Clarendon adds, "That the mob laid hands on the abp. of York, going to the house of peers, in that manner, that if he had not been seasonably rescued, it was believed they would have murdered him: so that all the bishops, and many members of both houses, withdrew themselves from attending, from a real apprehension of endangering their lives."

* The following lines in Hudibras seem to allude to this very Transaction:

'When Zeal, with aged Clubs and Gleaves,
'Gave chase to Rochets and Lawn Sleeves.'

with, That he will take care that, by commission, which he will grant, 10,000 English Volunteers should be speedily raised for that service, if the house of commons will declare that they would pay them." This Message the lords ordered to be delivered to the commons, at a conference; but we find no more notice taken of it at this time.—Instead of that, there came up a message from the commons, by Mr. Hall, as an Answer to the late Propositions from the lords concerning a Guard, "That they would agree with their lordships, in all good and lawful means, for the safety of the parliament; but, for printing a particular Declaration, the commons said, they had entered into debate thereof, and found it to be a thing of great consideration, and would require time to think of it. As concerning a Guard; the house agreed to it, provided it be such as the parliament approves of, and that it be commanded by the earl of Essex.—Further, the commons desired that their lordships would be pleased to send a member, That there were 2 bills depending before them; one concerning the Pressing of Soldiers for the service of Ireland, and the other for Pressing of Seamen for the defence of both England and Ireland; which they desired their lordships would speedily pass; without which, they conceive, Ireland cannot be saved." The lords returned for Answer, That they would take the two bills into consideration with all convenient speed.'

Complaint against lord Digby for aspiring to the Commons. Another message was brought up from the commons, to this purport, "That the commons find, by common fame, that it was said in the house of lords, by the lord Digby, and offered to be justified by him, 'That the house of commons have invaded the privileges of the house of lords, and the liberty of the subject;' and that he did likewise say, 'That this was no free parliament:' the commons therefore desired, that if these words were spoken by him, that right might be done to the commons of England against the lord Digby; and if no such words were spoken by him, that then a declaration be set forth by their lordships, to quit the commons of that scandal." The Answer returned was, "That the lords would take this message into consideration." In the mean time the words were referred to the committee for keeping a good correspondency between the two houses.

Complaint against several Gentlemen for appearing in Arms. The commons sent up another message to the lords, importing, "That they had received information of great disorders committed between this house and Charles Cross; that certain persons, in the habit of gentlemen, who are reported to be officers in the late English army, and are now in Whitehall, or some places thereabouts, backed and countenanced by a guard of Trained Bands, standing about Whitehall, do issue out in numbers and assault the king's subjects, going and returning, in the king's peace, to and from the parliament, offering to them, as they were con-

dily informed, no offence at all, and 20 or 30 of them sore wounded. This the commons conceive to be a true violation of the liberty of the subject, and an affront to the parliament, and will, in the end, strike an awe and terror into it, if not prevented by the wisdom of their lordships and the house of commons.—The commons are likewise informed, by a member of their own house, that he, going from the house to their lordships, through the churchyard, found there a guard of soldiers: enquiring of them by whose command they were there? they answered, by the lord abp. of York's. If this be to be suffered, to have guards set about the parliament, in this manner, to the terror and affray of the people, the commons submit it to their lordships judgment; and therefore, to prevent all inconveniences, the commons desire to have a Guard; otherwise there will follow certain mischief in the end; which the commons foreseeing, do give their lordships timely warning, that, if it happen, they may clear themselves to all the world. That there may still be free a parliament, he was commanded to desire their lordships, that, according to their own Propositions, and upon such conditions as the house of commons consented to, That their lordships would presently join with them in an humble Petition to his majesty, that the parliament may have a Guard; such a one as may be approved of by both houses, and to be commanded by the earl of Essex."—When this Message was delivered, a long debate ensued amongst the lords; and, at last, the question being put, Whether this house would join with the commons in an humble Petition to his majesty, to desire that the parliament may have a Guard, &c. it was in the message? it passed in the negative.

Protestation of the Bishops against all Proceedings during their forced Absence from the House. Dec. 30. The lord keeper signified to the house, That the king had commanded him to deliver a Petition to their lordships, which had been presented to him. The said Petition was ordered to be read, and was in these words:

To the KING's Most Excellent Majesty, and the LORDS and PEERS now assembled in parliament, The HUMBLE PETITION and PROTESTATION of all the Bishops and Prelates, now called by his majesty's writs to attend in parliament, and present about London and Westminster for that purpose.

"That whereas the petitioners are called up by several and respective writs, and under great penalties, to attend in parliament; and have a clear and indubitable right to vote in bill, and other matters whatsoever debateable in parliament, by the ancient customs, laws, and statutes of this realm; and ought to be protected by your majesty, quietly to attend and prosecute that great service; They humbly remonstrate and protest before God, your majesty, and the noble lords and peers now assembled in parliament, that, as they have an indubitable right to sit and vote in the house of lords, so are they (if they may be protected, from force and violence) most ready and willing to perform their duties accordingly; and that they do abominate all actions or opinions tending to Popery, and the maintenance thereof; as also all propension and inclination to any malignant party, or any other side or party whatsoever, to the which their own reasons and consciences shall not move them to adhere.—But whereas they have been, at several times, violently menaced, affronted, and assaulted, by multitudes of people, in their coming to perform their service in that hon. house; and lately chased away and put in danger of their lives; and can find no redress or protection, upon sundry complaints made to both houses, in these particulars: They likewise humbly protest, before your majesty and the noble house of peers, that, saving unto themselves all the rights and interests of sitting and voting in that house; at other times, they dare not sit or vote in the house of peers, until your majesty shall further secure them from all affronts, indignities and dangers, in the premises. Lastly, Whereas their fears are not built upon phantasies and conceits, but upon such grounds and objects as may well terrify men of good resolutions and much constancy, they do, in all duty and humility, protest, before your majesty, and the peers of that most hon. house of parliament, against all laws, orders, votes, resolutions, and determinations, as, in themselves, null, and of none effect; which, in their absence, since the 27th of this instant Dec. 1641, have already passed; as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass in that most hon. house, during the time of this their forced and violent absence from the said most hon. house: not denying, but, if their absenting of themselves were wilful and voluntary, that most noble house might proceed in all these premises; their absence, or this their Protestation, notwithstanding: and humbly beseeching your most excellent majesty, to command the clerk of the house of peers to enter this their Petition and Protestation amongst his records, they will ever pray God to bless and preserve, &c. Proceedings against the Protesting Bishops. This Petition being read, the lords sent a message to the commons, to desire a present conference by a committee of both houses, touching matters of dangerous consequence. A conference being held immediately, the lord keeper, in the name of the house of peers, declared, "That this Petition and Protestation of the 12 Bishops, containing matters of high and dangerous consequence, and such as the lords are very sensible of, and such as require a speedy and sudden resolution, it extending to the deep intrenching upon the fundamental privileges and being of parliaments; therefore the lords have thought fit, that this matter concerning the whole parliament, may be communicated to the commons, it being a thing of so great, so general a concernment."

The Bishops Petition being thus communicated to the house of commons, they came to a Resolution, to accuse those 12 Bishops of High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and being of parliaments. And Mr. Glynn was ordered to go to the lords, and, at their bar, in the name of all the commons of England, to accuse these 12 prelates of High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws of the realm and the very being of parliaments, manifested by preferring that Petition and Protestation; and to desire the lords, that they may be forthwith sequestered from parliament and put into safe custody; and that their lordships would appoint a speedy day for the commons to charge them, and they to answer; for that the commons were ready to make good their charge.—Hereupon it was ordered, "That the gentleman usher bring the said Bishops, so accused, before this house, that they may be committed to safe custody." In the mean time, a conference having been desired by the commons, concerning the Safety of the Kingdom and both houses of parliament, the lords went to the conference; and, being returned, the lord keeper reported it to the house to this effect:

He first repeated the former message from the commons, with their Reasons for desiring a Guard, to which the commons said they had yet no Answer. They now desired their lordships to take the following Reasons into consideration, as an addition to their former: "1. The insolent and traitorous Petition and Protestation of the Bishops preferred this day to their lordships; which the commons conceive they durst not to have done without some back to their design.* 2. They desire to have a Guard, because they hear the king hath a guard at Whitehall, as apprehending it fit; and the commons conceive, that those that are enemies to the king, are likewise enemies to

* Lord Clarendon observes, "That the indiscretion of these Bishops, at such a crisis, gave so great scandal and offence to all those who passionately desired to preserve their function, that they had no compassion or regard of their persons, or what became of them; inso-much as, in the whole debate in the house of commons, there was only one gentleman who spoke on their behalfs, and said, 'He did not believe they were guilty of High Treason, but that they were stark mad; and therefore desired they might be sent to Bedlam.' And Whitlocke says, "Divers of their adversaries were much pleased with this unadvised act of the Bishops, being, (as they wished) a way prepared by themselves for them to be set aside, and removed from the house of lords."

the parliament; and so vice versa: Therefore that house desired their lordships to consider of these things and give them an Answer, Whether they will join with the commons in a Petition to the king, or not." Upon this another debate arose in the lords, Whether that house would recede, upon these further Reasons, from the vote given last night: and this question being put, it again passed in the negative. Afterwards, both the Vote of last night and this, were ordered to be sent down to the commons, as an Answer to them about a Guard.

The lords being informed, that the Bishops, accused of High Treason, were at the door, they were severally called in; and, first,

The Archbishop of York, (Dr. John Williams) being brought to the bar, and kneeling there as a delinquent, was compaigned to stand up, when the lord keeper told him, "That the house of commons, in their name, and in the name of all the commons of England, had accused him and other Bishops with High Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws of this realm, and the being of parliament, by preferring their Petition and Protestation, this day, to that house." The said archbishop, at his request, having leave to speak, said, "He would not, at that time, make any demurrer to the Charge, as having never heard it before; but he desired their lordships would give him leave to do as he should be advised, when he came to his Answer;" and so he withdrew.

The Bishop of Durham (Dr. T. Moreton) was next brought to the bar in the same manner, who said, "That this was the greatest misery that ever befel him, and what he did, was not with any malicious or treasonable intent; but he, going by chance, to the abp. of York's house, about two days ago, he found some bishops there, and the Petition signed by many of them; and, being desired to subscribe the said Petition, he read it over, and took some exceptions to it; but he was drawn in by inducements, or rather seducements, and he did subscribe only to preserve his right of voting in parliament;" and, desiring their lordships to have pity upon him, being a man of great years, he withdrew.

The Bishop of Norwich (Dr. Jo. Hall) said, "This was the heaviest affliction ever came to him; and professed it was far from his thoughts to be guilty of an offence of so high a nature, and confessed he subscribed the Petition and Protestation; but desired the rest of his brethren, the bishops, that it might be very well considered before it was presented; but whether it was so he knew not."

* The following account is given by this bishop, in a piece of his beforementioned, intitled "Hard Measure," wherein, after reciting the tumults about the house of lords, and the resolution of the bishops to forbear any longer attendance on that account, he proceeds thus: "The abp. of York sent for us to his lodging at Westminster; lays before us the perilous

The Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield (Dr. Rob. Wright) said, 'He subscribed the Petition, but craved their lordships best construction of it, for he did it not with any traitorous intention, and submitted himself to the pleasure of the house.'

The Bishop of St. Asaph (Dr. John Owen) confessed 'He subscribed the Petition; but he did it for matter of form, because the rest of the bishops his brethren had done so: that thoughts of treason were far from his heart, and desired their lordships favour and compassion towards him.'

condition we were in; advises, for remedy, 'except we meant utterly to abandon our right, and to desert our station in parliament) to petition both his majesty and the parliament, that, since we were legally called by his majesty's writ to give our attendance in parliament, we might be secured in the performance of our duty and service, against those dangers that threatened us; and, withal, to protest against any such acts as should be made during the time of our forced absence, for which he assured us there were many precedents in former parliaments, and which if we did not, we should betray the trust committed to us by his majesty, and shamefully betray and abdicate the due right both of ourselves and successors. To this purpose, in our presence, he drew up the said Petition and Protestation, avowing it to be legal, just, and agreeable to all former proceedings, and, being fair written, sent it to our several lodgings for our hands, which we accordingly subscribed, intending yet to have had some further consultation concerning the delivering and whole carriage of it: but ere we could suppose it to be in any hand but his own, the first news we heard was, that there were messengers addressed to fetch it in to the parliament upon an accusation of High Treason. For whereas this paper was to have been delivered, first to his majesty's secretary, and, after perusal, by him to his majesty, and after from his majesty to the parliament, and for that purpose to the lord keeper, the lord Littleton, who was the Speaker of the house of peers: all these professed not to have perused it at all; but the said lord keeper, willing enough to take this advantage of ingratiating himself with the house of commons and the faction, to which he knew himself sufficiently obnoxious, finding what use might be made of it by prejudicate minds, reads the same openly in the house of lords; and, when he found some of the faction apprehensive enough of misconstruction, aggravate the matter as highly offensive, and of dangerous consequence; and thereupon, not without much heat and vehemence, and with an ill preface, it is sent down to the house of commons; where it was entertained heinously, Glynn, with a full mouth, crying it up for no less than an High Treason, and some comparing, yea preferring, it to the Powder Plot."

Piers) acknowledged, 'That he set his hand to the said Petition, without any ill intent, and desired of his brethren that it might be well considered before it was delivered; and that all the bishops had set their hands thereto.'

The Bishop of Hereford (Dr. John Coke) said, 'That when time was fitting he would make his humble Answer to the Charge; but desired to say nothing for the present.'

The Bishop of Ely (Dr. M. Wren) desired their lordships to excuse him now from speaking, lest he should do himself more hurt by that than by silence.

The Bishop of Oron (Dr. Rob. Skinner) owned, 'He signed, also; but his offence was through ignorance; and therein craved their lordships compassion.'

The Bishop of Gloucester (Dr. G. Goodman) said, 'That it did appear he was one of the last that subscribed; that it was not done with any traitorous intent; but through ignorance, and submitted himself humbly to the wisdom of the house.'

The Bishop of Peterborough (Dr. J. Warner) made the same confession as the former.

The Bishop of Landaff (Dr. M. Owen) said, 'That it was done through ignorance, and indiscretion, and that he had no design to overthrow the fundamental laws of the land; he desired he might not feel the weight of their lordships justice, but mercy, and that he might be bailed upon good security.'

After hearing all these arraignments, the lords ordered ten of the Bishops to be committed prisoners to the Tower; but the bishops of Durham and of Coventry and Litchfield were remitted to the custody of the black rod.*

The Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Walter Curle) being all this time in the house, it was moved, That it should be put to him to answer, whether he consents to or disclaims the said Petition, before he be allowed to sit and vote in the house. The said bishop answered, 'That he never knew any thing of the matter: 'hereupon the lords gave him leave to read the Petition; after which he said, 'He never read it before, and he did now utterly disclaim it.' With which answer the house was satisfied.

Mr Kowse's Speech against filling up 5 vacant Bishopricks.] The same day that the proceedings went thus vigorously on against the Bishops in the house of lords, the following speech was made in the commons by Mr Kowse, member for Truro, against filling up 5 Bishopricks, † at this time vacant:

* Bishop Hall says, "These two had this favour by reason of their great age; which though desired by a noble lord on his behalf, would not be yielded."

† These were Worcester, Lincoln, Exeter, Bristol, and Chichester. The first was vacant by the death of bp. Thornborough, and the others by the translation of bp. Williams to York, bp. Hall to Norwich, bp. Skinner to Oxford, and bp. Duppa to Sarum. The persons

‘*Mr. Speaker; * You may remember the report made about 5 weeks since, by Mr. Woodward, of an order from his majesty, sent out of Scotland, for drawing up of certain Congé d’Elire’s for the electing of 5 new Bishops, whereof two are made and consecrated, and that then I moved petitioning his majesty to stay the making of them (p. 921.); but other business, of greater consequence for the present, hindered my enlarging such reasons as I conceived of weight to stop the proceedings concerning them. And now, Mr. Speaker, under favour of this hon. house, I intend to give you some further ground of my opinion then, that it was not, neither is it yet convenient, as I, under favour, conceive, they should be made bishops.*—Mr. Speaker, you know the proceedings against those bishops, which have been great delinquents in this state, and that we have prosecuted them to an impeachment of high treason; which was a main ground of my opinion for the then averting that intended business of making these new bishops, till that great affair was brought to a period. And Mr. Speaker, I persuade myself, that there are as great delinquents, to their power, amongst the inferior clergy, as the bishops. I speak not with an intent you should conceive that I reflect anywise upon the persons of those that are elected or made; but that until the others that are impeached be proceeded against, either to their condemnation or otherwise, as by the parliament they shall be found guilty, the election of new ones may be a while procrastinated and delayed.—Mr. Speaker, we have, as occasion has served us, had many debates and arguments about the quite taking away of Bishops, and many divisions in the house have been concerning the same; and although voted for their continuance, yet the manner of their government is not determined: 1. Then, as I conceive it can neither be requisite nor convenient to make new bishops, till a certain form of their government be fully concluded and settled by the whole state of this kingdom. 2. If we should give way to the making of these bishops, great prejudice may follow before we can settle them in such a government as may agree most for the security and safety, both of this kingdom, and the fundamental points and principles of the doctrine of the church of England: for, notwithstanding our proceedings against nominated to these sees by the king were, Dr. Prideaux, the king’s professor of Divinity in Oxford; Dr. Winniffe, dean of St. Paul’s; Dr. Brownerig, master of Catharine-Hall, in Cambridge; Dr. Westfield, of Great St. Bartholomew’s, London; and Dr. Henry King, Dean of Lichfield. Of these lord Clarendon says, “They were all of great eminency in the church; frequent preachers; and not a man to whom the faults of the then governing clergy were imputed, or against whom the least objection could be made.”

delinquents, both in church and state, how many petitions and complaints have we daily received against pernicious and dangerous tenets in doctrine, besides scandalous and slanderous aspersions delivered by divers of the clergy in their sermons, and otherwise, since the sitting of this present parliament; which, out of doubt, are favoured, nay animated and encouraged by the bishops; which doth much trouble many people, and is a great cause of their continuance in evil, and obstinate maliciousness of a great many of good quality and estimation? And then for new bishops to be made, although perchance men of great learning and judgment, before the parliament hath fully agreed on the manner of their government, and proceedings to prosecute and punish such delinquents as have been perverse Instruments in the church, to withdraw the affections of many, otherwise perhaps well-affected, from the right settling of true religion, with such discipline congruent thereunto, that should be the best means to procure the everlasting peace of king and people? The inconveniencies and dangerous consequences that may happen hereupon, may yet be worse than the former we have had too much experience of. 3. I conceive by making of these bishops, when they shall be admitted to sit in the house of lords, their votes there, although voted down in this house, yet not agreed unto by the lords, may be a great hinderance in our proceedings to settle such a form of government in religion, as shall, by the parliament, be thought requisite; all of them contriving to continue their old form and power of government. And their votes, you know, Mr. Speaker, have prevailed much in that house, many of the lords (I could wish not so many) being much inclined towards them, and too willing to comply with them in their designs; but I hope, by God’s blessing, and our endeavours, we shall in time, by degrees, remove such impediments, both in church and state, as hinder our happy proceedings in redressing such things that are amiss in the same. 4. I conceive the nonconcurrence among ourselves concerning their consecration, to be of weight for the staying the making of these bishops; which I desire may not be conclusive, till the other things before-mentioned, for the settlement of religion and punishment of delinquents be agreed unto; that then such as shall be, by this wise council of state, thought fit to bear any office in the church in places of government, may be, by the same, tried and proved in their learning, judgment, and the holiness of their lives and conversations; that so having not only able, but godly men set in places of authority, we may expect the well government of the inferior clergy.—I desire, Mr. Speaker, not to be misconceived in this my speech, concerning the stay of making these bishops, yet unconsecrated. I speak not against their incapableness or unworthiness of such places of government, not doubting but that they are as able and fit for the same as any other; but the intent of my speech and humble motion is,

That only, for the reasons before specified, they may not yet be made and consecrated, till such time as all things for the well government of the church be fully concluded and settled, which God grant; that having reformed all disorders, both in church and state, we may every one sit securely under his own vine and fig-tree, and reap and enjoy the fruit of his own labour.

The Commons petition the King for a Guard.] Dec. 31. The commons finding that the lords would not join with them, in petitioning the king for a Guard, this day resolved to do it by themselves: accordingly seven of that body, of which Mr. Hollis was to be their Speaker, were ordered to attend his majesty, and deliver to him the following message:

"Most gracious sovereign; We are sent by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, your faithful and loyal subjects, who are ready to lay down their lives and fortunes, to spend the last drop of their blood, to maintain your crown and royal person in greatness and glory; and do, by us, cast themselves down before your royal feet, to present unto your majesty our humble desires upon their great apprehensions and just fears of mischievous designs and practices to ruin and destroy them.—There have been several attempts, heretofore, to bring distraction upon their whole body at once, and threats and menaces against particular persons: there is a malignant party, bitterly inveterate against them, daily gathering strength and confidence, and now come to such height, as they have given some the boldness to embroil their hands in the blood of your subjects, in the face of the doors of the parliament, and at your majesty's own gates; and have given out insolent and menacing speeches against the parliament itself. This causeth great distractions amongst the people in general, and such fear and apprehension in the commons, that, they receive, they cannot, with the safety of their persons, (upon which the safety and peace of the whole kingdom doth now depend) sit any longer unarmed and unguarded as they are: they have therefore their recourse unto your majesty, most humbly beseeching you, that it may stand with your good liking, if they provide for their own safety; which the very law of nature and reason doth allow unto them. It is their humble desire, that they may have a guard out of the City of London, commanded by the earl of Essex, lord chamberlain of your majesty's household, of whose fidelity to your majesty and the common-wealth, they have had long experience. By this your majesty's grace and favour, you will remove their fears, fill them with comfort and assurance, and enable them to serve your majesty in such a way, as will render your majesty and your government happy and glorious. And to this they do most humbly desire your majesty's gracious and speedy Answer, because their safety and the safety of the whole kingdom, depends upon it, and will not admit of any delay."

The substance of this Message being first uttered by word of mouth, the king desired to have it in writing, which was delivered to his majesty accordingly: but the commons receiving no present Answer, ordered that halberds should be provided, and brought into the house, for their own better security; which was done, and the said halberds stood in the house for a considerable time afterwards.

Mr. Pym's Speech, at a conference, against Lord Digby.] Dec. 31. At a conference this day with the lords, about an Information the commons had received of the lord Digby's having, in a speech, reflected on their proceedings,

Mr. Pym spoke as follows*. "My Lords, The knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, now assembled in parliament, have commanded me to present to your lordships this Information which they have received against the right hon. George lord Digby, of such dangerous consequence, that, if not prevented, evil and troublesome events may ensue, to the great hazarding the peace of this kingdom, and a great hinderance of the happy proceedings of this parliament. My lords, I humbly crave your patience to declare to your lordships what I am commanded concerning the said Information, which is, That he, the said lord Digby, should give forth report, upon reading the late Petition and Protestation of the 12 Bishops, 'That the present parliament was a forced one; and that the Acts, Votes, and Laws that should be enacted therein, without the votes and assents of the bishops, are void and of none effect, and not binding to the subject.' My lords, this report is of great danger to the state, it proved against the said lord, in these three respects, 1. It is a great breach of the rights and privileges of parliament. 2. It intrencheth much on the prerogative of the king, and abridges his royal power. 3. It is the first step to bring into this state an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government.—First, my lords, it is a Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, for these reasons: 1. It is against the free votes of parliamentary proceedings; which ought to be reserved and unquestionable during the free sitting thereof. 2. It is against the late act of parliament, in that case made and provided, for not adjourning or abrupt breaking up of the same. This act, my lords, was freely voted by both houses; freely and willingly passed by his majesty, without any force or compulsory means used by any, or private working of any of the members of either houses to induce his majesty to do the same: an act voted as well by the said lord; as the rest of this hon. house. This report, therefore, of his must needs be against his knowledge and former free consent in passing that act. 3. One privilege of parliament, and that is one of the greatest, is to accuse and freely proceed to the punishment of delinquents that have caused the troubles in this state, both in church and common-wealth. This report is against this privilege; it opposes altogether our proceedings against the Bishops, accused as the greatest delinquents, both in church and state: for, my lords, if the parliament is forced in the absence of the bishops, how may then the parliament proceed lawfully against them? If the bishops sit and have their votes, although delinquents, in parliament, how can we proceed, I beseech you, against their votes? Therefore, under favour, I conclude this report of the said lord is against this privilege of parliament: 4. To redress the grievances of the common-wealth, is a privilege of parliament. This report is against this privilege. Now, I pray you, my lords, can our grievances be redressed, when the oppressions, injustice, and vexatious troubling of his majesty's loyal subjects, by the Bishops, may not be called in question, nor the misdoers therein prosecuted and punished for the same? 5. This report is against divers acts of parliament of this kingdom, that have been made without the voice of bishops in parliament, as is on record in the Parliament Rolls.—Secondly, my lords, this report intrencheth on the Royal Power, and Prerogative of the king, and that in two respects: 1. His royal prerogative, in making and enacting laws by parliament; it resting only in his power, to pass or refuse the votes of parliament. My lords, the king of this realm has the greatest prerogative (to require the counsel and assistance of the whole state, upon any occasion whatsoever, when it pleaseth him) of any prince in the world, except the king of France: and, under favour, my lords, I conceive a parliament cannot be termed forced, when it is freely called, and willingly continued by the king. I conceive, my lords, a forced parliament is, when, against the free consent of the king and his lords, without lawful calling by writ, men assemble themselves; and, by force of arms, sit in council and enact laws, not tending to the welfare of the kingdom. The parliament holden in the 14th of Edw. 2. was a forced parliament; the barons coming thither with horse and arms, and compelling the king to pass what they thought proper to have enacted. 2. My lords, this report entrencheth on the royal power of the king in making of laws; for, as before I have touched, parliaments have, without bishops, made and enacted laws. By this supposition, my lords, that laws, made without bishops, are void; bishops, be they never so vile and disaffected to the tranquillity and security of the state, yet must have votes in rectifying and setting in order such things as are amiss in the same, as well by their own procuring as others: which is not then likely to take any good effect: nay, it is too apparent they have been the greatest opposers of our proceedings in this parliament, and the chief cause why no more is done by the same.—Thirdly, this report is the first step to bring in an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government; and that, under favour, for these reasons: 1. Free parliaments are the securest and safest government that ever could be found for this nation; and that in respect of the power and wisdom thereof. It is upholden, defended, and preserved by the whole body of the kingdom; therefore powerful: The members thereof are well elected, one out of ten thousand, by the whole state; therefore esteemed wise: then to oppose the proceedings, and deny the government thereof, is to change the same: and, if changed to another form, (none being so secure so powerful, and so wise) it must needs be arbitrary, and so tyrannical. 2. If no law can be binding to the subject, but such as is voted and assented to by the bishops, then none can be expected but such as are destructive to the state; their affections being altogether averted from free parliamentary proceedings, and their designs only agitated the opposing the government thereof; and cannot but daily fear the utter confusion of the same thereby.—Now, my lords, having failed the command of the commons, in speaking any thing of this Information, I am to desire your lordships, in their name, that the said Gentleman Digby may answer the said Information, otherwise be proceeded against as the parliament shall think fit.”—Whether any complaint passed against the lord Digby, on this occasion does not appear by the Journals of either house: but the resentment of the commons against him will appear, fully, in the sequel.

Thus ends the Calendar Year 1641; but the Journals of both Houses, with the State Books, continuing it to March 25, we shall follow that course, as we have hitherto done throughout this History.

The King's Answer to the Commons' Petition for a Guard.] Jan. 3. The commons received from the king the following Answer to their last Petition for a Guard:

“We have taken the last Message from you, touching your desire of a Guard, into serious consideration; and truly, with grief of heart, that (after a whole year's sitting of parliament, wherein you have obtained things, for the happiness and security of yourselves, and the rest of our subjects, as none can equal) instead of reaping, in peace and tranquillity, the fruits of your labours, and our grace and affection to our people, should find jealousies, distrusts, and fears so prevalent among you, as to induce you to declare them unto us, in so high a manner as you have done at this time. We are ignorant of the grounds of your apprehensions; but this we do protest before Almighty God (to whom we must be accountable for that which he hath intrusted to our care and protection) that had we any knowledge or design of the least design in any, of violence, either formerly or at this time, against you, we would pursue them to condign punishment, with the same severity and detestation, that we now do the greatest attempt upon our crown. We know the duty of that place where God has set us, the protection we owe to all our subjects, and most particularly to you, and our service by our writs; and we do engage to you solemnly the word of a king, that the curity of all, and every one of you from violence, is, and shall ever be as much our care, the preservation of us and our children. And, if this general assurance shall not suffice to remove your apprehensions, we will command such a Guard to wait upon you as we will be responsible for to him, who hath intrusted us with the protection and safety of our subjects."

Impeachment of Lord Kimbolton and five members of the House of Commons, of High treason.*] This day the lord keeper told the use of lords, That he was commanded by the king to let them know, his majesty had sent commands to his attorney general, to acquaint their lordships with some particulars in him. Hereupon the said Attorney, standing up at the clerk's table, said, "That the king had commanded him to tell their lordships, that great and treasonable designs and practices against him and the state had come to his majesty's knowledge; for which the king had given him command to accuse, and did accuse Six Persons of High Treason, and other high Misdemeanours, by delivery of Articles in writing which he had in his hand, which he received from his majesty, and he commanded to desire their lordships to read it read:" which Articles were read, in c verba :

ARTICLES OF HIGH TREASON, and other high MISDEMEANOURS, against the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Denzill Hollis, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode :

I. "That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of this kingdom, to deprive the king of regal power, and to place in the subjects arbitrary and tyrannical power, over the liberties, and estates of his majesty's subjects. II. That they have traiterously endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his name odious to them. III. That they have endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his commands, and to side with them in their traiterous designs. IV. That they have traiterously invited and engaged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England. V. That they have traiterously endeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of parliaments. VI. That, for the completing of their traiterous designs, they have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traiterous designs; and, to that end, have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament. VII. That they have traiterously conspired to levy, and actually have levied, war against the king."

Then Mr. Attorney said, "That he was further charged to desire on his majesty's behalf, 1. That a select committee, under a command of secrecy, may be appointed to take the examination of such witnesses as the king will produce in this business, as formerly hath been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this house. 2. Liberty to add and alter, if there should be cause. 3. That their lordships would take care for the securing of the persons, as, in justice, there should be cause."

Mr. Rushworth says, that "lord Kimbolton, being present in the house, stood up and offered to obey whatever the lords should order; but prayed that, as he had a public charge, he might have a public clearing." Accordingly the lord steward, the lord chamberlain, earls of Bath, Southampton, Warwick, Bristol, and Holland, with the assistance of Mr. Serj. Whitfield and Mr. Serj. Glanville, were appointed a committee to consider precedents and records, touching the regularity of this accusation; whether there had ever been any such proceedings before in this house, and whether such an accusation may be brought by Mr. Attorney, into this house, against a peer.—Lord Clarendon adds, "The house of peers was somewhat appalled at this alarm; but took time to consider of it till the next day, that they might see how their masters the commons would behave themselves; the lord Kimbolton being present in the house, and making great professions of his innocence, and no lord being so hardy as to press for his commitment on the behalf of the king." This general silence was the more remarkable, since the noble historian assures us, "That the lord Digby had promised the king to move the house for the commitment of lord Kimbolton, as soon as the attorney general should have accused him, which, if he had done, would probably have raised a very hot dispute in the house, where many would have joined him. On the contrary he seemed the most surprized and perplexed with the attorney's Impeachment; and sitting at that time next the lord Kimbolton, with whom he pretended to live with much friendship, he whispered him in the ear with some commotion, (as he had a rare talent at dissimulation) 'That the king was very mischievously advised; and that it should go very hard, but he would know whence that counsel proceeded; in order to which, and to prevent further mischief, he would go immediately to his majesty;' and so went out of the house: whereas he was the only person who gave the counsel, named the persons, particularly the lord Kimbolton, (against whom less could be said than against many others, and who was more generally beloved) and undertook to prove that the said lord Kimbolton told the rabble, when they were about the parliament house, that they should go to Whitehall."

The Commons desire a Conference for the Vindication of their Privileges.] After some other business had been done in the house of lords; a message was brought up, from the commons to desire the lords would be pleased to sit a while, for they should have occasion to confer with their lordships about a Breach of Privilege. This being granted, a conference was held, between committees of both houses; the Report of which was made by the Lord Keeper to this effect:

"That the house of commons apprehended the parliament to be the great council and the representative body of the kingdom, and both houses are but one body of the realm; the privileges are as the walls, or sinews, of the parliament, which being cut, distraction will speedily follow: That both houses have lately taken a Protestation for the maintenance of their privileges, persons, and goods, a high breach whereof is at this instant; for divers members of the house of commons have their persons assaulted and laid in wait for; their chambers, studies, and trunks have been ransacked and sealed up; as Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pym, and Mr. Hampden; besides, the house of commons understand that there are Guards of Soldiers set so near the parliament houses as Whitehall; which being done without consent of parliament, they hold it as a Breach of Privilege: They therefore desire their lordships would join with them in an humble request to the king, that the Guards at Whitehall may be removed; and that the parliament may have such a guard as shall be approved on by the king and both houses of parliament. Also the house of commons desire their lordships to join with them in vindicating the Breaches of their Privileges; and, if a guard cannot be obtained, that they desire their lordships to take it into consideration to adjourn to another place where they may sit in security."

The lords taking the abovesaid conference into consideration, ordered, "That all the chambers, studies, and trunks, that were sealed or locked, belonging to Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, or to any member of parliament, shall be forthwith unsealed and unlocked, and left to their free use and disposal." Ordered, also, "That this house will join with the house of commons, in an humble petition to the king for a Guard, in the same manner as they desired, and that it shall continue as long as the king and both houses shall think fit."

Jan. 4. This joint Petition of both houses having been presented to the king, his majesty said, "That he would send an Answer to it very speedily." But the commons being very uneasy, they this day renewed their desires to the lords, to have it done; for this reason, "Because they had received information that divers gentlemen had made their addresses to the gentlemen of the Inns of Court, and have dealt with them to come armed to Whitehall, when they shall be required; but they had not condescended thereto. They likewise said they had met with a scandalous Paper, as was published abroad, to the injury of some members of both houses, which contained Articles of High Treason and High Misdemeanors, against the lord Kimbolton, a member of that house and others, members of the house of commons, which they desired their lordships to join with them in finding out the authors of, and bring them to condign punishment, for so high a breach of the privileges of parliament." Nothing was this day resolved on by the lords.

The King sends the Serjeant at Arms to the Commons, to arrest the 5 accused Members. The day before, the king had sent Mr. Francis, serjeant at arms, to the house of commons, where, being admitted without his mace, delivered this message;

"I am commanded by the king's majesty master, upon my allegiance, that I shall come and repair to the house of commons, where Mr. Speaker is; and there to require Mr. Speaker five gentlemen, members of the house of commons; and that these gentlemen being delivered, I am commanded to name them, in his majesty's name, of High Treason. Their names are, Mr. Hollis, sir A. Hampden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode."

The commons immediately ordered the cellor of the exchequer, lord Falkland, sir Philip Stapleton, and sir John Hotham, to attend his majesty; and acquaint him, "That this Message was a matter of great consequence, as it concerned the privilege of parliament, and that the privileges of all the commons of England. That this house will take it into serious consideration, and will attend his majesty, with Answer in all humility and duty, and with much speed as the greatness of the business will permit: And that, in the mean time, the house will take care that those gentlemen mentioned in the message, shall be ready to answer any legal charge laid against them."

The Speaker did then, by command of the house, enjoin those five members, particularly one by one, to give their attendance at the house, de die in diem, until further Order. And, in the afternoon of the 4th, the Memorandum entered, That all the five members, aforementioned, did appear in the house according to yesterday's injunction.

Sir John Hotham was ordered to go to the lords to desire a free conference concerning the Safety of the Kingdom and Parliament; brought Answer back, That the lords would give a present meeting as was desired.—A message from the lords came down to the commons to acquaint them, "That, according to the agreement between both houses last night, the king sent the duke of Richmond and the lord Berkeley to his majesty, concerning a Conference; and that the king's Answer was, "That because of some weighty affairs that were before him, he could not give a present Answer."

did believe that, either to day or to-morrow, he should send it."

Some members of the commons having been told by that house, to inquire into the truth of a report, That the gentlemen of the Inns of art came to Whitehall, armed; Mr. Brown, who was sent to Lincoln's Inn, said, "That gentlemen told him, they went to court, upon a general report that his majesty's son was in danger *****"

The King comes in person to the House of Commons and demands the 5 Impeached Members.

his is all that is entered in the Journals of Commons relating to this extraordinary air. Probably the great confusion the house in, at this juncture, broke off all punctures in the clerk, and prevented any further about it there: But Mr. Rushworth, then k-assistant to the house, is very explicit in printed Collections: which, to make the ter as clear as possible, we shall give in his words.

He begins with telling us, "That when the accused members came this day, after tier, into the house, they were no sooner in their places, but the house was informed one captain Langrish, lately an officer in a in France, that he came from among the ers and soldiers at Whitehall; and understanding by them that his majesty was coming a guard of military men, commanders and iers, to the house of commons, he passed hem, with some difficulty, to get to the house re them, and sent in word how near the officers and soldiers were come; where- a certain member of the house* having private intimation from the countess of lisle, sister to the earl of Northumberland, endeavours would be used this day to ap- pend the five members, the house required five members to depart the house forthwith, be end to avoid combustion in the house, he said soldiers should use violence to pull of them out. To which command of the se four of the said members yielded ready ience; but Mr. Strode was obstinate, till Walter Earle, his antient acquaintance, ed him out by force, the king being at that : entering into the New Palace-yard, in rminster-Hall, the commanders, reforma- s, &c. that attended him, made a lane on sides the hall, through which his majesty ed and came up the stairs to the house of mons, and stood before the guard of pen- ers and halberters, who also attended the king's person; and the door of the house of commons being thrown open, his majesty entered the house, and as he passed up towards the chair, he cast his eye on the right hand, near the bar of the house, where Mr. Pym used to sit; but his majesty not seeing him there, knowing him well, went up to the chair, and said, "By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your chair a little?" Whereupon the Speaker came out of the chair, and his majesty stepped up into it. After he had stood in the chair a while, he cast his eye upon the members as they stood up uncovered, but could not discern any of the five members to be there; nor, indeed, were they easy to be discerned, had they been there, among so many bare faces all standing up together. Then his majesty made this speech:

"Gentlemen, I am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you. Yesterday I sent a serjeant at arms upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some that by my command, were accused of high treason, whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message. And I must declare unto you here, that, albeit, no king that ever was in England shall be more-careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the uttermost of his power, than I shall be; yet you must know, that in cases of treason no person hath a privilege; and therefore I am come to know if any of these persons that were accused are here: for I must tell you, gentlemen, that so long as these persons that I have accused, for no slight crime, but for treason, are here, I cannot expect that this house will be in the right way that I do heartily wish it; therefore I am come to tell you, that I must have them wheresoever I find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you, that you shall send them unto me as soon as they return hither. But I assure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other.—And now, since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, That whatsoever I have done in favour, and to the good of my subjects, I do mean to maintain it. I will trouble you no more, but tell you, I do expect, as soon as they come to the house, you will send them to me; otherwise I must take my own course to find them."

When the king was looking about the house, the Speaker standing below, by the chair, his majesty asked him, Whether any of these persons were in the house? Whether he saw any of them? and where they were? To which the Speaker, falling on his knee, thus answered:

"May it please your majesty; I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here; and humbly beg your majesty's pardon, that I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me."

The king, having concluded his speech, went out of the house again, which was in great disorder, and many members cried out aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege! Privilege! and forthwith adjourned till the next day at one o'clock.—The same evening his majesty sent James Maxwell, usher of the house of peers, to the commons, to require Mr. Rushworth, the clerk-assistant, whom his majesty had observed to take his speech in characters, at the table in the house, to come to his majesty; and when Maxwell brought him to the king, his majesty commanded him to give him a copy of his speech in the house. Mr. Rushworth humbly besought his majesty, hoping for an excuse, to call to mind how Mr. Francis Nevil, a Yorkshire member, of the house of commons, was committed to the Tower, but for telling his majesty what words were spoken in the house by Mr. Henry Bel-lasis, son to the lord Faulconbridge; to which his majesty smartly replied, 'I do not ask you to tell me what was said by any member of the house, but what I said myself.' Whereupon he readily gave obedience to his majesty's command, and in his majesty's presence, in the room called the Jewel-House, he transcribed his majesty's speech out of his characters, his majesty staying in the room all the while; and then and there presented the same to the king, which his majesty was pleased to command to be sent speedily to the press, and the next morning it came forth in print.*

* The following very curious account of this transaction is transcribed from some minutes, taken at the time, by sir Edmund Verney, knight marshal, who afterwards bore the king's standard at the battle of Edgehill, and was killed in that action:—"On Tuesday, the 4th January, 1641, when the house met after their adjournment, till one o'clock, it was moved, (considering there was an intention to take the five Members by force) to avoid all tumult, "That they be commanded to absent themselves," but entered no orders for it, and then the five gentlemen went out of the house: a little after the king came with all his guards, and all his pensioners, and 2 or 300 soldiers and gentlemen. He commanded all the soldiers to stay in the Hall, and sent us word, he was at the door. The Speaker was commanded to sit still, with the mace lying before him; then the king came to the door and took the Palsgrave in with him, and commanded all that came with him, upon their lives, not to come in; so the doors were kept open, and the earl of Roxborough stood within the door, leaning upon it. Then the king came upwards towards the Chair with his hat off, and the Speaker stepped out to meet him; when the king stepped up to his place, and stood upon the step, but sat not down in the Chair. Then he said, "He expected obedience to his message of yesterday, and not an answer." On the Speaker's saying, "That he had neither eyes or tongue to see or say any thing but what the house commanded him." The king said, "He

The Commons declare the King's Breach of Privilege.] Jan. 5. The court met again; when the door being ordered locked, the key brought up, the outward way cleared of all persons, except servants to members of the house; and also that some of the servants should be sent forth to see what numbers of people are repairing towards Westminster, and to bring notice to the house; a committee was named to consider of some way vindicating the Privileges of Parliament, for providing for the safety of both kingdoms and to present it to the house with all speed. A debate then arose, whether this house should be adjourned to Tuesday next, Jan. 11. a committee be appointed to sit in Guildhall, London, during that time? The question put, and on a division of the house, there appeared to be 170 members for it, and 86 against it.—The house then agreed upon a Declaration, to be forthwith printed and published concerning the late Breach of Privilege; which was done in these words:

"Whereas his majesty, in his royal presence yesterday, being the 4th day of January, did come to the house of commons, attended with a great multitude of men, armed in a like manner, with halberds, swords, and pikes, who came up to the very door of this house, placed themselves there, and in other places passages near to the house, to the great and disturbance of the members thereof, sitting, and, according to their duty, in a peaceable and orderly manner, treading of the affairs of both the kingdoms of England and Ireland; and his maj. having placed himself in the Speaker's chair, did demand the presence of divers members of this house to be delivered unto him: It is this day declared by the house of commons, That the same is a high Breach of the rights and privilege of parliament, and consistent with the liberties and franchises thereof; and therefore this house doth command they cannot, with the safety of their own persons, or the indemnity of the rights and privileges of parliament, sit here any longer, without a full vindication of so high a breach, and a sufficient guard wherein they may confer for which both houses jointly, and this house by itself, have been humble suitors to his majesty, and cannot as yet obtain.—Notwithstanding which, this house, being very sensible thought his own eyes as good as his, but that the birds were flown; but he expected that the house would send them to him, for their trespass was foul, and such a one as we should all like him to discover;" and so went out, putting his hat till he came to the door. Upon this the house resolved to adjourn immediately to-morrow, at one o'clock, and consider what was to be done.—These minutes, taken at the time, in pencil, were found among the papers of the late earl Verney, written by his ancestor, sir Edmund Verney; and though at so distant a period, were plain enough to be legible. Hatsell's Precedents, Vol. IV. p. 106.

the great trust reposed in them, and, especially at this time, of the manifold distractions this kingdom, and the lamentable and distressed condition of the kingdom of Ireland, by order, That the house shall be adjourned on Tuesday next at one of the clock; and that a committee, to be named by this house, all that will come to have voices, shall sit at the Guildhall in the City of London, to-morrow at 9 of the clock, and shall have power to consider and resolve of all things that concern the good and safety of the city of Ireland; and particularly, how our privileges may be vindicated, and our persons secured, and to consider of the affairs, and relief of Ireland; and shall have power to advise and consult with any person or persons, touching premises, and shall have power to send for files, witnesses, papers, and records.—And it is further ordered, That the committee for the Affairs shall meet at the Guildhall afore-mentioned, at what time they shall think fit; and shall do, touching the affairs of Ireland, according to the power formerly given them by the house; and that both the said committees report the results of their considerations to the house.

Mr. Fiennes was sent up to the lords, to acquaint their lordships with the reasons why the commons adjourned till Tuesday next, and had a committee to act at Guildhall; which was much the same as those expressed in the former declaration. Adding, that they still desired their lordships to move his majesty for a sufficient Guard about the parliament, both houses might approve of. The lords returned for Answer to this last affair, That they had already sent to the king about it, and his majesty's Answer was, That he would do it speedily; but their lordships would renew it soon. The lords ordered also, That the report of the committee appointed to consider of the accusation the attorney general had brought in, the lord Kimbolton and the 5 members of the lower house, should be considered of; and that all the capital proceedings in parliament be searched into on this occasion.

Speeches of Mr. Pym, sir A. Haslerig, and Mr. Strode, in Answer to the King's Articles against them. The following Speeches were made by Mr. Pym, sir A. Haslerig, and Mr. Strode, in vindication of themselves against the Articles of High Treason, exhibited by sir Edward Herbert, the king's attorney general. In Dr. Johnson's Collections there is also a speech of Mr. Hampden's; but this latter, being deemed repetitious, we shall omit. We do not find that Mr. Hollis made any Speech upon this occasion.

Mr. Pym spoke as follows: *—Mr. Speaker, These Articles of High Treason, exhibited against his majesty against me, and the other gentlemen in the accusation charged with the same, are of great consequence, and much dangerous to the state. The Articles in themselves, if proved, are, according to the laws of the land, high treason. 1. To endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws of the land, is, by this present parliament, in the earl of Strafford's case, adjudged high treason. 2. To endeavour to introduce into this kingdom an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government, is likewise voted high treason. 3. To raise an Army to compel the parliament to make and enact laws, without their free votes and willing proceedings in the same, is high treason. 4. To invite a foreign force to invade this land, to favour our designs agitated against the king and state, is high treason. 5. To animate and encourage riotous assemblies and tumults about the parliament, to compel the king to assent to votes of the house, is treason. 6. To cast aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious unto them, is treason. 7. To endeavour to draw his majesty's army into disobedience, and to side with us in our designs, if against the king, is treason.—I desire, Mr. Speaker, the favour of this house to clear myself, concerning this charge; I shall only parallel and similitize my actions, since the sitting of this parliament, with these Articles.—

1. Mr. Speaker, if to vote with the parliament, as a member of the house, wherein all our votes ought to be free, (it being one of the greatest privileges thereof to have our debates, disputes, and arguments in the same unquestionable) be to endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws; then am I guilty of the first Article. 2. If to agree and consent with the whole state of the kingdom, by vote, to ordain, and make laws for the good government of his majesty's subjects, in peace and dutiful obedience to their lawful sovereign, be to introduce any arbitrary and tyrannical form of government in the state; then am I guilty of this Article. 3. If to consent, by vote with the parliament to raise a guard or trained band, to secure and defend the persons of the members thereof, being inviolable and beset with many dangers in the absence of the king; and, by vote with the house, in willing obedience to the royal command of his sacred majesty, at his return, be actually to levy arms against the king; then am I guilty of this Article. 4. If to join with the parliament of England, by free vote, to crave brotherly assistance from Scotland, (kingdoms both under obedience to one sovereign, both his loyal subjects) to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, which lies gasping every day in danger to be lost from his majesty's subjection, be to invite and encourage foreign power to invade this kingdom; then am I guilty of high treason. 5. If to agree with the greatest and wisest council of state, to suppress unlawful tumults and riotous assemblies; to agree with the house, by vote, to all orders, edicts, and declarations for their repelling, be to raise and countenance them in their unlawful actions; then am I guilty of this Article. 6. If, by free vote, to join with the parliament in publishing of a Remonstrance; in setting forth Declarations against delinquents in the state; against incendiaries between his majesty and his kingdom; against ill counsellors, which labour to avert his majesty's affection from parliaments; against those ill-affected Bishops that have innovated our religion, oppressing painful, learned, and godly ministers, with vexatious suits and molestations in their unjust courts; by cruel sentences of pillory and cutting off their ears; by great fines, banishments, and perpetual imprisonment; if this, Mr. Speaker, be to cast aspersions upon his maj. and his government, and to alienate the hearts of his loyal subjects, good protestants and well-affected in religion, from their due obedience to his royal maj.; then am I guilty of this Article. 7. If to consent, by vote with the parliament, to put forth Proclamations, or to send Declarations to his majesty's army, to animate and encourage the same to his loyal obedience; to give so many Subsidies, and raise so many great sums of money, willingly, for their keeping on foot to serve his majesty upon his royal command, on any occasion; to apprehend and attach, as delinquents, such persons in the same as are disaffected both to his sacred person, his crown and dignity, to his wise and great council of parliament; to the true and orthodox doctrine of the church of England, and the true religion, grounded on the doctrine of Christ himself, and established and confirmed by many acts of parliament in the reigns of Hen. 8. Edw. 6. Eliz. and king James, of blessed memory: If this be to draw his majesty's army into disobedience, and side with us in our designs; then am I guilty of this Article.—Now, Mr. Speaker, having given you a touch concerning these Articles, comparing them with my actions ever since I had the honour to sit in this house as a member thereof, I humbly crave your consideration and favourable judgment of them; not doubting, they being weighed in the even scales of your wisdoms, I shall be found innocent and clear from these crimes laid to my charge. I humbly crave your further patience, to speak somewhat concerning the exhibiting of this charge; which is to offer to your consideration these Questions, viz. 1. Whether to exhibit Articles of High Treason by his majesty's own hands in this house, agrees with the Rights and Privileges thereof? 2. Whether for a Guard armed to come into the parliament, to accuse any of the members thereof, be not a Breach of the Privilege of Parliament? 3. Whether any of the members of parliament, being so accused, may be committed upon such accusation, without the whole consent thereof? 4. Whether a parliament hath not privilege to bail any member so accused? 5. Whether if any of the members of a parliament so charged, and by the house discharged, without release from his majesty, may still sit in the house as members of the same? * And thus, Mr. Speaker,

* We do not find, by the Journals, that the commons came to any formal Resolution on this or any of the foregoing questions: They

I humbly crave pardon for my presumption in so far troubling this hon. house, desiring the favourable consideration of all my actions; and that I may have such trial as to this wise council shall seem meet, cheerfully submitting myself and actions to the righteous judgment of the same.

Sir Arthur Haslerig spoke as follows to Mr. Speaker; This misfortune of mine seem to me, at the first, exceeding strange; not in respect of the crimes laid to my charge, but most of all having thereby incurred not only the disfavour but ireful displeasure of his majesty. For the first, knowing the innocence and integrity of my heart, that it is free from any such crime, either in thought, word, deed, against either my gracious sovereign, my native country, I shall the more easily bear the burden of the Charge; but to groan under the burden of a most pious and wise displeasure, wounds me sore.—Mr. Speaker, I humbly desire so much favour of this house, to speak something of my innocence in all these crimes I am charged with. In this house, can, I hope, witness for me the nature of my carriage and disposition in any debates or arguments wherein I have been one. If nothing hath proceeded from me that may come, any ways, within the compass of treason, In all disputes and conclusions of any matter by vote of the house, my vote hath commonly agreed with the major part; then I hope my vote in parliament, being free, cannot be treason.—The Articles, exhibited against me and the other gentlemen, are of a most dangerous and pernicious consequence; if I should be found guilty of them; which I defend, I would to God those persons, who have incensed his maj. against us, which I conceive who they are, were as free from such thoughts and words, nay actions, within the limits of treason, as I hope we shall prove ourselves, by God's blessing.—Mr. Speaker, I alleged we have endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws of this land, abridge the power, and deny his royal prerogative. I beseech you, to speak concerning this Article. There are not, as I conceive, two forms of government in this kingdom; there is but one form of government; one sort of fundamental laws; that is, the common laws of this land, and acts, statutes, and ordinances of parliament. These depend and hang one upon another, so seem to have thought it unnecessary; it appears from those authorities, that Mr. Strode, and Mr. Hollis were of a committee (inter alios) upon a bill 'For enabling the Lords and Commons to adjourn this parliament from place to place, as they shall see cause,' on the 11th of Jan., being the day of their meeting after the late adjournment.

they cannot be separated; and he that subverts the one, breaks and infringes the privileges of the other; and he that breaks the privileges of the one subverts the other. Now, to speak freely in parliament, freely called and assembled by his majesty's most royal authority; to vote freely in the same, upon the conclusion of any bill to be made a law by the whole consent of parliament, and assented to by his maj.; to agree in voting with the whole parliament, against delinquents and malefactors in the state, to bring them to condign punishment for the same; to give my vote, in the house, for removing evil counselors from his majesty, and to place loyal and faithful ones in their place; to assent, with the whole state assembled together in council, for the settling of peace and tranquillity in the same; to ordain and enact such wholesome laws and ordinances, whereby his majesty's good subjects may be governed in righteousness and good obedience; to vote, with the house, for redressing the many grievances of the common-wealth: If these be to subvert the fundamental laws of the land, then, Mr. Speaker, am I guilty of this Article in giving my vote against the earl of Strafford; in voting those acts already made and passed by his maj.; in voting against the Bishops; in protesting to maintain the fundamental laws of the land, and the true Protestant religion, according to the true doctrine of the church of England. I say then, in this am I guilty; but if this be not to subvert the laws of the land, then, am I clear from being guilty of this Article. Mr. Speaker, I come now to the other Articles of the Charge: To endeavour to bring in an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government; To invite tumults and unlawful resorts of multitudes of people to the parliament, to be a colour for our designs: to raise forces and armies in this land to assist us in our practices: To invite foreign princes to bring an army into the land: To endeavour, by Declarations, Proclamations, and otherwise, to alienate the hearts of his majesty's loyal subjects from their lawful sovereign, thereby to avert their due obedience from him; and, having an evil opinion of his sacred maj. to persuade them to side with us, and take their parts to effect our designs. Give me leave, I beseech you, to speak concerning these crimes: And first, Mr. Speaker, to endeavour to bring in an arbitrary power and tyrannical form of government in the subject, is to deny parliamentary proceedings: To oppose the laws, enacted by parliaments; to incense his maj. against parliaments; to protest and petition against the proceedings thereof; is to bring in an arbitrary form of government: but to agree with the parliament, being a member thereof, by vote, to make and enact laws, I conceive this cannot be termed arbitrary; neither, I persuade myself, can the effects thereof be tyrannical.—2dly, Concerning the late Tumults about the house, I am innocent thereof; neither came they by my invitation or encouragement; I always thought their resorts, in that sort, were illegal and riotous: I have voted with this house for suppressing; have assented to all orders for their appeasing; agreed with the parliament, in all things, concerning their petitions and requests: then I hope this hon. house will not conceive me guilty of this crime: If it be one, and granted, yet I conceive far without the limits of treason, for these reasons: 1. They came not with arms to force any thing to be done in parliament; but humbly, by petition, shewed their grievances, and desired redress thereof; which is one privilege, and one of the greatest, to make their griefs known to a parliament, and by them to be relieved. 2. They offered no assault; but, being assaulted, preserved themselves, and departed. 3. The matter of their clamour was not against the king, nor any of his council; it was not against the lords, nor the house of commons; it was only against delinquents, against such as had been the greatest oppressors of them. 3dly, I come, in a word, to other Articles of the Charge, which I intend to speak of, under favour, altogether: I pray you, who raised any Army, actually, in this land, but the Trained Bands; which was done by the parliament, for the security of their own persons in the king's absence; and, in obedience to his commands, at his return home, they were discharged, and afterwards again raised by his majesty's own royal authority? And for inviting or procuring any foreign princes to aid me with an army, I am altogether innocent therein; I know of no aid required but from Scotland, which is done by the parliament; my vote, as a member thereof, only agreeing with them in the same; and that aid is procured for his majesty's assistance, in subduing the rebellion, in Ireland, and, as I conceive for no other purpose. And for the last Article wherewith I am charged, I hope to be cleared by this whole house: For what Declarations, or Proclamations, have been published but by authority of the parliament, joined with his majesty's most royal power and assent thereunto? It is manifest to all people that nothing is published by the parliament, or any of the members thereof, but tendeth to the winning of the hearts of his majesty's subjects to dutiful obedience, to intire love and tender affection, towards their gracious sovereign. And I dare confidently say, that there is none of his majesty's subjects, that are true Protestants and well affected to religion, but, upon the least command of his maj. will spend their dearest blood in defence of his sacred person, his queen and princely issue; the laws and constitutions of this kingdom; parliaments and the rights and privileges thereof; religion and the doctrine of the church of England: and, therefore, I conceive I am far from intending any treason either against his majesty or his kingdoms.

Mr. Storde. spoke thus:—Mr. Speaker; It is the saying of the wise man, even of a king, Solomon, the wisest of all kings that ever reigned on this earth, 'That in the countenance of the king is life and death;' like to the sun, which, by the sending forth of his glorious beams upon the fruits of the earth, nourisheth, and causeth the same to fructify and grow, gives vigour and strength to all the creatures that live in and upon the same; and, by withdrawing his light, being overshadowed with clouds, keeps back the growing and flourishing of the creature; yea, and by continuance in that his hidden motion, procureth at last the utter withering and perishing thereof.—His gracious majesty is our sun and comfort; at such time as his glorious beams of grace and favour reflect upon his good subjects, they increase and grow in an intire and tender affection towards his maj. so that no distempers, or troubles whatsoever, can separate between him and them. But this our sun, when overshadowed with clouds, and mists of discontent and disfavour towards his people, causeth them to wander in obscurity and darkness, even ready to faint and despair of any design they take in hand, for the safety and security of his maj. and his kingdoms; yea, strikes them, as it were, with death and utter destruction.—Mr. Speaker, I persuade myself our gracious sovereign, in his own natural disposition, is altogether bright and comfortable; he never causeth, or retracts to himself, any discontent towards his loving subjects, but by suggestion, information, or instigation, of malignant spirits, disaffected both to the tranquillity and peace of his maj. and the whole state of this kingdom. It is the policy only of desperate and evil-minded persons, that have been the only troublers of our Israel, finding themselves in danger (by calling of them to an account for their misdeeds and misdemeanors) to be brought to punishment for the same, to cast aspersions upon those faithful counsellors of the king and state, who strive to prevent their malicious and wicked designs from overthrowing and destroying the same.—It cannot, sir, enter into my thoughts that ever his maj. of himself, could have gone about to interrupt and hinder the happy proceedings of this his great and wise council, by accusing and impeaching the members thereof of high treason; as if they, whose hearts are united to their lawful sovereign, by nature bound to the defence and security of their country, and, by covenant with God, tied to the maintenance of his true religion, should be the betrayers and destroyers of them all together.—These Articles exhibited against myself and the other gentlemen, are, I conceive, not really intended against us as if we were actually guilty of the same; but only to procure our absence from this hon. house, that we may not have our free votes in the trial of the 12 Bishops accused; by whom, I verily believe, these Articles were drawn; and only by their advice and such as favour their cause, exhibited. And I persuade myself, were we to be apprehended and taken from this house, under pretence of trial, we should, by force, immediately be cut off; although his maj. conceives, and is really minded, we should be legally proceeded against; of such powerfulness are those persons that were the authors of them.—These Articles, if we were actually guilty, are, many of them, I confess, high treason; as to endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws; to introduce an arbitrary form of government in the state, &c. I need not speak much to clear myself of these crimes. I hope this hon. house will make such a favourable construction of all my actions, that it will be manifest to all the world, that they have been far without the compass of treason either against my king or country.—And if it shall be conceived by this hon. assembly, (as learnedly it hath already been delivered by that worthy gentleman that spake first) That, as members of a parliament, to agree with the same in all their votes, for the punishment of delinquents, settling of religion, securing of their own persons by a guard, or desiring assistance of our brethren in Scotland to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, be treason; then, I think, we are all guilty of these Articles; otherwise are we clear and innocent of the same.—Mr. Speaker, I humbly desire of this hon. house, that I may have a speedy trial upon the same; that, as I shall be found guilty by the judgment of this high court, I may know my sentence, which I shall willingly submit unto; be it to my condemnation, or preservation; wishing and praying with all my heart, that none of these evil and malicious designs, in agitation against the parliament, by any malignant persons whatsoever, may take effect to hinder the blessed proceedings thereof; but that you may go on, with courage and cheerfulness, to settle all things aright, both in church and state, for the government thereof in perpetual peace and tranquillity.

Speeches in Vindication of the Privileges of Parliament.] There are also extant, in single pamphlets of the times* the following Speeches of Mr. Grimston, Mr. Glynn, and Mr. Maynard, spoken at the beforementioned committee of the house of commons, at Guildhall.

Mr. Grimston (member for Colchester) spoke as follows:—'Mr. Chairman; There are no courts of judicature in this kingdom, but they have several rights and privileges appertaining and belonging unto them; and have such power and authority, in the several jurisdictions of the same offices, that they may call to an account, prosecute, and bring to judgment, the infringers of the same. Of all these courts, there is none, yea, put them altogether, they are not all, of so great power and jurisdiction, but remain inferior and subject to the ordinances and statutes of the high court of parliament. Sir, of such awful predominancy is the very name of a parliament to this nation, that it strikes with terror and despair all such evildoers, as are malefactors in the state: on the contrary side, it enriches and comforts the brooping spirits of men, groaning under the burden of tyrannical oppression, inflicted on them unjustly and maliciously, by unmerciful and wicked men that have usurped unto themselves places and offices of power and authority both in church and state.—Sir, this great and high court, is not only the powerfulest of all other courts whatsoever, but the prudentest and wisest, made and compacted not only of men sound in religion and well learned, but wise in their judgments, selected from all parts of this kingdom, elected and chosen with the free consent of the whole body politic of the kingdom: this great and high council is not only of such power and wisdom, but endured and attended with the most and greatest privileges thereof, that not only the meanest of his majesty's subjects, but the greatest personages of the kingdom, are in danger, if infringers of the same, to be called in question, and by them punished; therefore give me leave, sir, to speak somewhat of the Privileges in this particular incident, and appertaining to this wise senate: and, in speaking thereof, I shall observe these three particulars: 1. The Rights and Privileges belonging to the same, in the free votes and judicature thereof. 2. The Rights and Privileges belonging to the power and jurisdiction thereof. 3. The Rights and Privilege of the continuance thereof; being freely called and assembled by his majesty's authority, not to be dissolved or broken up until all things debated therein, for the good both of church and commonwealth, be fully concluded and determined.—First, Sir, concerning the Privileges of a Parliament, belonging to the free votes and judicature thereof, I shall observe these three particulars: 1. To speak freely, without interruption or contradiction, in any debate, dispute, or argument, upon any business debated in the same, being a member thereof, conceive to be one privilege of a parliament. 2. Not to be questioned, on any such free debate, argument, or debate; nor to be taxed or accused for the same, either during the free trial thereof, or after, is another. 3. Freely to give vote, judgment, or sentence, upon the passing of any bill to be made a law, or any bill, either of attainder or other charge, against delinquents and criminal persons against the state, at their trial upon the same, is a third. 4. To defend and maintain the free vote, judgments and sentences of the whole house, by retestation, Remonstrance, or other Declaration, if not consented unto, or opposed by the house of lords, is a fourth privilege. 5. For any member of the house, not to be accused of any crime, or impeached for treason by any person whatsoever, during the continuance of a parliament, for things done in the same, without legal accusation, and prosecution of any such member by the whole house, is another privilege. 6. Not to be apprehended upon any impeachment, or arrested by any officer; nor to have their studies broken open, or books and writings seized upon, without consent or warrant of the whole parliament, is another privilege of the same. And thus much, sir, shall suffice to be spoken concerning the Privileges and Rights of Parliament, appertaining to the subjects of which I am to speak.—I come now to the second thing, which was, the Rights and Privileges belonging to the power and jurisdiction of the parliament, in which I shall observe these particulars: 1. To consult and consider of what laws are fit to be made and enacted in this kingdom, for the good government thereof, is one privilege. 2. To justify or abrogate, repeal or make void, to ratify and confirm, establish and unmain, laws, statutes, and ordinances, made and enacted by precedent parliaments, by councils of state, or other courts of judicature, is a second privilege. 3. To give Subsidies, to raise taxes, to impose loans, and other charges upon the subject, is another privilege. 4. To accuse or impeach any incendiaries or delinquents in this kingdom of any crime notorious, tending to the prejudice of his majesty, or any of his loyal subjects, whether it be for treason or otherwise, be they members of the parliament or not, is another privilege. 5. To prosecute and bring to judgment such persons so accused, or impeached for any crime whatsoever, is another privilege. And thus much of the Rights and Privileges belonging to the power and jurisdiction of a parliament.—And now, sir, I come to the last thing I mentioned to you, concerning the Privileges belonging to the continuance and free sitting of a Parliament, till all things be concluded on for the good government of church and state; in which I shall also observe these particulars: 1. That for a parliament, when freely called and assembled by royal authority, not to be compelled to debate any one particular business appointed by any person whatsoever, is one privilege. 2. Not to break off, or dissolve a free parliament, until all the grievances and oppression of all his majesty's loyal subjects be fully redressed and remedied, is a second privilege. 3. Not to break off, or dissolve a free parliament, till all incendiaries and delinquents in the state be brought to condign punishment for their crimes: and, 4. Not to accuse or impeach any member of the parliament, thereby to hinder and interrupt the legal proceedings thereof, in the weighty affairs of the commonwealth, is another privilege belonging to the continuance of a parliament.—And, thus having briefly declared to you the Power and Jurisdiction of a Parliament, above all other courts of judicature in this land; the wisdom and policy of a parliament, above all other councils; the rights and privileges of a parliament, in respect of the free votes and judicature thereof; the power and jurisdiction thereof; and the free continuance thereof; I humbly leave to the consideration of this house, Whether the accusation of the gentlemen, accused by his majesty, and the illegal breaking open, upon this their accusation, of their chambers, trunks, and studies, be not a Breach of some of the Privileges of Parliament which I have mentioned unto you.

Mr. Glynn, (member for Westminster) spoke thus:—‘ Mr. Chairman, We sit now upon that grand business of the Breaches of the Rights and Privileges of Parliaments, which are so many and great; so carefully preserved and defended in former times, by severely punishing the infringers thereof; that I had thought and conceived that no subject, of what degree or dignity soever, would either in their own persons, or by misinforming his maj. concerning the same, have presumed to have intrenched, in the least measure, upon the free liberty, rights, and very being of parliaments, or tending to the breach thereof. But, sir, I perceive by the perverseness of divers persons in places of authority, that they dare not only presume to provoke his maj. by their political misinformations, but dare attempt, of themselves, to resist the lawful power of the king and his high court of parliament.—Sir, these men dare venture to cast aspersions, and spread abroad evil reports, not only of the members, but of the proceedings of the commons against them and others of their adherents and favourites in their wicked and desperate designs against their lawful sovereign and his liege people.—I conceive, sir, did these persons but remember the many precedents, yet extant, of the just and deserved punishments, inflicted by former parliaments, upon such miscreants; as witness the abp. of York, the earl of Suffolk, chief justice Belknap, and the rest of that conspiracy, in the reign of Rd. 3. they would have prejudged to themselves the like danger would follow upon them for their evil actions.* Nay, sir, did these men but consider with themselves the just judgments of God that have immediately lighted upon the necks of such as have been the troublers of kingdoms and commonwealths, whereof they have been members, as well recorded in sacred writ as of late times in this kingdom yet still fresh in memory, they would have laid their hands upon their mouths and hearts when they went about to speak or do any thing tending to the dishonour of Almighty God; in innovating of his true religion, and corrupting the sincere doctrine and discipline of Christ and his apostles; as also any thing tending to the dishonour and perpetual destruction of his royal majesty, (however otherwise they may pretend) the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom, the rights and privileges of parliament, and the very being thereof: but surely, sir, they are altogether benumbed and stupefied, their consciences dead and seared, their lives and conversations altogether devoted to the works of darkness and impurity; their desires altogether sensual, carnal, and devilish; forgetting God, kicking and spurning, with maliciousness, against all piety and godliness; or else they would never have adventured to practise such things, as it is too manifest they have done.—Sir, I intend to be brief in that which I am to speak, concerning the Breaches of the Privileges of Parliament. 1. To inform his majesty of any proceedings in the house of commons, upon any business whatsoever, before they have concluded, finished, and made ready the same to present to his majesty, for his royal assent thereunto: 2. To misinform his majesty, contrary to the proceedings in parliament, tending to incense and provoke him against the same: 3. To cause or procure any information or accusation to be brought or preferred, without the knowledge or consent of the parliament into the house, against any of the members thereof: 4. To apprehend any such accused, to imprison their persons, to seize upon their goods or estates, to prosecute and proceed against them, to their trial and judgment, condemn or execute them upon such accusation, without the consent or advice of the parliament: 5. To endeavour to cast any opinion of such members accused, into the hearts of his majesty’s loyal subjects, whereby they, disaffecting them, may be willing to be ready to put in execution any command or warrant for their apprehension and imprisonment: 6. For any officer or serjeant to come in open parliament, to demand and arrest any such member accused, be it of high treason or any other crime whatsoever, without the knowledge of the whole house: 7. To come to parliament, sitting in free consultation, and guarded with armed men; and with the sitting the house, to demand, as it were, by arms, such members accused: 8. To propose to be set forth, or to set forth under his majesty’s name, any Proclamation or Declaration prohibiting the repair of such persons accused to the parliament as members thereof, and apprehend them in what place soever they may be found, without the advice and consent of the whole state, assembled and sitting in parliament; all these are manifest Breaches of the Privileges of Parliament.’

Mr. Maynard (member for Totness) spoke as follows:—‘ Mr. Chairman; The internal of parliaments, so long together, hath been only cause, I confidently believe, of all the evils and troubles that have happened in this and the other his majesty’s kingdoms. The perverse nature of man is so forward and crooked, that it is always inclined to do nothing but that which is evil: without restriction, either by the powerful preaching of the word of God, wholesome and pious discipline in the exercise of religion, and good made for the strict observance and performance of the same, under pain of severe punishment for not obeying thereof: I say, without such means, the corrupt nature of man is not to be curbed; but will go on to the committing of all manner of wickedness against God, his king and country: And the only means to preserve and enjoy the sincere and pure teaching of God’s word, pious discipline, by wholesome laws made and made for that purpose, is by a parliament by that great and wise council expert in traces of good government, either of a church common-wealth.—A parliament, sir, is the best looking-glass for a state perfectly to see if in that ever was made; there is no disease, infirmity, or misery, that it groans under burden of, but in this glass it may be perceivably perceived, and the original and the causes that have produced the same:

 the glass is not only clear and bright to look in,
 it is medicinal, and of that sovereign power efficacy, that it can cure and remedy all grievances of the spectators therein, of what rank, degree, or dignity soever they be;
 that condition or quality soever the disease they are infected withall; of what profession or function soever, whether spiritual or temporal they are of, if they do but look herein.—Be they infected with pride, haughtiness of heart, (if in places of authority) exercising sway over the king's good people and loyal subjects; let them be but brought to look in this glass, they may have remedy.—Be they infected with too much ease, idleness, and plenty, (if the clergy) whereby is produced covetousness, luxury, wantonness, avarice, and all manner of lasciviousness; neglecting their duties, their several places in the church, as ordinary teachers and dispensers of the Word of God; or, being in authority and places of government in the church, becoming loose and idle in their preaching and dispensation of truth of God, according to the spiritual and meaning thereof; or else corrupt in their doctrine, teaching false doctrine, not the Word of God, but their own inventions, or the inventions and traditions of others; turning the Word into a lye, joining and adding to the same their own devices, as they are teachers and instruments of the people and children of God;
 as they are in authority, becoming proud and unkind, not contented with their spiritual office, but usurping to themselves temporal jurisdiction; exercising cruelty against those who are faithful and painful teachers of the Word, and holy in their lives and conversations; encouraging vain and idle persons, scandalous persons in their teaching and in their lives: These, sir, infected with all these sores and dangerous ulcers, looking but into this glass may receive cure.—Be they infected with bribery, justice and oppression, (be they judges, or officers in places of judicature in this kingdom) in their several courts over his majesty's subjects, by viewing themselves in this glass, they may receive remedy.—Be they infected with subtle plots, monopolizing devices, they courtiers, officers, customers, or whatsoever else thereby procuring grants, patents, monopolies; by them oppressing and excessively charging the subject, raising and increasing the rates and prices of all commodities, either imported or exported, in this land;
 if they look in this perspective, they may be cured.—Be they infected with treachery, conspiracy with any other devilish practice or design against his majesty or his kingdoms, as they are or dissolute and disaffected Protestants, or Baal's Priests, that halt between divers opinions, in part Protestants, in part Papists, and in part Arminians; if they will but look into this glass, it will clearly discover and cure them.—And thus, sir, having spoken something of the nature of a parliament, and of the sovereignty thereof in discovering and curing all diseases in a common-wealth, I come to speak a word or two of the rights and privileges appertaining and belonging to a parliament. I know right well the gentlemen who have gone before me, have set forth, clearly and learnedly, the Privileges thereof. I shall only speak concerning that privilege, which one of them hath already mentioned, 'Not to be questioned or accused, (for or concerning any vote, argument, or dispute, as members of a parliament, during the free sitting thereof) either in the continuance of parliament, or after the same be dissolved or broken off, either legally or illegally.' That which I shall only speak of,

 is the Breach of this grand Privilege of Parliament, as I conceive, by accusing of High Treason those six worthy members of the same, during the continuance thereof, for matters debated on, and done in the same, as members thereof; and, upon this accusation, to break open their chambers, trunks, and studies, and seizing on their books and writings: These, I conceive, are great breaches of this privilege, for these reasons: 1. If to be questioned for free debating, or arguing, in parliament be no breach of this privilege, then we cannot safely intermeddle with, or agitate any business whatsoever, either concerning church or state, but what shall be appointed and nominated by his maj. and his privy council; which is a restriction of the power of parliament, given unto the same by the royal confirmation of his
 maj. confirming to us, at our meeting, all our rights and privileges. 2. If to accuse the members of treason, for things done in the house, be not a breach of this privilege, then is it dangerous to sit in parliament upon any business of disorders in the state, and grievances of the subject, committed by great personages, as lords and bishops; who may, by their subtle inventions, induce his maj. to favour their actions, they pretending all they do is for his honour, maintenance of his prerogative and royal power, and the like. 3. If, upon any such accusation, the chambers, trunks, and studies of such accused members may be broken open, and their writings seized on, be not a breach of this privilege, then will it altogether discourage any man to undertake any service for the good of his country; when he shall perceive he may, at pleasure, be bereaved of such means and helps as may enable and make him fit for the same.—And now, sir, having added to the former speeches what I conceive necessary to the business we have now in debate, my humble motion is, That a Declaration may be forthwith drawn, and set forth in print, giving notice to all his majesty's loyal subjects of the Privileges of Parliament, and Breaches thereof, by the accusing of these gentlemen, breaking open their chambers, &c. and endeavouring to apprehend and commit them to prison; under a certain punishment to be inflicted upon those that shall obstinately refuse to observe the same.

The committee hereupon came to several Resolutions in support of the Privileges of Parliament; which, upon the report thereof to the house, were digested into one Declaration in form; which will appear under its proper date.

The King issues out a Proclamation for apprehending Lord Kimbolton, &c.—and leaves London.] As during the before-mentioned short recess of parliament, the Journals of both houses are necessarily silent, we shall refer our readers to lord Clarendon and Mr. Rushworth for what was further done, in this interval, by the king, or the committee of the commons sitting then, first at Guild-hall, and after at Grocers Hall, in London. We only think it necessary to mention, that the accused members having withdrawn themselves into the city of London, the king went thither on the 5th of Jan. and made a speech to the common council assembled at the Guild-hall, requiring their assistance in apprehending the said members; and dined with one of the sheriffs, where he was nobly entertained. On the 8th he issued a Proclamation, commanding all magistrates and officers to apprehend and carry them to the Tower. And on the 10th, the day before the parliament met again, the king removed himself and royal family to Hampton-Court; from thence to Windsor; and, after several other removes, went down to York on the 19th of March following. Upon this occasion Mr. Whitlocke, observes, "That it was a great wonder to many prudent men, that the king should leave this city, the place of his and his predecessors usual residence; where most of his friends and servants were about him, the magazine of all provisions both for war and peace, the place for intelligence and supplies, and betake himself to the country, where these things were not to be had; and, by his leaving the town, bring great disadvantages upon himself and his affairs: this was thought not to have been done advishly; but the fears of those with him, and his own fears for them, occasioned by great numbers of people gathered together in a very tumultuous manner about Whitehall and Westminster, and his hopes that, by his absence, the heat of the house of commons might in some measure, be cooled, were alleged in excuse for this action."

The Parliament meet pursuant to Adjournment.] Jan. 11. This day both houses being to meet again at Westminster, pursuant to adjournment, Mr. Whitlocke, again, informs us, that "The accused members were triumphantly brought from London to Westminster by water, by a great number of citizens and seamen, in boats and barges, with guns and muskets, braying as they passed by Whitehall, and making large protestations, at Westminster, of their adherence to the parliament."

The house of lords began with voting, "That it was fit and necessary to have a strong sufficient Guard, for the security of both houses, that they may sit in safety: and that it was legal way for the houses to require the sheriff of Middlesex and London to attend, for that purpose, with a Posse Comitatus." At the same time, the king's Answer to the parliament's last Remonstrance to him for a Guard was reported to this effect:

"We having considered the Petition of the houses of parliament concerning a Guard, give this Answer to it. That we will, to satisfy their fears, command the lord mayor of London to appoint 200 men, out of the trained bands of the city, such as he will be answerable to us for, to wait on the houses of parliament; that is to say, 100 on each house, to be commanded by the earl of Lindsey, being most proper to him, as being lord chamberlain; who, by his place, hath a particular charge of the houses of parliament, of whose integrity, courage, and sobriety none can doubt."

Lord Kimbolton moves for his Trial.] Lord Kimbolton, one of the accused members moved the lords, "That he lying under great a charge, which concerned his life, estate and his honour, which is dearest to him, the Attorney General might be commanded to prosecute the accusation against him, and is ready to answer it: but if he be not by his lordship said, he tendered himself to their disposal and commands, his own innocency making him thus confident."—The Attorney General being commanded to speak about the matter, along with the other prosecutions, "That what he did was by the express command of the king his master, and not done by his advice; since that he had attended them to take his further directions therein. His majesty told him, That when he went out of the house he would leave somewhat with the lord keeper to be laid before this house; but upon asking the lord keeper, he told him the king had not left any, but had sent for him to attend him speedily."

Orders relating to the Magazine at Hull. This day, sir Philip Stapylton brought up a message to the lords, to acquaint them, "That the commons were informed that there is at Hull, a Magazine of the king's with Arms 16,000 men and proportionable ammunition, but in regard no great strength is in the town, and that the country about is full of Parliament-affected, the commons desire their lords to join with them that some companies of trained bands, next to Hull, be forthwith sent into that town, for the safeguard of it and the magazine. The said trained bands to be under the command of sir John Hotham, who hath the command of that town already by patent from the king." This was agreed to by the lords, with this addition, "That the said sir John shall not deliver up the town, or magazine there, or any part thereof, without the king's authority signified unto him by nds and commons, now assembled in parliament.—Ordered, also, That the king be made acquainted with this Order very speedily.

Bill to enable the Parliament to adjourn themselves to any Place.] Sir Philip Stapylton, brought up a bill, intitled, 'An Act that the Lords and Commons may adjourn themselves, respectively, to any place:' which bill was read 3 times in the lords that day, and read nem. con. The lord keeper was ordered to move his majesty, that he will be used to give his royal assent to the bill aforesaid, with another for pressing Mariners, and a third for redeeming Captives in Algiers.

The Commons desire the removal of Sir John Byron from being Lieutenant of the Tower.] A message was brought from the commons, to their lordships know, "That, in regard of great jealousies and distractions of London, sir John Byron's being lieutenant of the Tower; the citizens shutting up their shops giving over trade; and, in regard of their affections expressed to the parliament, the commons desire their lordships to join with them to petition the king, that sir John Byron be forthwith removed from being lieutenant of the Tower; and that sir John Conyers be recommended for that place." The lords took this message into consideration, a great debate arose; when, at last, it was resolved, that this house thinks not fit to join with the commons in this Petition; and this vote was immediately sent down to them.

Wiltshire Petition against Bishops. The last things we shall take notice of in the business of this long day, are Petitions from the county of Bucks to both houses, and read in their Journals. They were brought by a town by divers knights, gentlemen, and holders, to the number, says Rushworth, of about 4000, riding every one with a printed copy of the Protestation, lately taken, in his hand. Their Petition to the commons stands in the Journals, and evidently shews the temper of those times:

Sheweth, That whereas, for many years, we have been under very great pressures, and are clearly set forth in the late Remonstrance of the house of commons; the redress of which hath for a long time been by endeavoured with unwearied pains, though with answerable success; having still your favours frustrated or retarded, and we denied of the fruit thereof, by a malignant faction of Popish Lords, Bishops, and others; and, of late, to take from us all that little that was left of a future reformation, the very rights of the parliament shaken; and, by the seditious practices of most wicked counsellors, the privileges thereof broken in an unparliamentary manner, and the members thereof unassured of their lives, in whose safety the safety of us and our posterity is involved; we held it our duty, according to our late Protestation, to defend and maintain the same persons and privileges, to the uttermost expence of our lives and estates: to which purpose we are now come to make the humble tender of our service, and remain in expectation of your command and order; to the execution whereof we shall, with all alacrity, address ourselves, ready to live by you, or to die at your feet, against whomsoever shall, in any sort, illegally attempt upon you.—May it therefore please this honourable assembly, to assist the ardent prayer of your petitioners, that Popish Lords and Bishops may be forthwith ousted the house of peers; that all Privileges of Parliament (yours and our posterity's inheritance) may be confirmed to you; and that all evil Counsellors, the Achans of this commonwealth, may be given up to the hand of justice; without all which, your petitioners have not the least hope of the kingdom's peace, or to reap those glorious advantages, which the 14 months seed-time of your unparalleled endeavours have given to their unsatisfied expectations. So your petitioners shall be bound to pray, &c."

We find, by the Journals, that this Petition was extremely agreeable to the commons.

Orders, occasioned by Informations of Plots, &c.] Jan. 12. This day the lords were informed, That there was a design discovered for killing some of that house this night; and, in particular, named the earls of Northumberland, Essex, Holland, Pembroke, and Leicester. The witness to this was one Francis Moor, called, in the Journal, an Italian, who overheard some discourse between two, in that language, tending thereto. But though the persons accused were taken up and examined, yet nothing more came of it.—The Tower of London was next the care of both houses. Informations had been given, that ammunition and provisions, in great quantities, had been carried out and in, &c. Upon this the lords agreed with the request of the commons, That a convenient guard might be put round the Tower, both by land and water, under the command of major-general Skippon; and that the common council of London might be made acquainted with this Order.

The Lieutenant of the Tower sent for by the Lords, but refuses to come.] The lieutenant of the Tower being likewise sent for to attend both houses, he gave this Answer to the message, "That he was very ready to attend the parliament according to their Order; but he conceived he could not come without his majesty's leave first obtained, in respect he had received a warrant from him, with a command not to depart out of the Tower, without his leave, but to reside there." A copy of which warrant the said lieutenant sent to the parliament.—The lords thought this refusal of the lieutenant to come, a high contempt of the Order of that house, notwithstanding the king's warrant; and cause the king's command is always supposed to be implied in an Order of their house.—After some debate, the lords sent a message to the commons to acquaint them with this affair; who soon after returned their lordships these votes; 1. "That sir John Byron, the now lieut. of the Tower, hath committed a high contempt against the authority and privileges of parliament, by refusing to appear upon the summons of parliament. 2. That he shall be sent for as a delinquent." To the first vote the lords agreed, but demurred to the second for that time.

A message was brought up from the commons, that col. Lunsford and the lord Digby had appeared in arms, at Kingston upon Thames, to the terror and affright of his majesty's subjects, &c. and to desire their lordships that lord Digby might be sent for to attend their service, as a member of that house. The lords answered, That they would send for him, if he was at Kingston or at court; but if he be gone to Sherborn to fetch up his lady, he had leave to do it.

The earl of Southampton dropping some words, this day, in a debate, "That the parliament had neglected their duty to the king, for the safety of his person," he was called upon to explain them. After which it was resolved, nem. con. "That this parliament hath performed their duty to the king, for the safety of his person; and that the earl had satisfied the house with his explanation."

The King's Answer concerning the Magazine at Hull, &c.] Jan. 13. The lord-keeper reported, "That he had waited on the king, and had moved his majesty, to be pleased to give his royal assent to the three Bills lately passed. And had likewise acquainted him with the Order made concerning the putting of sir John Hotham into Hull, for the security of that town and the Magazine there." To which his majesty returns these Answers. 1. "Concerning the bill for pressing of Mariners, and that for the Captives at Algiers, his majesty is content to give his assent to them; and, for that purpose, had given warrant for a commission. But, for the bill for giving power to the houses to adjourn to London, &c. his majesty says, in regard that neither he, nor any of his council hath seen it, he will take some time to consider of it before he resolve anything therein. For the fears concerning Hull, his majesty hath formerly considered the same; and hath already taken special care for the security of that place from the adjoining Papists."

The King waves any present Proceeding against the accused Members.] The lord keeper also reported, what his majesty had commanded him to deliver, concerning the lord Kimbolton and the five Members: "That his majesty taking notice that some think it disputable, whether this proceeding against that lord and those gentlemen be legal and agreeable to the Privileges of Parliament, and being very desirous to give satisfaction to all men in all matters that may seem to have relation to Privilege, is pleased to wave his former proceedings; and all doubts being by this now settled, when the minds of men are composed, he intends to proceed therein, in an unquestionable way; and assures his parliament that upon all occasions, he will be as careful of their privileges, as of his life and his crown."

Earl of Monmouth's Speech for the King's Return to Whitehall.] We meet with the following speech of the earl of Monmouth this day, in the house of lords, on occasion of the king's having withdrawn himself from Whitehall.

'My Lords; I shall desire to be heard in a few words, which I would much rather have heard spoken by any of your lordships, than they might have a happier and a more happy expression; though with a better heart, and clearer intentions, they could not have been spoken. The sad condition we are now in, my lords, is such as is too apparent to every man, who hath but half an eye: the city of London is full of jealousies and apprehensions, we sit not here free from fears; the king hath withdrawn himself from hence, together with his queen and children, out of a belief, as I conceive, that his majesty's person was not safe here. While things continue in this position, my lords, we may well fear an impairing, can hardly hope for the bettering of all. God hath placed us in the medium between the king and his people; let us play our part, let us do our duties, and discharge our sciences; let us really prove, what we are, by name, noblemen; let us endeavour to win perfect and a true understanding between the king and his people; let us freely unburden ourselves to his maj.; and desire that his maj. be pleased to do so to us; and to this end, my lords, if it shall be approved of by your lordships, I do humbly move, That, by way of reference, or any other way, we may desire the commons to join with us; first, in an humble Petition to his maj. that he would be graciously pleased to return to his good city of London as the safest place, we conceive, for his safe person in these distempered times; and, that they will likewise join with us in a petition, or protestation, That we will do what in us lies to free his maj. from his fears; to take from the citizens of London, and his majesty's other subjects, their jealousies and apprehensions; and that we will live and die his majesty's faithful advisers, counsellors, and subjects.'

The Lieutenant of the Tower being at home, and being asked, Why he committed the lord Kimbolton to contempt yesterday, he answered, "That was in a dilemma between his majesty's commands and their lordships order; but he stood since that the king's command was involved in that order, and was one in the same; he desired their lordships pardon for his coming yesterday; professing, he did it."

t of any disobedience or contempt of the parliament." This Answer was sent to the commons, and the same day the lieutenant was missed his attendance on the lords for that day.

The Attorney General examined in relation to the Proceedings against lord Kimbolton, &c.] The Attorney General was then asked what he could say to justify himself, for urging the lord Kimbolton and the 5 members, and to prove it was a parliamentary proceeding, and no breach of privilege. And, he said, "That for the matter of the charge, and the framing of the Articles, he had nothing to do with them, neither did his majesty rise with him therein; but the bringing of a Charge into this house, which he did by his majesty's command, and only in obedience therunto: and for the legality of this proceeding, he insisted upon, and opened at large, the sole proceedings of the king's attorney in the case of Bristol's Case, 2do Caroli;" (see p. 79.) Each being done, the house appointed to take the business into further consideration the next day.

The lord Kimbolton, upon his majesty's late message concerning himself and the 5 Members, moved, "That since his majesty waved the former proceeding, the house would become more to his majesty, that he may be brought to a speedy trial as may be, that so he might lie under this accusation; but be cleared and judged."

The commons also having desired liberty to examine the Attorney General, upon certain prerogatives, he made it his humble request to the lords, "That he may be excused from answering to any questions to discover what the king hath committed to him as secret council, which, by his oath, he is bound not to reveal; but what concerns himself he would willingly and ingenuously answer unto." And thus the sense of the house, That if Mr. Attorney, at the conference, shall desire not to answer to some questions that may be asked, the house will take it into consideration whether it be fit for him to answer or not.

The Declaration of the Commons for putting the Kingdom into a Posture of Defence.] A message from the commons was brought up to the lords, by Mr. Whitlocke, with a Declaration putting the Kingdom into a Posture of Defence; which, having passed their house, they bore their lordships to join with them therein, that it may be dispersed throughout the kingdom. This Declaration was as follows:

Whereas the Papists, and other ill-affected persons within this kingdom, both before and since this parliament, by many wicked and malicious designs, mentioned in a Remonstrance of the State of this Kingdom, have laboured and laboured the confusion of this state government; the subversion of the ancient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, and a division of the body of this common-wealth from the head thereof; to the end they might the better effect their devilish and bloody purposes, for the utter destruction of the true reformed religion and the professors of the same; and in further pursuance of their wicked endeavours, have and daily do contrive all possible means to bring this kingdom into the like miserable condition with that of Ireland; as does clearly appear to the lords and commons in this present parliament, by sundry informations and examinations produced before them: and they, the better to bring the same to pass here, do secretly and cunningly work to raise distractions in this kingdom, by high breaches of the privileges of parliament; plotting to have some of the members thereof accused of high treason, and to be taken out of the house of commons by force; and, to that end, resorting in great numbers, in a warlike manner, to the very doors of the said house, armed with swords, pistols, and other weapons, ready, and intending to fall upon the said house, and cut the throats of the members there, as by divers examinations clearly appears; whereby this parliament might have been involved in blood and confusion, the relief of the Irish protestants prevented, and an evident and speedy way opened to the ruin of us and our religion here in this kingdom: but failing of their hopes therein, through the great mercy of God towards us; nevertheless, they still persist in their wicked and traitorous courses, confederating themselves with strangers, and instigating foreign princes to join their counsels and forces, and by invasion from abroad, and intestine war here amongst ourselves, to waste the wealth and substance, and totally to annihilate the true Protestant religion, and the whole frame of government in all his majesty's dominions. And, building upon that foundation, great numbers of soldiers, Papists, and other disaffected persons to our existence and well-being, have enrolled themselves in a list, under the commands of persons fit for the execution of their wicked designs; and have made great preparations of arms, ammunition, and victuals in several parts of the kingdom; where they have likewise had frequent assemblies to consult how they might compass their detestable machinations; and, through malignant counsels, have prevailed so far, as to have the Tower of London, and other places of eminent strength and trust, to be put into the hands of such persons as we have just cause to suspect will adhere to them, and turn the strength of the kingdom against itself.—All which, the lords and commons, in this present parliament assembled, as watchmen trusted for the good and welfare of the king, church, and state, having taken into their serious consideration, and labouring by all fit means to prevent these great and threatening dangers to his majesty's royal person, to our religion, lives, liberties, and fortunes, have thought good to give timely advertisement thereof to all his majesty's subjects of the reformed Protestant religion; declaring thereby that they hold it necessary and advise able, that with all expedition they put themselves into a posture of defence, to provide fit arms and ammunition, and be ready, on all occasions to defend their several counties, from domestic insurrections or foreign invasions. And that the sheriffs, justices of the peace, mayors, and head officers, within their several liberties, do take care, that their magazines of powder, arms, and other ammunition be compleatly furnished; and that they cause strong guards and watches to be set in convenient places to secure themselves, and for the apprehending of such persons as they shall have just cause to suspect; and if, upon examination, any grounds of danger shall appear, to give notice thereof to the parliament; and that all officers do take care that no soldiers, arms, or ammunition, be raised or levied, nor any castles, forts, or magazines delivered up, without his majesty's authority, signified by both houses of parliament."

Jan. 14. The lords took into consideration the above Declaration; and, after much debate, the question was put, Whether the preamble of this Declaration should be referred to a committee to be so drawn, that it may appear to be the Narrative of the commons only, and so published? It passed in the negative. But though the lords refused even to commit this Declaration, yet it was resolved to have a conference with the commons, to hear the reasons that induced them to make this Narrative therein.

The King's second Message relating to the accused Members.] The lord keeper acquainted the lords, That he had just then received a Letter and a Message from the King; both which were ordered to be read, and were in these words:

"My lord keeper; This is to command you to deliver that which is contained within the inclosed Paper, as a Message from me to both houses; and that instantly, and without delay. And so I rest your assured friend,

Windsor, Jan. 14, 1641. "CHARLES R."

The Message was as follows:

"His majesty being no less tender of the Privileges of Parliament, and thinking himself no less concerned, that they be not broken, and that they be asserted and vindicated whenever they are so, than the parliament itself, hath thought fit to add to his last Message, this profession, That in all his proceedings against the lord Kimbolton, and the five Members, he had never the least intention of violating the least privilege of parliament; and in case any doubt of breach of privilege remains, he will be willing to clear that, and assert those, by any reasonable way that his parliament shall advise him to: upon confidence of which he no ways doubts his parliament will forthwith lay by all jealousies, and apply themselves to the public and pressing affairs, and especially to those of Ireland; wherein the good of this kingdom, and the true religion (which shall ever be his majesty's first care) are so highly and so nearly concerned; and his majesty assures himself, that his care of their privilege will increase their tenderness of his lawful prerogative, which are so necessary to the mutual defence of each other; and both which will be the foundation of a perpetual perfect intelligence between his maj. and his parliament, and of the happiness and prosperity of his people."

Sir P. Stapylton's Speech on Occasion of Lord Digby and Col. Lunsford appearing in London at Kingston.] Jan. 15. In a debate concerning the lord Digby and the Kingston business before-mentioned,

Sir Philip Stapylton made the following speech:*

"Mr. Speaker; It is the continual practice of the devil, after any of his works of darkness and maliciousness intended against God or his Christ, is discovered and annihilated by special power of Divine Providence, to practise new; being always striving to encrease his kingdom, always winning to himself fresh instruments, to yield to his suggestions and temptations, and execute the same.—I am now to speak concerning this new treachery and conspiracy, endeavoured to be practised by eminent persons; that have, especially one of them, obtained the favour not only their prince, but applauded for their parts by most of his majesty's subjects, the lord Digby and col. Lunsford: the first had honour to sit in this house as a member thereof; so well approved was he both of his king and country; none more fervent against evil-doers at the first, than himself seemed to be, both in his speeches and disputes; but, in heart, as it seems, favouring the bishops and their cause; and although it seemed but a little yet encreasing daily more and more, he grew to such strength in his opinion concerning his own worth, that he adventured to take counsel with the earl of Strafford, trusting too much the same: so high his pride, that at length presumed to oppose and set himself against the proceedings of the whole house against said earl, obstinately refusing to be persuaded concerning the same; and yet, keeping many of the lords his friends, he was, by his majesty, as a baron, called to that house; aspiring yet higher, obtained his privy council, not yet acquainted with his secret intentions; by which means, too confident of success and security in his designs, he adventured openly to comply with the public enemies of king and country, and especially now, with this other person of whom I am to speak, colonel; who, being by his majesty advanced to that dignity and trust, could not so easily humble himself, but imitating the water-toad, in the shadow of a horse seem bigger than he is, swelled to compare with the same, and so even so this gentleman, having obtained this place of command, and afterwards removed to the Tower, and being found of such a

ment spirit that he was unfit and incapable for that great place of trust, and therefore removed; taking the same a great dishonour to his worth, he now endeavours, by traitorous and desperate actions, to defend himself; and to revenge of his pretended adversaries; and that purpose they have, between them jointly, raised arms against the state met together in several consultations for the good of the church and commonwealth.—Mr. Speaker, these attempts, made by these persons, are dangerous consequence; and this their intention, (by taking up arms without warrant from his royal majesty and this high court of parliament, only to do mischief in raising sedition and contention, thereby to preserve themselves from being called to an account for their desperate actions) will prove harder to appease and suppress, than any troubles we have yet suffered.—Mr. Speaker, I conceive quick dispatch in our intentions, for the apprehending and suppressing these persons, is the only means to prevent future danger; and to that purpose I desire to present to your considerations these particulars: 1. That warrants by issue forth for the speedy and private apprehending of them, in what places soever they shall be found, and immediately to bring them before the parliament. 2. If this cannot be effected, to issue forth proclamations for their king in, within a certain time prefixed, under penalty of being prosecuted and proceeded against as traitors to their king and country. That warrants be forthwith sent for the raiding and securing of all the ports of this kingdom; and for the intercepting of all letters or letters intended to be conveyed into foreign kingdoms, or any brought from thence her. 4. That order be sent down into the several counties of this kingdom, where it is suspected either of these persons have any lands or favourites, well-wishers to their use; with command to the sheriffs, and several officers of such counties, to stand upon their guard, and to raise force for their own defence and safety; and to endeavour, by all means possible, to apprehend and suppress them and the fruits of their conspiracy as shall be taken, presently to be sent up to parliament, to be examined and prosecuted according as they shall be found. 5. That order may be made by the parliament, That no officer, that shall be found to have a hand in this Plot, may be employed in any service of public command, either for the king or any other of his majesty's dominions, any private affairs of this kingdom. 6. That we may, without further delay, proceed to sentence against all delinquents, by this honourable assembly accused for any crime whatsoever, in their defence, or for whose cause, these persons now accused pretend to take up arms. That his maj. may be moved graciously to be pleased to declare himself against these persons, and all others that do any ways prejudice his authority or warrant for what they do. 8. His majesty may be moved to avert his intended Journey to Portsmouth; for the security of his royal person, till such time as these dangers be removed, and the peace and unity of all his majesty's loyal subjects be settled.—And thus, Mr. Speaker, having presented such things to this house, which I humbly conceive to be necessary to suppress and prevent this new danger, threatened by these two disaffected and male-contented persons, the lord Digby and colonel Lunsford, I leave the same to the further consideration of this honourable house; desiring, from my heart, that it would please God to end all the troubles and distempers of this commonwealth; and that this high court of parliament may prove the firm settlement of all things amiss, both in church and state.—The effect of this speech will be seen in the sequel.

This day a conference was held between the two houses, at the desire of the commons, concerning the Tower of London; wherein they renewed their former motion, That the lords would join with them, in getting the present lieutenant removed, and such a person put in as the king, parliament, and city may confide in. They said, "That sir John Byron had been disobedient to the summons of both houses; but that they spoke not, as desiring he might be punished for it, but as a ground of distrust. That the citizens said, Though the lieutenant might be a worthy gentleman otherwise, yet he was a man unknown to them, and that his being in that post produced ill effects. That the merchants began to draw their bullion out of the mint; had wrote to their factors to send no more; that a ship was in the Thames, in which was a great deal of bullion, but the owners would not carry it to the Mint, because they cannot confide in the lieut. of the Tower. That it concerned the city and trade exceedingly, for it was a charge to the city to keep a guard about the Tower; therefore they desire their lordships to join with them, in petitioning the king to have this man removed, and sir John Conyers put in his place."—Before the lords would come to any resolution on this affair, they ordered that certificates should be made of these matters, from the common council of London, and the merchants there, of the decay in trade, &c. and whether it proceeded from sir John Byron's being lieut. of the Tower; and these to be speedily laid before the lords in parliament.

The Lords refuse to let the Earls of Essex and Holland go to the King at Hampton-Court.] The earl of Essex acquainted the house of lords, That the king had commanded him, as lord chamberlain of the household, and the earl of Holland, as groom of the stole, to attend his majesty at Hampton-Court; concerning which they prayed the pleasure of the house, being required, by their writs, there to attend the business of the kingdom. The lords resolved, Not to dispense with their absence, in respect of the many great and urgent affairs depending: hereupon they excused themselves to his majesty, as well as they could, That, in obedience to his writ, they were obliged to assist in parliament; and that their attendance there, about the high affairs of the realm, was truer service to his majesty than any they could do him at Hampton-Court.—Lord Clarendon tells us, “This refusal so incensed the king, that from this time he was determined to remove those two lords from their respective offices.” But he did not put his resolution into execution till the April following, as will appear in the sequel.

A Remonstrance from the Commons to the Lords against the Lord Digby. Jan. 15. p. m. A Remonstrance came up from the commons, about horses and armed men raised near Kingston, to the number of 1000, to their amazement, that in time of peace, and the parliament sitting, such forces should be raised. They desired also, that such persons as raised them may be declared disturbers of the peace of the kingdom; and that the lord Digby, who had been with the soldiers at Kingston, and had given them thanks in the king's name, and told them ‘That his majesty had brought them out of London to keep them from being trampled in the dirt,’ might be sent for forthwith to attend the house. Hereupon it was ordered, That the lord Digby shall be sent for to attend the house, as a peer of this realm, without fail.

The Examination of the Attorney General concerning the Articles against the accused Members. This day Serjeant Wyld reported the conference had on Thursday night last with the lords, concerning Mr. Attorney's exhibiting Articles in the lords house against members of this house, as follows: “The conference consisted of two parts; 1. The Narrative Part, That these Articles exhibited by Mr. Attorney, and entered in the lords house, was a Breach of Privilege of parliament; and that, in due time, this house would desire that justice may be done upon Mr. Attorney. The second part was, To examine Mr. Attorney upon certain questions, and to receive his Answer: 1. He being asked, Whether he contrived, framed, or advised the said Articles, or any of them; if not, then whether, he doth know or hath ever heard, who did frame, contrive, or advise the same or any of them? To this he answered, ‘That he would deal clearly freely, and ingeniously, and that he should say the same which he had before delivered to the lords, and should need no long time to Answer this; for, that he had done none of these three, that is, neither framed, advised, or contrived these Articles, or any of them; and would be contented to die if he had.’ 2. Being demanded, Whether he knew the truth of these Articles, or any of them, of his own knowledge, or had it by information? To this he answered, ‘He did know nothing, of his own knowledge, of the truth of these Articles, or any part of them, nor hath heard it by information. All that ever he hath heard concerning this was from his master. 3. Being asked, Whether he will make good these Articles, when he shall be thereunto called in due course of law? To this he answered, ‘He cannot do it, nor will not do it, otherwise than as his master shall command him and shall enable him, no more than he that never heard of them can do it.’ 4. Being asked, From whom he received these Articles, and by whose direction and advice he exhibited them? He answered, ‘He did exhibit them by his master's command, and from his hands he did receive them.’ 5. Being asked, Whether he had any testimony, or proof, of these Articles before the exhibiting of them? He gave this Answer, ‘That he received the command of his majesty: but whether he had any proof offered, or intimation of testimony, to make good those Articles, he desired time to consider of it.’ He was pressed again to make answer to this, but desired time to consider of saying, ‘There was a secret trust between master and a servant, much more in this case. Hereupon it was ordered, “That some way thought of for charging Mr. Attorney, by this house, as criminous, for exhibiting those Articles in the lords house, against members of the house, without any information or proof appears; and that this house, and the gentlemen charged by him, may have reprieve from him; and that he may put in good security to stand to the judgment of parliament. It was also resolved, “That a committee be appointed to prepare a charge against Mr. attorney, upon these votes of the house.”

The lord keeper reported the effect of a conference held this afternoon, by the desire of the commons, concerning the king's last messages, about the impeachment of their 5 Members, “That the commons had taken them into serious consideration, and had resolved upon the question, That the said impeachment, the proceedings thereupon, is a high Breach of Privilege of Parliament: That, in order to redress this breach, they propose a committee of both houses may meet to consider about and to petition his majesty, That those who informed him against these members, should come in five days time to charge them; or that they may be cleared, in such a way as parliament shall think fit.” The lords, hereupon passed the same vote as the commons, and appointed a committee of 21 of their house to meet with a proportionable number of commons, to consider of this affair.

Jan. 17. The king's Answer to some propositions sent him on the 15th was, “That to the bill for adjourning the Parliament to Westminster to London, or any other place, his majesty will take further time to consider of. And as to the securing the town and Manor of Hull, his majesty conceiveth he hath formerly given a satisfactory answer.”

A committee of the lords and commons, appointed, jointly, to meet at Grocers Hall, London, to consider of the Safety of the Kingdom, the Privileges of Parliament, the Affairs of Ireland, and concerning settling the Distempers.

The Lords refuse to join with the Commons in removing the Lieutenant of the Tower. The Merchants and Goldsmiths having presented a Petition to the lords this day, against the Lieutenant of the Tower, they were led in and asked these questions: 1. What number of Merchants and Goldsmiths besides themselves, brought in bullion to the Mint? they answered, Sir Peter Richaut, and some more, but not many. 2. What reason they had for their fears and jealousies of sir John Byron, and why they forebore to bring their petition to the Mint? They said, 'They heard that he disobeyed the orders of both houses of Parliament; also, that he was a gentleman unkind to them; and they desired to have such a person put in as the parliament approved.'—The merchants, being withdrawn, a great debate arose amongst the lords, till the question was put, Whether this house will join with the commons in an humble Petition to his majesty to remove sir John Byron, knt. from the office of lieutenant of the Tower of London, and to place sir John Conyers in his room? It ended in the negative.

Answer of the 12 Bishops, to the Charge against them. This day the 12 Bishops were brought bodily, to the bar of the house of lords, a committee of the commons being present; and the abp. of York, who, kneeling as a defendant, was bid to rise; when the lord keeper, by direction of the house, told him, that this was the day appointed for him to give his Answer to the Impeachment of the Bishops against him for High Treason.—His majesty answered, That on the 30th of Dec. last he received an order, with an Impeachment, against himself and 11 other Bishops, of High Treason, by the commons; and since, he had received several other orders, on several days, to put in their Answers; and the last was for this day; that he was come according to their lordships commands; and for his Answer to the charge, he gives it in this manner.

I John, archbishop of York, saving to myself all advantages of exception to the instances of the said Impeachment, for my say, That I am not guilty of the Treason charged by the said Impeachment, in manner and form as the same is therein expressed.

The archbishop desired a present, or speedy answer, and then withdrew. In like manner all the rest of the bishops were brought to the bar, and gave the same answer. Afterwards the bishops delivered in the following Petition:

The Right Hon. the Lords, assembled in the House of Peers: The Humble Petition of John Archbishop of York, and the other the Bishops impeached by the House of Commons, the 30th of December last,

Humbly Sheweth; That your petitioners, your honourable order, were to put in their 02. II.

Answers thereunto the 7th instant, and have had, since, several days for that purpose assigned them, and are now, the 17th instant, brought hither by your lordships order. They having always been as now, ready to obey your lordships commands; and may of them being already much impaired, both in their healths and estates; do humbly pray, that a speedy proceeding may be had therein, and that, in the mean time, they may be admitted to bail. And your petitioners shall ever pray, &c. Jo. Eborac', Tho. Duresme', Rob. Co. Liche', Jos. Norwic', Jo. Asaphen', Ro. Oxon', Guil. Bath. & Welles', Geo. Hereff', Math. Elien', Godfrey Gloucest', Jo. Petri-burgh', Morg. Llandaff'.

The Lords ordered the Trial of the 12 Bishops to be on the 25th instant, and, in the mean time, the bishops of Durham, and Coventry and Litchfield were remanded to the custody of the black rod, and all the rest to the Tower.

The King's Letter concerning the Safety of the Prince. A Letter from the King was sent to the house by the lord keeper, and some Papers inclosed, which were to be communicated to the house; which were read in these words:

"His majesty hath seen the lords' Order, upon the motion of the house of commons, given to the marquis of Hertford, concerning his care and attendance upon the Prince, not without wonder that this parliament should make such an order; which can hardly be otherwise understood, than that there had been a design of sending the Prince out of the kingdom; which must necessarily throw reflections upon his maj. the prince being now in the same place with him; and his maj. hath shewed himself both so good a father and a king, that he thinks it strange that any should have such a thought, as that he would permit the prince should be carried out of the kingdom, or that any durst give him such counsel."

Ordered, That this message should be sent to the commons at Grocers-Hall; and then the lords adjourned to the 20th instant.

Declaration of the Commons touching the Breach of their Privileges in the Proceedings against the 5 Members. Jan. 19. This day the following Declaration, in pursuance of three Reports from the late committee at Guildhall and Grocers Hall, appeared in print, according to an order of the 12th:

A DECLARATION of the House of Commons, touching a late Breach of their Privileges, for the Vindication thereof, and of divers Members of the said House.

"Whereas the chambers, studies, and trunks of Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, members of the house of commons, upon Monday the 3rd of this instant Jan. by colour of his majesty's warrant, have been sealed up by sir W. Killgree, and sir W. Fleming, and others; which is not only against the Privileges of Parliament, but the common liberty of every subject; which said members, afterward the same day, were, under the like colour, by serjeant Francis, one of his majesty's serjeants at arms, contrary to all former precedents, demanded of the Speaker, sitting in the house of commons, to be delivered unto him, that he might arrest them of High Treason: And whereas afterwards, the next day, his majesty, in his royal person, came to the said house, attended with a great multitude of men, armed in warlike manner with halberts, swords, and pistols; who came up to the very door of the house, and placed themselves there, and in other places and passages near to the said house, to the great terror and disturbance of the members, then sitting, and, according to their duty, in a peaceable and orderly manner, treating of the great affairs of England and Ireland: And his maj. having placed himself in the Speaker's chair, demanded of them the persons of the said members to be delivered unto him; which is a high breach of the rights and privileges of parliament, and inconsistent with the liberties and freedom thereof; And whereas afterwards his maj. did issue forth several warrants to divers officers, under his own hand, for the apprehension of the persons of the said members; which, by law, he cannot do, there being not, all this time, any legal charge or accusation, or due process of law, issued against them, nor any pretence of charge made known to that house: All which are against the fundamental liberties of the subject and the rights of parliament. Whereupon we are necessitated, according to our duty, to declare, and we do hereby declare, That, if any person shall arrest Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, or any of them, or any other member of parliament, by pretence or colour of any warrant issuing out from the king only, he is guilty of the breach of the liberties of the subject, and of the privilege of parliament, and a public enemy to the common-wealth; and that the arresting of the said members, or any of them, or of any other member of parliament, by any warrant whatsoever, without a legal proceeding against them, and without consent of that house whereof such person is a member, is against the liberty of the subject, and a breach of privilege of parliament; and the person which shall arrest any of these persons, or any other member of the parliament, is declared a public enemy of the common-wealth: Notwithstanding all which, we think fit further to declare, That we are so far from any endeavour to protect any of our members that shall be, in due manner, prosecuted, according to the laws of the kingdom, and the rights and privileges of parliament, for treason, or any other misdemeanor, that none shall be more ready and willing than we ourselves, to bring them to a speedy and due trial; being sensible, that it equally imports us, as well to see justice done against them, that are criminous, as to defend the just rights and liberties of the subjects and parliament of England.—And whereas, upon several examinations taken the 7th day of this instant Jan. before the committee appointed by the house of commons to sit in London, it did fully appear, that many soldiers, papists and others, to the number of about 500, came with his maj. on Tuesday the 4th instant, to the said house of commons, armed with swords, pistols, and other weapons; and divers of them pressed to the door of the said house, they away the door-keepers, and placed themselves between the said door and the ordinary attendants of his maj. holding up their swords; and some holding up their pistols ready cocked near the said door; and saying, 'I am a marksman; I can hit right, I warrant you, and they not suffering the said door, according to the custom of parliament, to be shut; he said, 'They would have the door open; and any opposition were against them, they put no question, but they should make their way good; and that they would maintain their liberty.' And, when several members of the house of commons were coming into the house, the attendants desiring that room might be cleared for them, some of the said soldiers answered, 'A pox of God confound them'; and one said, 'A pox take the house of commons; them come, and be hanged; what a do it is with the house of commons.' And some of the said soldiers did likewise violently assault, by force disarm, some of the attendants and servants of the members of the house of commons, waiting in the rooms next the said house, and, upon the king's return out of the house, many of them, by wicked oaths, and otherwise, expressed much discontent, that the members of the said house, for whom they were not there: And others of them said, 'When comes the Word?' And no word being given, at his majesty's coming out, they cried, 'A Lane, A Lane.' Afterwards, some of the being demanded, 'What they thought the company intended to have done,' answered, 'That, questionless, in the posture they were set, if the Word had been given, they should have fallen upon the house of commons, and have cut all their throats.' Upon all which, we are of opinion, that it is sufficiently proved, the coming of the said soldiers, papists, and others, with his majesty, to the house of commons, on Tuesday being the 4th day of this instant January, in the manner aforesaid, to take away some of the members of the house; and, if they should have found opposition or denial, then to have fallen upon the said house in a hostile manner: And we hereby declare, That the same was a traitorous design, against the king and parliament. And whereas Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, members of the said house of commons, upon report of the coming of the said soldiers, papists, and others, in the warlike and hostile manner aforesaid, did, with the approbation of the house, absent themselves from the said house, far avoiding the great and manifest inconvenience which otherwise appeared might have happened: Since which time, a printed Paper, in the form of a Proclamation, bearing date the 6th day of this instant Jan. 1641 issued out, for the apprehending and imprisoning of them; therein suggesting that, through the conscience of their own guilt, they were absent; and fled: not willing to submit themselves to justice: We do further declare, that the said printed Paper is false, scandalous, and illegal; and that, notwithstanding the said printed Paper, or any warrant issued out, or any other matter yet appearing against them, or any of them, they may and ought to attend the service of the said house of commons, and the several committees now on foot.—And we do further declare, ‘That the publishing of several Articles, purporting a form of a Charge of High Treason against the lord Kimbolton, one of the members of the lords’ house, Mr. Hollis, sir A. Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, members of the house of commons, by sir Wm. Killigree, sir Wm. Fleming, and others, in the Inns of Court, and elsewhere, in the king’s name, was a high breach of the privileges of parliament; a great scandal to his majesty, and his government; a seditious act, manifestly tending to the subversion of the peace of the kingdom; and an injury and dishonour to the said members, there being no legal charge or accusation against them.—That the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the subject, so violated and broken, cannot be fully and sufficiently vindicated, unless his maj. will be graciously pleased to discover the names of those persons, who advised his maj. to issue out warrants for the sealing of the chambers and studies of the said members; to send a sergeant at arms to the house of commons to demand the said members; to issue out several warrants, under his majesty’s own hand, to apprehend the said members; his majesty’s coming thither in his own royal person; the publishing of the said Articles, and printed Paper, in the form of a Proclamation, against the said members, in such manner as is before declared: to the end that such persons may receive condign punishment.—And this house doth further declare, That all such persons as have given any counsel, or endeavoured to set or maintain division or dislike, between the king and parliament; or have listed their names, or otherwise entered into any combination or agreement, to be aiding, or assisting, to any such counsel or endeavour, or have persuaded any other so to do; or that shall do any the things above-mentioned: and shall not forthwith discover the same to either house of parliament; or the Speaker of either of the said houses respectively, and disclaim it; are declared public enemies of the state and peace of this kingdom, and shall be inquired of, and proceeded against accordingly.”

The King's Message, desiring the Parliament to settle all Grievances in a summary Way. Jan. 28. The lord keeper signified to the lords, that he had just then received a Paper from the king, directed to both houses of parliament; which was ordered to be read, and was in hæc verba:

“His majesty perceiving the manifold distractions which are now in this kingdom, which cannot but bring great inconvenience and mischief to the whole government; in which, as his majesty is most chiefly interested, so he holds himself, by many reasons, most obliged to do what in him lies for the preventing thereof: and though he might justly expect, as most proper for the duty of subjects, that propositions, for the remedies of these evils, ought rather to come to him than from him; yet his fatherly care of all his people being such, that he will rather lay by any particular respect of his own dignity, than that any time should be lost for preventing of these threatening evils, which cannot admit of the delays of the ordinary proceedings in parliament, he doth think fit to make this ensuing proposition to both houses of parliament: That they will, with all speed, fall into a serious consideration of all those particulars which they shall hold necessary, as well for the upholding and maintaining of his majesty’s just and regal authority, and for the settling of his revenue, as for the present and future establishment of their privileges; the free and quiet enjoying of their estates and fortunes; the liberties of their persons; the security of the true religion now professed in the Church of England, and the settling of Ceremonies in such a manner as may take away all just offence; which, when they shall have digested and composed into one intire body, that so his maj. and themselves may be able to make the more clear judgment of them, it shall then appear by what his maj. shall do, how far he hath been from intending or designing any of those things which the too great fears and jealousies of some persons seem to apprehend; and how ready he will be to exceed the greatest example of the most indulgent princes in their acts of grace and favour to their people: so that if all the present distractions, which so apparently threaten the ruin of this kingdom, do not, by the blessing of Almighty God, end in an happy and blessed accommodation, his maj. will be ready to call heaven and earth, God and man, to witness that it hath not failed on his part.”

After reading this Paper, a message was immediately sent to the commons, to acquaint them that their lordships had received a gracious Message from his majesty, which fills their hearts full of joy and comfort; which being directed to both houses, they desire it may be delivered to them, at a present conference, in the Painted Chamber.—The conference being ended, the lords thought proper to draw up an Answer of Thanks to the king’s gracious Message; which was read and agreed to in these words:

“Whereas the houses of parliament have received from your majesty a Message, expressing much grace and favour to all your majesty’s subjects, they have thought fit to return your majesty most humble thanks for the same; and to let your maj. know, that they will take it into such speedy and serious consideration, as a proposition of that great importance doth require."

Ordered, That this be sent down to the commons to desire them to join in it; but no present Answer was returned.

Conference about the Magazine, &c. at Hull.]

A conference was desired by the commons, concerning the town of Hull; which being agreed to by the lords, it was reported back to the house, by the lord keeper, to this effect:

"That the house of commons did put their lordships in mind of their late Order, concerning the placing of sir John Hotham governor of Hull; and had power given him to draw into that town some of the Trained Bands of that county, for securing the town and the king's Magazine there, the said sir John being governor, by the king's grant under the great seal; yet the said Order is disobeyed, and the companies not suffered to come into the town; which appears by a letter from Mr. Hotham, deputy to sir John, importing, That the earl of Newcastle is there, with a letter under the king's hand and seal mianual, to have the town and magazine delivered into his hands, as governor; and to draw in such of the Trained Bands as he shall think fit; particularly the regiment of sir John Metham. That the Order of parliament hath been pressed to the mayor and aldermen of the town, who answer, They were willing to obey the king and parliament, but, for the present, they had wrote to both, and until they had an Answer, they were not willing the men, who were presented at the gate, should be admitted. The men who were most averse, were Mr. alderman Atkinson, the present mayor, Mr. Barnard, and one Mr. Cartwright; who, if sent for and punished, and a peremptory Order made for obedience to the commands of the parliament, the business would be effected.—The commons further say, That they held this to be an injury to both houses, and to the earl of Essex, who is lord lieutenant of Yorkshire, under the great seal of England, and recommended to the king, by both houses, for his nobleness and approved confidence, to that place: they therefore desire, That the earl of Newcastle, as a peer of this house, may be sent for, to shew by what warrant he came to be governor of Hull, and to raise the power of the county."

The lords, after some consideration of this matter, directed the lord keeper to write to the earl of Newcastle to come and attend the house immediately. They ordered, also, That the mayor, and the other aforementioned persons, should be sent for, and bring up their charter along with them.

A message came up by sir Philip Stapylton, importing, "That the commons had heard there was a report carried to the Queen, as if that house had an intention to accuse her majesty of High Treason, and that some Articles were brought to the queen for that purpose; and, as they understand, the earl of Newcastle was told as much by the queen herself. The commons conceive this to be a great slur upon them, never having any such thing in their thoughts; they desire their lordships to join with them in sending some from both houses to the Queen, humbly to desire her maj. that she will be pleased to discover the party that gave her this information, and deliver those Articles to her." The lords agreed to this, and ordered the earl of Newcastle to the lord Seymour to wait upon her maj. accordingly.

The commons refused to join with the lords in their Answer to the king's last Message without an Addition, the substance of which was, "That he would be pleased to put the Tower of London, with all the other forts, and militia of the whole kingdom, into such hands as the parliament could confide in."

The Commons petition the King to hasten the Trials of Lord Kimbolton, &c.] The commons drew up a Petition, and sent it to the king, which was in these words:

To the King's most Excellent Majesty; I humble PETITION, of the LORDS and COMMONS, now assembled in Parliament.

"Sheweth; That whereas, of late, there have been sundry and great Breaches of Privileges of Parliament; and your majesty, a Message to both houses, was pleased graciously to express, that you would be willing to clear and assert them, by any reasonable way; your parliament should advise you to; and shall, in convenient time, present the particulars to you, together with our advice and demand for the asserting our privileges; and what your maj. by another Message to both houses hath expressed an apprehension of some reasonable matter to have been committed, by lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, and the rest; we declared, That you will, hereafter, proceed against them in an unquestionable way: your lords and commons do humbly beseech your maj. that you would be pleased to give directions, that your parliament may be formed, in a few days, what proof there is against them; that, accordingly, there may be a parliamentary and a legal proceeding against them; and they receive, in justice, what shall be their due; either for their acquittance or condemnation.—This we humbly conceive we are bound to crave, both in regard of ourselves and of them; being unfit that we should be any of our members liable to so great a charge, and thereby hindered from doing the same, as they respectively owe to their several houses, as that they, if innocent, should longer be under so great a weight; or, if guilty, avoid the deserved punishment."

The lords agreed to this Petition, and desired some of their body to join a committee of the commons to present it to the king next day.

The King's Answer.] Jan. 24. The King's Answer to the above Petition, was upon the lords by the earl of Newport, to this report:

"That he doth well approve of the desire of the houses, for the speedy proceeding against the persons, mentioned in the Petition; wherein his maj. finding the great inconveniences, by a first mistake, hath endured some delay, it he might be informed in what order to put the same. But, before that be agreed upon, his maj. thinks it unusual to discover what is there is against them; and therefore asks it necessary, lest a new mistake should be made more delay, which his maj. to his power avoids, that it be resolved, Whether he be bound, in respect of privilege, to proceed just them by impeachment in parliament, whether he be at liberty to prefer an indictment at the common law, in the usual way, or at his choice of either: whereupon his maj. give such speedy directions for the prosecution, as will shew his desire to satisfy both sides, and put a determination to this business."

This day the lords took into consideration. Addition the commons had sent up to them, to be added to their Address of Thanks be king for his last gracious Message to both sides. And, after a long debate, it was, on question, rejected; upon which the following Protest was entered against it.

Whereas the desire brought from the people of commons, about the forts and militia of the kingdom, concerneth much the safety of the king's service, and the general peace quiet of the land; and, as we conceive, is utterly necessary to the settling the present disorders, and tendeth to the furtherance of the now much obstructed and decayed, as has been represented by several Petitions from the city of London and sundry other cities: we protest against the vote of rejection of that desire of the commons, and do therefore dissent, to discharge ourselves from all mischief and ill consequences that may, hereupon, follow. (Signed) Essex, Warwick, Brooke, Holland, Stanford, Bedford, Leices-Clare, Lincoln, Sarum, Bolingbroke, Peterburgh, Thanet, Nottingham, Say and Sele, Gray, Paget, Kimbolton, Brooke, Roberts, Ash, Wharton, St. John, Spenter, Newnham, Longbby, Bruce, Dacres, Howard de Escrick, de Werk, Chandois, Hunsdon."

Mr. Pym's Speech at a Conference occasioned by many Petitions for a Reformation in Church & State. Jan. 25. Petitions were now presented from various counties of England to the parliament, for a Reformation both Church and State; and this day the commons desired a Conference with the lords concerning them. On which occasion

Mr. Pym, who was appointed to manage the business, spoke as follows: "My lords; I am commended by the knights, citizens, and burgesses, assembled for the commons in parliament, to give to your lordships divers Petitions, which I have received from several parts, concerning the State of the Kingdom; whereunto they are chiefly moved by that constant affection which they have always expressed, of maintaining a firm union and good correspondence with your lordships; wherein they have ever found much advantage and contentment, but never held it more important and necessary than at this time, wherein the wisdom and resolution of parliament have as many great dangers and difficulties to pass through as ever heretofore.—We are united in the public trust, which is derived from the commonwealth, in the common duty and obligation whereby God doth bind us to the discharge of that trust; and the commons desire to impart to your lordships whatsoever information or intelligence, whatsoever encouragement or assistance, they have received from those several counties which they represent; that so likewise we may be united in the same intentions and endeavours of improving all to the service of his majesty, and the common good of the kingdom.—The Petitions, which I am directed to communicate to your lordships, are 4; from London, Middlesex, Essex, and Hertfordshire. We have received many more, but it would take up too much time, and be too great a trouble to peruse all; and in these 4 you may perceive the effect and sense of all: first, I am to desire your lordships to hear them read; and then I shall pursue my instructions in propounding some observations out of them."

The Humble PETITION and ANSWER of the Mayor, Aldermen, and the rest of the Common Council of the City of London, to the Honourable House of Commons.

The PETITION.

"Sheweth; That the committee of this hon. house, upon Saturday, the 22d of this instant Jan. sent a message to the petitioners for the loan of 100,000*l.* or of so much thereof as could conveniently be forthwith raised, for levying of forces to suppress the rebels in Ireland; to which Message something was then answered, and a further Answer in writing promised. In performance whereof they humbly present the Answer following, together with the Reasons thereof, desiring that the same (being the best that, for the present, they are able to give) may be favourably accepted. And they shall ever pray, &c."

The ANSWER.

"The petitioners are duly and deeply sensible of the great miseries of their brethren in Ireland, and of the imminent danger, not only of the total loss of that kingdom, but of the ruin of this also, if that of Ireland should, which God forbid, be lost. And as they have hitherto shewed themselves ready, even beyond their abilities, to serve the king and parliament; so shall they ever continue, to the utmost of their power, with all cheerfulness and duty: but, at the present, they are compelled to repeat their former Answer, that they have no power to raise any sums, by way of tax, for any foreign use; and do further answer, that they have no means to do it, otherwise than by the imme-

date personal consent of every particular lender, which they cannot hope to obtain, in regard of these Obstructions following; which the petitioners humbly present, together with this their further Answer, as the Reasons thereof: 1. That immediately before the parliament, and since, divers great sums, for the service of the king and kingdom, have been already lent by the citizens of London, besides 50,000*l.* for the supply of Ireland in particular; a great part whereof some of the lenders were compelled to borrow, and cannot, to this day, repay. 2. That such part of those monies as are already due to the citizens from the parliament, and should have been repaid out of the Poll-money and Subsidies, is not yet done, because there is not any considerable sum come in from the country, as was expected, to satisfy the same. 3. That the said 50,000*l.* lent for Ireland, was hastened and speedily paid within near about 2,000*l.* upon this ground then urged by the parliament, that if it were forthwith lent, it might be of more use to preserve that kingdom than the loan of 200,000*l.* could be, if deferred but six weeks; yet no considerable forces are sent thither to this day. And we find that men will not be willing to lend any thing, till they are assured that a good strength be sent thither, with full commission, to relieve Londonderry, and other parts of that kingdom. 4. The general withholding of very great sums of money from the Petitioners, and many others; which monies have been long due, not only from chapmen and other debtors in England, but from very many in Ireland, who owe many hundred thousand pounds to the citizens of London, doth render divers persons, of good estates and credit, hardly able to go on with trade, or to pay their debts and maintain their charge. 5. The brotherly offer of Scotland to send 10,000 men into Ireland, not yet so accepted as to produce any relief to that bleeding kingdom, while yet our brethren are daily massacred there, discourageth most men from lending any money, were they ever so able. 6. The not passing the Bill for pressing of Soldiers here, whereby such forces as are requisite might be timely sent from hence into Ireland, puts many men into fears; that there may be some design rather to lose that kingdom, and to consume this in the losing of Ireland, than to preserve either the one or the other; for that it cannot be conceived, that the rebels, being grown so powerful, will be suppressed by volunteers. 7. The slow issuing of Commissions to those who, being in Ireland, or going thither, are willing to enter the field against the rebels, disables them from doing any effectual execution upon the enemy, unless in their own defence; and so all the monies that have been, or may be, sent thither, are exhausted to maintain our forces to do little or nothing worthy of them, rather than employed to chastise the rebels, and to reduce them to obedience; by means whereof the number and power of the rebels are greatly increased, divers castles and towns are by them taken, much Protestant blood is daily spilt, many thousand families destroyed, the malignant party of Papists and their adherents here are encouraged, and those rebels much emboldened, that they boast they will extirpate the British nation there, and make England the seat of war. 8. The disarming of Papists here in England, and many discoveries of their treacheries and designs upon the parliament and kingdom, the great decay of fortifications, blockades and other sea forts; the not managing of the navy nor furnishing them with ordnance and ammunition; the not placing all of them in the hands in whom the parliament may confide, and the not settling this kingdom in a posture of defence, in times of so many fears and insidious of foreign invasions and intestine conspiracies; the not removing the present lieutenant of the Tower, and putting such a person into that place as may be well approved by the parliament; notwithstanding the earnest petitions exhibited to this honorable house for that purpose; which hath produced a forbearance, bring bullion into the Tower, in this time of scarcity of monies: all which cannot but throw trading more and more, and make money yet more scarce, in the city and kingdom. The King's Ships, which ought to be a defence to this kingdom, and a convoy to merchants, for which Tonnage and Poundage was granted, are not fitted and employed to the present condition of this kingdom and land requires; but some of them for the conveying away of delinquents, who dare abide the test of the parliament, to the encouragement of the rest of the malignant party here; who, when their designs and selves be detected, know how to escape the hand of justice, through the abuse of their conduct. 10. The not questioning those thousands of unknown persons who are lodged in Covent-Garden, and thereabout, who do not employ themselves in any lawful call, and, it is very probable, lie in readiness to venture upon some desperate attempt, to endangering of the welfare, peace, and safety of the king's majesty, the parliament, and the kingdom. 11. The misunderstanding between the king and the parliament; the not vindicating the privileges of parliament; the not suppressing protections; the not punishing of delinquents, and the not executing of all Priests and Papists legally condemned; while others, contrary to the Privilege of Parliament, have been galled, as the petitioners conceive, charged with Treason to the deterring of worthy men from discharging their duties, and to the destroying of the very being of parliament, exceedingly fill the minds of men, well known to the public, with many fears and distractions throughout the kingdom, and so prevent them from that cheerful assistance which would be glad to afford. 12. By means whereof there is such decay of trading, and such scarcity of money, neither of which is cured till the former evils be removed, it is likely, in very short time; to cast itudes of poor artificers into such a depth of poverty and extremity, as may enforce them in some dangerous and desperate attempts; fit to be expressed, much less to be justified; which they leave to the wisdom of this house speedily to consider and prevent.—

 These are the Evils under which the petitioners exceedingly labour and languish, which they humbly conceive to have sprung from the enjoining of ill-affected persons in places of trust and honour in the state, and near to the sacred person of his majesty; and that these evils are continued by means of the votes of Bishops and Popish lords in the house of peers.—And that the petitioners have faithfully represented the true Reasons which do really cause them to return this Answer, most of which have been formerly offered to this house, in sundry Petitions; and that they have seen all that in them lies, even beyond all present to serve the king, parliament, and kingdom: they humbly crave leave to protest, before God and the high court of parliament, that if any further miseries befall their dear brethren in Ireland, or if any mischief shall be done upon this kingdom, to the endangering and disturbing thereof, it ought not to be imputed to the petitioners, but only to such as shall endeavour to hinder the effectual and speedy cure of the evils before recited, that so much discourage the petitioners from doing that which, by this honourable house is desired of them.”

THE HUMBLE PETITION of the Knights, Gentlemen, Ministers, and other Inhabitants, of the County of Essex, to the Honourable House of Commons,

Sheweth, To this honourable house, that we are truly sensible of your great care and extraordinary endeavours to settle our religion in peace; and daily bless God Almighty, the King's majesty, the peers, and this honourable assembly for the same. And we do further, in humility, represent to your honourable congregation, that notwithstanding your abundant industry, we do still apprehend a great need of reformation in matters of religion; and ourselves together with you and the whole kingdom, to be in great danger from the Papists and other ill-affected persons, who are everywhere very insolent, and ready to act the parts of those savage blood suckers in Ireland, if we be not speedily prevented; by means of our Trading, especially of clothing farming, grow apace to so great a damp, that many thousands are like to come to sudden ruin: nor can we expect any redress thereof, as the Bishops and Popish Lords be removed out of the house of peers. Therefore we humbly pray, that you would earnestly mediate with his majesty and the house of peers, that our brethren in Ireland may be speedily relieved, that Papists throughout this kingdom may be removed; the kingdom be put into such a posture, for defence, as may be for its safety; and that the Bishops and Popish Lords, who, as we conceive, have hindered the success of your godly endeavours, may be excluded the house of peers; not doubting but that then our petitions, formerly presented to this house, will receive the more full and speedy Answer. And your petitioners resolving (in all just and honourable ways, according to our late Protestation) to assist you in your rights and privileges, with our estates and lives, against the enemies of God, the king and state, humble pray, &c.”

THE HUMBLE PETITION of the Knights, Gentlemen, Freeholders, and others, Inhabitants of the County of Hertford, to the Honourable the House of Commons, “Sheweth; That this church and kingdom being, (by the prolates, the multitudes of corrupt and scandalous ministers their creatures, and the Popish party, concurring with them on the one hand; and by wicked counsellors, evil ministers of state, and great swarms of projectors, and others ill-affected to the peace of this realm, on the other hand) brought to a sad and almost desperate condition, and thereby the splendor of his majesty's crown and dignity dangerously weakened and eclipsed; it pleased his majesty, having respect to the Petitions of nobles and people in that behalf, to call this present parliament, the only able means, under God, to reform the many pressures and grievances of the church and kingdom, and to remove the causes thereof.—In which parliament, to the honour of his majesty, and comfort of his good subjects, exemplary Justice hath been executed, Arbitrary Courts, Ship Money, Monopolies, and other illegal impositions removed, the shedding of much blood prevented by the late Union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and further hopes given us of perfecting what remains by the happy continuance and much-desired progress of this parliament.—And although that malignant party of Prelates and Papists, and their adherents (whose present standing, and the happy success of this parliament, as the petitioners humbly conceive, are consistent) have by their manifold wicked practices and designs, endeavoured to hinder all thorough reformation in church and common-wealth; to stifle, in the birth and progress, all those good bills and other preparations made by this hon. assembly for that purpose; and especially, for the relief of the kingdom of Ireland, (the ruin whereof will endanger this kingdom also) to stop the influence of his majesty's royal favour in giving life thereto; to divide between his majesty and this hon. assembly; and to render you not only contemptible, but also burthensome to the people; yet the petitioners, and, as they verily believe, all well-affected to his majesty and the peace and prosperity of this kingdom, have, and still shall continue an high and honourable esteem of this worthy assembly, and of your great and unwearied endeavours, and do with the utmost expressions of their thankfulness; acknowledge the same, and the progress and perfecting thereof, to be of great consequence and deep necessity to the peace and welfare of this church and kingdom; and such as without which not only a reflux of the former calamities, but even utter ruin and desolation, like that, being too long continued, in sad and much lamented Ireland, will apparently ensue.—From the sense whereof, and of the great and unheard-of Breaches lately made upon the Privileges of Parliament, even to the endangering of the being thereof, wherein your petitioners and their posterity are much concerned: The petitioners take upon them the humble boldness to declare their readiness and great engagements, according to their Protestation, to stand to, and defend, to the utmost peril of their lives and estates, the king's majesty and high court of parliament, with all the power and privileges of the same, and all your honourable proceedings for the common good, against all Popish and other malignant opposers who endeavour, either by evil counsel, secret plots, or open force, to hurt or prejudice the same, or to make divisions between his majesty and the parliament. And the said petitioners humbly pray, that the Papists may be fully disarmed; the laws against them executed; the kingdom, and especially this county, according to their late Petition in that behalf, put into a posture of war for their better defence; the forts and strength of this kingdom put into safe hands, which the parliament may confide and trust in; the Privileges of Parliament repaired and thoroughly vindicated; and that this hon. assembly (as hath been lately desired of you by the citizens of London) will be a means unto his majesty and the house of peers, that life may be speedily given to your good endeavours by their concurrence with you in taking away of the votes of Popish Lords and Bishops out of the house of Peers; the speedy and strong relief of Ireland; the further punishment of delinquents; the removal of the pressures and grievances in church and common wealth, and reforming of what is therein amiss. For all which your petitioners shall daily pray, &c."

These Petitions being read,

Mr. Pym reassumed his discourse. "My lords; in these 4 Petitions you may bear the voice, or rather the cry, of all England; and you cannot wonder if the urgency, the extremity of the condition wherein we are, do produce some earnestness and vehemency of expression more than ordinary; the agony, terror, and perplexity in which the kingdom labours, is universal, all parts are affected with it; and therefore in these you may observe the groans and miserable complaints of all.—Divers reasons may be given why those diseases which are epidemical are more dangerous than others: 1. The cause of such diseases is universal and supernal, not from an evil constitution, or evil diet, or any other accident; and such causes work with more vigour and efficacy than those which are particular and inferior. 2. In such diseases there is a communicative quality, whereby the malignity of them is multiplied and enforced. 3. They have a converting transforming power, that turns other diseases and evil affections of mens bodies into their own nature.—1. The common and epidemical disease, wherein this common-wealth lies and gasping, hath a superior and universal cause from the evil counsels and designs of those who, under his majesty, bear the greatest weight in government. 2. It hath a contagious and infectious quality, whereby it is diffused and dispersed through all parts of the kingdom. 3. It is apt to take in the discontents, evil affections, and designs of particular persons, to increase and fortify itself.—I shall take occasion, from several branches of those Petitions to observe, 1. The variety of dangers to which this kingdom is now subject. 2. The many distempers which are the cause of those dangers. 3. The multiplicity of those evil influences which are the causes of those distempers.—The first danger is from enemies abroad. This may seem a causeless and impertinent observation at this time, seeing we are in peace with all nations about us: But, my lords, you may be pleased to consider that the safety of the kingdom ought not to depend upon the will and disposition of our neighbours, but on our own strength and provision; but states there are often sudden changes, from peace to war, according to occasion and advantage. All the states of Christendom are now armed, and we have no reason to be satisfied but that those of greatest power have an eye upon us, in respect of our religion: And if their private differences should be composed, how dangerously, how speedily, might the great armies, and other preparations be ready, be applied to some enterprise and tempt against us? And if there were no excuse, this were sufficient to make us stand upon our guard: But there are divers more special symptoms of dangers of this kind. You may perceive, by several advertisements from abroad, that they did foresee our dangers many months before they broke out; they could foretell the time and manner of them, which is clear evidence they held intelligence with those which were the contrivers and workers of the present troubles. We have many dangerous traitors and fugitives now in other parts, we can discover the weakness and distemper of the kingdom; who hold intelligence with the ill-affected party here, and by all cunning and subtle practices, endeavour to incite and provoke other princes against us. Some of the ministers of our neighbour princes may be justly suspected to have had a more immediate hand and operation in the insurrection and rebellion in Ireland; many of the commanders and most of the soldiers, levied for the service of Spain, are now joined with the rebels here, and those Irish friars, which were employed by the Spanish ambassador for the making of those levies, are known to have been the pendencies of this rebellion, and are still very give in the prosecution and encouragement it.—The rebels have a ready and speedy ply from some of our neighbours. Two troys of munition and arms we are certainly formed of, one from Dunkirk, the other from antes in Britany; and certainly those that so forward to enable others to hurt us, will forbear to hurt us themselves, as soon as by shall have means and opportunity to do —Another danger is from the Papists and affected party at home. The Papists here acted by the same principles with those in land; many of the most active of them have been there, which argues an intercourse communication of councils. They have store of arms and munition at their disposal, notwithstanding all our endeavours to disarm them; they have a free resort to the city to the court, they want no opportunities consult together; they have the same or water encouragements from above, and from out them, than ever, in respect of the example and success of the rebels in Ireland, and great confusions and divisions which, by their cunning and subtle practices, are raised and fomented amongst ourselves at home.— third Danger is of Tumults and Insurrections of the meaner sort of people, by reason their ill vent of cloth and other manufactures, whereby great multitudes are set on work; to live for the most part on their daily gettings, and will, in a very short time, be brought great extremity, if not employed: Nothing is so sharp and pressing than necessity and want; what they cannot buy they will take;

from them the like necessity will quickly be derived to the farmers and husbandmen;
it so grow higher, and involve all in an equality of misery and distress, if it be not prevented. And, at this time, such tumults will be dangerous, because the kingdom is full of disarmed soldiers and officers, which will be ready to head and to animate the multitude to commit violence with more strength and advantage; and if they once grow into a body, it will be much more difficult to reduce them into order again because necessity and want, which are the causes of this disturbance, will increase as the effects do increase.—A fourth Danger is from the Rebels in Ireland, not only in respect of that kingdom, but in respect of this: they have seized upon the body of that kingdom already; they abound in men very able bodies; they increase in arms and munition; they have great hopes of supplies from abroad, of encouragement here, and are rejoicing of good entertainment from the Popish party; so that they begin to speak already there of transporting themselves hither, and making the kingdom the seat of the war.—The Distemper which hath produced these Dangers is various and exceeding violent. Whensoever nature is hindered in her proper operations and politics, distempers will necessarily follow.
The obstructions which have brought us into this distemper, are very many, so that we cannot wonder at the strength and malignity of it.

Some of the chiefest of these Obstructions I shall endeavour to remember. 1. The Obstruction of Reformation in matters of Religion: no grievances are sharper than those that press upon the tender consciences of men; and there was never church or state afflicted with more grievances of this kind, than we have been. And though they are, by the wisdom of this parliament, partly eased and diminished, yet many still remain; and as long as the Bishops, and the corrupt part of the clergy, continue in their power, there will be little hope of freedom, either from the seuse of those which continue, or the fear of those which are removed. And of this obstruction, my Lords, I must clear the commons;
we are in no part guilty of it: some good bills have passed us, and others are in preparation, which might have been passed before this, if we had not found such ill success in the other.
Whatsoever mischief this obstruction shall produce, we are free from it: we may have our part of the misery, we can have no part in the guilt or dishonour.—2. An Obstruction in trade: It is trade that brings food and nourishment to the kingdom. It is that which preserves and encreases the stock of the whole, and distributes a convenient portion of maintenance to every part of it; therefore such an obstruction as this must needs be dangerous, the freedom of trade being so necessary, the benefit so important, as that it gives life, strength, and beauty to the whole body of the commonwealth. But I must protest the house of commons hath given no cause to this obstruction: we have eased trade of many burthens and heavy taxes, which are taken off; we have freed it from many hard restraints, by patents and monopolies; we have been willing to part with our own privileges, to give it encouragement; we have sought to put the merchants into security and confidence in respect of the Tower of Loudon, that so they might be invited to bring in their bullion to the Mint, as heretofore they have done; and we are no way guilty of the troubles, the fears, and public dangers which make men withdraw their stocks, and to keep their money by them, to be ready for such sudden exigences, as in these great distractions we have too much cause to expect.
—3. The Obstruction in the Relief of Ireland.
It must needs be accounted a great shame and dishonour to this kingdom, that our neighbours have shewed themselves more forward to supply the rebels, than we have been to relieve our distressed brethren and fellow-subjects.
But I must declare we are altogether innocent of any neglect herein. As soon as the first news of the Rebellion came over, we undertook the war, not by way of supply and aid, as in former rebellions the subjects have used to do; but we undertook the whole charge of it, and we suffered not 24 hours to pass before we agreed to a great levy of money and men, to be employed against the rebels, even in a larger proportion than the lord justices and council there did desire; and, from time to time, we have done all for the furtherance thereof, though in the midst of many distractions and diversions; but the want of commissions for levying of men, for issuing arms, and divers other impediments, have been the causes of that obstruction; and I wish we had not only found impediments to ourselves, but also encouragements to them. Many of the chief commanders, now at the head of the rebels, after we had, with your lordships concurrence, stopped the ports against all Irish Papists, have been suffered to pass by his majesty's immediate warrant, much to the discouragement of the lord justices and the council there; and, this procured, as we believe, by some evil instruments too near his royal person, without his majesty's knowledge and intention.—4. The Obstruction in prosecution of delinquents. Many we have already brought up to your lordships; divers others we have been discouraged to transmit; such difficult proceedings have we met withall; such terrors and discountenance have been cast upon ourselves and our witnesses; and those who have shewed themselves their friends and patrons, have found it the most ready way to preferment; yea, his majesty's own hand hath been obtained, and his majesty's ships employed, for the transporting divers of those who have fled from the justice of parliament.—5. A general Obstruction and Interruption of the Proceedings of Parliament, by those manifold designs of violence which, through God's mercy, we have escaped; by the great and frequent breaches of privilege; by the subtle endeavours to raise parties in our house, and jealousies betwixt the two houses.—6. The Obstruction in providing for the Defence of the Kingdom, that we might be enabled to resist a foreign enemy, to suppress all civil insurrections: and what a pressing necessity there is of this, the exceeding great decays in the navy, in the forts, in the power of ordering the militia of the kingdom, and means of furnishing them with munition, are sufficient evidences, known to none better than your lordships, and what endeavours we have used to remove them; but, hitherto, without that success and concurrence which we expected: and where the stop hath been, and upon what good grounds we may claim our own innocency and faithfulness in this, we desire no other witnesses but yourselves.—Lastly, I come to the evil Influences which have caused this Distemper; and I shall content myself with mentioning those which are most important. 1. I shall remember the evil counsels about the king, whereof we have often complained. Diseases of the brain are most dangerous, because from thence sense and motion are derived to the whole body. The malignity of evil counsels will quickly be infused into all parts of the state. None can doubt but we have exceedingly laboured under most dangerous and mischievous counsels. This evil influence hath been the cause of the preparation of war with Scotland; of the procuring a Re-

billion in Ireland; of corrupting religion, suppressing the liberty of this kingdom; and many fearful and horrid attempts to the subverting the very being of parliament, which was the only hopeful means of opposing, preventing all the rest; and this doth appear to be a most predominant evil of the nation, whereat we need not wonder, when we consider how counsellors have been preferred and pardoned. And I appeal to your lordships' consciences, whether the giving and countenancing of evil counsel hath not been, and shall be the only way to favour and advancement. The Discouragement of good Counsel. Dislike of honest and approved counsellors have been sent from their places; others so discontented, as that the way of favour hath been shewn to them, and that of danger and destruction open to them. 3. The great Power of the interested and factious Party hath in the parliament, by the continuance of the votes of Bishops and Popish lords in your lord house; and the taking in of others both of the house of commons, and otherwise, to increase their strength. 4. The fomenting cherishing of a malignant Party throughout the whole kingdom. 5. The manifold Jealousies betwixt the King, his Parliament, and the Subjects; whereby his protection and favour hath, in a great measure, been withheld from them; their inclination and resolution to assist him, hath been very much hindered and interrupted; we have often suffered by the mis-interpretation of good actions, and imputation of evil which we never intended, so that we may justly purge ourselves for guilt of being authors of this jealousy and misunderstanding. We have been and are ready to serve his majesty with our lives, fortunes, with as much cheerfulness and earnestness of affection as ever any subjects; and we doubt not but our proceedings manifest this, that we shall be as clear in apprehension of the world, as we are in testimony of our own consciences.—I now come to a conclusion; and I have nothing propound to your lordships by way of request or desire from the house of commons. I do not but your judgments will tell you what is to be done: your consciences, your honours, interests, will call upon you for the doing. The commons will be glad to have your concurrence and help in saving of the king; but if they fail of it, it should not discourage them in doing their duty. And whether the kingdom be lost or saved, (but I hope by God's blessing, it will be saved) they shall be sorry that the story of this present parliament should tell posterity, That in so great a danger and extremity, the house of commons should be enforced to save the kingdom alone, and the house of peers should have no part in the honour of the preservation of it; you have great an interest in the good success of these endeavours, in respect of your great estate, and high degrees of nobility.

The foregoing speech was so agreeable commons, that the same day they ordered, that Mr. Speaker, in the name of the house, should give thanks unto Mr. Pym for his so well performing the service he was employed in by commands of this house at this conference. It was farther ordered, That Mr. Pym be desired to put the Speech he made at this conference into writing, and to deliver it into the house, to the end that it may be printed." It was done accordingly; and from the edition published by order of the house, the record is taken.

Exceptions to Words spoken by the Duke of Richmond.] Jan. 26. The lord keeper having reported the foregoing conference, a motion was made for joining with the commons petitioning his majesty about putting the militia and Militia of the Kingdom into safer hands, &c. upon the new Reasons offered at said conference. This occasioned a long debate, the house being in a committee; when, it resumed, some lords desired the house to be adjourned, to which the duke of Richmond answered, "Let us put the question, Whether we shall adjourn for six months?" In words the house taking exception to, the duke explained himself, "That he did not say these words positively, but meant that the house might be adjourned as well for six months, as to a time not limited.*" But this not satisfying, the duke withdrew; when, after more debate, the question was put, Whether it shall be sufficient satisfaction to this house, That the lord duke of Richmond shall return to his place, and make an humble submission, as an acknowledgment that he hath abused the house in speaking these words considerably and unadvisedly; and that he has no intention to have the house adjourned six months, and that he craves their lordships pardon for it?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Voted thereupon.] Against which the following Protest was entered: "That, in respect the words spoken by the duke of Richmond tended to the prejudice of the king and kingdom, we do protest against this vote, as not sufficient punishment for Words of that dangerous consequence: Northumberland, lord marshal; Bedford, Essex, Penbroke, Suffolk, Northampton, Leicester, Warwick, Holland, Bolingbroke, Stamford, Conway, Wharton, Paget, Mordaunt, Chandois, St. John, Spencer, Kymberley, Brooke, Grey de Werk, Roberts, Howards, Escrick, Willoughby de Parham."

The Queen's Answer concerning a Report that the Commons intended to accuse her of High Treason.] Jan. 27. The earl of Newport related to the lords the Queen's Answer to the message sent to her, concerning a report of a design to accuse her of High Treason, to this effect: "That there was a general report of an accusation intended against her, but she never saw any Articles in writing; and having no certain author either for the one or the other, she gave little credit thereto: and much less now, being assured from the house of commons, that never any such thing came into their thoughts; nor will she believe they would lay an aspersion upon her, who hath ever been unapt to misconstrue the actions of any one person, and much more the privileges of parliament; and shall, at all times, wish a happy understanding between the king and his people." Ordered to be communicated to the commons; but in their Journals is this Addition to the former Message; "Upon better recollection of myself, I do confess and acknowledge to have been mistaken in reporting what was delivered me, on discourse with some member of the house of commons; and am most heartily sorry for it; beseeching, with all humility, the pardon of the honourable house of commons, for that my great mistake."

Lord Clarendon says, "The motion for adjournment was made by some of the dissenting Lords, who were not willing the power of the Militia should then come into debate."

The Commons charge the Duke of Richmond with being a Malignant, and an evil Counsellor to the King.] Jan. 29. A message came up, also, from the commons, brought by sir Peter Wentworth, desiring a conference, touching the duke of Richmond.* The lords fixed upon a present meeting; when, being returned from it, the lord keeper reported the substance of it to this effect:

"That Mr. Glynn said, He was commanded by the house of commons, to acquaint their lordships with what information had been given to them about the said duke. 4. That he did write unto the town of Hithe, to chuse one captain Wimberley to serve for one of the barons there in this parliament, but he was not chosen. A letter was produced, wrote by one of the duke's officers, said to be by his grace's direction, to prove this: as also, another to capt. Collins, deputy lieutenant, directed to the mayor and jurats of Hithe, for the return of the said election. 2. Mr. Perd, a member of the house of commons, informed that house, That whilst the affair of Mr. Percy and Mr. Jernyn were before the house, and before their offences were declared high treason, one Mr. Scroop, the duke's steward, came to him, and, in his master's name, desired Mr. Perd to forbear to press the matter concerning those gentlemen; affirming, that it would be an acceptable service, and would do him good. Which last words Mr. Perd construed to mean, that the king and queen would take notice of it as an acceptable service. This he would not say positively, but he believed it, &c. 3. That, by a copy of a record then in their house, it did appear, that the duke of Richmond did, on the 26th of Jan. instant, desire that the question might be put for the adjournment of the house of lords for six months. Upon the whole, the house of commons passed this vote, That they had sufficient cause to accuse the duke of Richmond as one of the Malignant Party, and an evil Counsellor to the King, for these reasons; 1. That he endeavoured to have such members chosen as he should name; and his way of menacing afterwards shews an intention to overthrow the freedom of election, and making a party in parliament. 2. That he endeavoured to corrupt the members of the house of commons after they were elected, even in matters of the highest nature; for support of the delinquents that were in question for endeavouring to bring the army upon the parliament. 3. The motion made in the house, if effected, would certainly be the loss of Ireland, and hazard the ruin of this kingdom; there being distractions at home, and imminent danger in Ireland, and no way to help both but by parliament; which, if it had been adjourned, in consequence that necessary and good act, for the continuance of this parliament, would have been ineffectual. Upon all which the house of commons desire their lordships forthwith to join with them to petition his majesty, That the duke may not have any access to the persons or courts of the king or queen; and that he may be removed from all offices and places of public trust. And that this may be done with all speed, in regard of the great places of trust and confidence he now holds.”—Mr. Glynn concluded with telling their lordships, “That it was the care of the house of commons to prevent the evils that hang over our heads; and they can do no less, in regard to the duty they owe to the king, who has called them as his council; to their country that hath intrusted them; and, lastly, they do it to satisfy their own consciences. They say they saw the stone that hit them, but could not discover the arm that threw it. They say they wash their hands of the ill consequences of these things, and lay it at their lordships door.”

This report being ended, the duke of Richmond stood up, and made his humble desire, “That he might have a copy of the heads of this Information against him; and that he be allowed some short time to give in his Answer.” The lords agreed this, and ordered the 31st instant, for that purpose.

The Duke's Speech in his own Defence.] Jan. 31. The duke of Richmond brought in his Answer to the Charge against him from the commons, which his grace, standing in his place, read in these words:

“My Lords, I take it this vote of the house of commons, which to me must prove very heavy, if it light upon me, is grounded on these three Reasons.”—Then his grace presented the substance of the three Articles brought by the commons against him; and proceeded thus:—“Upon these three Reasons the house of commons have desired your lordships to join with them in petitioning his majesty, That I might not have any access to the persons or court of the king and queen, &c. This is the Charge. Though these requests, if put in execution, would much afflict me; yet the sense of the house of commons, and their ill opinion of me, (which I judge by their vote) is a greater cross than any that hath yet befallen me: but I have this comfort, that as the house of commons have passed this vote, and made these requests upon me without hearing my defence; so that, when your lordships shall hear my clear and ingenuous Answer, you, I hope, will be so far from joining with them in any such request to his majesty, that I shall presume to be an humble suitor to your lordships to clear my innocence to the house of commons; and to set me right in their good opinion; which I much desire; who, I doubt not, are so just as to acquit or condemn, according as the cause shall appear unto them.—And to your lordships I affirm, by all that may procure belief, that I did never malign the prosperity and happiness of the king, kingdom, or parliament; my interest in all may be some persuasion to justify what I say; or did give the king, my master, any council whatever, but what, in my own heart, I conceived to tend to the advancement of his honour, and maintenance of the public good of the kingdom; the union of the king and his people each to the other, and a right understanding and correspondence between him and his parliament; and, from my heart, I cannot but declare against any, if there be any, of a contrary opinion.—So far am I from a thought of prejudice to the kingdom of Ireland, that I would rejoice as much to see the Protestants there settled in peace and their possessions, the Protestant religion there established, the rebels there suppressed, and the kingdom reduced to obedience, as any of his majesty's subjects, and be as ready to join in giving assistance to effect it; for I crave leave to let your lordships know, that I have, some months since, sent into Ireland, of my own, 29 barrels of powder, 120 muskets and pikes, 90 corslets and head-pieces, besides match and bullets, both for great ordnance and muskets, to Colmore castle, for the defence of that, Londonderry, and the country about it; and I left 200*l.* sterling in my agent's hands, for defraying the charge of transporting those things.—But to apply myself to the particular reasons of the Charge against me; it rests upon the truth of the fact, and your lordships judgement of it, either to acquit or condemn me, which I shall wholly submit to. I must crave your lordships pardon for giving any Answer at all to the third Reason, touching what passed from me in this house; as well in respect of the privilege of this house, where things of that nature, as I conceive, are to be questioned; as for that your lordships have already taken the same into your consideration, and I have undergone and performed your lordships censures thereon before this accusation. I know it will not seem just to your lordships, that I should be in a worse case than any other subject, to receive a double punishment for one and the same offence; and I know your lordships cannot but conceive it to be of more than ordinary consequence in the precedent.—For the other, shall give your lordships a distinct Answer. must beg your leave to deny some things which have been charged upon me; but shall manfully confess whatsoever I know to be a truth, touching these things, how prejudicial to it may prove to me; and rely more upon my own innocence, than to defend myself denying a truth, or defending what is not true. 'Magna est veritas et prevalebit.' I wish may do so in what concerns me. 'Regnet veritas et ruat Cælum.'—I conceive the Proof of the first Reason, inducing the house of commons to believe an intention in me to overthrow the freedom of election, and make a party in parliament, is upon the information of Henry Hayman, That I did write to the Mayor of Hithé to chuse one captain Wimberly, for one of the barons there, in this present parliament, but he was not elected. A gentleman that gave the information I do not know; but it is true in this; and if it be an offence, I shall be so far my own accuser, that I have here brought a true copy of that letter which I sent to that port, with a witness, to attest it. Other recommendation, than by that letter only, I never made for any town; but I was so far, before this accusation, from thinking it an offence, that I sent to your lordships I wrote the like letter to other places, within the jurisdiction of the Cinque Ports; and I was informed, That the warden of the Cinque Ports had, in all times, done the same. But this being no more than a bare recommendation, their choice was left free, and some of those places my request prevented, some not: But I had never so much as a thought of ill against any who gave him his vote for the party recommended; and will stand my honour and fortune, that no man can affirm that I ever gave them the least check in this occasion.—For the Copy of the Letter then by captain Collins, suggested to be one of my officers, and signified to be by my directions; I confess that captain was deputy of the tenancy of Dover castle, which is under my command; but whether the captain wrote such a letter to the port of Hithé, I know not; but I know for certain, that my directions imported not so much; and I hope your lordships will not think it just to charge me with a high crime, drawing on so heavy a punishment, for that an under-officer shall do without my knowledge. Yet, in this, I will not conceal a particle of truth; for it is true I did write to captain Collins, and shall shew your lordships the very letter itself, which I have sent for to your last sitting; and when I have told your lordships the occasion, which I shall make good by proof, I am confident you will find it to be from a crime. It was this: I being warden of the Cinque ports, and the writ of summons to parliament directed to me, I make warrant for the several ports, for election of their barons; which, when done, they return them to me, and I return them with the writ of summons. And, I having made warrants, accordingly, to the ports, and received and returned their barons elected, I was informed from the port of Sandwich, that some had given voices in their election who received alms from the town, with some other questions about elections in other places, particularly Rye, for which I was informed there was a petition in parliament; and because I might be able to give an account touching all these elections, if occasion were, I wrote to all the ports in general, to be certified how the elections went by the poll; that is, to know how many voices went for the one, and how many for another; but for their names, I wrote not, though I had ground enough given me by the complaint of Sandwich; and, if captain Collins, upon this letter of mine, have been too exact, I hope that shall not turn to my prejudice or his, since there was no ill intent, nor hath been any ill consequence from it: for this I affirm, confidently, to your lordships, That not one elector, in any of the ports, was ever menaced or ill used by me, or my direction. I cannot be disproved in this, and your lordships will hardly believe I wrote to captain Collins out of any intention of revenge; when, by the same letter, I desired to be certified of the poll in all the ports, as well where the party recommended by me was elected, as where he was not.—This is the whole truth, and my Answer touching that business; and if it be an offence to write a letter to recommend a gentleman for an election, yet, I hope, it will not deserve so severe a punishment. Sure I am I never understood it an offence; for, if I had, I should not have done it myself, or believe it to be generally done by others, who, I hope, will never come in danger of punishment for it. And now, before I go to the second Head, I desire your lordships to hear the letters, and the witness upon the occasion of them.—Then the Letter to the Mayor and Jurats of Hithé was read, with their Answer to his grace, which contained much the same as is expressed in his Defence; as did also, the Letter to captain Collins, in relation to the sending up the Polls of all the ports. Then the duke proceeded:—"The second and only thing to be now answered, is, The endeavouring to corrupt the members of the house of commons, after they were elected, for support of delinquents. The offence which is charged, I am confident your lordships will not find me guilty of; all the instance of proof is only upon a message pretended to be delivered to one Mr. Perd, a member of the house of commons, by my steward, who is my cousin, Adrian Scroop; and some speeches and gestures of mine to Mr. Perd, some time after that message. I know your lordships will not take this upon an implicit faith, that it is true, because it is charged against me. But I must crave your noble justice, as a free subject as well as a peer, to be judged secundum probata as well as allegata; and, notwithstanding this misfortune which is fallen upon me, I hope you believe I will not tell you an untruth. I confess I sent my steward to Mr. Perd; and he being one who has long been with me, and ever carried himself honestly and like a gentleman, gives me confidence that he delivered no such message to Mr. Perd from me, as is charged. I protest to your lordships, upon my honour, that the message I sent was no more than to this effect, "That if, in the business of Mr. Percy it fell in his way to do him any just favour, that I should take it as a courtesy, and express it to him upon any fair occasion." This was without any other intimation or particular request whatsoever, and I am confident my servant delivered it to him no otherways; for he brought me a civil answer of his readiness to do any thing he might, with a good conscience, which was as much as I desired. And I was so far from taking offence, that, when I spoke to Mr. Perd, it was only to avow my servant, and to give him thanks; and no such thing happened as has been informed by him.—Now, my lords, Mr. Percy being my old acquaintance at school; in our travels, and here at home, having lived friends together; I thought I could do no less than to ask just favours for him in his distress. There was no unlawful thing desired; no bribes offered; if this be an offence, as I hope it is not, I am confident it will not be so heinous as to draw so heavy a censure upon me.—And because, my lords, I would be quit of this great burthen, I have caused Scroop to attend without; and desire your lordships to examine him, upon his oath, touching the truth of the message, and what passed between Mr. Perd and him; for I am guilty of no tittle more than what I have confessed to you. I know not what passed in the house of commons, or that Mr. Perd had ever spoken in that business; or if Scroop had desired him not to press that business, or persuaded him not to call upon it, or intimated any thing of the king or the queen, which I believe he did not, it was without any direction from me, and let him answer for it. But I rather believe there was no ill in the message, because Mr. Perd did not then, nor at any time since, till this question in the house of commons, call upon him or me concerning it. My lords, I am no lawyer or orator, but I am a gentleman; and, in that consideration, so much concerned in what is moved against me, as though life or a total confiscation may not be desired, yet, upon the consequence of it, so much of honour and reputation depends, that I esteem it equal to any of those censures. But I have so much innocence in me, as makes me confident that I cannot miscarry by your lordships judgment; and therefore have adventured to make my own defence, who best know the truth of my own heart; and so I submit myself and cause, which concerns you all, to your lordships judgment. RICHMOND."

The duke having ended, he desired that Thomas Webb, his secretary, might, upon oath, relate the occasion of writing the Letters to the Port Towns; which was one complaint against his grace. Then the lords sent a message to the commons, "That, in regard of their offer made at the last conference, they desire that sir Henry Hayman and Mr. Perd may come to this house, and, upon oath, testify what they know in the business concerning the duke of Richmond."

The King's Message relative to the Bill for Tonnage, &c.] The same day the new grant of a Subsidy on Tonnage and Poundage, &c. was read a second and third time in the house of lords, and passed into a law. After this the lord keeper informed the house, That he had received a Letter from the King, with a Message inclosed to both houses, which were read in hæc verba:

"Charles R. Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well; Our will and pleasure is, that you deliver the Message enclosed, to be read in our house of peers before the passing the bill for Tonnage and Poundage, for which this shall be your warrant.—Given at our Court at Windsor the last day of January, 1641."

"Though his majesty, having passed more acts of justice and grace in this parliament than has ever been passed by any of his royal ancestors, might well expect, from the affection and gratitude of his parliament, to have received the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage for no less a time than it hath been granted to any of his predecessors; yet, in regard that, by a clause in this bill, he finds that his parliament intends not to continue the old Book of Rates, and that the settling a new one must require some time; and in respect that otherwise it might beget an interruption of trade, give an advantage to foreign states, and leave the sea unguarded, to the danger of this kingdom and Ireland; he hath, at this time, given a commission for the passing of this present bill, the 25th of March: not doubting but, as soon as their extraordinary affairs will permit, that they will settle a new Book of Rates; and, in granting this Subsidy in the usual manner, will give a proof of their good intentions, as they have often expressed, and of which he is fully satisfied, to consider no less both his subsistence and splendor, than their own liberties and interests."

Further Proceedings against the D. of Richmond.] Feb. 1. The house of lords proceeded in the business of the duke of Richmond: when Mr. Perd gave his evidence, upon oath, nearly in the same manner as is before related. The duke, having heard this evidence, denied that he gave his steward, Mr. Scroop, any such directions as Mr. Perd alledged, and then withdrew. The house went into a debate, Whether Mr. Scroop ought to be examined, upon oath, to know what directions the duke gave him; because, thereby, he might accuse himself. The Judges Opinions being asked on this question, they were all in a mind, That, in their ordinary courts of justice, Mr. Scroop might, by law, be examined on oath.—Hereupon Mr. Scroop was sworn and examined, who said, "That the duke directed him to go to Mr. Perd, and to desire him, that, in the business of Mr. Percy, he would, if it fell fairly in his way, ther incline to do good offices, than press in poor; and that thereby he might engage my lord duke to render him thanks, and return such favours as fell in his way; and that I had no directions to speak of any favours tendered from the king or queen."

This being done, the lords considering of the evidence on both sides, the affair of the Cinque ports being dropped, the question was put, whether that house should join with the commons in the Petition against the duke? It ended in the negative.

This day the house of commons sent up a draught of a Petition to the King, concerning the lord Kymbolton and the 5 Members, in which was recited all that was passed in that business; and that they once again besought his majesty to give directions that they might be informed, in two days time, what proofs were against them, that they might be brought to a legal trial, it being the undoubted right and privilege of parliament, that no member can be proceeded against without their consent. To which Petition they desired their ships concurrence; which was granted.

The King's Answer to the Commons Petition concerning the Tower, &c. This day, also, the commons sent up a Message, to desire the lords to join with them in another Petition to the King, That the Forts and Militia of the kingdom might be put in such hands as were proved of by both houses of parliament; to desire that house to lay this thing to heart; and tell them, that if they will not join with the commons, now that things are brought to the point, then to desire those lords that are of opinion with this house, to declare themselves, that they may be known from the rest; to protest themselves innocent of whatever mischief may fall out; and to tell them plainly, that they must not expect the commons to come to them again on this business. Lastly, to communicate to their lordships an Answer which they had received from the King, on the Petition of their own, presented to him, concerning that affair; which was read in these words:

"His majesty having seriously considered of the Petition presented to him from the house of commons, on Wednesday the 26th of this month, returns this Answer; That he was in good hope his gracious Message of the 20th of this month, to both houses, would have produced some such overture, which, by offering it is fit on their parts to do, and asking it is proper for his majesty to grant, might bring a mutual confidence in each other. Concerning the Tower of London, his majesty did expect that (having preferred a person of a known fortune and unquestionable reputation to that trust) he should be pressed to remove it, without any particular charge objected against him, and therefore returns this Answer; That if, upon due examination, any particular shall be presented to his maj. whereby it may appear that his majesty was mistaken in his opinion of this gentleman, and that he is unfit for the trust committed to him, his maj. will make no scruple of discharging him; but, otherwise, his majesty is obliged, in justice to himself, to preserve his own work, lest his favour and good opinion may prove a disadvantage and misfortune to his servants, without any other accusation; of which his maj. doubts not his house of commons will be so tender, as of a business wherein his majesty's honour is so much concerned, that, if they find no material exception against this person, they will rather endeavour to satisfy and reform the fears of other men, than, by complying with them, press his maj. to any resolution which may seem so much to reflect upon his honour and justice. For the Forts and Castles of the kingdom; his maj. is resolved that they shall always be in such hands (and only such) as the parliament may safely confide in; but the nomination of any persons to those places (being so principal and inseparable a flower of his crown, vested in him, and derived unto him from his ancestors, by the fundamental laws of the kingdom) he will reserve to himself; in bestowing whereof, as his majesty will take care that no corrupt or sinister courses shall prevail with him, so he is willing to declare, That he shall not be induced to express that favour so soon to any persons as to those whose good demeanor shall be eminent in or to his parliament; and if he now hath, or shall at any time, by misinformation, confer such a trust upon an undeserving person, he is, and always will be, ready to leave him to the wisdom and justice of his parliament.—For the Militia of the Kingdom (which, by the law, is subject to no command but of his majesty, and of authority lawfully derived from him); when any particular course, for the ordering the same (which his majesty holds very necessary for the peace and security of his kingdom) shall be considered and digested by his parliament, and proposed to his maj. his maj. will return such an Answer as shall be agreeable to his honour, and the safety of his people; his maj. being resolved only to deny those things, the granting whereof would alter the fundamental laws, endanger the very foundation upon which the public happiness and welfare of his people is founded and constituted, and nourish a greater and more destructive jealousy between the crown and the subject, than any of those which would seem to be taken away by such a satisfaction. And his maj. doth not doubt, that his having granted more than ever king hath granted, will ever persuade his house of commons to ask more than ever subjects have asked; and if they shall acquaint his maj. with the particular grounds of their doubts and fears, he will very willingly apply remedies proportionable to those fears; for his maj. calls God to witness, that the preservation of the public peace, the law, and the liberty of the subject is, and shall always be, as much his majesty's care and industry, as of his own life, or the lives of his dearest children: and therefore his maj. doth conjure his house of commons, by all the acts of justice and favour they have received from him this parliament, by their hopes of future happiness in his majesty, and in one another, by their love of religion and the peace of this kingdom, in which that of Ireland cannot be forgotten, that they will not be transported, by jealousies and apprehensions of possible dangers, to put themselves or his majesty into real and present inconveniences; but that they will speedily pursue the way proposed by his majesty's former Message, which, in human reason, is the only way to compose the distractions of the kingdom, and, with God's blessing, will restore a great measure of felicity to king and people."

Both Houses declare the Advisers of the said Answer to be Enemies to the Kingdom, and petition the King again.] This Answer being read, the lords took it into consideration, and then resolved, first to join with the commons in voting, That whosoever advised the king to give this Answer, is of the malignant party, and an enemy to the public peace and safety of the kingdom. Likewise to join with them in the Petition, as desired; and these votes being communicated to the other house, they returned for Answer, That they received them with a great deal of joy, and that they hope it would be for the good of the king and of the whole kingdom.

Feb. 2. A draught of the above-mentioned Petition was read in the house of lords, agreed to, and presented to the king this day by 2 lords and 4 commons, and was in hæc verba:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty. The Humble PETITION of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament.

"Most Gracious Sovereign, The present evils and calamities wherewith your kingdoms are most miserably intangled, the imminent dangers which threaten your royal person and all your people, have caused us your most faithful and obedient subjects, the lords and commons in this present parliament, with thankfulness to entertain, and with all earnestness of affection and endeavour to pursue, the gracious proposition and direction which, not long since, we have received from your majesty: and we have thereupon taken into our most serious consideration the ways and means of securing the safety of your royal person; preserving the honour and authority of your crown; removing all jealousies betwixt your majesty and your people; suppressing the rebellion in Ireland; preventing the fears and dangers in this kingdom; and the mischievous designs of those who are enemies to the peace of it. And that we may, with more comfort and security, accomplish our duties hereip, we most humbly beseech your majesty, That you will be pleased forthwith to put the Tower of London, and all other Forts, and the whole Militia of the kingdom, into the hands of such persons as shall be recommended unto your majesty by both houses of parliament; which, they assure themselves, will be a hopeful entrance into those courses, which, through God's blessing, shall be effectual for the removing of diffidence and misapprehension betwixt your majesty and your people, and for establishing and enlarging the honour, greatness, and peace of your majesty and royal posterity, and for restoring and confirming the peace and happiness of your loyal subjects in all your dominions. And to this our most necessary petition, we, in all humility, expect your most speedy and gracious Answer, the great dangers and distempers of the kingdom notwithstanding any delay."

Sir E. Dering expelled, &c. for printing Speeches.] This day the house of commons entered into a debate and consideration of a bill composed and printed by sir Edward Dering, and observed unto him divers passages of it, which were laid to his charge: and when he made his several and respective Answers to these Charges, he was commanded to withdraw: then it was resolved, 1. "That a bill of Speeches made by sir Edward Dering, knight and baronet, in Matter of Religion against the honour and privilege of this house, and scandalous to this house; and shall be burned, by the hands of the common hangmen in Westminster, Cheapside, and Smithfield. That the said sir E. Dering shall be denied to sit as a member of this house, during parliament; and that a new writ shall be issued for electing a knight to serve for the county of Kent, in the room and place of sir E. Dering thus disabled; and that he be sent to the Tower, there to remain during the pleasure of the house *."—Sir Edward being called in kneeling at the bar, Mr. Speaker pronounced this sentence, against his book and him accordingly.

The Trial of the 12 Bishops was, once more put off to the 8th instant; after which the houses adjourned to the 4th, and on the 1st of the mean time, that committee do sit on Irish Affairs at Merchant Tailors Hall.

Petition to the Commons from the Town of Ipswich, for Redress of Grievances. February 4. A very singular Petition was that day presented to the commons from the gentlewomen, and tradesmen's wives, in the city. On the last day of sitting these zealous had been observed to crowd about the door of the commons, † and some major Skippon, the commander of the militia, had applied to the house, to know what to do with them; they telling him, "That there was one now there would be 500."

* Upon this last question the house divided Yeas 85, Noes 61. But he was discharged few days after.—Commons Journals.

'The Oyster-women lock'd their fish up
'And trudg'd away to cry 'No Bishops.'
Hudibras, Part I. Canto 4.

day; and that it was as good for them to be here, as at home.' The house advised him to speak them fair, and send them home again: at this day they were as good their words: they came down in great numbers and presented a Petition to the commons, which was received and read. This Petition is mentioned in their Journals: and as it is preserved in our collections, we think it proper to give it here, with the Answer to it, as it was printed in these times: *

To the Honourable Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons assembled in Parliament: The Humble PETITION of the GENTLEWOMEN, TRADESMEN'S WIVES, and many others of the FEMALE SEX, all Inhabitants of the City of London, and the Suburbs thereof, With the lowest submission shewing;

"That we, with all thankful humility, acknowledging the unwearied pains, care, and great charge, besides hazard of health and life, which you the noble worthies of this honourable and renowned assembly, have undergone, for the safety both of church and common-wealth, for a long time already past; for which not only we, your humble petitioners, and all well-affected in this kingdom, but also all other good Christians are bound now, and at all times, to knowledge; yet notwithstanding that many worthy deeds have been done by you, great danger and fear do still attend us, and will, as long as Popish Lords, and superstitious Bishops are suffered to have their voice in the house of commons; that accursed and abominable Idol of a mass suffered in the kingdom; and that arch-enemy of our prosperity and reformation, (abp. and) lieth in the Tower, yet not receiving his deserved punishment. All these, under correction, gives us great cause to suspect that God is angry with us, and to be the chief causes by your pious endeavours for a further reformation proceedeth not with that success as we desire, and is most earnestly prayed for, by all that wish well to true religion; and the punishing estate both of king and kingdom: be insolencies of the Papists and their abettors, which hath a just fear and suspicion of sowing sedition, and breaking out into bloody persecution in this kingdom, as they have done in Ireland; the thoughts of which sad and barbarous actions maketh our tender hearts to melt within us, forcing us humbly to petition this honourable assembly, to make safe provision for yourselves, and us, before it be too late.—And whereas we, whose hearts have joined cheerfully with those Petitions which have been exhibited unto you, in the behalf of the purity of religion, and the liberty of our husbands persons and estates; recounting ourselves to have an interest in the common privileges with them, do, with the same confidence, assure ourselves to find the same gracious acceptance with you, for easing of those Grievances, which, in regard of our frail condition, do more nearly concern us, and do deeply terrify our souls; our domestic dangers, with which this kingdom is so much distracted, especially growing on us from those treacherous and wicked attempts which, already, are such as we find ourselves to have as deep a share in as any others.—We cannot but tremble at the very thoughts of the horrid and hideous facts, which modesty forbids us now to name, occasioned by the bloody wars in Germany and by his majesty's late Northern army. How often did it affright our hearts, whilst their violence began to break out so furiously upon the persons of those whose husbands or parents were not able to rescue them: We wish we had no cause to speak of those insolencies, savage usage and unheard-of rapes, exercised upon our sex in Ireland: And have we not just cause to fear they will prove the fore-runners of our ruin, except Almighty God, by the wisdom and care of this parliament, be pleased to succour us, our husbands and children, which are as dear and tender to us as the lives and blood of our hearts; to see them murdered and mangled and cut in pieces before our eyes; to see our children dashed against the stones, and the mother's milk, mingled with the infant's blood, running down the streets; to see our houses on flaming fire over our heads: Oh, how dreadful would this be!—We thought it misery enough, though nothing to that we have just cause to fear, but few years since, for some of our sex, by unjust divisions from their bosom comforts, to be rendered, in a manner, widows, and their children fatherless; husbands were imprisoned from the society of their wives, even against the laws of God and nature; and little infants suffered in their fathers' banishments: thousands of our dearest friends have been compelled to fly, from episcopal persecutions, into desert places amongst wild beasts, there finding more favour than in their native soil: and, in the midst of all their sorrows, such hath the pity of the Prelates been, that our cries could never enter into their ears or hearts; nor yet, through multitude of their obstructions, could ever have access or come nigh to those royal mercies of our most gracious sovereign, which we confidently hope would have relieved us.—After all these pressures ended, we humbly signify that our present fears are, that unless the blood-thirsty faction of the Papists and Prelates be hindered in their designs, ourselves in England, as well as they in Ireland, shall be exposed to that misery which is more intolerable than that which is already past; as, namely, to the rage, not of men alone, but of devils incarnate, as we may so say, besides the thralldom of our souls and consciences concerning God, which, of all things, are most dear unto us.—Now the remembrance of all these fearful accidents aforementioned, do strongly move us, from the example of the Woman of Tekoah, to fall submissively at the feet of his majesty, our dread sovereign, and cry, 'Help, O King!' Help ye the noble worthies now sitting in parliament! And we humbly beseech you, that you will be a means to his majesty and the house of peers, that they will be pleased to take our heart-breaking Grievances into timely consideration, and add strength and encouragement to your noble endeavours; and further, that you would move his majesty with our humble requests, that he would be graciously pleased, according to the example of the good king Asa, to purge both the court and kingdom of that great idolatrous service of the Mass, which is tolerated in the Queen's Court; this sin, as we conceive, is able to draw down a greater curse upon the whole kingdom, than all your noble and pious endeavours can prevent: the good and pious king Asa would not suffer Idolatry in his own mother, whose example if it shall please his majesty's gracious goodness to follow, in putting down Popery and Idolatry both in great and small, in the court and in the kingdom throughout; to subdue the Papists and their abettors; and by taking away the power of the prelates; (whose government, by long and woful experience, we have found to be against the liberty of our conscience, the freedom of the gospel, and the sincere profession and practice thereof) then shall our fears be removed: and we may expect that God will pour down his blessings, in abundance, both upon his majesty and upon this honourable assembly, and upon the whole land: for which your new Petitioners shall pray affectionately, &c."

The Reasons of this Petition follow:

"It may be thought strange, and unbecoming our sex, to shew ourselves by way of Petition to this honourable assembly: but the matter being rightly considered of, the right and interest we have in the common and public cause of the church, it will, as we conceive, under correction, be found a duty commanded and required: 1. Because Christ hath purchased us at as dear a rate as he hath done men, and therefore requireth the like obedience for the same mercy, as of men. 2. Because in the free enjoying of Christ in his own laws, and a flourishing estate of the church and common-wealth, consisteth the happiness of women as well as men. 3. Because women are sharers in the common calamities, that accompany both church and common-wealth, when oppression is exercised over the church or kingdom wherein they live; and unlimited power given to the Prelates, to exercise authority over the consciences of women as well as men; witness Newgate, Smithfield, and other places of persecution, wherein women as well as men have felt the smart of their fury. Neither are we left without example in Scripture; for when the state of the church, in the time of king Ahasuerus, was, by the bloody enemies thereof, sought to be utterly destroyed, we find that Hester the queen and her maids fasted and prayed; and that Hester petitioned to the king, in the behalf of the Church; and though she enterprized this duty with the hazard of her own life, being contrary to the law to appear before the king before she were sent for; yet her love of the church carried her through all difficulties, to the performance of that duty. On which grounds we are emboldened to present our humble Petition unto this honourable assembly, not regarding the reproaches which may and are, by many, cast upon us; who do not well weighing the promises, scoff and deride our good Intent. We do it not out of any self-conceit, or pride of heart, as seeking to equal ourselves with men, either in authority or wisdom: But according to our places, to discharge that duty we owe to God, and the cause of the church, as far as lyeth in us; following herein the example of those good women, which have gone, in this duty, before us."

Mr. Pym's Answer to them in the Name of the House. The editor of this Petition tells us, "That it was presented by Mrs. Anne Stagg, a gentlewoman, and brewer's wife, and many others with her of like rank and quality; and that, after some time spent in reading of it, the house sent them an answer by Mr. Pym, which was performed in this manner:

Mr. Pym came to the commons door, and called for the Women, and spake unto them in these words:— Good Women; Your Petition, with the Reasons, hath been read in the house, and is thankfully accepted of, and shall come in a seasonable time. You shall, God willing, receive from us all the satisfaction which we can possibly give to your just and lawful desires. We intreat you, therefore, to repair to your houses, and turn your Petition, which you have delivered here, into prayers at home for us; for we have been, are, and shall be, to our utmost power, ready to relieve you, your husbands, and children; and to perform the trust committed unto us, towards God, our king and country, as becometh faithful Christians and loyal subjects."

About this time, also, a Petition from the Young Men, Apprentices, and Seamen; another from the poor Tradesmen and Manufacturers; and a third from the very porters of London, to the same effect, were presented to the house of commons, who received them all very graciously.*

* "It is fresh in memory," says the author of a tract, entitled, 'Lex Talionis,' "how the city sent forth its spurious scum in multitudes to cry down Bishops, root and branch; what like shoals of herrings, or swarms of hornets, lay hovering about the court with lying pamphlets and scandalous pasquils, until they forced the king from his throne, and banished the queen from his bed, and afterwards out of the kingdom." "Good Lord!" says the 'True Informer,' Oxford, 1643, p. 12, "what a deluge of dirt was thrown in the Bishops' faces! what infamous ballads were sang! what a thick cloud of epidemical hatred hung suddenly over them! so far, that a dog with a black and white face was called a Bishop!"—See Grey's Hudibras, London, 1799. Vol. I. p. 149.

The Lords pass the Bill for taking away the Bishops Votes.] Feb. 5. A bill, which had laid on in the house of lords, 'For taking away the Bishops Votes in Parliament,' was read a third time; when, after a long debate, the question was put, Whether it should pass into a law? It was resolved in the affirmative; the Bishops of Winchester, Rochester, and Worcester only dissenting.

Feb. 7. The passing this bill being communicated to the commons, a message was sent the next day of meeting, by sir Robert Harcourt, importing, "That the commons did much rejoice in that clear concurrence and correspondence between both houses; and they desired their lordships would send some lords to the king, humbly to request, That he would be pleased to crown this bill with his royal assent, as one of the chiefest means of giving satisfaction to men's minds, and exceedingly conducing towards settling the distractions of the kingdom; which was the rather desired as soon as possible, because the bill was to commence and be of force on the 15th of this instant February."—The lords agreed also to this proposal, and ordered two of their body to attend the king for that purpose.

The King's second Answer relating to the Ports and Militia.] This day the lord keeper produced a Letter from the King, in which was closed his majesty's Answer to the two late petitions from parliament, which the lords ordered to be read, and was as follows:

"His majesty having well considered of the several Petitions, presented unto him the instant, from both houses of parliament; and being desirous to express how willing he is to apply a remedy, not only to your dangers, but even to your doubts and fears; he therefore, to that Petition which concerns the Ports and Militia of this kingdom, returns this Answer, That when he shall know the extent of power, which is intended to be established in those persons you desire to be the commanders of the Militia in the several counties; and likewise to what time it shall be limited, that no power shall be executed by his majesty alone without the advice of parliament.—Then he will declare, That (for the securing you from all dangers, or jealousies of any) his majesty will be content to put in all the places both of Ports and Militia in the several counties, such persons as both the houses of parliament shall either approve, or recommend unto him; so that you declare before unto his majesty, the names of the persons whom you approve or recommend; unless such persons shall be named against whom he shall have just and unquestionable exceptions."

The King's Answer concerning the accused Members.] To the other Petition, concerning the accused Members of either house, his majesty returns this Answer:

"That as he once conceived that he had ground enough to accuse them, so now his majesty finds as good cause wholly to desert any further prosecution of them: and, for a further testimony of his majesty's real intention towards all his loving subjects, some of whom happily may be involved in some unknown or unwilling errors; for the better composing and settling of fears and jealousies, of what kind soever; his majesty is ready to grant as free and general a pardon, for the full contentment of all his loving subjects as shall, by the approbation of both houses of parliament, be thought convenient for that purpose."

His majesty added, "That being very much pressed by the States Ambassador, to send the princess his daughter immediately into Holland; and being likewise earnestly desired by his royal consort, the queen, to give her majesty leave to accompany her daughter thither; he hath thought fit to consent to both desires; and to make this his majesty's consent, and her majesty's resolutions, known to his parliament."

Feb. 7. p. m. The commons desired a conference with the lords, about the aforesaid Answers; the report of which was, "That they presented to their lordships an Ordinance of parliament, concerning the Militia, with some Resolutions of their house, about the continuance of power to be put to it; which was voted to continue until it was altered by the advice and desires of both houses: and that the power of recommending or altering such persons, as shall be trusted with the Militia, be on the same footing as in the former."

Debate in the Commons concerning the Militia.] There had been many debates in the commons concerning the Militia: in which some members declared their opinions, That the power of the Militia was solely in the king, and ought to be left to him, and that the parliament never did, nor ought to meddle with the same. Others were of opinion, that the king had not this power in him, but that it was solely in the parliament; and that if the king refused to order the same according to the advice of the parliament, that then they, by the law, might do it without him. In one of these days debate,

Mr. Whitlocke spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; I have often heard it said in former debates, in other matters, in this house, that such and such a thing was of as great concernment as ever came within these walls. I am sure it may be said so of the matter of your present debate: it is truly of the greatest concernment that ever came within these walls. It highly concerns us all, and our posterity after us, where this power of the Militia shall be placed. This great power, which indeed commands all men, and all things, cannot be too warily lodged, nor too seriously considered; and I do heartily wish that this great word, this new word, this hard word, the Militia, might never have come within these walls; but that this house may be, as the Temple of Janus, ever shut against it. I take the meaning of those gentlemen who introduced this word to be, the power of the sword, potestas gladii, which is a great and necessary power, and properly belonging to the magistrate; potestas gladii in facinerosos, without which our peace and property cannot be maintained. But potestas gladii in inanibus facinerosorum, in the hands of soldiers, is that whereof you now debate: and it is best out of their hands; I hope it will never come there. Some worthy gentlemen have declared their opinions, that this power of the Militia is, by right and law, in the king only: others affirm it to be in the parliament only. I crave leave to differ from both these opinions. I humbly apprehend that this power of the Militia, is neither in the king only, nor in the parliament only; and if the law hath placed it any where, it is both in the king and parliament, when they join together. And it is a wise institution of our law, not to settle this power any where; but rather to leave it in dubio, or in nubibus, that the people might be kept in ignorance thereof, as a thing not fit to be known, nor to be pried into. It is the great arcanum imperii, and the less it is meddled with, the less acquaintance we have with it, the better it will be for all sorts of persons, both for king and people.—That this power of the Militia is not in the king only, appears in this, that the power of money is not in the king; but it will be granted here, that the power of money is solely in this house; and without the power of money to pay the soldiers, the power of the Militia will be of little force. But if the power of the Militia should be in the king, yet the power of money being in the parliament, they must both agree, or else keep the sword in the scabbard, which is the best place for it. It is true that the king, by his tenures, may require the service, in war, of those that hold of him; but if they stay above 40 days with him, unless he give them pay, they will stay no longer. And it is also true, that our law looks upon the king, as the Jewish law did upon theirs, that, by his kingly office, 'he is to go in and out before the people,' and to lead them in battle against their enemies; but, by the laws of the Jews, their king could not undertake a war abroad without the consent of the great Sanhedrin. And, by our law, as is declared by the statute 1 Edw. 3. and by divers subsequent statutes, the king can compel no man to go out of his country, but upon the sudden coming of strange enemies into the realm; and how many of our parliament rolls do record that the king advised with his parliament about his foreign wars, and could not undertake them without the advice and supplies of the parliament? All the power of the Militia is exercised either in offence or defence; defence is either against the invasion of enemies from abroad, or against insurrections at home. Against insurrections at home, the sheriff of every county hath the power of the Militia in him, and if he be negligent to suppress them with the Posse Comitatus, he is fineable for it. Against invasions from abroad, every man will be forward to give his assistance; there will be little need to raise forces, when every man will be ready to defend himself, and to fight pro aris & focis. And offensive war against a foreign enemy, if the king will make it of himself, he must of himself pay his army; which his own revenue can hardly afford, nor can he compel any of his subjects to serve him in those wars; nor can, by law, be pressed to serve in that war but by act of parliament. But not to waste more of your time, sir, I shall conclude, that, in my humble opinion, the power of the Militia is neither in the king alone, nor in the parliament alone, but if any where, in the eye of the law, it is in the king and parliament both consenting together. And I think it best that it should stay there still. I cannot join in that advice to settle the Militia of ourselves without the king; but rather with those worthy gentlemen who have moved, that we, yet again, should petition his majesty that the Militia may be settled in such hands as both he and you may agree upon whom you may trust; and who, I hope, will be more careful to keep the sword sheathed than to draw it.

The King delays his Assent to the Bill against the Bishops Votes. Feb. 8. This day the king agreed to the Resolutions of the commons about the Militia. The earl of Monmouth reported what the king said concerning the passage of both houses, to him, for passing the bill to take away the Bishops Votes, "That was a matter of weight, which his majesty would take into consideration, and send an Answer in convenient time."

The Commons' Reasons for hastening it. In the afternoon, the commons desired another conference with the lords, which was reported back to that house, That the commons desired they could not receive the king's Answer about the Bishops bill, but with great sorrow and little hope arising that it would pass. They say, they hold a delay to be as bad as a denial; and seeing the passing of this bill is a matter of that great importance, the whole kingdom being for it, as may appear by daily petitions from several parts, the commons desire the lords to join with them in presenting the three following Reasons for it being passed by the king: "1. The great and general concerns of the kingdom, by the clergy's exercise of secular jurisdictions, and the Bishops raising a party in the house of lords, as his late majesty hath expressed from several parts; is an opinion of parliament that there cannot be satisfaction given, either to the people's desires, or the heavy grievances they suffer under, without the speedy passing of this bill. 2. The great content which the bill's passing in both houses, hath given to all sorts of people, the delay whereof by his majesty will exceedingly lessen that satisfaction, and turn it into great discouragement. 3. The speedy passing of this bill, of such importance, would be to the lords and commons, a comfortable proof of his majesty's gracious intentions to comply with them in their subsequent desires; which they are preparing to present to his majesty, the cures of those great evils and miseries the kingdom now groans under."

The lords joined with the commons in presenting these Reasons to the king, and chose two of their body to go with a fit number of the commons for that purpose. The bill for pressing of Soldiers passed the house of lords this day; and the giving the royal assent to it, as made a part of the aforesaid message.

Mr. Pleydell's Speech concerning Religion..] during the debates of this day, Mr. Pleydell, member for Wotton Bassett, spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker; I have said, since I had the honour to sit here, many favours presented; and truly, sir, my heart leads within me when I think of them, especially those that concern Religion. But what would I speak of Grievances concerning Religion, when religion itself is become a Grievance; nay, the very nurse and mother of all favours, all scandals, all reproaches? 'Unum Religio potius sanderis malorum.' Sir, do to trouble you with any long discourse; if I have any sight, that bark, both of church and state, hath a long time floated betwixt Sylla and Charibdis, Popery on the one side, and I now not what to call it on the other; in many respects both alike dangerous, unless the Italian proverb may alter the case, 'God defend us from my reputed friends, and I will defend myself from my professed enemies.' Sir, we are trusted by God, the king, and the country, with the managing of this bark, fraught with the fortunes of three great kingdoms. Now, would we so decline the former rock, that we dash on the other side, I humbly offer it to this our assembly, whether she might not have just cause to say, she had changed her pilot rather than her condition, and only shifted places to find her ruin: for, sir there is as much beyond truth, as on this side it; and would we steer a right course we must be sure to keep the channel, lest we fall from one extreme to another, from the dotage of superstition, to the frenzy of profaneness; from bowing to idols, to worship the calves of our own imaginations. Sir, I beseech you consider, what libellous pamphlets are now printed, what sermons are preached, not building hay and stubble, but utterly subverting the foundations of truth: that irreverence in churches, what profanation of God's service, to the scandal of Christianity, the reproach of religion, and the intolerable neglect of all good men; of which I may take up the words of Petrus de Aliaco to the council of Constance, 'Nisi celeriter facta reformatio, video dicere, quod fiet magna sintque videamus tamen in brevi incensurabilia: majora videbimus, & post ista tantum horrenda majora aliamus.' Sir, I take God to record I am no man's advocate; no man's enemy, but a faithful lover of truth and peace, and a dutiful son of our distressed mother the church of England, in whose behalf, and our own, my motion shall be shortly this: That the Minister's Petition, with so much of their Remonstrance as hath been read, may be committed; and the rest of it, concerning matter of doctrine, may be referred to some learned and approved divines, as have spent their time in that noble study. For give me leave to tell you, there is a vulgus among the clergy, as among the laity, 'et in utroque nil modicum' and for these and all things which strike at the root and branch, as they please to call it, I shall humbly move that we rather consider how to satisfy the petitioners with some timely Declaration from both houses, of the lawfulness and conveniency of episcopal government, derived from the Apostles, and so long established in this kingdom, rather than venture upon any alteration, the consequence whereof the wisest men cannot foresee: and, in truth, sir, should we once begin, for my own part, I know not how, or where we should stay. Nevertheless, if any one doubt the superiority of Bishops over priests and deacons in ecclesiastical government, or in ordination, I shall be ready, whenever this house shall command me, to make it good, and I think by as pregnant testimonies, as we are able to prove the difference betwixt canonical and apocryphal scripture, the necessity of infants baptism, or that the apostles were the authors of their own creed: but, sir, I hope you will save yourself and me that labour, and rather devise of some set way to bind up the church's wounds, which God knows are too wide already; that so the clergy and laity being made friends, and all reduced to the model of our ancestors since the Reformation, we may altogether preserve the unity of the spirit, in the bond of peace; and so his majesty having graciously and prudently expressed himself, I am the more confident we shall not only put an end to all unintelligence betwixt prince and people, but also highly advance the Protestant cause, and give a deadly blow to the see of Rome. Sir, I humbly ask the favour of the house, for God is my witness 'Non potui aliter liberare animam meam'.

The King complains of a Passage in Mr. Pym's Speech..] The same day Mr. Speaker read a Letter from his majesty, and in it inclosed this message:

"His majesty taking notice of a Speech, pretending, in the title, to have been delivered by Mr. Pym, in a conference, and printed by order of the house of commons; in which it was affirmed, That since the stop upon the Ports, against all Irish Papists, by both houses, many of the chief commanders, now in the head of the rebels, have been suffered to pass, by his majesty's immediate warrant; and being very certain of having used extreme caution, in the granting of passports into Ireland; so that he conceives either this paper not to have been so delivered and printed as it pretends, or this house to have received some misinformation: his majesty would be resolved, whether this Speech were so delivered and printed; and if it were, would have this house to review, upon what informations that particular was grounded; that either that may be found, upon examination, to have been false, and both this house and his majesty injured by it: or that his majesty may know, by what means, and by whose fault, his authority hath been so highly abused, as to be made to condescend to the assistance of that rebellion, which he so much detests and abhors, and that he may see himself fully vindicated from all reflections of the least suspicion of that kind."

Hereupon a committee was appointed to consider of the king's Message, also of the Informations given to the house touching this business, and what is fit to be done thereupon.

Ordinance concerning the Militia.] Feb. 9. The commons sent to the lords an Ordinance concerning the Militia, which had passed their house with amendments. But some objection arising, Whether the words, 'shall answer their contempt to the lords and commons,' did not give a part of judicature to the lower house, it was thought fit to add to 'the lords and commons,' in a parliamentary way: which was agreed to. Then the whole was read in these words:

"Whereas there has been, of late, a most dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons, which we have just cause to believe to be an effect of the bloody counsels of Papists, and other ill-affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland: and by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to stir up the like rebellion and insurrections in this kingdom of England, but also to back them with forces from abroad: for the safety, therefore, of his majesty's person, the parliament, and kingdom, in this time of imminent danger; It is Ordained by the king, lords and commons now in parliament assembled, that shall have power to assemble and call together all and singular his majesty's subjects within the county of , as well within liberties as without, that are meet and fit for the wars, and them to train, exercise, and put in readiness, and them, after their abilities and faculties, well and sufficiently, from time to time, to cause to be arrayed and weaponed, and to take the muster of them in places most fit for that purpose. And shall have power and authority, within the said county, to nominate and appoint such persons of quality, as to him shall seem meet, to be his deputy lieutenants, to be approved of by both houses of parliament. And that any one or more of the said deputies, so assigned and approved of, shall in the absence, or by the command of the said , have power and authority to do and execute within the county of all such powers and authorities as before in this present Ordinance contained. And shall have power to make colonels and captains, and other officers, and to remove out of their places, and make others, from time to time, as he shall think fit for that purpose. And his deputies, colonels, and captains, and other officers, shall have further power and authority to lead, conduct, and employ the persons aforesaid arrayed and weaponed, as well within the county of , as within any other part of this realm of England, or dominion of Wales, for the suppression of all rebellions, insurrections, and invasions that may happen, according as they, from time to time, shall receive directions by his majesty's authority signified unto them by the lords and commons assembled in parliament. And it is further ordained, that such persons as shall obey in any of the premises, shall answer their neglect and contempt to the lords and commons in a parliamentary way, and not otherwise, nor elsewhere: And that every the powers granted, as aforesaid, shall continue, until it shall be otherwise ordered or declared by both houses of parliament, and no longer. This also to go to the dominion of Wales.—John Brown, Cler. Parl."

The commons next proceeded to nominate persons to be, by them, recommended to the king, as fit to be intrusted with the Militia of the kingdom; wherein they desired the king's concurrence, which was granted. Sir John Conyers was again recommended to the king from both houses, as lieutenant of the Tower.

Names of the Persons recommended to the Lieutenants of the Counties.] The nomination of the Lieutenants of the several Counties in England and Wales, employed the commons three several days. The Commons Answer to the King's Message concerning Mr. Pym's Speech.] This day Mr. Wm. Lewis reported, from the committee appointed to consider the king's Message relating to Mr. Pym's Speech, the following Answer; which was read, and, upon the question, assented to by the house, as follows:

"Your majesty's most loyal and faithful subjects, the commons now assembled in parliament, have taken into their serious consideration the Message received from your majesty, the 7th of this instant February; and do acknowledge, that the Speech therein mentioned was delivered by Mr. Pym, in a conference, was printed by their order; and that what was therein delivered, was agreeable to the sense of the house: And, touching that passage, wherein it is affirmed, That, since the stop upon the Ports against all Irish Papists, by both houses, many of the chief commanders, now in the head of the rebels, have been suffered to pass, by your majesty's immediate warrant, they present your majesty with this their humble Answer: That they have received divers advertisements, concerning several persons, Irish and other Papists, which have obtained your majesty's immediate warrant for their passing into Ireland, since the order of restraint of both houses; some of which, as they have been informed, since their coming into Ireland, have joined with the rebels, and been commanders amongst them; and some others have been stayed, and are yet in safe custody; particularly the lord Delvyn, and four other persons in his company, whereof one is thought to be a priest; one colonel Butler, brother to the lord Montgarratt, now in rebellion, and sir Geo. Hamilton; all which are Papists; and one other, as is reported, being the son of lord Nettersfield, whose father and brother are both in rebellion: the particular names of others we have not yet received; but doubt not, but, upon examination, they may be discovered. And your majesty's most faithful subjects are very sorry, that the extreme caution which your majesty hath used, hath been so ill seconded with the diligence and faithfulness of your ministers; and that your royal authority should be so highly abused; although, as it was expressed in that Speech by Mr. Pym, we believe it was by the procurement of some evil instruments, too near your royal person, without your majesty's knowledge and intention: and we beseech your majesty to take such course, that not only your honour may be vindicated for the time past, but your kingdom may be secured from the like mischief for the time to come."

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer*, Mr. Carew, sir Dndley North, and Mr. Strange-ways were appointed to attend his majesty with this Answer the next day.

Petition from the Inhabitants of Cleveland.] Several more Petitions from counties, to the same purpose as those before given, were presented and read; amongst which there was a short one from the Gentry, Ministry, and Commonalty of Cleveland, in the county of York, so particular in its style, as to deserve our notice:

"To the Rtt. Hon. the LORDS and COMMONS of the House of Parliament.

"Whereas we know no other means, under God, to divert the just judgments which he hath executed against the church of the Lacedaemonians, for their lukewarmness in Religion;

* Sir John Colepeper, so appointed about this time, when lord Falkland was made Secretary of State. The reasons for their promotion are very particularly detailed in Clarendon, Vol. I. p. 267.

or against the church of Thiatira, for keeping seducers; nor to prevent our imminent dangers, but by a most necessary and speedy executing of the laws of God and the king: We do therefore desire to certify, that we are resolved to live and die in the faith of the Protestant Religion, knowing no other means of salvation; and that we will defend it with our lives and goods: which that we may, with our abilities, be encouraged in performing, we humbly, above all things, desire that we may be secured; a happy reformation afforded; and the laws of God and the king, without favour or delay, justly put in execution against Papists. And your Petitioners, &c."—This Petition is said, in the Lords Journals, to be subscribed by several hundred hands.

The King consents to the Removal of the Lieutenant of the Tower. Feb. 11. The king's Answer to the desires of both houses, about the Lieutenancy of the Tower, was reported to the lords, which was to this effect:

"Although his majesty thinks himself not obliged to give an Answer, in any particular, concerning the Forts and Militia of the kingdom, until he shall know the extent of the power and time, and to whom they shall be disposed of; yet, to shew his real intention to satisfy the fears of his people, he is content to accept of sir John Conyers, in the place of sir John Byron, to be lieutenant of the Tower; having already, at his earnest desire, received the surrender of the said place from him."

The Lord Keeper's Speech on giving the Royal Assent to the Bills, for levying Soldiers, and taking away the Bishops Votes. Feb. 14. The lord keeper acquainted the lords, That he had received a commission from the king, to give the royal assent to two bills; one for levying of Soldiers, and the other for taking away the Bishops Votes and Seats in that house; and likewise that he had received a Message from his majesty, which was to be read after the bills were passed. He then addressed himself to the lords as follows:

"My Lords; His majesty being very willing to give full satisfaction to all the just desires of his subjects, especially when they are transmitted to him by the representative body of the kingdom, the lords and commons assembled in the high court of parliament, his great and general council, hath therefore taken into his serious consideration two Bills of great importance, which were lately passed by the votes of both houses: the one 'For impressing and raising of Soldiers for the present Expedition into Ireland,' to aid and relieve the poor distressed Protestants, who are there daily and barbarously butchered and massacred by the over-prevailing party of the bloody Papists; a thing taken much to heart by the king and all other good men. In which bill there is contained a clause, tending much to the security of the persons of the subjects of this kingdom, in declaring, That, by the law, no man ought to be impressed nor otherways compelled to go out of his country, to serve as a soldier, without his own particular assent; or by any common consent of parliament, wherein he is involved, unless it be upon necessity of the sudden coming of strange enemies into the land, as, heretofore, it was ordained by a statute made in the 1st year of Edw. 3. or that he be therunto obliged by assent; the custom whereof hath been practised for many ages, &c. facti.—The second bill, much wished and earnestly insisted on, is 'For taking away the Votes of Bishops out of the Lords House, exempting them from the trouble of ecclesiastical Affairs;' that so, being reduced to their first and original institution, they may better attend the gaining of souls to Heaven, their frequent preaching and other duties proper to their function; a work far more excellent than their mingling in temporal businesses. But in regard his majesty cannot with convenience, be present to give the assent to these two bills, in person, he hath done it by commission; which your lordships and the gentlemen of the house of commons may be pleased to bear read to your satisfaction, and content of the people in general."

The King's Message upon that Occasion. This being ended, with the ceremony of signing the two bills, the king's Message, dated Canterbury, Feb. 13, (where he went to the Queen on her Journey to Holland) was read to both houses in these words:

"Though his majesty is assured, that having so suddenly passed these two Bills, of so great importance, and so earnestly desired by both houses, will serve to the satisfaction of his kingdom; yet he may further manifest to both houses his patient he is, till he find out a full remedy to compose the present distempers, he is pleased to signify, That his majesty will, by proclamation, require, that all statutes made contrary to the recassants be, with all care, diligence, and verity, put in execution: That his majesty is resolved, that the 7 condemned Priests be immediately banished, if his parliament consent therunto: And his majesty will preserve the present order; if it shall be held fit by both houses, that a proclamation issue to recall Romish Priests, within 80 days, to depart the kingdom; and if any shall be apprehended at that time, his majesty assures both houses the word of a king, that he will grant pardon to any such, without consent of parliament.—And because his majesty observeth and different troubles to arise on the behalf of his people, concerning the government and turgery of the church, his maj. is willing to refer that whole consideration to the wisdom of his parliament; which he desires not to be pressed to answer on his part, till the whole be so settled by both houses, that his maj. clearly see what is fit to be left, as matter

fit to be taken away.—For Ireland, in behalf of which his majesty's heart bleeds, as his majesty hath concurred with all propositions made that service by his parliament, so he is resolved to leave nothing undone for their relief which shall fall within his possible power; nor I refuse to venture his own royal person in a war, if his parliament shall think it convenient, for the reduction of that miserable kingdom.—And, lastly, his majesty taking notice, by several Petitions, of the great and general Decay of Trade in this kingdom, and more particularly of that of cloathing and new peries; concerning which he received lately, Greenwich, a modest, but earnest, Petition from the clothiers of Suffolk; of which Decay Trade his majesty hath a deep sense both in respect of the extreme want and poverty it hath brought, and must bring, upon many thousands of his loving subjects; and of the hence it must have, in a very short time, upon the very subsistence of this nation; doth most justly and justly recommend the consideration of that at and weighty business to both houses; wishing them that he will, most readily, concur in any resolution their wisdoms shall find, which may conduce to so necessary a point.

The commons being withdrawn, it was moved: That the king might receive thanks and acknowledgments for his grace and goodness passing the two Bills, and likewise for his usage; and a committee was appointed to draw up a form to that purpose. Which being done, was read to the house as follows: "The lords and commons assembled in parliament with much joy receive, and with much thankfulness acknowledge, your majesty's grace favour in giving your royal assent to a bill, entitled, 'An Act for disabling all persons in Orders to exercise any Temporal Jurisdiction or Authority;' and also your majesty's care for Ireland expressed in the dispatch of a Bill for Pressing, so much importing the safety of that and this kingdom; and they do, with the like thankfulness, acknowledge your majesty's gracious favours, expressed in the message to both houses, that your majesty will grant any pardon to any Romish Priest without consent of parliament."

This being agreed to by the lords, was sent down to the commons, for their approbation, which they gave to it; but desired that the Order of parliament, touching the Militia, might be presented at the same time. The lords demurred to this; and ordered, That they should be presented separately.

Impeachment against the Attorney General.] On the 11th day, the commons sent up an Impeachment against sir Edw. Herbert, the king's Attorney General, for high crimes and misdemeanors, which was read to the lords in hæc Verba, That the said sir Edw. Herbert, knight, his majesty's Attorney General sworn, on the 3rd of Jan. 1641, contrary to his oath and the duty of his place, did falsely, scandalously and maliciously, advise, contrive, and publish certain false, scandalous, and malicious Articles of High Treason against the lord Kimbolton, one of the members of the house of peers in parliament, D. Hollis, esq; sir A. Haslerig, bart. J. Pym, J. Hampden, and Wm. Strode, esqrs. being then, and yet, members of the house of commons in parliament, which Articles follow in these words: [Here the Articles are recited, which we have before given at p. 1005.] And the said sir E. Herbert, the said 3rd day of Jan. did falsely, unlawfully and maliciously, exhibit the said Articles into the house of peers and caused the same to be entered into the clerk's book of the said house; intending and endeavouring thereby, falsely, unlawfully, and maliciously, to deprive the said houses of their said several members, and to take away their lives, estates, and good names. All which doings of the said attorney, and every of them, were, and are, high breaches of the privileges of parliament, tending to sedition, and to the utter subversion of the fundamental rights and being of parliaments, the liberty of the subject, and to the great scandal and dishonour of his majesty and his government; and were, and are, contrary to the oath of the said Attorney General, and to the great trust reposed in him by his majesty; and contrary to the laws of this realm; and a great derogation to his majesty's royal crown and dignity. For which high crimes and misdemeanors the said commons, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting any further or other Impeachment, or accusation, against the said sir E. Herbert, do impeach him; and do pray that he may be forthwith put to answer the premises in the presence of the commons, and that his person may be secured."

Hereupon the Attorney General was sent for, and standing in his place, as assistant, the Charge was read to him, who answered, That he humbly desired to have a copy of the Impeachment, and such time allowed as their lordships do, in justice give to others. The lords gave him 8 days to bring in his Answer; and the earl of Monmouth offering himself as bail for his appearance, he was bound in 5000*l.* bond for it.

The Trial of the 12 Bishops again deferred.] The next day having been appointed for the Trial of the Bishops, another message came up from the commons, That in regard of the many great and important occasions, now depending before them, they desire the Trial might be put off till Friday come se'nnight, and that they would then desire no further time. The lords agreed to this; but ordered, That, in regard the Bishops had been so many times put off, from day to day, from trial, and that many of them were aged men, they should be bailed; provided they found such security as the house should approve of, for their appearance on the said day, which was to be peremptory on all sides.

Lord Digby's Letters to the Queen, &c. intercepted.] A packet of letters from lord Digby bore

ing intercepted, directed to secretary Nicholas, was ordered to be opened; but one of them being directed to the Queen, the lords disputed the opening of it, and sent to know the opinion of the commons about it. They returned for Answer, That they had voted it should be opened; on which the lords, conceiving this affair to be a thing of great consequence, desired a conference; the report of which was, "That the commons said, they saw no reason to alter their vote; 1. Because it concerned the safety of the kingdom; for, by this means, the evil spirit and counsels of the lord Digby might be discovered and prevented. 2. If this Letter be delivered to the Queen unopened, the parliament will be put to a deal of trouble to discover what is presented to her majesty in these letters. 3. Since, of late, they had very good reason to suspect the lord Digby as an ill instrument, they conceive they ought not to lose so happy an occasion offered to do the state service; which, if neglected, they shall not be able to answer." On this, a great debate arose in the lords, but, at last, it was ordered, That the Letter should be opened.

Resolutions of the Commons concerning evil Counsellors, &c.] Feb. 15. This day Mr. Glynn reported to the commons the Resolutions of a committee, appointed to consider how evil Counsellors might be found out and removed from the king, as follows: 1. "That all privy-counsellors and great officers of state may be removed for the present, excepting such as have offices by inheritance. 2. That his majesty shall be humbly desired, that he will be pleased to receive only such, to be counsellors and great officers of state, as shall be recommended unto him by the humble advice of both houses of parliament. 3. That such of the said counsellors and great officers, whose names shall be presented by both houses, shall not have access to the persons or courts of the king and queen's majesty. 4. That Mr. Wm. Murray, of the bed-chamber, is thought fit to be removed from the persons and courts of the king and queen, as one that is conceived to give dangerous counsel." In like manner, Mr. Porter, the lord Digby, Mr. Wm. Crofts, and sir John Wyntour secretary to the queen, were excepted against; but when Mr. Porter's exception, being a member of that house, was put to the Question, it was carried against him, by only 110 against 107.

The Lords pass the Ordinance for the Militia.] Feb. 16. The Ordinance concerning the Militia being at last compleated by the two houses, it was this day read and agreed to by the lords; and ordered to be presented to the king. Lord Clarendon observes upon this occasion, "That when this bill had been, with much ado, accepted, and first read, there were few men who imagined it would ever receive farther countenance: but now there were few, who did not believe it to be a very necessary provision for the peace and safety of the kingdom; so great an impression had the late proceedings made upon them."

The 12 Bishops remanded to the Tower.] A message was brought from the commons by Mr. Hollis, importing, "That they understood their lordships had bailed the 12 Bishops impeached by them of high treason; but that they had voted they ought not to be bailed; and therefore desired their lordships to remand them back to the place where they were; which the lords also ordered accordingly: but sent to let the commons know, that they had ordered the Trial to be on the 19th instant, which was agreed to by the commons."

The Queen's Message concerning Lord Digby's Letter to her.] Feb. 17. The king's Answer to the parliament's Address of Thanks was reported to the lords; which was only this, "Well, I pray you take Ireland, really, in your care; and let your thanks be expressed in that, and I shall thank you."

A Message came, also, from the King, the day, to the lords, which was read in these words:—"His majesty, at the earnest desire of his consort, the Queen, hath thought fit to acquaint the parliament, that she understanding a Letter, addressed to herself, had been opened by them, and remains in their custody, desired that a transcript of it might be speedily sent her; and declares, That if the parliament should desire to be further satisfied from her of any particulars mentioned in that letter, or any circumstances concerning the same, as far forth as may any ways relate unto or reflect upon her person, or any whatsoever concerning her, she is ready and very willing to give them due satisfaction therein." A copy of this Message was dispatched to the commons; but, this not contenting that house, they desired to see the original message which was sent them.

Another Petition relating to the Accused Members.] The commons prepared another petition to the King, concerning the accused Members, which they sent up to the lords for their concurrence, who joined with them in it. This petition was as follows:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS, now assembled in parliament.

"Sheweth; That whereas your majesty, in Answer to their late Petition touching the proceedings against the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, &c. members of the parliament, was pleased to signify, That as your maj. once conceived that you had ground enough to accuse them, so now your maj. finds as good cause, wholly to defer any further prosecution of them: notwithstanding which, they remain still under that heavy charge so imputed unto them, to the exceeding prejudice not only of themselves, but also of the whole parliament: and whereas, by the express laws and statutes of this your realm, that is to say, by two acts of parliament, the one made in the 37th, and the other in the 38th year of the reign of your most noble progenitor king Edw. 3. If any person whatsoever make suggestion to the king himself of any crime committed by another, the same person ought to be sent, with the suggestion, before he chancellor or keeper of the great seal, the treasurer, and the great council, there to find remedy to pursue his suggestion; which if he cannot prove, he is to be imprisoned till he hath satisfied the party accused of his damages and slander, and made fine and ransom to the king. The said lords and commons, therefore, humbly beseech your maj. that, not only in point of justice to the said members in their particular, but for the vindication of the rights and privileges of parliament, your maj. will be pleased to send the person, or persons, that in this case made the suggestions or informations to your maj. against the said members of parliament, together with the said suggestions or informations, to your parliament; that so such suits of the said good laws may be had as was intended by them, and the rights and privileges of parliament may be vindicated; which, right and justice, ought not to be delayed."

Answer of both Houses to the Queen's Message.] Feb. 19. The commons sent up Mr. Symonds with an Answer to the king's last Message about the lord Digby's Letters, with the copies of them, and desired their lordships concurrence in it: it was to this effect:*

"Most Gracious Sovereign; Your majesty's most loyal and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, have received your message of the 17th instant, sent at the instance of the queen; and, upon consideration thereof, we find, to our great joy and content, your expressions of grace and favour from us to your majesties, for which we return your most humble thanks; and have herewithal sent the transcript of that Letter required by your maj. as, likewise, of two other letters dictated to Mr. secretary Nicholas and sir Lewis Dives; all which were brought to us, under a cover, directed to Mr. Secretary, with information that they were written by the lord Digby; who being a person fled from the justice of parliament, and one who had given many evidences of his disaffection to it, we conceived it necessary to open the two latter; and finding sundry expressions in them full of perjury and malignity to the parliament, we thought it very probable the like might be contained in the Letter to her majesty; and that would be dishonourable for her and dangerous to the kingdom if it should not be opened; wherein we were no wit deceived, as your maj. may well perceive by the contents of it. And though we cannot but be very sensible of the great dishonour therein done to your majesties, and the malicious endeavours of fomenting and increasing the jealousies betwixt your majesty and your people; yet we are far from reflecting any thing on the Queen, or expecting any satisfaction from her maj. but impute all to the bold and inveterate spirit of the man. Only we most earnestly beseech your maj. to persuade the queen, That she will not vouchsafe any countenance to, or correspondence with, the lord Digby, or any other of the fugitives or traitors; whose offences, now, depend under the examination and judgment of parliament; which, we assure ourselves, will be very effectual to further the removal of all jealousies and discontents betwixt your maj. and your people, and the settling of the great affairs of your maj. and the kingdom in an assured state and condition of honour, safety, and prosperity."

The lords agreed to this Message, and ordered it to be presented to the king.

The Trial of the 12 Bishops begun.] This being the day, last appointed, for the Trial of the 12 Bishops, they were brought to the bar of the house of lords, where the managers, for the commons attended. The lord-keeper told those gentlemen they might now proceed against them; whereupon Mr. Glynn desired the Impeachment might be read; which being done, the Answer, or Plea, of the Bishops was also read; importing, That they were not guilty of the Treason charged against them. Then the Petition of the Bishops was read, on which the said Impeachment was grounded (see p. 993); after which Mr. Glynn proceeded to open the charge; and first desired, That the Bishops might be asked, 'Whether they did subscribe the Petition now read, and whether it was their hand-writing?' To this question the bishops refused to answer, because they alledged, 'That it was not charged in the impeachment; neither were they bound to accuse themselves.' Another question was then put to them, 'Whether they consented not to the exhibiting and preferring of the Petition?' To this they said, 'That they would stand to their former answer of Not Guilty.' Then Mr. Glynn desired, That the Bishops Answer which they made voluntarily, in this house, on the 30th Dec. last, might be read out of the Journal Book; which being done, all the bishops, except the abp. of York, voluntarily confessed, That they subscribed the said Petition, and did own the hand-writing; but denied that they consented to the preferring of it.

The committee of the commons then proceeded, and desired leave to examine some witnesses to prove the falsity of the Bishops Petition, in styling it, 'The Petition of all the Bishops and Prelates now called by his majesty's writ to attend in Parliament, and present about London and Westminster.' Likewise to prove that several bishops did never give their consents to the said petition, or ever absented themselves from parliament, on any occasion, or reason of fear or menace: and that some of the petitioners, viz. the bishops of Gloucester and Bath and Wells, sat in the house of lords the 28th of Dec. last.

To prove this the bishop of Salisbury was sworn, who said, 'That he was present about London and Westminster, at the time when the other bishops presented their petition to the king and parliament: That he was not absent from parliament on any other occasion, than his attendance on the prince, and not out of any force or menace: neither did he hear or know of that petition, before it was brought into the house of peers, or ever consented to it before it was preferred, or since.'

Next the bishop of Winchester, upon oath, deposed, 'That, ever since the last recess, he hath been resident in and about London and Westminster, and attending the parliament: that he was sent for to come to the abp. of York the day after the great tumult, at the dean of Westminster's house, where were several other bishops present; the said abp. then said, That they had been affronted, and shewed a draught of a petition, and read it to them. Some speaking of amendments to it, the abp. said, 'It was hastily done, and might be made better,' or words to that effect: That then the abp. left them, and, it being late, he went home himself. Afterwards he heard no more of this matter, until he, being in the parliament house, saw a petition there under the 12 bishops hands; and thinks that it was, in effect agreeable with the aforesaid draught, although, he said, there have been some alterations made therein. He further said, That he never gave any consent to the delivery of the said petition to the king or to the lords in parliament. Also, that on the 29th of Dec. last, he, being coming to the parliament by water, met the earl of Newburgh, between the landing place at the parliament stairs and the parliament house; who asked him whither he was going, and told him there were none of his brethren, the bishops, in the house; and thereupon he turned back. He likewise said, that either on that day, or some other about that time, he was coming in a boat towards the shore, to land at the parliament stairs; and seeing a company of 'Prentices, and others standing on the shore, crying, 'No Bishops,' some called out to him, and advised him not to land there; and thereupon he caused the boat where he was to turn off, and to carry him to Lambeth, where he sent for his coach to carry him home. He further said, that he never absented himself from parliament, at any other times, except upon private occasions.'

Then, the bishop of London was sworn, who said, 'He had been resident in and about London, ever since the last recess of this parliament: that, being at the latter place the day the 12 bishops were committed to the Tower, he was told of it, and the reason of their commitments: That the next day he came to the house of lords, where he saw the petition which the said bishops had presented; but did never hear of it before: that the only reason he came not to parliament, was because of the frost. Lastly, that he never did consent to the delivery of the said petition to his majesty, nor to the lords in parliament.'

The Evidence for the matter of fact being given, Mr. Glynn desired, That the Bishops would make their several Answers to their charge, if they had any thing to say. Hereupon, every bishop for himself, made his Answer to the matter of fact; the effect whereof was, 'That, by reason of the great concourse of people and their menaces, they were unable to come to parliament, which was the cause of preferring the aforesaid Petition and Protestation, to preserve their rights in parliament without any intention to commit any treatable act, or destroy the fundamental laws of being of parliaments, as is charged in the impeachment against them.'

To this Mr. Glynn replied, and made his observations on some of the protestations, the Petition, and observed the circumstances in the body of the Petition, which he pressed by way of aggravation. 'Tis said, adds he to their Petition, they can find no redress or protection, upon sundry complaints made to the houses; and they do protest against all laws, orders, resolutions, and determinations as in themselves null and of none effect, while in their absence, since the 27th of Dec. last, already past; as likewise against all such shall hereafter pass in this house, during time of their absence from it: which we he said, are an express denial of the authority, in giving the royal assent, in parliament, because the bishops were not present. That their crimes tended to the subversion and undermining the foundation and power of parliament. It deprives this house of all being, and makes its body without life or motion, to be less than a Pie-Powder Court, unless bishops were present. It overthrows the fundamental laws of the kingdom for the same reason, and is a derogation of the laws and the privileges of parliament; charging the houses with denial to give them redress upon complaints made of the particulars in the Petition when, in truth, no such complaints were made to parliament. That the bishops, in their Petition, endeavoured to raise sedition, and fix an impression in the hearts of the people. 'That the parliament, at that time, had power to act, or proceed in any business to relieve them in their grievances without bishops were present.' That when the said Petition was preferred, there was a great rebellion in Ireland; and the remedy to reduce that kingdom to obedience was such supplies, as the wisdom and power of parliament should provide, which was well known to the bishops; therefore their Petition and protestation was a direct act to endeavour the subversion of that kingdom. Lastly, that at the time when the Petition was preferred, there was a bill depending in this house to take the Bishops from sitting and voting in parliament.' Mr. Glynn concluded with observations. 'That their evil intentions might be discovered 1st. By the many falsities in their Petition and Protestation, which had been proved by witnesses; next, by the time when these were preferred, it being the second day after they had passed this house, 'That this parliament is a free parliament,' therefore it is an endeavour to make an assault upon the

and smelt it. And these, adds he, were the dreams that flowed from this fountain.—After Mr. Glynn had done speaking to matter of fact, the Bishops desired to be heard, by their counsel, concerning the matter of law, in point of reason. But both sides being commanded to withdraw, the lords took this into consideration; and ordered, 'That the Trial of the 12 Bishops, &c. should be further proceeded in on the 24th instant.'

The King defers giving an Answer concerning the Militia Ordinance.] Feb. 21. The lord tamford reported to the house the king's Answer to the last Message from parliament about the Militia; "That it being on a business of the highest importance, not only for the kingdom in general, but also for his majesty's regal authority, he thinks it most necessary to take some time for advisement thereupon; and therefore he cannot promise a positive answer until he shall return; which he intends to do as soon as he shall have put his dearest consort, the Queen, and his dear daughter, the princess Mary, on board for their transportation to Holland."

Both Houses Petition the King again.] His Answer being sent down to the commons, it was by no means relished in that house; and the same day they drew up another Petition to the king about this matter; which being sent to the lords, it was by them agreed to, and ordered to be presented by the earl of Portland and two commons. This petition was as follows:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty: The Humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS.

"May it please your most excellent majesty: Your humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons, have, with a great deal of grief, received your majesty's Answer to their just and necessary Petition concerning the Militia of the kingdom; which your majesty, by a gracious Message formerly sent unto them, was pleased to promise should be put into such hands as your parliament shall approve of, or recommend unto you: the extent of their power, and the time of their continuance being likewise declared: That being done, and the persons by both houses nominated, your maj. nevertheless, defers your resolution therein to a longer and very uncertain time; which, the present dangers and distractions being so great and pressing, is as unsatisfactory and destructive as an absolute denial: Therefore, we once again beseech your maj. to take our desire into your royal thoughts, and to give us such an Answer as may raise in us a confidence that we shall not be exposed to the practices of those who thirst after the ruin of his kingdom, and the kindling of that combustion in England, which they have, in so great a measure, effected in Ireland; from whence, as we are daily informed, they intend and endeavour to invade us, with the assistance of the Papies here amongst us. Nothing can prevent these evils, nor enable us to suppress the Rebellion in Ireland, and secure ourselves, but the instant granting of that our humble Petition; which we hope your maj. will not deny to those who must, in the discharge of their duties, both to your maj. and the common-wealth, represent unto your maj. what they find so absolutely necessary for the preservation of both; which the laws both of God and man enjoin them to see put in execution, as several counsels, by their daily petitions, have desired of us, and, in some places, begin already to do it of themselves."

Another Answer from the king, about the lord Kimbolton, &c. was this day, also, reported to the house, and was much to the same purport as the former.

Impeachment of Lord Digby.] Feb. 22. The commons sent up an Impeachment of High Treason against George lord Digby, desiring their lordships to prefix some short time for him to come and appear, before which time the commons would be ready to come up to make good their charge against him. Upon this the lords ordered out a proclamation, through England and Wales, for the lord Digby to appear and answer to this charge, within 15 days after date, on pain of conviction.

The Attorney General's Answer to the Impeachment against him.] This day the Attorney General delivered in his Answer to the Charge of the commons against him, which was read before a committee of that house, in these words:

"The said defendant, saving to himself now, and at all times hereafter, all just exception to the said Impeachment, as the same is charged, for Answer saith, and acknowledgeth, That he is, and the 3d day of Jan. last past was, his majesty's Attorney General sworn: But whereas he is charged with the malicious, false, and scandalous advising and contriving the Articles in the said Impeachment mentioned, he saith, That he was, and is so far from any malice, falsehood or scandal, in the advising and contriving of the same, or any of them, that he did not at all advise or contrive the said articles, or any of them; nor ever knew or heard of them, or any of them, until he received them from his majesty's hands, the said 3rd day of Jan. last past, ready ingrossed in paper.—And as to that part of the said Impeachment, which chargeth this defendant with the exhibiting of the said Articles to this hon. house, he saith, That, upon the said 3rd day of Jan. he repaired to his majesty by his command, who then delivered unto this defendant a paper containing the Articles in the said Impeachment mentioned, and did command him, in his majesty's name, to acquaint this hon. house that divers great and treasonable designs and practices, against his majesty and the state, were come to his majesty's knowledge; for which his maj. commanded this defendant, in his majesty's name, to accuse 6 members, in the said paper mentioned, of high treason, and other high misdemeanors, by delivering that paper to your lordships, and to desire to have it read: And further to desire, in his majesty's name, that a select committee of lords might be appointed to take the examinations of such witnesses as his maj. should produce, as formerly had been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this house; and that committee to be under a command of secrecy, as formerly: and further, in his majesty's name, to ask liberty to add and alter, if there should be cause, according to justice: and likewise, that their lordships would take care of the securing of the said persons, as, in justice, there should be cause.—That, according to his majesty's said command, this defendant did come to this hon. house, the said 3rd day of Jan. and then, after the rt. hon. Edw. lord Littleton, lord keeper of the great seal of England, had declared to this hon. house, that he was commanded by his maj. to let your lordships know, that his maj. had given this defendant command to acquaint your lordships with some things from his maj.; this defendant thereupon, the said 3rd day of Jan. in this hon. house, before your lordships, then and there sitting in parliament, in obedience to his majesty's said commands, as a message from him, did declare the aforesaid commands of his maj.; by acquainting your lordships, that the king had commanded him to tell your lordships, that divers great and treasonable designs and practices, against him and the state, had come to his majesty's knowledge, for which the king had given his command to accuse six persons of high treason, and other high misdemeanors, by delivering these Articles: And that he was commanded to desire your lordships to have them read; which, by your lordships command, were accordingly read by the clerk: And then further declared, that he was also commanded by his maj. to desire, on his majesty's behalf, that a select committee might be appointed to take the examination of such witnesses as the king would produce, as formerly had been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of this house; and this committee to be under a command of secrecy, as formerly: And that he was commanded to ask liberty to add according to justice; and that he was commanded to desire that your lordships would take care for the securing of those persons, as, in justice, there should be cause.—And saith, he did not conceive there could be any offence in what was so done by him, in this hon. house, in obedience to those his majesty's commands; being wholly thereby left to your lordship's wisdoms and judgments, being his majesty's great council and greatest court for advice and justice.—And as touching the false, scandalous and malicious advising, contriving, or publishing the said Articles, or any other Articles against the said persons in the said papers mentioned, or any of them; or any breach of this defendant's oath of attorney general; and to the false, unlawful, and malicious exhibiting the said Articles into this hon. house, or causing any entry thereof to be made; and the intent and endeavour falsely, unlawfully, and maliciously to deprive this hon. house, or the hon. house of commons, of any of the members of the said house, or to take away any of their lives, estates, or good names; and every offence and misdemeanor or charged by the said impeachment upon this defendant, he saith he is not guilty of them, or any of them, in such manner and form as the said Impeachment is charged. All which matters and things this defendant is, and will be, ready to aver and prove in such sort, as this hon. house of parliament shall seem meet.

The earl of Monmouth was again bailed by Mr. Attorney, in 5000*l.* bond, for his appearance to abide the judgment of the lords in parliament, in this cause, and so the matter was dismissed for that time.

Feb. 23. This day the queen and prince of Orange embarked for Holland*: on the 24th the king returned to Canterbury, and the next day to Greenwich; from whence, on the 26th, he removed to Theobalds on his way to York.

Further Proceedings against the 12 Bishops. Feb. 24. This being the day for the further proceedings against the 12 Bishops, the lords came down word to the commons, That they had appointed that afternoon, to hear their counsel, in point of law, concerning the treason alleged against them. Soon after the commons returned for Answer, That they had resolved proceed against the said Bishops who were impeached by them for high treason, by bill, and are proceeding in it accordingly. He upon the bishops were called in, and told the matter; on which they said, They had been under a charge of Treason, and have had many days assigned them to be heard; and as the matter of fact had been heard, they desired the justice of this house that they might be heard by their counsel, in point of law; and either be acquitted, or judgment given against them upon the charge. The bishops being desired to withdraw, the lords took their debate into consideration, and it was ordered, "That before the matter against the 12 Bishops shall be concluded in any proceeding in that behalf, they shall be heard by themselves and their counsel, as their cause shall require."

* Whitlocke says, "That the queen came with her all her own and the king's jewels, leaving behind the jewels of the crown; and with them, and the assistance of the prince of Orange, a sufficient party might be raised against the king." But lord Clarendon alleges, "That both their majesties were reduced to so great want, that the queen was compelled to pawn her chamber plate for the supply of the most necessary occasions; there being no money in the Exchequer, or in the power of the ministers of the revenue; the officers of the customs, out of which the allowance for the weekly support of their majesty's household had been made, being enjoined by the house of commons not to issue out any money, without their particular consent and approbation."

hops were called in again and told of this ler, which was all the satisfaction they had that time. The committee of the commons, pointed to manage the evidence against the hops, had been ordered to draw a bill, 'For forfeiting of the Issues and Profits of their rates, temporal and ecclesiastical, and the posing thereof as the parliament shall think : for the Imprisonment of their Persons ring their lives; and for the Disposal of all ings that may fall within their gift.'

The King's Reply to the Commons' Answer urning Mr. Pym's Speech.] This day the caker, acquainted the house of commons it he had the night before received a Message from the king, (dated Feb. 22, at Dover, osed in a letter directed to himself) which majesty required him to read in the house, d is as follows :

"As his majesty hath expressed a great dee to give his house of commons all possible isfaction to all their just requests, and a rea-ness to rectify or retract any thing done by nself, which might seem to trench upon their irileges by any mistake of his; so he doubts t they will be ready, upon all occasions to nifest an equal tenderness and regard of : majesty's honour and reputation with his od subjects; and therefore his majesty ex-cts they should review his Message of the tenth of this month, concerning a passage in
 r. Pym's Speech, and their Answer, sent his ajesty by some of their members on the 10th
 'the same, with which his majesty can by no ans rest satisfied. His majesty's exception that message was, That it was affirmed in at Speech, 'That since the stop upon the orts against all Irish Papists, by both houses, any of the chief commanders now in the head
 'the rebels, have been suffered to pass by his ajesty's immediate warrant.' To this the Answer is, 'That the Speech, mentioned in that essage to be delivered by Mr. Pym, was nted by their order, and that what was erein delivered was agreeable to the sense of e house, that they have received divers adrtisements concerning several persons, Irish apists and others, who have obtained his majesty's immediate warrant for their passing into eland, since the order of Restraint of both ouses; some of which, they have been in-nmed, since their coming into Ireland, have ned with the rebels, and been commanders ongst them.'—His majesty is most assured, such persons have passed by his warrant or vity; and therefore desires his house of commons to consider, Whether such a general in-mation and advertisement (in which there ot so much as the name of any particular erson mentioned) be ground enough for such a irect and positive affirmation, as is made in at Speech; which, in respect of the place and erson, and being now acknowledged to be eable to the sense of the house, is of that uthority that his maj. may suffer in the affecns of many of his good subjects; and fall er a possible construction (considering the many scandalous pamphlets to such purpose) of not being sensible enough of that Rebellion, so horrid and odious to all Christians; by which,

 in this distraction, such danger might possibly ensue to his majesty's person and estate, as he is well assured his house of commons will use their utmost endeavours to prevent. And, therefore, his maj. thinks it very necessary, and expects that they name the persons, who,
 by his majesty's licence, have passed into Ireland, and are now there in the head of the rebels; or that if upon their re-examination, they do not find particular evidence to prove that assertion, (as his maj. is confident they never can) as this affirmation, which may reflect upon his maj. is very public; so they will publish such a declaration, whereby that mistake may be discovered; his maj. being the more tender in that particular, which hath reference to Ireland, as being most assured that he hath been, and is, from his soul, resolved to discharge his duty, which God will require at his hands, for the relief of his poor Protestant subjects there, and the utter rooting out that Rebellion; so that service hath not suffered any, but necessary delays by any act of his majesty's, for the want of any thing proposed to his maj. or within his majesty's power to do.—For the persons named in the Answer, his majesty saith, That col.
 Butler, and the son of the lord Nettersfield, obtained his warrants for their passage into Ireland, at his majesty's being in Scotland, which was long, as his maj. thinks, before the Order of both houses: His maj. knowing the former of them to be one who hath always made professions to his service, and to be uncle to the earl of Ormond, of whose affection to the Protestant religion, and his majesty's service, his maj. hath great cause to be assured; and the latter being a person of whom at that time, there was no suspicion to his majesty's knowledge: For the others, it may be they have obtained warrants from his maj. since the said Order; but his maj. assures the parliament, that he had no intimation of such an order, till after stay made of sir Geo. Hamilton, who was the last that had any licence from his
 maj. to pass for Ireland.—And his majesty having, since his Answer from the house of commons, used all possible means, by the examining his own memory, and the notes of his secretaries, to find what warrants have been granted by him, and to what persons, doth not find that he hath granted any to any Irish, but those who are named by the house of commons; and, in Dec. last, to the earl of St. Albans and two of his servants, and to one Walter Terrell;
 a poor man; they being such as his maj. is assured are not with the rebels, and much less chief commanders over them. And though it may be the persons named by the house of commons are Papists, yet his maj. at that time, thought it not fit, in respect of their alliance in that kingdom to such persons of great power, of whom his maj. hoped well, to discover any suspicion of them; the lords justices having de-placed by their letters, which letters were not disapproved of by the parliament here, that they were so far from owning a public Jealousy of all Papists there, that they had thought fit to put arms into the hands of divers noblemen of the pale of that religion, who made profession to his majesty's service, and desired the same: And since so great a trust reposed in in some of the lords of that religion was not disapproved by the parliament here, his maj. could not imagine it unsafe or unfit for him to give licences to some few to pass into that kingdom, who, though Papists, professed due allegiance and loyalty to his majesty.—And therefore, unless the first affirmation of the house of commons can be made good by some particulars, his maj. doth not know that his ministers have failed in their diligence and faithfulness to his maj. in this point, or that his honour hath suffered so much by any act of his own, as that it needs be vindicated for the time past by any other way than such a Declaration, which he expects from this house, as in duty and justice due to his majesty."

The King's Letter to the Earl of Berkshire for his attendance in Parliament.] Feb. 25. The earl of Berkshire signified to the lords, That he had received an extraordinary Letter from the King, which was read in these words:

"C. R. Right trusty, &c. we greet you well: As we have been graciously pleased, at your request had for your private occasions, by our former letter, to dispense with your present attendance in parliament; so now as there are likely to be treated there affairs much importing the public peace and good of our kingdom, we have thought good, by these our letters, to desire you to repair forthwith to London, and not fail to give your personal attendance in parliament: For, as we know your own good good affections to the public, will incline you to be careful to prefer that before your own private ease, so we assure you we shall take it as a testimony of your good affections to us, on whom the care of the parliament doth immediately depend. Given at our Court at Dover, Feb. 23, 1641."

Several lords affirming that they had received Letters from the king to the same effect, the house was put into a committee, to consider what ill counsels had been given to the king; who had gone about to extend the king's prerogative beyond its antient bounds; who were the authors and procurers of monopolies; and likewise who gave counsel for the breach of the pacification with the Scots, which had cost the kingdom 5 millions; besides many other mischiefs and inconveniences that happened thereupon. But nothing being resolved on, at this time, the house was resumed; and thus this matter ended.

Articles of Impeachment against lord Digby.] Feb. 26. The commons, at a conference this day, exhibited the following Articles against lord Digby, which were sent up by sir John Evelyn.

I. "That the said lord Digby, in or about the month of Jan. 1641, maliciously and traitorously endeavoured to persuade the king to levy forces against his liege subjects within the kingdom; and actually did, in or about the said month, levy forces within this realm, to the terror of his majesty's subjects. II. That the said lord D. in or about the same month, at other times, falsely, maliciously, and traitorously laboured to raise a jealousy and division between the king and his people, and to possess his majesty that he could not live in safety of his person amongst them; and thereupon, traitorously, endeavour to persuade his majesty to betake himself to some place of strength for his defence. III. That the said lord D. about the time aforementioned, maliciously and traitorously endeavour to stir up jealousies and dissensions between the king and parliament; and, to that end and purpose, did wickedly advise the framing of certain and scandalous Articles of High Treason against the lord Kimbolton, Denzil Holles &c. and did persuade his majesty, accompanied with divers soldiers and others, in what manner, to come in person into the house of commons, and demand the said members of the said house then sitting; to the apprehension of his majesty's person, and in violation of the privileges and being of parliament. All which matters were done by the said George lord Digby traitorously, &c. for which the commons do impeach him of High Treason, &c."—In support of this accusation,

Sir John Evelyn spoke to this effect:—"That this was a heavy accusation, and such as needed rather pity than aggravation: that a noble gentleman, as he was, should fall into so foul a crime as to study the destruction of his country. In the house of commons they served him to appear much for his country; he had dived into the secrets of that house soon after which he fell into ill discourse and bitter railings against that house; as in the speech of his, touching the earl of Somerset wherein he involved the commons, your ships, and the king, in wilful murder. He questioned for it, he fled from that house, came to yours, where we found him that way there. That the lord Digby had said, 'This was no free parliament;' not long followed that high breach of parliament, which time he was observed to be a constant attendant on the courts of the king and queen. After that plot was discovered, the king retired to Hampton Court, and there was he found tampering with the soldiers, saying, 'The king went out of town only to save himself from being trampled in the dirt,' and by offering money to the soldiers for doing the worst service that ever was done to the king. That he endeavoured to 'list men, getting up offering himself and all he could for the peace; the particulars whereof they will appear to your lordships, by proof. That his majesty and honour that hath promoted your ships to stand so long in the gap, the ship" of the state, will easily suggest what he desireth that would destroy it. He that will not omit to sow jealousies between the king and people, deserveth ill; but he that will stir and nourish them, the state will spue him out, they cannot digest him. He concluded with saying, they would, by proof, make good the Articles now exhibited to their lordships."

Message to the King about removing the prince.] Feb. 28. The King, on his return not seeing the queen embarked for Holland, being sent to command the prince of Wales to meet him at Greenwich on the 26th; his governor, the marquis of Hertford, being then sick, could not attend him thither, but sent to acquaint the two houses with it: upon which they dispatched the following Message to the king; and the Answer to it was read in the presence of lords on this day. The Message was as follows:

"The lords and commons, in parliament, greatly desire his majesty, that the Prince be not be removed from Hampton-Court; and that for these ensuing reasons: 1. They perceive that his majesty had resolved, that the Prince should stay at Hampton-Court until his majesty's return. 2. That the lord marquis of Hertford, appointed by his majesty to be governor of the prince, and approved of and commanded by the parliament to give his personal attendance upon his highness, is now so disposed in his health, that he is not able to send the prince in any other place. 3. That the prince's removal, at this time, from Hampton-Court, may be a cause to promote jealousies and fears in the hearts of his majesty's subjects, which they conceive very necessary to avoid."

The King's Answer.] The King's Answer is as follows: "1. That his majesty intended at his remove from Hampton-Court with his royal consort, the queen, towards Dover, that the Prince his son should stay at Hampton Court till his majesty returned to some of his houses; and thereupon, as soon as his majesty resolved upon a certain day to be at Greenwich, he commanded that his son should attend him there, which was no way contrary to his former intention. 2. That his maj. was very sorry to hear of the indisposition of the marquis of Hertford, being the person upon whom he principally relies for the care of his eldest son: but, if that indisposition should be lasted, his majesty could no way think fit that his want of health should have hindered the prince from waiting upon his maj. according to his command; and therefore would have been much offended if the prince had failed in meeting his majesty, according to his appointment. 3. To the fears and jealousies, his maj. knows not what Answer to give, not being able to imagine from what grounds they proceed; but if any information hath been given to that purpose, his maj. much desires that the same may be examined to the bottom; and then he hopes that their fears and jealousies will be hereafter continued only with reference to his majesty's rights and honour."

The King's final Answer concerning the Militia.] The same day the lord keeper delivered the King's Answer concerning the Ordinance about the Militia, which was read in these words:

"His majesty having, with his best care and understanding, perused and considered that which was sent him from both houses, for the ordering of the Militia, presented unto him to be made an Ordinance of Parliament, by the giving of his royal assent; as he can by no means do it, for the reasons hereafter mentioned, so he doth not conceive himself obliged, by any promise made in his Answer of the 2nd of this month, to the Petition of both houses, to yield to the same.—His majesty finds great cause to except against the preface or introduction to that Order, which avoweth a most dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons of late, supposed to be an effect of the bloody counsels of Papists, and other ill-affected persons; by which many may understand (looking upon other printed papers to that purpose) his coming in person to the house of commons on the 4th of Jan. which he got so unhappy a misunderstanding between the king and his people: and for that, though he believes it, upon the information since given him, to be an apparent Breach of their Privilege; and hath offered, and is ready, to repair the same for the future, by any act that shall be desired of his maj.; yet he must declare and require to be believed, that he had no other design upon that house, or any member of it, than to require, as he did, the persons of those 5 gentlemen his maj. had the day before accused of high treason; and to declare that he meant to proceed against them legally and speedily, upon which he believed that house would have delivered them up: and his maj. calls the Almighty God to witness, that he was so far from any intention or thought of force or violence, although that house had not delivered them according to his demand, or in any case whatsoever, that he gave those his servants, and others, who then waited on his maj. express charge and command that they should give no offence to any man; nay they received any provocation or injury, that they should bear it without return. And his majesty neither saw or knew that any person of his train had any other weapons, but his pensioners and guards those with which they usually attend his person to parliament, and the other gentlemen swordsmen: and therefore his maj. doubts not but his parliament will be so regardful of his honour herein, that he shall not undergo any imputation by the rash or indiscreet expressions of any young men then in his train; or by any desperate words uttered by others, who might mingle with them, without his consent or approbation.—For the persons nominated to be Lieutenants of the several Counties of England and Wales, his maj. is contented to allow that recommendation; only concerning the city of London, and such other corporations as, by antient charters, have granted unto them the power of the Militia, his maj. doth not conceive that it can stand with justice or policy to alter their government in that particular. And his maj. is willing, forthwith, to grant every of them (that of London and those other corporations excepted) such commissions as he hath done, this parliament, to some lord lieutenants, by your advice: but if that power be not thought enough, but that more shall be thought fit to be granted to these persons named, than by the law is in the crown itself; his maj. holds it reasonable that the same be, by some law, first vested in him, with power to transfer it to these persons, which he will willingly do; and whatever that power shall be, to avoid all future doubts and questions, his maj. desires it may be digested into an act of parliament rather than an Ordinance; so that all his loving subjects may thereby particularly know, both what they are to do, and what they are to suffer for their neglect, that there be not the least latitude for his good subjects to suffer under any arbitrary power whatsoever.—As to the time desired for the continuance of the powers to be granted, his maj. giveth this Answer, That he cannot consent to divest himself of the just power which God and the laws of this kingdom have placed in him for the defence of his people, and to put into the hands of others for any indefinite time. And since the ground of this request, from his parliament, was to secure their present fears and jealousies, that they might, with safety, apply themselves to the matter of his Message of the 20th of Jan.; his majesty hopeth that his grace to them since that time, in yielding to so many of their desires, and in agreeing to the persons now recommended to him by his parliament, and the power before expressed to be placed in them, will wholly dispel those fears and jealousies; and assureth them, that as his maj. hath now applied this unusual remedy to their doubts, so, if there shall be cause, he will continue the same to such time as shall be agreeable to the same care he now expresseth towards them.—And, in this Answer, his majesty is so far from receding from any thing he promised, or intended to grant, in his Answer to the former Petition, that his majesty hath hereby consented to all which was then asked of him by that Petition concerning the Militia of the kingdom, (except that of London and those other corporations) which was to put the same into the hands of such persons as should be recommended unto him by both houses of parliament: and his majesty doubts not but the parliament, upon well weighing the particulars of this his Answer, will find the same more satisfactory to their ends, and the peace and welfare of all his good subjects, than the way proposed by this intended Ordinance; to which, for these reasons, his majesty cannot consent.—And whereas his majesty observes, by the Petition of both houses, presented unto him by the earl of Portland, sir Tho. Heale, and sir Wm. Seville, That, in some places, some persons begin already to intermeddle of themselves with the Militia; his majesty expecteth that his parliament should examine the particulars thereof, it being a matter of high concernment and very great consequence. And his majesty requireth, that if it shall appear to his parliament, that any persons whatsoever have presumed to command the Militia, without lawful authority, they may be proceeded against according to law."

Both Houses vote the King's Answer a direct Denial. The lords, taking the King's Answer to be a matter of the greatest concernment, sent it down immediately to the commons, and withal ordered, That they would adjourn till 2 that afternoon, to wait the Resolution that house upon it. Accordingly a message was sent from the commons to desire a conference, the report of which was made to the lords to this effect:

"Some Votes of the house of commons were read, upon the king's last Answer: 'Resolved, upon the question, by the house of commons, That this Answer from his majesty is a direct Denial to the desires of both houses concerning the Militia. 2. That those who advised his majesty to give this Answer, enemies to the state, and mischievous projectors against the safety of the king and peace of the kingdom. 3. That this Denial is of that dangerous consequence, that if his majesty persist in it, it will hazard the peace and safety of all his kingdoms; unless some speedy remedy be applied, by the wisdom and authority both houses of parliament. 4. That such persons of this kingdom, as have put themselves in posture of defence against the common danger, have done nothing but what is justifiable, and is approved of by this house. 5. That his majesty shall remove into any remote place from his parliament, it will be a great hurt to the kingdom, and a great prejudice to the proceedings of parliament. 6. That this house holds it necessary that his majesty should be desired, that the Prince may come to live near about London, and there to continue. That the lords be desired to join with this house, in an humble address unto his majesty, that he will be pleased to reside near his parliament, that both houses may have a convenience of access unto him on all occasions. That the lords be moved to join with them, a full course of examination, to find out such persons who gave his majesty this advice, that they may be removed from him, and brought to condign punishment. 9. That no change can be granted by the king, to create a parliament in any corporation over the Militia of that place without consent of parliament. 10. That the lords shall be desired to appoint a select committee, that they may join with another proportionable number of the commons, to prepare what is fit further to be done upon these votes, or upon any thing else that may ise upon these Answers of the king's concerning the Militia or the Prince." The lords agreed with the commons in all these votes; and appointed a select committee of their house accordingly.

Declaration that both Houses will dispose of the Militia without the King.] March 1. On that day the said committee brought in a draught of a Declaration to the King, on the foregoing answer concerning the Militia; which was read hæc verba:

"Most Gracious Sovereign; Your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, do find their just apprehensions of sorrow and fear, in respect of the public dangers and miseries like to fall upon your majesty and the kingdom, to be much increased, upon the receipt of your unexpected denial of their most humble and necessary Petition, concerning the Militia of the kingdom; specially grieving, that wicked and mischievous counsellors should still have that power in your majesty, as, in this time of imminent and approaching ruin, rather to incline your resolutions to that which is apt to further the accomplishment of the desires of the most malignant enemies of God's true religion, and of the peace and safety of yourself and your kingdom, than to the dutiful and faithful counsel of your parliament.—Wherefore they are enforced, with all humility, to protest, That if your maj. will persist in that denial, the dangers and miseries of the kingdom are such as will spare no longer delay: but unless you shall be graciously pleased to assure them, by these messengers, that you will speedily apply your royal assent to the satisfaction of their former desires, they shall be enforced, for the safety of your maj. and your kingdoms, to dispose of the Militia by the authority of both houses, in such manner as hath been propounded to your maj.: if they resolve to do it accordingly.—They likewise most humbly beseech your maj. to believe, That the dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons, mentioned in their preamble, was not inserted with any intention to cast the least aspersion upon your majesty; but therein they reflected upon that malignant party, of whose bloody and malicious practices they have had so often experience, and from which they can never be secure, unless your maj. will be pleased to put down those wicked and unfaithful counsellors, who interpose their own corrupt and malicious designs betwixt your majesty's goodness and wisdom, and the prosperity and contentment of yourself and of your people: and that by the dispatch of the great affairs of the kingdom, the safety of your person, the protection and comfort of your subjects, you will be pleased to continue your abode near to London and your parliament, and not to withdraw yourself to any other remoter parts; which if your maj. should do, must needs be a cause of great danger and distraction.—That your maj. will likewise be graciously pleased to continue the due highness in these parts, at St. James's or any other of your houses near London; whereby the designs which the enemies of the religion and peace of this kingdom may have upon his person, and the jealousies and fears of your people may be prevented.—And they beseech your maj. to be informed by them, That, by the laws of the kingdom, the power of raising, ordering, and disposing the Militia, within any city, town, or other place, cannot be granted to any corporation by charter, or otherwise, without the authority and consent of parliament; and that those parts of the kingdom, which have put themselves in a posture of defence against the common danger, have therein done nothing, but according to the declaration and direction of both houses, and what is justifiable by all the laws of this kingdom.—All which their most humble counsel and desires they pray your maj. to accept, as the effect of that duty and allegiance which they owe unto you, and which will not suffer them to admit of any thoughts, intentions, or endeavours, but such as are necessary and advantageous for your majesty's greatness and honour, and the safety and prosperity of the kingdom, according to that trust and power which the laws have reposed in them."

The King's Reply, resolving to abide by his last Answer.] March 2. The aforesaid declaration having been presented to the king, at Theobalds, his majesty returned the following Answer:

"I am so much amazed at this Message, that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears: lay your hands to your hearts, and ask yourselves, whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies: and if so, I assure you this Message hath nothing lessened them. For the Militia; I thought so much of it before I sent that Answer, and am so much assured that the Answer is agreeable to what, in justice or reason, you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point. For my residence near you; I wish it might be so safe and honourable, that I had no cause to absent myself from Whitehall; ask yourselves whether I have not, For my Son; I shall take that care of him, which shall justify me to God as a father, and to my dominions as a king. To conclude: I assure you, upon my honour, that I have no thought but of peace and justice to my people, which I shall, by all fair means, seek to preserve and maintain; relying upon the goodness and providence of God, for the preservation of myself and rights."

The Parliament insist upon their Declaration, and resolve to put the Kingdom into a Posture of Defence, &c.] This Answer being made known to both houses, the commons sent up to desire a conference about it; the report of which was, That the commons had considered much of it, and did still think it fit that their Message to the king should be insisted on. They offered, also, the following Resolutions which their house had made, and desired their lordships concurrence: "Resolved, by the house of commons, on the question, 1. That the Kingdom be forthwith put into a Posture of Defence, by authority of parliament, in such a way as is already agreed on by both houses. 2. That a committee be appointed to prepare a Declaration upon these two heads: 1st, To lay down the just causes of the fears and jealousies given to this house, and to clear this house from any jealousies conceived against it. 2nd, To consider of all matters that may arise on this Message, and to declare their opinions what is fit to be done upon it."

The lords taking these Resolutions into consideration, after a serious debate, agreed to the first; whereupon the following lords entered their Dissent against it: viz. the earls of Lindsey, Bath, Southampton, Northampton, Monmouth, Cleveland, Portland, and lords Mowbray, Willoughby de Eresby, Grey, Dunsmore, Seymour and Capel.—The second Resolution was wholly agreed to; after which both houses adjourned to the 4th, to give time for their joint committee to meet at Merchant-Taylors Hall, and prepare matters accordingly.

March 4. A bill had been sent up by the commons intitled, 'An Act for the clearing and vindicating of the lord Kimbolton, and the five Members, from a late feigned Charge or accusation, of High Treason;' which was read a second time this day by the lords, and committed.

The Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry's Defence, at the Bar of the Commons. The bill against the 12 Bishops being now depending in the house of commons, an order was made, That they should be heard by themselves, or by petition, at the bar of that house, this day. The bishops of Durham, and Litchfield and Coventry appeared there, and spoke in their own defence. The speech of the latter * was published at that time; and is still preserved in our Collections; which we give here as follows: †

"Mr. Speaker; As it hath been ever my fashion, and in truth it is my disposition, to endeavour, at the least, to give satisfaction to every man, even to the meanest, that hath had any sinister conceptions of me, be it scandalum datum, or acceptum; so hath it been my ambition, and I have sought it with affection, as to all men, so much more to this hon. assembly, especially concerning the late Petition and Protestation exhibited unto his sacred majesty, and the lords and peers in parliament. But, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am, as it becomes me, to give most hearty and condign thanks to the noble knights, citizens, and burgesses, of this hon. house of commons; for that they have been pleased, by a general vote, and I hope unanimous, to give me leave to speak for myself; and to lay open the truth of my cause, concerning the said Petition and Protestation before them.—And now, Mr. Speaker, to address myself to the business: whereof I shall not speak as a lawyer, for I have no head for law; neither shall I need to touch upon any point thereof, as a flourishing orator desirous to hear himself speak: I have long since laid aside my books of rhetoric; my desire is, Mr. Speaker, to tread in the steps of an old divine, of whom Sozomen writes in his Ecclesiastical History: who, groaning under the like heavy burden and accusation as I do, chose rather to vent his own sense, and express the truth of his cause in plain language, than to colour or cloak falsehood; or to extenuate his offense, by forced, trapped, and new varnished eloquence: And to that purpose my conceptions and narration shall stand only upon two feet, Negation and Affirmation.—There are some things that I must deny, and yet justly; somewhat I must affirm, and that I shall do ingenuously and fully.—First, for the Negative: I never framed, made nor contrived, compiled or preferred, any such Petition or Protestation; I never was at any meeting, consultation or conference, about any such business; nay, I never heard of any intention, much less execution of any such thing, until it was the Wednesday in Christmas, being the 29th of Dec.; at which time it was brought unto my house in Covent Garden, being betwixt 6 and 7 at night, (subscribed by some of my brethren) with a request, that I would subscribe suddenly also.—Now, for the Affirmative: presuming that so learned, grave, and wise men, well versed in matters of that nature, would not have attempted any such thing, without good counsel, to the endangering themselves and their brethren, and to the contempt of the lords; and that all the rest of the bishops, in and about the city of London and Westminster, should subscribe thereunto; and that it should not be preferred, without the approbation and mature deliberation of good counsel, and of us all, I made one; and set my hand thereto, which I do now acknowledge, and never vet denied; nay, the first time that I came to the bar in the lords house, I acknowledged that my hand was to it; and divers of this hon. presence heard it so read unto them out of the Journal of the lords house.—Now, Mr. Speaker, if these my deceived and deceiving thoughts (to use St. Bernard's phrase) have led me into an error, the error is either 'ex ignorantia juris,' an unskilfulness in the law, or 'debilitate judicii,' a weakness of my apprehension; else 'ex nimia credulitate,' out of my too much confidence in others; not of any prepossessed malice, or out of a spirit of contradiction, as the Lord knoweth. The schoolmen tell me, that 'duo sunt in omni peccato,' there is 'actio et malitia actionis'; I con the action, the subscription is mine; but that there was any malice in the action (to cross any vote, at which I was not present) I utterly disavow.—And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall become an humble suitor, that I may recommend three most humble requests, or mo-

me, to this hon. house.—This first motion is, that you would be pleased to tread in the steps of Constantine the Christian emperor, who had ever this resolution, That if he should be sacerdotem peccantem, an offending divine, he would rather cast his purple garment on him, than reveal the offence, for the Gospel's sake of Christ.—My second motion is, that if my subscription shall make me a defendant, and worthy of any censure, that then censure may not exceed, but, at the highest, be proportionable to the offence. The third and last motion is, That that of Plautus in my 58 years painful, constant, and successful preaching of the Gospel of Christ, in the kingdom of England, and in foreign parts) is not to be verified of me, 'Si quid bene fecerim levior pluma est gratia; si quid mali fecerim plumbeas iras gerunt.'—And now, Mr. Speaker, I might here tender divers motions to the consideration of this hon. house, for favouring the construction of my rash subscription, I say commiseration; yet all without ostension, that is far from me; but rather for the consolation of my perplexed soul; for the affliction, restraint and disgrace, which I have long sustained; (which is far greater than I endured before, and transcends the dangers and jeopardies of the seas, and the series of the wars, whereof I have had my share) and partly for the vindication of my former reputation, calling, and profession; which now so clouded, eclipsed, and blackened in the eyes of the world, and scandalized in the mouths of the vulgar multitude; that, without remuneration, and restoration to my former esteem, shall never have heart to shew my face in the world any more, wherein I have wished to end my days.—But I waive all these, because I will detain you from other occasions of greater importance; and desire my ways may be made known unto you, rather by inquisition, than in my own relation; only I shall appeal to noble knights, citizens, and burgesses of this diocese where I now live; and of the other wherein formerly I did live, as namely the honourable city of Bristol; which I can never be without that title, not only in respect of my piety, unity, and conformity, but also in respect of their love, kindness, and extraordinary bounty unto me. I appeal to them for my testimonies, and knowledge of my courses amongst them: nay, I appeal to the records of this hon. house, where, I am confident, after many months sitting, there is nothing found that is a trench upon me, neither, I hope, will nor be. —And therefore my humble suit is for redress, if you intend accusation; or rather for your mediation, that I may speedily return to my own home and cure, 'to redeem the time because the days are evil,' as the Apostle bids; and to regain the esteem and reputation which I was long in getting, and long enjoyed, but lost in a moment; for if I should live (I say not my bishoprick, but) my edit, my grey hairs and many years would be brought with sorrow to the grave.—

I have done, Mr. Speaker; and there remains nothing now but that I become a petitioner unto Almighty God, that he will be pleased to bestow upon you all the patriarch's blessing, even the dew of Heaven, and the fatness of the earth: and I end with that of St. Jude, 'Mercy, peace, and love be multiplied unto you;' I say again, with a religious and affectionate heart, 'Mercy, peace, and love be multiplied unto you.'

The Ordinance for settling the Militia passed by Parliament, without the King. March 5. The Ordinance concerning the Militia was again read by the lords, and the king's name and authority wholly left out of it. Hereupon one of the lords starting a doubt, That it was a scruple to his conscience whether this Ordinance doth not intrench upon the oath of allegiance? That oath was read, and it was resolved, nem. con. "That the passing of this Ordinance, now read, is not any way against the oath of allegiance." Then it was resolved, "That this Ordinance of the lords and commons in parliament, for the safety of the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, shall pass*." The last mentioned peers, with the earl of Devon, the lords Rich. Howard de Charlton, and Savile, dissenting.

To strengthen this Ordinance, some Resolutions of the commons were read and agreed to by the lords, viz. That the several commissions, granted under the great seal, for lieutenantancies of counties, were illegal and void: that such commissions should be all called in and cancelled: that whosoever shall execute any such power again, without the consent of parliament, shall be accounted a disturber of the peace of the kingdom. The earl of Southampton, with the lords Mowbray, Howard, and Seymour dissenting.

The house of commons sent up the form of a Declaration to be presented to the king, to which they desired their lordships concurrence. The same being read, the debate of it was put off till the 7th, and, in the mean time, a conference was desired with the commons, to know of them what proofs can be offered to satisfy such lords who doubt the truth of some particulars in the said Declaration.

The Declaration of both Houses, setting forth the Causes of their Fears and Jealousies. March 7. This day the aforesaid conference was held; and, after it, the Declaration was again read in the house of lords, as follows:

"May it please your Majesty; Although the expressions in your majesty's Message, of the

* The Ordinance at large, as passed by both houses, we purposely omit, it being the same as the draught before given at p. 1081, excepting the omission of the king's name and authority throughout, and the filling up the Blanks of the Lieutenantancies with the Names of the same persons whom the commons had recommended to the king; a List of whom are to be found at p. 1082.

2nd of this instant March, do give just cause of sorrow to your faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament; yet it is not without some mixture of confidence and hope, considering they proceeded from the misapprehension of our actions and intentions; which, having no ground of truth or reality, may, by your majesty's justice and wisdom, be removed, when your maj. shall be fully informed that those Fears and Jealousies of ours, which your maj. thinks to be causeless, and without any just ground, do necessarily and clearly arise from those dangers and distempers, into which the mischievous and evil counsels about you have brought this kingdom; and that those other Fears and Jealousies, by which your favour, your royal presence and confidence, have been withdrawn from your parliament, have no foundation or subsistence in any action, intention, or miscarriage of ours; but are merely grounded upon the falsehood and malice of those, who, for the supporting and fomenting their own wicked designs against the religion and peace of the kingdom, do seek to deprive your maj. of the strength and affection of your people, and them of your grace and protection; thereby to subject both your royal person and the whole kingdom to ruin and destruction.—To satisfy your majesty's judgment and conscience in both these points, we desire to make a clear and free Declaration of the Causes of our Fears and Jealousies, which we offer to your majesty, in these particulars: 1. That the design of altering Religion in this, and in your other kingdoms, hath been potently carried on by those in greatest authority about you for divers years together; the queen's agent at Rome, and the Pope's agent or nuncio here, are not only evidences of this design, but have been great actors in it. 2. That the War with Scotland was procured to make way for this intent, and chiefly invited and fomented by the Papists, and others popishly affected; whereof we have many evidences, especially their free and general contribution to it. 3. That the Rebellion in Ireland was framed and contrived here in England, and that the English Papists should have risen about the same time, we have several testimonies and advertisements from Ireland; and that it is a common speech amongst the rebels, (wherewith concur other evidences and observations of the suspicious meetings and consultations; the tumultuary and seditious carriage of those of that religion in divers parts of this kingdom, about the time of the breaking out of the Irish rebellion; the deposition of O'Connelly; the information of Mr. Cole, minister; the letter of Tristram Whitecombe; the deposition of Tho. Grant, and many others which we may produce, do all agree in this) and the public Declaration of the lords, gentlemen, and others of the Pale, that they would join with the rebels, whom they call the Irish army, or any other, to recover unto his majesty his royal prerogative, wrested from him by the Puritan faction in the houses of parliament in England; and to maintain the same against all others; as also to maintain episcopal jurisdiction, and the lawfulness thereof: these two being the quarrels, upon which his majesty's late army in the North should have been incensed against us.—The great cause we have to fear that the late design, stiled 'The Queen's pious Intention,' was for the alteration of religion in this kingdom; for success whereof the Pope's nuncio, the count Rosetti, enjoined fasting and praying to be observed every week by the English Papists; which appeared to us by one of the original letters, directed, by him, to a priest in Lancashire. The boldness of the Irish rebels, in affirming they do nothing but by authority from the king; that they call themselves the Queen's Army; that the prey or booty which they take from the English, they mark with the queen's mark; that their purpose was to come to England, after they had done in Ireland, and sundry other things of this kind, proved by O'Connelly, and divers others, especially in the fore-mentioned Letter from T. Whitecombe, the mayor of Kinsale, to his brother Ben. Whitecombe, wherein there is this passage, 'That many other strange speeches they utter about religion, and our court of England, which he dares not commit to paper.' His manifold attempts to provoke your majesty's late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise a faction in the city of London and other parts of this kingdom; that those, who have been actors in those businesses, have had their dependance, their countenance, and encouragement from the court: witness the treason whereof Mr. Jermin, and others, stand accused, who were transported beyond sea, by warrant under your majesty's hand, after your maj. had given assurance to your parliament, that you maj. had laid a strict command upon all your servants, that none of them should depart from court; and that dangerous faction, delivered to captain Legge by your majesty's own hand, accompanied with a direction, signed with C. R.* The false and scandalous Accusation against the lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the house of commons, tendered to the parliament by your majesty's own command; endeavoured to be justified in the city, by your own presence and persuasion; and to be put in execution upon their persons, by your majesty's demand of them in the house of commons, in so terrible and violent a manner, as far exceeded all former breaches of privileges of parliament, acted by your maj. or any of your predecessors; and whatsoever your own intentions were, divers bloody and desperate persons, which attended your majesty, discovered their affections and resolutions to have massacred and destroyed the members of that house; if the absence of those persons accused had not, by God's providence, stopped the giving of the word which they expected, for the setting them upon that barbarous and bloody act: the listing of so many officers, soldiers, and others; putting them into pay, and under command of colonels; feasting and caressing them in an unusual manner, at Whitehall; thereby maintaining them in the violent assaults, and other injuries, which they offered to divers of your objects, coming that way in a lawful and peaceable manner; the carrying them out of town: after which they were told by lord Digby, 'That the king removed on purpose, but they might not be trampled in the dirt;' and keeping them so long in pay; endeavouring to engage the gentlemen of the Inns of Court in the same course; the plotting and designing of a perpetual Guard about your majesty; labouring to infuse into your majesty's subjects an evil opinion of the parliament, through the whole kingdom; and other symptoms of a disposition of raising arms, and dividing your people by a civil war; in which combustion Ireland must needs be lost, and this kingdom miserably wasted and consumed, if not wholly ruined and destroyed.—That after a vote had passed in the house of commons, (declaring, that the lord Digby had appeared in a warlike manner, at Kingston-upon-Thames, to the terror and fright of your majesty's good subjects, and disturbance of the public peace of the kingdom; and that therefore the lords could be moved to require his attendance;) should, nevertheless, be of that credit with your majesty, as to be sent away, by your own warrant, to sir John Pennington, to land him beyond the sea; from whence he vented his traitorous conceptions, That your majesty could declare yourself, and retire to a place of strength in this kingdom, as if your majesty could not be safe among your people; and, finally, took that transcendent boldness to write to the queen, offering to entertain correspondence with her majesty by cyphers, in anating some service which he might do in one parts, for which he desired your majesty's instructions; whereby, in all probability, he intended the procuring of some foreign force, to strengthen your maj. in that condition to which he would have brought you; which he and malicious counsel and advice, we have great cause to doubt, made too deep an impression in your majesty; considering the use you are pleased to take, of absenting yourself from your parliament, and carrying a Prince with you; which seems to express a repose in your majesty, to keep yourself in a readiness for the acting of it.—The manifold vertisements which we have had from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, that they still expect that your maj. has some great design in mind, for the altering of religion, and breaking the neck of your parliament; that you will find means to compass that design; that the Pope's nuncio hath solicited the kings of France and Spain to lend your maj. 4000 men, piece to help to maintain your royalty against parliament: and this foreign force, as it is the most pernicious and malignant design of all the rest, so we hope it is, and shall always be, farthest from your majesty's thoughts; because no man can believe you will give up your people and kingdom to be spoiled by strangers, if you did not likewise intend to change both your own profession in religion, and the public profession of the kingdom; that so you might still be more assured of those foreign states of the Popish religion, for your future support and defence.*—These are some of the Grounds of our Fears and Jealousies, which made us, so earnestly, to implore your royal authority and protection for our defence and security, in all the ways of humility and submission; which being denied by your majesty, seduced by evil counsel, we do, with sorrow for the great and unavoidable misery and danger which thereby is like to fall upon your own person and your kingdoms, apply ourselves to the use of that power, for the security and defence of both, which, by the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom, resides in us; yet still revolving to keep ourselves within the bounds of faithfulness and allegiance to your sacred person and your crown.—As to the second sort of Jealousies and Fears of us, expressed by your majesty, we shall give a shorter, but as true and as faithful an Answer. Whereas your majesty is pleased to say, 'That, for your residence near the parliament, you wish it might be so safe and honourable, that you had no cause to absent yourself from Whitehall.' This we take as the greatest breach of privilege of parliament that can be offered; as the heaviest misery to yourself, and imputation upon us, that can be imagined, and the most mischievous effects of evil counsels; it roots up the strongest foundation of the safety and honour which your crown affords; it seems, as much as may be, to cast upon the parliament such a charge as is inconsistent with the nature of that great council, being the body whereof your maj. is the head; it strikes at the very being both of king and parliament; depriving your majesty, in your own apprehension of their fidelity, and them of your protection, which are the mutual bands and supports of government and subjection.—We have, according to your maj.'s desire, laid our hands upon our hearts; we have asked ourselves in the strictest examination of our consciences; we have searched our affections, and our thoughts; considered our actions; and we find none that can give your maj. any just occasion to absent yourself from Whitehall and the parliament; but that you may, with more honour and safety, continue

* When this clause was read in the house of commons, sir Ralph Hopton told them, 'That they therein accused the king for being an apostate to his religion, not only in his own person, but of endeavouring to bring in his people to the same apostasy and idolatry;' for which the commons sent him to the Tower. But he was discharged a few days after.—Commons Journals.

there than in any other place.—Your maj. lays a general tax upon us; yet if your maj. will be graciously pleased to let us know the particulars, we shall give a clear and satisfactory Answer: but what hope can we have of ever giving your maj. satisfaction, when those particulars which you have been made believe were true; yet, being produced and made known to us, appeared to be false; and your majesty, notwithstanding, will neither punish nor produce the authors, but go on to contract new Jealousies and Fears, upon general and uncertain grounds, affording us no means or possibility of particular answer to the clearing of ourselves; for proof whereof, we beseech your majesty to consider these instances: The Speeches alledged to be spoken in a meeting of divers members of both houses at Kensington, concerning a purpose of restraining the Queen and Prince; which after it was denied and disavowed, yet your maj. refused to name the authors, though humbly desired by both houses: The report of Articles framed against the queen's majesty, given out by some of near relation to the court; but when it was publicly and constantly disclaimed, the credit seemed to be withdrawn from it; but the authors being kept safe, will always be ready for exploits of the same kind; wherewith your maj. and the queen will be often troubled, if this course be taken to cherish and secure them in such wicked and malicious slanders: The heavy charge and accusation of the lord Kimbolton and the five members of the house of commons, who refused no trial or examination which might stand with the privilege of parliament; yet no authors, no witnesses produced, against whom they may have reparation for the great injury and infamy cast upon them; notwithstanding three several petitions of both houses, and the authority of two acts of parliament vouched in the last of those petitions.—We beseech your maj. to consider in what state you are, how easy and fair a way you have to happiness, honour, greatness, plenty, and security; if you will join with the parliament and your faithful subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the kingdom: this is all we expect from you, and for this we shall return to you our lives, fortunes, and uttermost endeavours to support your maj. in your just sovereignty and power over us: but it is not words that can secure us in these our humble desires; we cannot but too well, and sorrowfully, remember what gracious Messages we had from you this summer, when, with your privity, the bringing up the army was in agitation; we cannot but, with the like affections, recall to our minds, how, not two days before you gave directions for the above-mentioned accusation, and your own coming to the commons house, that house received from your maj. a gracious Message, "That you would always have the same care of their privileges, as of your own prerogative; of the safety of their persons, as of your own children." That which we expect, and which will give us assurance that you have no thought but of peace and justice to your people, must be some real effect of your goodness to them in granting those things which the present necessity of the kingdom doth enforce us to desire: and, in the first place, that your maj. will be graciously pleased to put from you those wicked and mischievous counsellors, who have caused all these dangers and distractions; and to continue your own residence, and the Prince's near London, and the parliament. This, we hope, will be a happy beginning of contentment and confidence betwixt your maj. and your people, and be followed with many succeeding blessings of honour and greatness to your majesty, and of security and prosperity to them."

This being read, a debate ensued, and the question being put, it was resolved, "That the house agrees with the house of commons in this Declaration, and that it be presented to the king." A committee of both houses being appointed accordingly, the following peers entered their names as dissenting to this vote: earl of Lindsey, lord great Chamberlain; earls of Southampton, Northampton, Derby, and Cleveland; lords Mowbray, Willoughby de Eresby, Grey, Rich, Howard de Charlton, Savile, Dunsmore, Seymour, and Capell.

Additional Reasons in Support of the foregoing Declaration. March 7. p. m. The lord received a message from the commons, desiring their lordships to sit a while, having some business to communicate to them of high importance. Soon after came Mr. Pym, and presented to the house some Reasons, which he said, the commons think fit to be delivered to the king; either in writing, or by word of mouth, along with the Declaration. The Reasons were read in these words:

"The lords and commons have commended us to present unto your majesty this further Addition to their former Declaration. That your majesty's return, and continuance in the parliament, is a matter, in their apprehension, of so great necessity and importance towards the preservation of your royal person and your kingdoms, that they cannot think to have discharged their duties in the single expression of their desire, unless they add some further Reasons to back it with. 1. Your majesty's absence will cause men to believe that it is out of design to discourage the undertakers, and hinder the other provisions for raising money for defence of Ireland. 2. It will very much hearten the rebels there, and disaffected persons in this kingdom, as being an evidence and effect of the jealousy and division betwixt your maj. and your people. That it will much weaken and withdraw affection of the subject from your majesty, without which a prince is deprived of his chief strength and lustre, and left naked to the greatest dangers and miseries that can be imagined. 4. That it will invite and encourage the enemies of our religion, and the states of foreign parts, to the attempting and achiev-their evil designs and intentions towards us. That it causeth a great interruption in the proceedings of parliament.—These considerations threaten so great danger to your majesty's person, and to all your dominions, that, as your majesty's great council, they hold it necessary to represent to you this their faithful advice, that so, whatsoever followeth, they may be excused before God and man."

These Reasons were also voted by the lords to be presented at the same time with the Declaration.

Proceedings in the Trial of the Attorney General. March 8. This day a Letter from the King, directed to the lord keeper was read, viz.:

"C. R. Right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, we greet you well; We have thought good hereby to certify, that we did, on the 3rd Jan. last, deliver unto our Attorney General certain Articles of Accusation, ingrossed in a Paper, (a copy whereof we have sent here enclosed) and did then command him, in our name, to acquaint our house of peers, that divers great and treasonable designs and practices against us and the state, had come to our knowledge; for which we did command him, in our name, to accuse the six persons, in the said paper mentioned, of high treason, and their high misdemeanors, by delivering the paper to the said house, &c. [as before recited.] We further declare, That our said Attorney did not advise or contrive the said Articles, nor had any thing to do with, or in, advising any Breach of Privilege that followed after; and for what he did, in obedience to our commands, we conceive he was bound by his oath and the duty of his place, and by the trust by us reposed in him, so to do; and had he refused to have obeyed us therein, we would have questioned him for the breach of his oath, duty, and trust: but now having declared, That we did cause wholly to desist from proceeding against the persons accused, we have commanded our Attorney to proceed no farther therein, nor to produce or discover any proofs concerning the same. Given at our Court at Oyster, the 4th day of March, 1641."

The lords conceiving this letter to be a premeditated judgment of their house, ordered to proceed in the business against the Attorney General, now; and this Letter to be taken into consideration afterwards, as a matter of great consequence. A message was also sent to the commons, to inform them of the Letter, and that their lordships were ready to proceed against the Attorney General, if they would send a committee of their house to manage the evidence. Accordingly, the committee being sent, the lord keeper told them they might begin their evidence; whereupon

Mr. Serjeant Wylde, one of them, said, That they were appointed by the house of commons, to make good their Charge against Edw. Herbert, his majesty's Attorney General; a person of eminency in the common law, both eminent in place, and eminent in crime; the nature and deformity of which is set forth in the Impeachment, which he desired might be read. Then he observed, That his Charge was of 3 parts: 1. The advising and contriving of these foul Articles. 2. The publishing and exhibiting of them in this house. 3. The falsehood, scandal, malice, and other ingredients, mixed and incorporated so together, that they could no be more separated than blackness from the Ethiopian; or, if they could be separated, yet each of them was sufficient to call for judgment against Mr. Attorney.—He then mentioned the exhibiting of these Articles, Jan. 3, 1641. and they were read out of the Journal Book of that day. Also the king's Proclamation, reciting, That his Attorney General, by his majesty's command, had accused the 6 members of high treason in the house of lords. Likewise his majesty's Letters to Dover, and other ports, for the apprehending of them, reciting that they were accused by the Attorney General. Next he desired that Mr. Attorney's Answer might be read; wherein, he said, there was matter enough to condemn him: In which he confessed the exhibiting the paper of Articles, as a Message from his majesty, and by his command; on which it was recorded in the clerk's book; put into a course of proceeding; a committee appointed for examination of witnesses, under a command of secrecy; and a desire to the lords that their persons might be secured. These were the steps and degrees of his proceedings; but, in his Answer, he denies the advising and contriving of these Articles; and saith, That he was so far from that, that he knew nothing at all of them, till he received this command from his maj. for the exhibiting of them; being sent for, immediately before, by his maj. for that purpose. But this, he said, was so far from satisfaction to the commons, or qualification of the offence, that it aggravated and augmented it.—For the exhibiting and promoting of those Articles, is, in judgment of law, an evident demonstration of his contrivance of them: As, in the case of stolen Goods, the receipt and possession of them, is an evidence, to a jury of life and death, of the stealing of them, unless the party can shew how he came by them. In case of Trover and conversion of goods, though the denial of them, upon demand, be no conversion, in law, whereon to ground an action, upon Not guilty pleaded; it is a good evidence to a jury to find him guilty of the conversion. In case of a Libel, the finder and publisher shall be adjudged the author and contriver of it, unless he can produce some other author. So, in this case, the publishing and exhibiting of these Articles, by the attorney general, is a clear evidence that he contrived them; the one doth necessarily imply the other. The contriving, without the publishing, is but an inception of an offence; the publishing is the consummation of it, and therefore the more heinous. The publisher is the grand offender; he blows the coals and the trumpet. If it could be imagined that there was another author, or contriver of these, than Mr. Attorney, as he would pretend, yet the exhibiting and promoting of them is an offence so heavy, as needs no other additional weight to press him down to the ground; who, by such an act of injustice and false accusation, would so grievously have oppressed them. Mischiefs, hatched in the brain, are only mischievous to the inventor; but the vegetation and life is from the publisher; he gives motion and agitation to it, which, otherwise, would be but an abortive and inanimate creature.—But for the Excuse, under which he seeks to shelter himself, that is, the king's command, this adds more to his offence; a foul aspersion on his majesty, and wrong to his gracious master; for he could not but know that the king's command, in things illegal, is utterly frustrate, and of no effect: his patents and grants, if against the crown, in matter of interest, are merely void, quia in deceptione regis; if against the weal-public, they are, ipso jure, vacua; much more his command, in matters criminal, because no action lies against him.—The Serjeant, next, proceeded to cite several cases, from the Statute Books, &c. to prove that the Attorney General had broken all those laws, and infringed all those liberties; even the rights of parliament, by which no member of either house ought to be impeached, either for felony, treason, or other offences, without representing the cause first to that house whereof he is a member; and their consent and direction therein desired: for, otherwise, all members of each house may be pulled out, one after another, upon a pretence of treason; which, perhaps, he said, was now Mr. Attorney's design. Besides, he said, that the Attorney had done contrary to his oath, in this business; for he is sworn to the king, duly and truly to issue out the king's writs, and give the king true advice according to the law; which, in this action, he hath not done, contrary to his oath.—The Serjeant then said, That many aggravating circumstances might be added; as, the Attorney's profession and knowledge in the law; his long experience in the course and privileges of parliament, having been so often, and of late, a member of the house of commons, and obliged to them by many favours; and now an assistant or attendant in the house of lords: Then considering the qualities of the persons accused; their singular parts, integrity, and merit; their indefatigable labours and travail for the public good, which could not expect such a reward as this, the odious name of traitors: the woful and dangerous consequences that have, de facto, ensued upon this; for, by colour of these Articles, they were proclaimed, posted, sold up and down, for traitors; they were hunted and sought for by officers, demanded even from the horns of the altar; their studies, chambers, and trunks scaled up; the house of commons strongly besieged; their privileges strangely invaded; their last and uttermost hopes ready to be confounded. As these are beyond expression, so the consequences that might have happened are beyond imagination; bloodshed, horror, devastation, and confusion; all the evils, dangers, troubles, and distractions which have happened since, and what now the houses be under, may be imputed to this act of Mr. Attorney. Had he stood in the gap, and humbly besought or advised the forbearance of this, or declined the doing of it, as in all equity he ought to have done, all these miseries had been prevented; and a happy reconciliation, in all likelihood, settled between his majesty and his people before this time. It remains, therefore, that he who, willingly, judicially, and upon record, hath contracted to himself the guilt of all these evils and calamities, should receive, from their lordships, such a measure of punishment as may make the fact more odious, and himself the mark of that exemplary justice to this and after ages."

Mr. Serjeant Wyde having made an end of this Charge, desired, That if Mr. Attorney would make any Answer to it, he might speak himself; but the attorney desired that his counsel might be heard for him: To this the Serjeant objected, and said, That they were a committee representing the house of commons, and it did not stand with the dignity of the house to have counsel come to confront them. He further alledged, That this offence of Mr. Attorney's had been voted, by both houses of parliament, an high Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, which no counsel can, neither ought they to judge of. And because it concerned the house of commons, in an high degree, in their privileges, as well as it did the lordships, he desired that Mr. Attorney might not be allowed counsel, but that he might speak for himself.—The Attorney replied, That their lordships had been pleased, upon his humble Petition, to assign him counsel in this cause; that his Answer is put in by the advice, and they are ready to maintain it, which if their lordships should not allow of, he was not provided to make a defence to the charge; therefore desired their lordships to hear him by his counsel, and the committee to take the judgment of the house upon it.—Hereupon both sides being commanded to withdraw, the lords put themselves into a committee, for the more free debate in this matter, it being a mixed case, consisting of breach of privilege of parliament, matter of fact, and matter of law. The house being resumed, the question was put, Whether Mr. Attorney should have counsel, in matter of privilege, in this case? and it was resolved in the affirmative. The committee of the commons, the Attorney and his counsel, being called in again, were told of this Resolution; and that their lordships had appointed to proceed further in this cause the next day.

March 9. The lords proceeded in the Attorney General's cause, and his counsel were told, that they were to begin with assisting him in his defence, upon their perils. The counsel raved their lordships pardon therein, for they are not now provided for his defence; because the business concerned the privilege of parliament, as was alledged yesterday. The lords not being satisfied with this Answer, directed the Attorney and his counsel to withdraw; and, upon consideration of it, it was ordered, 'That they should be commanded to give a direct Answer, severally, whether they could plead or not; and if they would not it could be taken as a denial.'—Being called in again, the lord keeper commanded them to proceed; when sir Thos. Beddingfield, one of counsel, answered, He desired some time prepare for it, not being now provided. Sir Wm. Gardiner, recorder of London, another counsel, answered in like manner. The rest of them said, That they were willing to plead, at their lordships command, and thought it was their duty so to do; but the chief part of Mr. Attorney's Defence being committed to the aforesaid gentlemen, by that means they were not provided now, but desired some further time, as their lordships should please to point. On this, all being commanded to withdraw again, the lords considering the refusal of sir Thos. Beddingfield and sir Thos. Gardiner, to plead, as a contempt of that use, ordered them both to be committed to the Tower, there to remain during the pleasure of the house: and further ordered, "That if the Attorney desire other counsel, in the room of the former, that he bring in the names of such as he desires, the next morning, for the better expediting of this cause."

March 10. The Attorney made his humble petition to the lords, That they would assign a Mr. Serj. Green, and Mr. Serj. Pheasant, counsel in the room of the former two committed; which was granted, and the 12th instant was peremptorily appointed to proceed in the business.

The King's Speech to the Committee, on their sending the last Declaration to him, at Newmarket. March 12. The lords appointed to send the parliament's Declaration to the king, reported, That they had done so at Newmarket, and that the next day they had received the following Answer:

'I am confident that you expect not I should give you a speedy Answer to this strange and unexpected Declaration; and I am sorry, in distraction of this kingdom, you should ask this way of address to be more convenient than that proposed by my Message, of the 20th January last, to both houses. As concerning the Grounds of your Fears and Jealousies, I take time to answer particularly, and do not but I shall do it to the satisfaction of all the world. God, in his good time, will, I hope, discover the secrets and bottoms of all treasons and treasons, and then I shall stand right in the eyes of all my people. In the mean time, I must tell you, that I rather expected vindication for the imputation laid on me by Mr. Pym's Speech, than that any more general rumours and discourses should get credit with you. For my Fears and Doubts I did not think they should have been thought so groundless or trivial, while so many seditious pamphlets and sermons are looked upon, and so great tumults are remembered, unpunished and unrequited in me: I still confess my fears, and call God to witness, that they are greater for the true Protestant profession, my people, and laws, than for my own rights or safety; though I must tell you, I conceive that none of these are free from danger. What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any one bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask you what you have done for me. Have any of my people been transported with fears and apprehensions? I have offered as free and general a pardon, as yourselves can devise. All this considered, there is a judgment from Heaven upon this nation, if these distractions continue. God so deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright, for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observation and preservation of the laws of this land; and, I hope, God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation. As for the Additional Declaration, you are to expect an Answer to it, when you shall receive the Answer to the Declaration itself."

Remarkable Passages on that Occasion. A Narrative of some remarkable Passages that happened between the king and the committee of both houses, upon delivering the foregoing Declaration to his majesty, was published at this time as follows: "When his majesty heard that part of the Declaration which mentioned Mr. Jermin's transportation, his majesty interrupted the earl of Holland in reading, and said, 'That's false.' Which being afterwards touched upon again, his majesty then said, 'Tis a lie.' And when he was informed, 'It related not to the date, but the execution of the warrant:' his majesty said, 'It might have been better expressed then, and that it was a high thing to tax a king with breach of promise.' As for this Declaration, his majesty said, 'I could not have believed the parliament would have sent me such a one, if I had not seen it brought by such persons of honour. I am sorry for the parliament, but glad I have it; for, by that, I doubt not to satisfy my people, though I am confident, the greater part is so already. Ye speak of ill counsels; but I am confident the parliament hath had worse informations than I have had counsels.' His majesty asking 'What he had denied the parliament?' The earl of Holland instanced that of the Militia: His majesty replied, 'That was no Bill.' The earl of Holland then said, 'It was a necessary request at this time.' And his majesty also then said, 'He had not denied it.' The next day, when his majesty delivered his Answer; which was read by the earl of Holland to the rest of the committee; and that being done, his lordship endeavoured to persuade his maj. to come near the parliament: his maj. answered, 'I would you had given me cause, but I am sure this Declaration is not the way to it; and in all Aristotle's Rhetoricks there is no such argument of persuasion.' The earl of Pembroke thereupon telling him, 'That the parliament had humbly besought his maj. to come near them as aforesaid.' His majesty replied, 'He had learned by our Declaration, that words were not sufficient.' His majesty, being again moved by the earl of Pembroke, to express what he would have, said, 'He would whip a boy in Westminster school that could not tell that by his Answer.' And further said 'They were much mistaken, if they thought his Answer to that a denial.' And being asked by the said earl of Pembroke, 'Whether the Militia might not be granted, as was desired by the parliament, for a time.' His majesty swore, 'By God, not for an hour; you have asked that of me in this, which was never asked of a king, and with which I will not trust my wife and children.' His majesty added, 'The business of Ireland will never be done in the way you are in, 400 will never do that work; it must be put into the hands of one. If I were trusted with it, I would pawn my head to end that work; and though I am a beggar myself, yet,' speaking with a strong asseveration, 'I can find money for that.'

Further Proceedings in the Trial of the Attorney General.] The foregoing Answer being read, the lords ordered the Attorney General and his counsel to be called in, and proceeded in his defence. Serjeant Pheasant desired to be excused from pleading in a business which required so much pains to attend, by reason of his bodily infirmities; and the other, serjeant Green, saying, That being assigned so lately to this business, he found it so intricate to be put in a method, and the records to be perused so many, that he could not, upon so short warning, undertake to make this defence; he therefore humbly craved their lordships to excuse him then, and allow him some further time to prepare himself for this purpose. But, upon consideration of this, the lords resolved to allow no longer time; on which Mr. Hearne, another of the Attorney's counsel, desired that the Impeachment might be read; which being done, he said, "That for the matter of fact, nothing appears by way of charge, but the exhibiting of the Articles; and that no witness was produced, in all the cause, to prove any crime; that there was but an Impeachment and a denial; and no act proved but what was confessed, which is the exhibiting the Articles. He further alledged, That whereas the Attorney was charged to do the fact maliciously, he did nothing but by the command of the king, and knew not of the Articles until they were delivered to him by his majesty."

Next Mr. Chute, another of Mr. Attorney's counsel, argued, "That it was the duty of the Attorney to prosecute the king's causes in all courts of record, when he shall be called, and be assistant in all these matters; to this purpose he read the Attorney's oath. Further he alledged, That the king's Datum est nobis intelligi, is warrant enough to the Attorney to proceed against any person, as in the record of Edw. 3. Rot. 38. where Wm. abp. of York, upon Datum est nobis intelligi, was brought before the king and his counsel, and prosecuted by the attorney general. He also urged the reports of the Judges in the earl of Arundel's case, April 1626." He said, "That the Attorney General is bound, by his oath, to proceed in all courts of record, though the king gave him no command; and that in parliament he had prosecuted a Commoner at large, as 31 Edw. 1. Rot. 22. where Nicholas de Segre was summoned, by the sheriff of Northampton to appear 'Coram Domino rege in primo parlamento suo, apud Westmonasterium pro adventu Domini regis, ibidem ad audiendam voluntatem Domini regis, super his quod tunc ibidem proponere intenderet versus eum et ad faciendum et recipiendum unde quod Curia Domini Regis consideraret premissis.' The said Segre appearing in parliament, he was prosecuted for the king and accused by Nic. de Warwick, That maliciously stirred up discord and content against John de Crumbwell, who was employed by the king in the war against the Scots. A day being given to make answer, Segre admitted and acknowledged his offence: upon this the king desired the advice of the lords, what punishment should be inflicted upon a grave for such a fact, so fully and expressly confessed; the lords gave this Judgment, That for his fault, he deserved to lose his life; the king, out of his special grace and piety, remitted the judgment of life and members; and ordered the said Segre to find seven good and sufficient men to be bail for him, body for body. Also 4 Edw. III. Sir Tho. Berkeley and John Maltravers were prosecuted in parliament, for the murder of Edw. II. and were tried and acquitted by a jury. And 4. Rot. No. 17. Rauf de Ferrers was prosecuted in parliament, upon suspicion of treason: See the parliament 17 Rd. 2. No. 20. Tho. Talbot, chevalier, was accused in parliament, for conspiring the death of two of the king's councillors."

The counsel having spoken concerning the matter of fact, Mr. Attorney made his own defence to that which concerned the matter of privilege of parliament; and cited the case of Philip Courtney, 16 Rd. 2. No. 16. and the case of the earl of Arundel, and his remission made therein, April 19, 2. Carol. I. He also insisted, lastly, on the case of the earl of Bristol, the same year. And concluded with observing, That he did not conceive any thing urged against him could make up the case that he is charged with, but only the vote passed by both houses, touching the breach the privileges of parliament; and so submitted himself to the justice of that house.—Nothing more was done in this cause at this time. Sir J. Beddingfield and sir T. Gardiner, on their humble petition to the lords, were released from the Tower.

March 15. The lords again took the cause of Mr. Attorney into consideration. What judgment was to be given on the Impeachment of the commons against him? After a long debate, it was put to the question, 1. Whether, upon the whole matter, Mr. Attorney had committed a crime for which he ought to be sentenced by that house? Resolved in the affirmative. 2. Whether for his offence, he shall lose his place? Resolved negatively. To his last vote the following lords dissented: the lords of Northumberland, Essex, Leicester, Warwick, Holland, Bolingbroke, Stamford; the lords Hastings, Willoughby de Parham, St. John, Spencer, Paget, Grey de Werk, Roberts. Whether the Attorney shall pay a fine to the commons for his offence? Resolved negatively; the same lords, as above, dissenting. 4. Whether Mr. Attorney shall pay damages for this cause to the parties that were accused? 5. Whether the Attorney shall be committed to the Tower for this offence? Both these were, in the affirmative; the same lords dissenting.

Votes of the Commons, for putting the King into a State of Defence, &c. March 15. A message was brought up from the commons, to acquaint the lords with some Votes, that had passed their house; to which they desired their lordships concurrence, as those Votes were to be the Heads for a Declaration to be drawn up by a committee: They were these:

1. "That the Kingdom hath been of late, and is in so evident and imminent danger, from enemies abroad, and from a Popish and discontented party at home; that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his Majesty's Subjects into a posture of Defence for the safeguard both of his majesty and his people." The lords agreed with the commons in this vote, the following lords dissenting: earls of Northampton, Cleveland, Newport; lords Unsworth, and Capell. 2. "That the lords of the commons, fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty to provide suitable prevention, have, in several petitions, addressed themselves to his majesty, for the arming and disposing of the Militia of this kingdom, in such a way as was agreed upon by the wisdom of both houses to be the most effectual and proper for the present exigence of the kingdom; yet could not obtain it, but his majesty did several times refuse his royal assent thereto." Agreed to by the lords. 3. That in case of extreme danger, and of his majesty's refusal, the Ordinance agreed on by both houses, for the Militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom." The question was put, Whether the Judges should be heard, in point of law, as to this vote? It passed in the negative; and, upon another question, the said vote was also agreed to. A Protest was entered, in form, against the third vote, and against the Resolution for not consulting the judges; but as it does no more than repeat the two questions, and their dissent from them, we pass it over. The lord Lovelace is the only additional name to those last mentioned. 4. "Resolved, upon the question, That these shall be the Heads of a Declaration." Agreed to. 5. "Resolved, That such persons as shall be nominated deputy lieutenants, and approved of by both houses, shall receive the commands of both houses, and execute their offices." Agreed to; the lords Southampton and Dunsmore only dissenting.—Ordered, 'That these Votes of both houses should be printed, and a committee next day to meet, and draw up a Declaration upon them.'

The Commons Answer to the King's Reply about Mr. Pym's Speech. This day sir Wm. Lewis reported the Commons Answer to the King's Reply, concerning Mr. Pym's Speech relating to persons passed into Ireland; which was agreed to, and ordered to be sent to his majesty, by lord Compton and Mr. Baynton; as follows:

"May it please your majesty; Your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the knights, citizens and burgesses of the commons house of parliament, having considered your majesty's Reply to their Answer, touching such persons as have been licenced by your maj. to pass into Ireland; do most humbly beseech your maj. to believe, that they shall always, with thankfulness and joy, receive from your maj. any satisfactory Answer to their just requests: and, as they hope they shall find in your maj. a readiness to rectify those things, which have been done to their prejudice; so will they be careful to remove all apprehensions of their actions or speeches, which may seem to cast any dishonour upon your majesty. For your majesty's better satisfaction concerning the positive affirmation, 'That many of the chief commanders, now in the head of the rebels, (after the ports were stopped by order of both houses) have been suffered to pass by your majesty's immediate warrant:' May it please your maj. to consider, That, herein, they have affirmed nothing but what they had cause to believe was true; the Grounds whereof they humbly present to your majesty. The first Ground is this, That both houses of parliament, (having, upon your majesty's recommendation, taken into their care the suppression of the rebellion in Ireland) had reason to be especially watchful over the forts; because the rebels, abounding in numbers of men for the most part ignorant of the use of arms, could by no means become dangerous or formidable to this kingdom, but by the access of soldiers and commanders; wherewith they were like to be furnished either out of France or Flanders; from both which places the passage into Ireland is speedy and easy through this kingdom; and therefore they could not

chuse but be very seisable of whatsoever gave liberty or opportunity to such a passage, as of a very hurtful and dangerous grievance; for prevention whereof they did, upon the 7th of Nov. agree upon an Order, and restrain all passage into Ireland, but upon due and strict examination, by such persons as were trusted to make those licences.—A second Ground that the other licence, granted to the lord Delvin, and then acknowledged by your majesty's Answer, was such, (both in regard of the persons to whom they were granted, and the extent of the words in which they were granted) as were apt to produce such an effect as is mentioned in that positive affirmation; that is, To open a way for the passage of Papists and other dangerous persons to join with the rebels, and to be heads and commanders amongst them, is thus proved. The first warrant granted to colonel Butler (since the Order of restraint by both houses of parliament) did extend to all parts of England and Scotland; and did give free passage to himself and to his company, without any qualification of persons, or limitation of number; and this colonel was himself a Papist, had a brother in the rebellion, and general of the rebels in Munster; was expected, and very much desired, by those rebels, who, for a long time, had kept a regiment to be commanded by him, as we have been credibly informed. The second was granted to a son of the lord Nettersfield, which lord had 4 sons in England since the rebellion; one of which is settled in England, three others intended to pass into Ireland, and were all dangerous persons, being Papists, bred in the wars in the service of the king of Spain, and one of them lately become a Jesuit. The third, to the lord Delvin, extends to himself and 4 persons more unnamed; that one of those, who should have past with him, is taken to be a Jesuit; and another, who calls himself Plunket, seems to be a man of some breeding and quality, and like to have been serviceable to the rebels, and to have done mischief, if he had gone over. The fourth to sir Geo. Hamilton and three more unnamed; this gentleman is likewise a professed Papist, and may be doubted to be of the party of the rebels; one of that name being mentioned in the instructions of Sempil, the Jesuit, amongst divers other dangerous persons of the Popish party in Scotland and Ireland; which instructions were found in a ship stayed in Cornwall, which was going into Ireland with divers Jesuits, soldiers and others, for the encouragement of the rebels.—A third Ground is this, That, by virtue and authority of these licences, several persons have passed over, which now are in actual rebellion; and have command amongst the rebels; which is thus proved: One captain Sutton did, by virtue and authority of your majesty's licence, embark at Whitehaven, in the company of colonel Butler, and was driven back by foul weather; whereupon the colonel stayed, and went to Chester; but that captain re-embarked himself in the same bottom, from whence he passed into Ireland, where he went into the rebellion with the lord Dunsany; and has since obtained the place of a colonel amongst the rebels, as we are credibly informed. Two of the sons of the lord Nettersfield, one Jesuit, and the other a soldier, passed into Ireland, in Dec. last; both of them by virtue of your majesty's warrant, as we have cause to believe, for that they went both together on one ship; and the licence, acknowledged in granted by your warrant, must needs be granted to one of them; seeing the other brother who lately endeavoured to pass over, did produce no licence, and upon his examination doth absolutely deny that he had any.—A fourth Ground, which we humbly offer to your majesty, is this, That your maj. cannot assured that no other did pass upon your licence as your maj. doth conceive, and are pleased to express in your Answer; and that we have great cause to believe that divers others have passed over by your warrant, besides the persons aforementioned; and that for these 4 sons: 1. Because we received such a general information, That divers, now in the head of the rebels, were passed by your majesty's licence; which being true in part, and to be effected, in regard of the nature and extent of the warrants; and probable to be attempted, in regard of the subtlety and lancy of that party to make use of all advantages, seemed to deserve credit; which should not have given to it, if it had been a general information without such circumstances. Because we had concurring advertisements from Ireland and Chester, that divers Priests, Jesuits, and Popish commanders had passed over, and were landed there; and particularly some of colonel Butler's company; and that the officers of the ports had kept no entry of names of these persons, or of the warrants by which they were transported.—These, we will be sufficient to persuade your maj. to believe, That as we had some cause to give credit to the said informations, so we had no intent to make any ill use of them to your majesty's dishonour; but did impute the blame to your ministers; who might have been more careful to have informed your maj. of the quality of the persons named in your licences; and to have limited them, that they might not be extended to others, as they did, how many dangerous soever. And they pray you to rest assured, That they shall always be tender of your honour and reputation as your good subjects; and, for this cause, have made this true Declaration of the full state of this matter, that they may think no other of it than the truth; and, in all things, shall labour to establish a good understanding and confidence betwixt your maj. and your people, which they heartily desire and pray for, as the chiefest means of preserving the honour, safety, and prosperity of your majesty, and your kingdom."

The King's Message from Huntingdon, relating to Ireland, the Militia, &c.] Mar

This day the lord keeper delivered to the king a Letter, directed to himself, and a Message in it, from the king to the lords, dated at Huntingtondon, March 15; which was read hæc verba:

"His majesty being now in his remove to the city of York, where he intends to make his residence for some time, thinks fit to send this Message to both houses of parliament: That doth very earnestly desire that they will use possible industry in expediting the business of Ireland, in which they shall find so cheerful concurrence by his majesty, that no inconvenience shall happen to that service by his absence; he having all that passion for the rearing of that kingdom, which he hath expressed in his former Messages; and being united, by words, to manifest more affection to it, than he hath endeavoured to do by those Messages; having likewise done all such acts as he hath been moved unto by his parliament: Therefore, if the misfortunes and calamities of poor Protestant subjects there shall grow upon them, (though his majesty shall be deeply concerned in, and sensible of, their sufferings) shall wash his hands before all the world, in the least imputation of slackness in that necessary and pious work.—And that his majesty may leave no way unattempted, which may beget a good understanding between him and his parliament; he thinks it necessary to declare, That as he hath been so tender of the privileges of parliament, that he hath been ready and forward to retract any act of his, which he hath been informed hath infringed upon their privileges; so he expects equal tenderness in them of his majesty's own and unquestionable privileges, which are the privileges of the kingdom; amongst which, he is assured, it is a fundamental one, that his subjects cannot be obliged to obey any act, order, or injunctions, to which his majesty hath not given his consent; and therefore he thinks it necessary to publish, That he commands, and hereby requires, obedience, from his loving subjects, to the laws established; that they presume not, upon any pretence of order or Ordinance to which his majesty is not assented, concerning the Militia, or any other business, to do or execute what is not warranted by those laws; his majesty being resolved to obey all the laws himself, and to require obedience to them from all his subjects.—And his majesty once more recommends to his parliament the substance of his Message of the 20th of January last, That they compose and digest, with all speed, such acts, as they shall think proper for the present and future establishment of their privileges; the free and quiet enjoying of their estates and fortunes; the liberties of their persons; the security of the true religion professed in the church of England; the maintaining his majesty's regal and just authority, and settling his revenue: his majesty being most desirous to take all fitting and just measures, which may beget a happy understanding between him and parliament, in which he conceives his greatest power and riches doth consist."

Conference held thereupon. The lords, taking this Message into consideration, ordered, That it should be communicated to the commons at a conference; which being done accordingly, Mr. Denzil Hollis made the following report: "That the lord Roberts, who was appointed by the lords for that purpose, said, That he was commanded, by the lords, to deliver what is their sense of this Message; and to represent their observations. 1. Concerning the Militia, the lords do still insist upon the Declaration of both houses, notwithstanding any thing expressed in this Message. 2. The lords made some observations out of the matter of the Message, and out of the circumstances of time and place: 1. For the king's Removal, for so far as York, from the parliament; and the great inconvenience that should happen thereby to the kingdom of Ireland, by reason of his absence; the lords taking it into consideration, do conceive his majesty's removing so far as York, must, of necessity, be an obstruction, and may be a destruction of that kingdom. The next particular out of the Message is, concerning the Privilege of Parliament, and the Laws of the Land; the lords are of opinion, That when the parliament, which is the supreme court of this kingdom, shall declare what the law of the land is, to have that not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, is a breach of the privilege of parliament.—The next observation they had, was, from the time, and place: for by comparing this with the votes that passed both houses yesterday, it is, as it were, a contradiction of those votes: they do either think there was some prophetic spirit in it, that this should be so express an Answer to those votes, or that it was framed nearer hand: and therefore desire, that it may be referred to a committee to examine the same."

Soon after the lords sent for Francis Taylor, the messenger, and asked him of whom he had the letter he brought from the king; he said, he had the letter from a servant of the lord Falkland's, secretary of state, last night, at 9 o'clock, and he brought it and delivered it to the lord keeper.

Then the bill 'For clearing the lord Kimbolton and the 5 Members from a feigned Charge of High Treason;' also another bill 'For raising Money for the great Affairs of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, was read a third time by the lords, and passed. Ordered, 'That the clerk of the crown, in Chancery, do forthwith draw up two commissions, and prepare them ready for the great seal, for his majesty's royal assent to be given to these two bills.

* Lord Clarendon observes, "That he never knew both houses in more choler and rage, than upon the receiving this Message; which came so early to them, that they concluded that it could not be sent from the king, but that it had been inserted in blanks left in the town for such purposes."

Votes of the Commons in consequence thereof.] March 17. The commons sent up a Message to the lords, by Mr. Denzil Hollis, That they had taken into serious consideration the matter of the last conference, and the king's last Message; That they had also passed some votes concerning their sense of the same, to which they desired their lordships concurrence, viz. "Resolved, 1. That this house shall insist upon their former votes concerning the Militia. 2. That the king's absence, so far remote from his parliament, is not only an obstruction, but may be a destruction, to the affairs of Ireland. 3. That when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom, shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament. 4. That a committee shall be appointed by this house to join with a committee of the lords, to inquire where this Message was framed. 5. That those persons that advised his maj. to absent himself from the parliament, are enemies to the peace of this kingdom, and justly to be suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland. 6. That those persons that advised his maj. to this Message are enemies to the peace of this kingdom.—All these Votes were agreed to by the lords.

Conference concerning some Informations touching an Invasion of England, &c.] March 19. p. m. A message was brought up from the commons, desiring a conference about an Answer to the king's last Message from Newmarket; as, also, concerning some Informations the commons had received, touching the Affairs of the kingdom. This conference being held, the lord keeper reported it back to the lords, to this effect. "That the house of commons had received several Informations from abroad concerning a design to invade England, the letters of which were read, importing, That the lord Digby had got together 30 or 40,000 men, at Elsenour, in Denmark, and a fleet of ships ready to convey them to Hull. This information was given abroad by one James Henley, a master of a ship, who said he was treated with to serve as pilot to this fleet. The next Information was from a Frenchman, who was servant to M. Freeze, son to the lord chancellor of Denmark, who said, that he came lately from Denmark, and heard there of levies of men; and at Hamburg he heard, that those levies were designed for England. The commons offered these concurrent proofs to make the Information more considerable. 1. The endeavours to have put the earl of Newcastle into Hull, and his coming thither under a feigned name. 2. The expressions in lord Digby's letters; and his majesty withdrawing himself into those parts, notwithstanding the advice of his parliament. To this the commons added another Information they had received, concerning a French fleet going for Ireland, from another master of a ship, who said them steering that way. These were materials for their fears, and a further cause for a continuance of their distractions and jealousies, and of pursuing the course already agreed on, for securing the kingdom, and putting the subjects into a posture of defence. It was further delivered at this conference, That a message with all speed be sent to his maj. to answer some things in his late speech to a committee of lords and commons, at Newmarket, which seem to reflect upon the conduct of both houses; to intimate to him the contents of those advices received out of Holland; to renew the desires of both houses; for his majesty's return to his parliament. Also the commons desired their lordships concurrence to the following propositions: 1. "That a command of both houses be sent to Hull, by express to the Governor there, to suffer no foreigner to come into that Harbour, without strict examination; and that he receive no English or other forces into that town, but such as both houses shall advise or direct him to receive, and keep that town for his majesty's service and the security of the kingdom. The proposition related to giving instructions to the lord admiral to take special care to guard the seas; to search all ships passing between land and Hull; and to enquire what preparations of land or sea forces are making abroad. Lastly, The lord lieutenants and sheriffs of the Northern counties were ordered, from both houses, to suppress forces which shall be raised in those counties without the direction of parliament; and to take special care of Newcastle, Hull, and other towns, on those coasts.—Then was read a Letter, without a name, dated, Newcastle, March 8, 1641, sent to Mr. Pym, intimating That the Navy will be treacherous to the parliament; that forces will be sent out of Hull into Ireland; that Declarations from the king will be printed of the grievances of the parliament; and that some of the members of the house of commons betray all their designs, and send the king the heads of their intended resolutions."

This report being ended, the lords took it into consideration; and, after a serious debate, the commons Answer to the king's last Message was read and agreed to; the earl of Newcastle, with the lords Mowbray, Grey, Danvers, and Capel, dissenting.—The first proposition, concerning sir John Hotham's not admitting him into Hull, was objected to, because of the words, 'Without the advice or direction of both houses of parliament;' and it was moved to propose that it should run, 'Without the king's authority, signified by both houses of parliament.' The second Proposition was wholly agreed to, and ordered accordingly. To the third, That the lieutenants and sheriffs should take care to suppress insurrections, it was resolved to be put to the commons.

whether it was not a weakening to a former order of both houses, given to sheriffs, &c. for suppressing unlawful assemblies. Resolved to have another conference with the commons on these emendations.

The commons sent up, by sir John Coleman, knight, chancellor of the Exchequer, a Bill of Subsidy of tonnage and poundage, &c. merchandize imported or exported; which the lords read a first time.

The same day the king's commission was read for passing a bill, intituled, 'an Act for speedy and effectual reducing of the rebels in your majesty's kingdom of Ireland;' when, the commons being sent for, the royal assent was given with the usual ceremonies. This act respected the adventurers, in that kingdom, already mentioned.

March 21. This day the conference was held on the late Propositions, when the commons would not agree with the lords in the alteration of that about Hull; but adhered to the first. As to the other about Sheriffs, the commons conceived in was no weakening of the former Order: but to make it clearer, a letter might be writ to that effect to the lord tenants and the Sheriffs: upon which the king agreed to all as they were first proposed. Resolutions of the Commons against the 12 Bishops. Mr. Glynn, one of the committee of the bill against the Bishops, made a report to the house, on which they came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That a question shall put upon every particular Bishop. 2. That, in this bill the archbishop of York shall not lose the inheritance of his temporal estate." The like question was put upon Thomas, Bishop of Durham, and so, severally on all the rest, it resolved negatively. But, upon another question, Whether the archbishop and the bishops, separately, should by that bill, forfeit the lands and issues of their temporal estates, hold lands, and lands of inheritance, during their lives? it was carried in the affirmative. Resolved, That the archbishop of York shall be valued 100*l.* per annum.

Answer of both Houses to the King's last Message from Newmarket. March 22. The following Message, to be sent to the king, from both houses, was this day read by the lords, read to, and ordered to be presented to the king by a committee of both houses:

'May it please your majesty; Your majesty's most loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, cannot conceive that the declaration which your majesty received from us at Newmarket, was such as did deserve that we should be so pleased to lay upon us that Speech which your maj. made to our committee there, and sent in writing to both houses: our Address therein being accompanied with plainness, humility, and faithfulness, we thought more proper for the removing the distraction of the kingdom, than if we had then proceeded according to your majesty's Message the 20th of January; by which your maj. was pleased to desire, That we would declare what we intended to do for your majesty, and what we expected to be done for ourselves: In both which we have been very much hindered by your majesty's denial to secure us and the whole kingdom, by disposing the Militia, as we had, divers times, most humbly petitioned; and yet we have not been altogether negligent of either, having lately made good proceedings in preparing a Book of Rates to be passed in a bill of Tonnage and Poundage, and likewise the most material heads of those humble desires, which we intended to make to your majesty, for the good and contentment of your maj. and your people: but none of these could be perfected before the kingdom be put into safety, by settling the Militia; and until your maj. shall be pleased to concur with your parliament in those necessary things, we hold it impossible for you to give the world, or your people, such satisfaction concerning the fears and jealousies which we have expressed, as we hope your maj. hath already received, touching that exception which you were pleased to take to Mr. Pym's Speech.—As for your majesty's fears and doubts, the ground whereof is from seditious pamphlets and sermons, we shall be as careful to endeavour the removal, as soon as we shall understand what pamphlets and sermons are by your maj. intended, as we have been to prevent all dangerous tumults: and if any extraordinary concourse of people, out of the city of Westminster, had the face and shew of tumult and danger, in your majesty's apprehension, it will appear to be caused by your majesty's denial of such a guard to your parliament, as they might have cause to confide in; and by taking, into Whitehall, such a guard for yourself, as gave just cause of jealousy to the parliament, and of terror and offence to your people.—We seek nothing but your majesty's honour, and the peace and prosperity of your kingdoms; and we are heartily sorry we have such plentiful matter of an Answer to that Question, 'Whether you have violated our laws?' We beseech your maj. to remember, that the government of this kingdom, as it was in a great part managed by your ministers, before the beginning of this parliament, consisted of many continued and multiplied acts of violation of laws; the wounds whereof were scarcely healed, when the extremity of all those violations was far exceeded by the late strange and unheard-of breach of our laws, in the accusation of the lord Kimbolton and the 5 Members of the commons house, and in the proceedings thereupon; for which we have yet received no full satisfaction.—To your majesty's next question, 'Whether you had denied any bill for the ease and security of your subjects?' We wish we could stop in the midst of our Answer, That with much thankfulness we acknowledge that your maj. hath passed many good bills, full of contentment and advantage to your people; but truth and necessity enforce us to add this, That, even in or about the time of passing those bills, some design or other hath been on foot, which, if it had taken effect, would not only have deprived us of the fruit of those bills, but have reduced us to a worse condition of confusion than that wherein the parliament found us.—And if your majesty had asked us the third question intimated in that speech, ‘What we have done for yourself? Our Answer would have been much more easy; That we have paid two armies, wherewith the kingdom was burdened last year; and have undergone the charge of the war in Ireland, at this time; when, through many other excessive charges and pressures, your subjects had been exhausted, and the stock of the kingdom very much diminished: Which great mischiefs, and the charges thereupon ensuing, have been occasioned by the evil counsels, so powerful with your majesty, which have, and will, cost this kingdom more than two millions; all which, in justice, ought to have been borne by your majesty. As for the ‘free and general Pardon, your majesty hath been pleased to offer,’ it can be no security to our fears and jealousies, for which your maj. seems to propound it; because they arise not from any guilt of our own actions, but from the evil designs and attempts of others.—To this our humble Answer to that Speech, we desire to add an Information, which we lately received from the deputy-governor of the merchant-adventurers at Rotterdam, in Holland, That an unknown person, appertaining to the lord Digby, did lately solicit one James Henly, a mariner, to go to Elsinæur, and to take charge of a ship in the fleet of the king of Denmark, there prepared, which he should conduct to Hull; in which fleet likewise, he said, a great army was to be transported: And al though we are not apt to give credit to informations of this nature, yet we cannot altogether think it fit to be neglected, but that it may justly add somewhat to the weight of our fears and jealousies; considering with what circumstances it is accompanied; of the lord Digby's preceding expressions, in a Letter to her majesty, and sir Lewis Dives; and your majesty's succeeding course of withdrawing yourself Northward from your parliament, in a manner very suitable to, and correspondent with, that evil counsel; which we doubt will make much deeper impression in the generality of your people: And, therefore, we most humbly advise and beseech your majesty for the procuring and settling the confidence, both of your parliament and all your subjects, and for the other reasons concerning the recovery of Ireland and security of this kingdom, which have been formerly presented to your majesty, you will be graciously pleased, with all convenient speed, to return to these parts, and to close with the counsel and desire of your parliament; where you shall find their dutiful affections and endeavours ready to attend your majesty, with such entertainment as shall not only give your maj. just cause of security in their faithfulness, but other manifold evidences of their earnest intentions and endeavours to advance your majesty's service, honour, and contentment; and to establish it upon a sure foundation of the peace and prosperity of all your kingdoms.”

Another Order about Hull, sent up by the commons, was read and agreed to by the lords, much to the same purport, but stronger than the former: “The governor, sir John Hotham, was to take care no foreign ships should enter that port, without strict examination of their strength, burden; &c. No English, or other forces whatsoever, to be suffered to enter, but those already appointed to be the garrison there; and such other as, by the wisdom and authority of both houses of parliament, should be advised and directed to be received or kept, for the better guard and defence of the town and magazine therein remaining, for his majesty's service and the security of the kingdom. In the doing whereof the mayor of the said town, and all other his majesty's officers and subjects, were commanded to be aiding and assisting to the said governor, as he would answer the contrary at their peril.”

The same day the commons sent up to acquaint the lords with a Vote which they had passed, and to which they desired their lordships concurrence, viz. “That when the lords and commons in parliament shall declare of the law of land is: To have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, is a command given that it be not obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament.” This the lords agreed.

The King's Answer to the Commons Resolving concerning a Passage in Mr. Pym's Speech. March 24. The lord Compton reported, That according to the command of the commons, he and Mr. Baynton did attend his majesty at York; that they arrived there on Saturday, and presented his majesty with the Reply to that house, concerning the passage in Mr. Pym's Speech, touching some commands now in the head of the rebels, &c. and read his majesty's Answer, in writing, on Monday morning; which was read, and was in these verba:

“His majesty hath seen and considered the Message, presented to him by the lord Compton and Mr. Baynton, the 19th of March, at York, touching such persons as have been licenced by his majesty to pass into Ireland. Though he will not insist upon what little reason they had to suspect, that some ill-affected had passed into Ireland, under colour of his majesty's licence, inferences being drawn from proofs to ground belief upon; yet he needs avow, that, for any thing that is yet cleared, he cannot see any ground, why Mr. Pym should so boldly affirm, before both houses of parliament, ‘That, since the stop upon ports, by both houses, against all Irish persons, many of the chief commanders now in the head of the rebels, have been suffered to pass his majesty's immediate warrant;’ first, there is not any particular person named, who is now so much as in rebellion, much less the head of the rebels, to whom his majesty no licence: And therefore, according to his majesty's Reply upon that subject, his majesty protests, that his house of commons publisheth a Declaration, whereby this mistaking may be cleared; that so all the world may see his majesty's caution in giving of passes; and wise that his ministers have not abused his majesty's trust, by any surreptitious warrant. And, lastly, his majesty expects, that accordingly there be more wariness used, before his public aspersions be laid; unless the same be before-hand better warranted by sufficient proofs."

The lords had petitioned the king to remove John Pennington from being commander of the fleet, to which he returned this Answer, "That his majesty sees no reason why he should give way to the alteration of him, who first made choice of by the lord admiral, that charge, and approved of by himself: before his majesty cannot, in honour and duty, appoint any other for that charge than John Pennington; of whose ability and integrity his majesty hath had so long and good experience."—The earl of Warwick was the person nominated to the king for that trust, by the lords; who, when they received this Message, sent it down to the commons, with a desire that both houses should join in a Petition to the king, That the said earl might command the fleet, in this summer's fleet, and to present it reasons are thought proper for the purpose.

The King's Answer to the Declaration of the Houses concerning Fears and Jealousies.

The lord Keeper acquainted the house, That he had received two Letters from the king, and at York, March 21, 1641, with a Declaration inclosed in one, in Answer to that presented in parliament, presented, at Newmarket, 19th instant; both which he was commanded to communicate to their lordships. The Declaration was in these words:

Though the Declaration, lately presented to me at Newmarket, from both our houses of parliament, be of so strange a nature, in respect of what we expected, after so many acts of love and favour to our people; and some expressions in it so different from the usual language to princes, that we might well take a long time to consider it; yet the clearness and uprightness of our conscience to God, and duty to our subjects, hath supplied us with a ready Answer; and our unalterable affection to our people prevailed with us to suppress a passion, which might well enough become upon such an invitation.—We have returned our Answer of the 2nd of this month Theobalds, which is urged to have given just cause of sorrow to our subjects. Whosoever he over that Message, (which was in effect to tell us, that if we would not join with them, we met which we conceived might prove prejudicial and dangerous to us and the whole kingdom, they would make a law without us, & impose it upon our people) will not think it reasonable Answer can be expected to.—We have little encouragement to Replies of this nature, when we are told of how little value our words are like to be with you; though they come accompanied with all the actions of love and justice, (where there is room for actions to accompany them) yet we cannot but disavow the having any such evil counsel or counsellors about us, to our knowledge, as are mentioned; and if any such be discovered, we will leave them to the censure and judgment of our parliament: in the mean time we could wish, than our own immediate actions which we avow, and our own honour, might not be so roughly censured and wounded under that common style of evil counsellors.—For our faithful and zealous affection to the true Protestant profession, and our resolution to concur with our parliament in any possible course for the propagation of it and suppression of Popery, we can say no more than we have already expressed in our Declaration to all our loving subjects, published, in Jan. last, by the advice of our privy council; in which we endeavoured to make as lively a confession of ourself, in this point, as we were able, being most assured that the constant practice of our life hath been answerable thereunto; and therefore we did rather expect a testimony and acknowledgment of such our zeal and piety, than those expressions we met with in this Declaration, of any design of altering religion in this kingdom. And we do, out of the innocence of our soul, wish that the judgments of Heaven may be manifested upon those who have, or had, any such design.—As for the Scots troubles; we had well thought that those unhappy differences had been wrapped up in perpetual silence, by the act of oblivion; which being solemnly passed in the parliaments of both kingdoms, stops our mouth from any further Reply, than to shew our great dislike for reviving the memory thereof.—If the Rebellion in Ireland, so odious to all Christians, seems to have been framed and maintained in England, or to have any countenance from hence, we conjure both our houses of parliament and all our loving subjects whatsoever, to use all possible means to discover and find out such, that we may join in the most exemplary vengeance upon them that can be imagined; but we must think ourself highly and causelessly injured in our reputation, if any Declaration, action, or expression of, the Irish rebels; any Letter from count Rosetti to the Papists, for fasting and praying; or from Tristram Whitcombe of strange speeches uttered in Ireland; shall beget any jealousy or misapprehension in our subjects of our justice, piety, and affection; it being evident to all understandings, that those mischievous and wicked rebels are not so capable of great advantage, as by having their false discourses so far believed, as to raise fears and jealousies, to the distraction of this kingdom, the only way to their security: And we cannot express a deeper sense of the suffering of our poor Protestant subjects in that kingdom, than we have done in our often Messages to both houses, by which we have offered and are still ready to venture, our royal person for their redempti^on; well knowing, that as we are, in our own interest, more concerned in them, so we are to make a strict account to Almighty God for any neglect of our duty for their preservation.—For the manifold attempts to provoke our late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise a faction in the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom; if it be said as relating to us, we cannot, without great indignation, suffer ourself to be reproached, to have intended the least force or threatening to our parliament, as the being privy to the bringing up of the army would imply: whereas we call God to witness, we never had any such thought, or knew of any such resolution concerning our late army.—For the Petition shewed to us by captain Legge; we well remember the same, and the occasion of that conference: captain Legge being lately come out of the North, and repairing to us at Whitehall, we asked him of the state of our army; and, after some relation made of it, he told us, That the commanders and officers of the army had a-mind to petition the parliament, as others of our people had done, and shewed us t^he copy of a Petition, which we read; and, finding it to be very humble, (desiring the parliament might receive no interruption in the reformation of the church and state, to the model of queen Elizabeth's days) we told him, We saw no harm in it: whereupon he replied, That he believed all the officers of the army would like it, only he thought sir Jacob Ashley would be unwilling to sign it, out of fear that it might displease us. We then read the Petition over again; and then observing nothing, in matter or form, we conceived could possibly give just cause of offence, we delivered it to him again; bidding him give it to sir Jacob Ashley, for whose satisfaction we had written C. R. upon it, to testify our approbation; and we wish that Petition may be seen and published, and then we believe it will appear no dangerous one, nor a just ground for the least jealousy or misapprehension.—For Mr. Jermyn; it is well known that he was gone from Whitehall before we received the desire of both houses for the restraint of our servants, neither returned he thither, or passed over by any warrant granted by us after that time.—For the Breach of Privilege, in the accusation of the lord Kimbolton and the 5 members of the house of commons, we thought we had given so ample satisfaction in our several Messages to that purpose, that it should be no more pressed against us; being confident that if the breach of privilege had been greater than hath been ever before offered, our acknowledgement and retraction hath been greater than ever king hath given; besides the not examining how many of our privileges have been invaded in defence and vindication of the other; and therefore we hoped our true and earnest protestation, in our Answer to your Order concerning the Militia, would so far have satisfied you of our intentions, that you would no more have entertained any imagination of any other design than we thus expressed.—But why the listing of so many officers, and entertaining them at Whitehall, should be misconstrued, we much marvel when it is notoriously known the tumults at Westminster were so great, and their designs so scandalous and seditious, that we had good cause to suppose our own person, and those of our wife and children to be in apparent danger; and therefore we had great reason to appoint a guard about us, and to accept the dutiful tender of the service of any of our loving subjects; which was all we did to the gentlemen of the Inns of Court.—For this Digby; we assure you, on the word of a king, that he had our warrant to pass the seas, and had left our court, before we ever heard of the Vote of the house of commons, or had cause to imagine that his absence would have been excepted against.—What your advertisements are from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, or what the Pope's Nuncio solicits the kings of France or Spain to do, or from what persons such informations come to you, or how the credit and reputation of such persons have been sifted and examined, we know not; but are confident no sober honest man in any kingdom can believe, that we are so desperate or so senseless to entertain such designs, would not only bury this our kingdom in sudden destruction and ruin, but our own and posterity in perpetual scorn and infamy; and therefore we could have wished that matters of so high and tender a nature, (which with the minds of our good subjects must needs be startled) all the expressions were so plain and easy, that nothing might stick with them in reflection upon us, since you thought fit to publish it at all.—And having now dealt so plainly and freely with you, by way of Answer to the particular Grounds of your Fears; I hope, upon a due consideration and weight both together, you will not find the grounds to be of that moment to beget, or longer to continue, a misunderstanding betwixt us; or for you to apply yourselves to the use of any power than what the law hath given you; which we always intend shall be the measure of our own power, and expect it shall be the rule of our subjects obedience.—Concerning our Fears and Jealousies; as we had no intention of accusing you, so are we sure we were spoken by us, on the sudden, at Whitehall, will bear that interpretation. We said, 'If our residence near you, we wished it might be so safe and honourable, that we had no cause to absent ourself from Whitehall,' and how it can be a breach of privilege of parliament, we cannot understand. We explained our meaning in our Answer at Newmarket, at the presentation of this Declaration, concerning the printed seditious pamphlets and sermons, and the great tumults at Westminster; and we must appeal to you and all the world, what we might not justly suppose ourself in danger either. And if we were now at Whitehall, we should have we that the like shall not be so; especially if any delinquents of that sort have been apprehended by the ministers of justice, and been rescued by the people, so as yet escape unpunished. If you have been informed of the seditious words used, and the circumstances of those tumults, and appoint some way for the examination of us, we will require some of our learned counsel to attend with such evidence as may satisfy you; and till that be done, or some other course taken for our security, you cannot with reason, wonder that we intend not to where we most desire to be.—And can there want evidence of our hearty and importunate desire to join with our parliament, and our faithful subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the kingdom? Have given you no other earnest but words, to prove you of those desires? The very Remonstrance of the house of commons, published Dec. last, of the State of the Kingdom, allows a more real testimony of our good affections in words: that Remonstrance valued our love of grace and justice at so high a rate, that declared the kingdom to be then a gainer, though it had charged itself by bills of Subsidies and Poll-Money, with the levy of 600,000*l.* besides the contracting of a Debt to our Scots subjects of 220,000*l.*—Are the bills for the Sessional Parliament; for relinquishing our right of imposing upon Merchandize, and Power of pressing of Soldiers; for taking away the Privy-Chamber and High-Commission Courts; and for regulating the Council Table, but bills? Are the bills for the Forests; the Statute Courts; the Clerk of the Market; and taking away the Votes of the Bishops out of the lords house, but words? Lastly, What other earnest of our trust and reliance on our parliament could, or can, we give, than the passing of the bill for the Continuance of this present Parliament? the length of which, we hope, will never alter the nature of parliaments, nor the constitution of this kingdom; or invite our subjects so much to abuse our confidence, as to esteem any thing fit for this parliament to do; which were not so, if it were in our power to dissolve it to-morrow. And after all these, and many other acts of grace on our part, that we might be sure of a perfect reconciliation betwixt us and all our subjects, we have offered, and are still ready to grant, a free and general Pardon, as ample as yourselves will think fit. Now, if these be not real expressions of the affections of our soul, for the public good of our kingdom, we must confess that we want skill to manifest them.—To conclude, (although we think our Answer already said to that point) concerning our Return to London: we are willing to declare, that we look upon it as a matter of so great weight, and reference to the affairs of this kingdom, and to our own inclination and desires, that if we can say or do, can raise a mutual confidence, (the only way, with God's blessing, to make us all happy) and, by your encouragement, the laws of the land, and the government of the city of London, may recover some life for our security, we will overtake your desires, and be as soon with you as you can wish. And, in the mean time, you may be sure, that neither the business of Ireland, or any other advantage for this kingdom, shall suffer through our default, or by our absence; we being so far from repenting the acts of our justice and grace, which we have already performed to our people, that we shall, with the same alacrity, be still ready to add such new ones, as may best advance the peace, honour, and prosperity of this nation."

The King's Objections to passing the Bill for clearing Lord Kimbolton, &c. The other Letter to the lord keeper was as follows:

"C. R. Right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, we greet you well; We have signed a commission for giving our royal assent for passing the bill 'For raising 400,000*l.* for the necessary Defence of our kingdom of Ireland. As for the other bill sent unto us, intituled, 'An Act for clearing and vindicating of the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, &c. albeit we are well pleased to pass an act for the clearing of them all, according to our gracious promise; yet we are not by that promise, nor otherwise, obliged to lay any imputation on ourself, or to clear them in words that may reflect upon our honour. Wherefore, our command is, that you make known to our parliament, That if they will pass a bill for the freeing and clearing of the lord Kimbolton and the rest, in such terms and words as may be strong for them, and not reflect upon us, we will readily give our royal assent thereto. Given at our Court at York, the 21st of March, in the 17th year of our reign."

Ordered; "That this house shall take into consideration, Whether this Answer is not a breach of the privilege of parliament. And that all these last matters from the king shall be communicated to the house of commons, at a conference." But at the very same time came up a Message from the commons, desiring a conference about the same things; which was granted, and appointed for that afternoon.

Information of an Invasion intended by the French. March 26. The earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, acquainted the lords, "That he had received information from sir Philip Carteret, governor of the Isle of Wight, of forces raising in Normandy and Britany, to the number of 7000 men; that they were designed against the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, or some part of England: and that there was in France a secret intent to break the peace between the two kingdoms." Ordered, "That this Information should be sent to the commons; and to desire that house to give a speedy dispatch to the setting forth this summer's fleet; and that both houses may join in an humble Petition to the king, to make the earl of Warwick commander of it."

This day an act 'For raising of 400,000*l.* for the necessary Defence and great Affairs of this kingdom and Ireland, and for the Payment of Debts undertaken by Parliament,' was passed, by commission, with the usual ceremonies.

The Lords refuse to let the Earl of Essex, &c. wait on the King at York.] March 28. The earl of Essex, lord chamberlain, and the earl of Holland, groom of the stole, exhibited Letters from the king, commanding them to appear at York, to attend St. George's Feast there, (they being knights of the garter) which the king intended to hold in that city. The like letters the earl of Salisbury and the lord Savile shewed; which being taken into consideration, as a matter of great importance, it was resolved, upon the question, "That the said lords should not have leave to go, but attend the business of that house, in regard that great and weighty affairs of the kingdom were then in agitation."

Conference concerning an intended Petition from Kent.] A conference was held this day between the two houses; when the commons informed the lords, That a Petition had been framed in Kent, and intended to be delivered to Parliament, which was of dangerous consequence. This was on the Information of one Francis Jones, who averred, That the Petition was produced and read at the assizes, at Maidstone, the 25th of March last, and consisted, to the best of his memory, of these particulars: "That the government of Bishops might still remain, they being as antient as Christianity in England; that the Liturgy and Common Prayer might still remain: that such might be punished who either absent themselves from it, or speak against it; and that all ministers and people might be brought into this uniformity: that no Order should issue out of either house, to oblige the people, unless it was an act of parliament: that no Order should issue concerning the Militia, from either house, without the king's hand to it: that they would presently apply themselves to his majesty's Message of the 20th of Jan. last: that they would establish the civil law, that they who were civil lawyers might not lose their studies: that they would speedily relieve their brethren in Ireland: that they would be pleased to establish the privilege of parliament, and the king's regal power. Lastly, That sir Edw. Dering pressed, with great earnestness, to have a copy of this Petition sent to the king; but, as he thought, it was denied."

The commons further informed the lords, that they found sir Edw. Dering, sir Roger Twissell, sir Geo. Strode, and Mr. R. Spencer, had been active men in contriving and presenting this Petition; they therefore desired the said gentlemen might be sent for, as delinquents; which was accordingly ordered by the lords, and a select committee, of both houses, appointed to examine this business to the bottom.

Petition to the King that the E. of Warwick may command the Fleet.] March 28. p. m.

The commons sent up the following draught of a Petition to the king, for constituting the earl of Warwick lord high admiral:

"The lords and commons, in this present parliament assembled, having found it necessary to provide and set to sea a strong and powerful Navy, for the defence of this kingdom against foreign force, and for the security of your majesty's other dominions, the charge whereof is to be borne by the commonwealth, and taking notice of the indisposition of the lord admiral, which disables him, at this time from commanding the fleet in his own person, did thereupon recommend unto his lordship the earl of Warwick, a person of such ability and quality, as in whom they might best confide, to supply his room for this employment. And understanding that your maj. hath signified your pleasure concerning that command for sir John Pennington, we do hold our duty to represent unto your maj. the great danger and mischief the commonwealth is to sustain by such interruption; and therefore humbly beseech your majesty, that the person, recommended by both houses for service, may no longer be detained from it, of any particular respect to any other person whatsoever."—The lords agreed to this Petition.

The Earl of Bristol and Judge Mallet examined touching the Kentish Petition; &c. committed to the Tower.] A copy of the Kentish Petition was produced in the house by the earl of Bristol, who said he delivered it to him by Judge Mallet. Being read, which was no more than enlargement on the foregoing heads, the commons asked, Whether he had taken a copy of the Petition? who answering, Yes, he was commanded to withdraw. Then Mr. Justice Mallet was examined, who said, "That he had the Petition from sir Geo. Strode, and he shewed it to the earl of Bristol, who took a copy of the same." Hereupon the lords took this affair into consideration, conceived that the judge had committed a great offence, contrary to his duty, as judge of the assize, and an assistant to this house, in not revealing the Petition to them till he was forced to it. After a long debate, the question was put, Whether there were not some words, in the petition, scandalous, dangerous, and tending to sedition? it passed in the affirmative. It was then resolved, that the earl of Bristol, because he had the Petition delivered to him, being of so dangerous a consequence, and took a copy of it without doing his duty in acquainting the commons therewith, was committed to the Tower for the present, until this business should be further examined. The earls of Bath, Devon, Portland, Monmouth, with the lords Montagu, Grey, Howard, and Capel, dissenting. Sir Mallet, also, underwent the same sentence.

March 29. A Message from the king, that the earl of Leicester, lord High Treasurer of England, should be sent over, immediately, to the ingdom, in order to comfort and encourage good subjects there, on their late success, and strike the more terror into the rebels, &c. which, after a conference with both houses, as denied.

The lord Seymour having been sent to by the king, as a knight of the garter, to attend the king at York, on St. George's feast, and being returning forward on a former leave of absence from the house, a post was sent after him, with an order to bring him back. The gentleman bearer of the black rod, having received the summons, the lords ordered, That he should attend his charge and duty to the house, according to his place.

Bill of Tonnage and Poundage passed.] On the day the bill of Subsidy on Tonnage and Poundage, &c. was passed by commission, it was the last of that kind this king ever granted. Some reasons were likewise drawn up and agreed to be sent to the king, for not permitting his great officers of state, and privy counsellors, to attend him at court.

Impeachment of George Benyon for contriving a Petition against the Ordinance for the Militia, &c.] March 31. This day, at a conference, the commons exhibited the following articles of Impeachment against George Benyon, citizen of London, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors:

"That he, the said George Benyon, being a man of power and credit in the city, and well knowing the present distractions and disorders of the times, had endeavoured to make a division between the king and parliament, and between the parliament and the city, by wickedly and maliciously contriving and forging a false, dangerous, and seditious Petition, on behalf of himself and other citizens, and presented to both houses of parliament, &c. That the said Benyon, by false and sinister insinuations, procured divers citizens to subscribe their hands to the said petition, contrary to their intent and true meaning, &c. Also, that the said Benyon did give out and utter divers bold and arrogant speeches, in derogation and contempt of the privileges of parliament, and the peers therein assembled; swearing, by God, that he would make the bill of objections pass, or there should not be one penny lent to parliament; that he would spend every groat in the Chamber of London, to put down the privileges of the peers, and make himself honest; that they might be as liable to taxes as the noblemen of France, Spain, Poland and other foreign countries: That he did that he had computed the debts of the lords, and that they owed more than would drive on the greatest trade of the whole kingdom, &c. That, speaking of the parliament, he did falsely and maliciously say, That they much complained of the king's authority and power, and yet they went about to set up an arbitrary government themselves; and they, being 400 in number, would be more grievous than one absolute monarch. All which matters and things were committed by the said Benyon, &c."

This is the substance of the Charge against Mr. Benyon: The Petition itself was as follows:

To the Rt. Hon. the LORDS and COMMONS, assembled in Parliament; The HUMBLE PETITION of the CITIZENS of LONDON, whose names are underwritten,

"Sheweth, That the city of London hath, time out of mind, enjoyed the ordering of their own arms, which hath successively been annexed to the mayoralty for the time being; the lord mayor having always been a person of worth and quality, and of their own choice, and hath ever advised with the court of Aldermen in the execution thereof: so that if the same should be conferred on others, we humbly conceive it would not only be a personal dishonour to the lord mayor, but also reflect upon the government and customs of the city of London, granted to the citizens by the great charter of England, and confirmed by divers acts and charters since that time; and which every freeman of the said city is, by the oath of his freedom, bound to maintain to the uttermost of his power. This hon. assembly may be pleased to take into consideration, that an alteration in the ancient government of this renowned city, may breed greater distractions and inconveniences, than, for the present, can be discerned, or, in the future, can be amended. Wherefore, our humble desire is, That since this government hath, by experience, been found for the honour of his majesty, the good of the city and the whole kingdom; and that, in the most troublesome time, it hath been admired and commended by strangers, before any other city in the known world, that the same, by your honourable favour, may be continued without any alteration. And they shall pray, &c."

This Petition being read, the Charge was farther aggravated against Mr. Benyon, by observing, 1. "That he was a man of a turbulent spirit, and a fit person to act such a mischief. A citizen and freeman of London, which is the metropolis and epitome of the whole kingdom; the strength whereof is in the common council: That this plot was like another Trojan horse, full of variety of mischiefs and potential designs; according to Machiavel's rule, 'divide et impera.' To divide between the king and his people, the parliament and the city, and the city between itself; like a worm gnawing between the bark and the tree. The circumstances and gradations of this offence ascends to a great height, as having reference to the common council, whereto he ought to have submitted, being involved in their votes; but he abounds in his own sense, and spurns against it. 2. It hath reference to the annihilating and opposing the Ordinance of both houses of parliament, for settling the Militia, the parliament having power of declaring what the law is concerning itself; and also it lays a great charge upon both houses for arbitrary power, ambition, and injustice, and hath scandalized their members and privileges. 3. Concerning the time when Benyon committed these offences: It was when the kingdom was full of fears, dangers, and distractions; and, taking advantage of this opportunity, he endeavoured to put all into confusion; so as the bark was not to be saved, but by casting anchor and standing together to oppose these mischiefs. He did not only act his part himself, but persuaded others, both at the Exchange and at the scriveners shops, to subscribe the Petition; which was a thing contrary to the opinion of the common council, as being a matter of great presumption, and tending to sedition; for, it is feared, the consequence of this example, will be an occasion of other places following the same steps, whereof some passages have already appeared: therefore the house of commons desire that exemplary punishment may be inflicted on the said Benyon, for these offences, according to justice."

This Report being made of the Charge, it was ordered, 'That the said George Benyon should be brought to the bar to hear it read; which being done, and he asked what Answer he would make to it, he humbly desired he might have time given him to put in his Answer; and, for the enabling him thereto, he desired to have counsel allowed him, and to have a copy of his Charge. All which was granted, and the 4th of April was appointed for his trial.

A Petition from the 12 Bishops, in the Tower, was read, praying the lords, That some speedy order might be taken for their enlargement, upon bail, or otherwise, as their lordships should think fit. Ordered, That this Petition be communicated to the commons, and they to be desired to proceed against the Bishops with all expedition.

The King's Reply to the Parliament's Answer to his Message from Newmarket. April 1. A conference having been held between both houses yesterday, a report of it was this day, made to the lords by the lord keeper; in which he said the commons communicated to them the king's Answer to a late Message from Parliament, of March 22; which he read in these words:

"If you would have had the patience to have expected our Answer to your last Declaration, (which, considering the nature of it hath not been long in coming) we believe you would have saved yourselves the labour of saying much of this Message: and we could wish that our privileges on all parts were so stated, that this way of correspondency might be preserved, with that freedom which hath been used of old; for we must tell you, That if you may ask any think of us by Message or Petition, and in what language, how unusual soever, you think fit: and we must neither deny the thing you ask, nor give our reason why we cannot grant it, without being taxed of breaking your privileges, or being counselled by those who are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and favourers of the Irish Rebellion (for we have seen your printed Votes, upon the Message from Huntingdon) you will reduce all our Answers hereafter into a very little room. In plain English, it is to take away the freedom of our vote; which, were we but a subject, were high injustice; but, being your king, we leave all the world to judge what it is.—Is this the way to compose all misunderstanding? We thought we shewed you one by our Message of the 20th of Jan.; if you have a better or readier, we shall willingly hearken to it for hitherto you have shewed us none. Why the refusal to consent to your Ordinance (which you call a Denial of the Militia) should be any interruption to it, we cannot understand. For the Militia, which we thought necessary to be settled, we did not deny the thing, as we told you in our Answer of the 28th of Feb. to the Petition of the house of commons; for we accepted the Militia, except for corporations; we only desired the way. You ask it by way of Ordinance, with such a preface as we can neither do justice to our honour or our innocence to consent to. You exclude us from any power in disposition or execution of it, together with you, and for a time utterly unlimited: we thought you would have the thing done; allow persons with that exception; desire a bill, the only good old way of imposing on our subjects. We are extremely unsatisfied what an answerance is; but well satisfied, that, without our consent, it is nothing, nor binding. And evident, by the long time spent in this matter, the necessity and danger was not so eminent but a bill might have well been prepared, which, if it shall yet be done with that regard to us, and care of our people, in the constitution of the power and other circumstances, we shall recede from nothing we formerly pressed in that Answer to your Order; otherwise we must declare to all the world, that we are not satisfied with, or shall ever allow subjects to be bound by your printed Votes of the 15th or 16th of this month; or to be under pretence of declaring what the law is in the land is, you shall, without us, make a new law; which is plainly the case of the Militia, and what is this but to introduce an arbitrary way of government?—Concerning your Speech; you will have found by what the lords of Compton and Mr. Baynton brought forth in Answer to that Message they brought forth, that, as yet, we rest nothing satisfied in particular. As for the seditious Sermons and Pamphlets; we are both sorry and ashamed that in so great a variety, and in which rights, honour, and authority are so much slighted and vilified, and in which the freedom of parliament is so much invaded and violated, it should be asked of us to be any; the mentioning of the Protestation, the Apprentices Protestation; the Tents, O Israel, or any other, would be to excuse for the rest. If you think them not worth your inquiry, we have done. But we think it most strange to be told, That our denial of a guard, which we yet never denied, is granted in another manner, and under a command at that time, most accustomed in the kingdom; or the denial of any thing else, which is in our power legally to deny; which,

 in our understanding, (of which God has surely given us some use) is not fit to be granted, will be any excuse for so dangerous a conception of people; which not only in our apprehension, but, we believe, in the interpretation of law itself, hath been always held most culpable and seditious. And we must wonder what and whence come the instructions and informations that those people have, who so easily think themselves obliged by the protestation, to assemble in such a manner, the defence of privileges, which cannot be clearly known to any of them; and so neg-lectfully pass over the consideration and defence of our rights, so beneficial and necessary for ourselves, and scarce unknown to any of us; which by their oaths of allegiance and fealty, and even by the same Protestation, they are at least equally obliged to defend.
 What interruption such kind of assemblies is to the freedom of future parliaments, is seasonably discountenanced and suppressed. We must advise you to consider; as likewise whether both our powers may not, by such means, be usurped by hands not trusted by the constitution of this kingdom.—For our Guard;
 refer you to our Answer to your Declaration.
 That question of violating your laws, by which we endeavoured to express our care and resolution to observe them, we did not expect would have been invited to have looked so many years, for which you have had, so little reparation; neither looked we to be reproached with the actions of our ministers, against the laws, whilst we express so great a zeal for the present defence of them; bringing our resolution, upon observation of the chief which then grew by arbitrary power, though made plausible to us by the suggestions of necessity and imminent danger, and take heed ye fall not into the same error, upon the same suggestions) hereafter to keep the ourselves, and, to our power, require the same of all others. But, above all, we must be sensible of what you cast upon us for re-tal of those good bills you cannot deny.
 We have denied any such design, and as God nightly must judge in that point between us, he knows our upright intentions at the passing of laws; so, in the mean time, we defy the will to prove that there was any design, with knowledge or privy, in or about the time missing those bills, that had it taken effect, had have deprived our subjects of the fruit of them: and, therefore, we demand full re-satisfaction in this point, that we may be cleared of the sight of all the world, and chiefly in the eyes of our loving subjects, from so notorious and false an imputation as this is.—
 VOL. II.

We are far from denying what you have done;
 for we acknowledge the charge our people have sustained in keeping the two armies, and in relieving Ireland; of the which we are so sensible, that in regard of those great burdens our people have undergone, we have and do patiently suffer those extreme personal wants, as our predecessors have been seldom put to,
 rather than we would press upon them; which we hope, in time, will be considered on your parts.—In our offer of a general Pardon, our intent was to compose and secure the general condition of our subjects, conceiving that in these times of great distractions, the good laws of the land have not been enough observed;
 but it is a strange world, when prince's proffered favours are counted reproaches; yet if you like not this our offer, we have done.—Concerning any Discourses of foreign Forces; though we have given you a full Answer in ours to your last Declaration, yet we must tell you, we have neither so ill an opinion of our own merit, or the affections of our good subjects, as to think oneself in need of any foreign force to preserve us from oppression, and we shall not need for any other purpose; but are confident, through God's providence, not to want the good wishes and assistance of the whole kingdom; being resolved to build upon that sure foundation, the law of the land. And we take it very ill that any general discourses between an unknown person and a mariner, or inferences upon letters, should be able to prevail in matters so improbable in themselves, and scandalous to us; for which we cannot but likewise ask reparation, not only for the vindicating of our own honour, but also thereby to settle the minds of our subjects, whose fears and jealousies would soon vanish, were they not fed and maintained by such false and malicious rumours as these.—For our Return to our Parliament; we have given you a full Answer in ours to your Declaration, and you ought to look on us as not gone, but driven (we say not by you yet) from you; and if it be not so easy for you to make our residence in London so safe as we could desire, we are, and will be, contented that our parliament be adjourned to such a place where we may be fitly and safely with you: For though we are not pleased to be at this distance, yet ye are not to expect our presence, until ye shall both secure us concerning our just apprehension of tumultuary insolencies, and likewise give us satisfaction for those insupportable and insolent scandals that are raised upon us.—To conclude: as we have not, or shall not, refuse any way, agreeable to justice or honour, which shall be offered to us, for the begetting a right understanding between us; so we are resolved, that no straits or necessities, to which we may be driven, shall ever compel us to do that which the reason and understanding which God hath given us, and our honour and interest, with which God hath trusted us, for the good of our posterity and kingdoms, shall render unpleasant and grievous unto us. And we assure you, that

(how meanly soever you are pleased to value the discharge of our public duty) we are so conscious to ourself of having done our part since this parliament, that, in whatsoever condition we now stand, we are confident of the continued protection from Almighty God, and the constant gratitude, obedience, and affection of our people: and we shall trust God with all."

After the reading of this Answer the lord keeper further said, That the house of commons did account it to be a matter of so great importance, as to require some time to consider of it; and therefore they resolved to lay all other business aside, excepting one or two matters, until this was done; which Resolution the lords agreed to. Ordered, also, "That the Message of both houses to the king, on the 22nd of March last, with his majesty's Answer, should be forthwith printed and published."

Declaration of the Grievances of the Kingdom, and the Remedies proposed. This day the lords took into consideration the substance of a late conference had with the commons, concerning a Declaration of the Grievances and Evils of this Kingdom, with Propositions of the Remedies and Cures, which they conceived fit for these Diseases; reported by the lord Roberts; and, first, the Declaration was read in hæc verba:

"We your majesty's most humble and loyal subjects, the lords and commons of this present parliament assembled, do hereby call God, this kingdom, and the whole world to witness that we have, ever since our first meeting in this present parliament, with fidelity to your maj. and the state, with much patience and constancy, in respect of the great affronts and interruptions, the pernicious plots and attempts wherewith we have been encountered, distracted and opposed, employed our counsels and endeavours to maintain God's true religion, the honour and rights of your crown, the peace and safety of your royal person and your kingdoms, and the just liberties of your people; that so we might ease them of their great Grievances, and prevent the fears and dangers, yea, the imminent ruin and destruction, which have been contrived and fostered, not only in your court, but even very near your own person; and however our liberties have been invaded, many of our lives endangered, and such attempts made upon us as might have subverted the very being of parliament, yet have we so kept ourselves within the bounds of modesty and duty, that we have given no just occasion of your majesty's absence at this time, nor of any offence or displeasure to the queen's majesty; but, notwithstanding our manifold experience, past and present, and our sense and apprehension of those principles, destructive of this church and state, with which that religion professedly doth abound, we have ever been careful of the honour and safety due to her majesty's person, and so intend to continue for the time to come.

—And we most humbly beseech your majesty, with wisdom and compassion to behold the miserable and perishing condition of all your majesty's kingdoms; the full accomplishment whereof seems impossible to be avoided, unless you will be graciously pleased to join seriously and thoroughly with your parliament, in removing the Causes, and applying the most powerful and sovereign Remedies to those evils and distempers which have long held this kingdom in a languishing estate, and now brought it even to the last gasp and period of destruction; for preventing whereof, according to the trust reposed in us, we are bound in all humility and faithfulness, to present some of those Causes and Remedies to your princely view and consideration. 1. The Counsel about your majesty and the queen continually acting and disposing all occurrences of state, and abusing your majesty's power and authority, to the prejudice of religion and hazard of the public peace; the interrupting of the parliament; the strengthening of a malignant party within the kingdom; the raising and fomenting jealousies and contentions, to twist your majesty, your parliament, and all loyal subjects. 2. The Priests, Jesuits, and Papists, both foreign and native, and other dangerous and ill-affected persons have had great an interest in the affections, and powerful an influence upon the counsels of the queen, that her maj. hath been admitted to intermeddle with the great affairs of state, and with the disposing of places and preferments, even of highest concernment in the kingdom, which, being conferred by her means, hereby not only many of those who are of great power and authority, but divers spirits, ambitious of public employment, by their dependance upon, and are engaged in favour and advance those aims and designs which are infused into her maj. upon ground of conscience, which is the strongest motive either of good or evil. 3. The great encouragement of Popery; the public exercise of religion in Whitehall, Somerset-house, and other places; the establishing of a Popish hierarchy; the settling a college of Capuchins within this realm; the free and frequent conventions and consultations of Papists; multitude of English youth, of both sexes, in the colleges and religious houses beyond seas, and those Popish schools which, by connivance and favour of the times, have been set up and permitted within this kingdom. The want of a due Reformation of the Church Government and Liturgy now used; the want of a preaching Ministry, and a competent Maintenance for them in many parts of the kingdom. 5. The over-strict pressing of the Ceremonies in the Liturgy and Rubric, the enjoining and pressing of other ceremonies not established by law. 6. The violent Popish lords in the house of peers, who the great work of reformation in the government of the church and state hath been, may yet be, very much hindered, and the great party of the kingdom strengthened and infected. 7. The countenance and protection which hath been afforded to many great and dangerous delinquents; the preferment of such as have adhered to them; and the disservice shewed against those who have been used and employed as witnesses in the trial and prosecution of them. 8. The violent and contemptuous Breaches of the Privileges of Parliament; the often attempts against the safety, and malicious design to frustrate the power and proceedings of parliament. 9. The managing and transacting the great affairs of the realm in private cabinet councils by men unknown, and trusted by the wisdom of the law, nor well-learned to the public good of the kingdom. 10. The preferring men to degrees of honour, offices, and other employments of trust, and moving others in time of parliament, without the consent of that your great and faithful Council; whereby covetous and ambitious men are apt to be biassed to those courses which lead to their own preferment; and more ingenuous and upright, are awed and straitened in the performance of their duty. 11. The Selling of Places of Judicature, Offices of Trust in Courts of Justice, as of degrees of sergeant at law, and of the charge and custody of the castles and forts of the kingdom; whereby insufficient, corrupt, and unworthy persons are often preferred; so, knowing themselves obnoxious to the shame and punishment of parliament, are enabled, for their own security, to be pliant and accessible to any ill designs; oppression, bribery, and extortion, are cherished and encouraged; your majesty's service, the safety, honour and government of the kingdom neglected; and offices and employments of trust, which, in the law and constitution of the common-wealth, are intended for the general good and service of the kingdom, are, for the most part, by study and endeavours of those that enjoyed them, improved to the satisfaction of their own covetousness, ambition, or other private ends; so made burthensome and hurtful to the public, by obstructing or preventing the ways of justice. 12. The secret and false Informations and Accusations received against divers members of parliament; whereby they have been much endangered and prejudiced, in the fear and apprehension of your maj. and the Council, and, by concealing the informers, have been left without means to acquit and defend themselves.—The Remedies which we humbly offer to your majesty are these: 1. That the Clerk, and other your majesty's privy council, and all other persons employed in great offices of state and government, either at home or beyond the seas, may be put from the privy council, and from those offices and employments, keeping such as have offices by inheritance; so that such persons, as shall be put into such places and employments, shall be recommended to your majesty by advice of both Houses of parliament; and that all privy councillors shall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in such form as shall be agreed upon by parliament; and that such of those counsellors and great officers as shall be so displaced, and not recommended as aforesaid, and whose names shall be presented by both Houses of parliament, shall not have access to the persons or courts of the king or queen's majesty. 2. That all Priests, Jesuits, or Papists, as likewise all other dangerous and ill-affected persons, though professing the Protestant religion, be removed from the queen's person, and from having any office or employment under her; and that all her majesty's servants whatsoever shall take an oath, to be advised and enacted by parliament, that he or she will not, at any time, directly or indirectly, by him or herself, or any other, move, petition, or solicit her maj. in any matter concerning the state and government of the kingdom; or concerning any favour or immunity to be conferred upon any Papists, against the laws; or for any honour, preferment, or employment of any person whatsoever. 3. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to remove from about the royal persons of your maj. and the queen, and from both your courts, Mr. Wm. Murray, Mr. Eadimion Porter, both which are of your bed-chamber, sir John Winter, late secretary to the queen, and Mr. Wm. Crofts, being all persons of evil fame, as those who are disaffected to the public peace and prosperity of the kingdom; instruments of jealousy, discontent, and misunderstanding betwixt your maj. and your parliament; and busy promoters of those mischiefs and grievances which have produced the great dangers, distempers, and fears wherewith all your kingdoms have been, and still are, miserably distracted and perplexed. 4. That your majesty will be pleased not to entertain any advice or mediation from the queen in Matters of Religion; as concerning the government of any of your majesty's dominions; as for the placing or displacing any great officers, counsellors, ambassadors, or agents beyond the seas; or any of your majesty's servants attending your royal person, either in your bed-chamber or privy-chamber, or attending the person of the Prince, or any of the royal issue, after they shall attain to the age of 5 years. 5. That for the further securing the kingdom in this behalf, being a matter of so great importance for the preservation of Religion and the Safety of the Kingdom, the queen will be pleased to take a solemn oath, in the presence of both Houses of parliament, the form whereof is to be agreed on in parliament, That she will not hereafter give any counsel, or use any mediation to his maj. concerning the disposing of any of the offices or places above-mentioned, or at all intermeddle in any of the affairs of state or government of the kingdom. 6. That all great Officers and Counsellors, and such others as shall be employed in any of the places before-mentioned, shall take a solemn oath, in such manner and form as shall be prescribed by parliament, That they have not made use of any power or mediation of the queen, directly or indirectly; for their preferment, in obtaining any such place or employment. 7. That the great Affairs of the Kingdom may not be concluded or transacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unsworn counsellors; but that such matters as concern the public, and are proper for your majesty's privy council, shall be debated and concluded by such of the nobility and others as shall be recommended to that place by parliament; and such other matters of state as are proper for this high court of parliament, which is your majesty's great and supreme council, shall be debated, resolved, and transacted only in parliament, and not elsewhere; and such as shall presume to do any thing to the contrary, shall be referred to the censure and judgment of parliament. 8. That no person whatever, under the penalty of high treason, to be enacted by parliament, shall presume to make, entertain, solicit, or further any propositions or treaty for the marriage of any of the king's children, with any prince or person of the Popish religion; that no marriage for any of the king's children may be concluded with any other prince or person whatsoever, without the advice and consent of both houses of parliament. 9. That none of the king's children, except the princess Maria, already affianced, may, at any time, go beyond the seas without the consent of both houses of parliament; and that no person, under the penalty of high treason, to be enacted by parliament, shall advise, assist, or attend any of his majesty's children in such voyage beyond the seas, without the like consent of both houses of parliament. 10. That such Popish Priests as are already condemned, may be forthwith executed; and such as shall hereafter be condemned, may likewise be executed according to law. 11. That no Mass, or Popish service, be sung or said in the courts of the king, queen, prince, or the house of any subject in this kingdom; and that none of your majesty's subjects, or servants to your majesty, the queen, or any of your children, be present at mass, or in any other service of the church of Rome, or in any place whatsoever, under the penalty of losing his office and service; over and above the other penalties already enjoined by law. 12. That some more effectual courses may be enacted, by authority of parliament, for the better execution of the laws against Papists, for the preventing of feigned conformity, and disabling them from making any disturbances in the state. 13. That the Votes of the Popish lords in the house of peers be taken away by act of parliament. 14. That a due Reformation may be made of the Church Government and Liturgy by the parliament, and an able preaching Ministry may be established in all parts of this kingdom; for which purpose they intend to be assisted with the advice of such godly and learned divines, as shall be agreed on by both houses of parliament. 15. That it may be established, by act of parliament, That no person shall incur any penalties or punishment for any omission of the ceremonies in the Liturgy and Rubric, until the intended Reformation be made by parliament; and that such ceremonies, as are not established by law, may forthwith be wholly taken away. 16. That such delinquents, as stand charged in parliament, for any offence against the peace and liberty of the kingdom or privilege of parliament, may be left to the course of justice; and such as have, or shall be put out of the kingdom upon any such charge, shall be subject to such penalties and forfeitures, as shall be agreed, and imposed by bill, in both houses of parliament. 17. That such persons, as shall be declared in parliament to adhere to any such delinquents, and have thereupon any preferment from your majesty, shall be removed from those preferments; and that such as shall be declared, by both houses of parliament, to have been employed or used as witnesses against delinquents, and have thereupon fallen into your majesty's displeasure, and been put out of their places, shall be restored to their places, and to your majesty's favour. 18. That every person which, being a member of the house of commons in this present parliament, hath been accused of any offence against that house; and, that accusation depending, hath been called upon to the house of lords, in the quality of a peer, shall, by act of parliament, be put out of that house; and that hereafter, no member of the house of commons, except in case of descent, may, without their consent, be called up to be a peer in the lords house. 19. That no person, which shall hereafter be made a peer of this realm, shall be admitted to have his seat or vote in the house of peers, without the consent of both houses of parliament. 20. That those members of the house of commons, who have, this parliament, been called to the house of peers, except in case of descent, may be excluded from giving their votes in the house of peers, unless by houses of parliament shall assent thereto. 21. That no member of either house of parliament may be preferred, or displaced, sitting the parliament, to or from any office in the court of the king, queen, or prince, or about any of the king's children or public place of trust in the commonwealth, or to or from the benefit of such place or places, without consent of that house whereof such person shall be a member. 22. That such persons, of either house of parliament, who have been preferred to any such offices or places, during this parliament, may be put out of those offices and places; and that those members of either house of parliament, who, during the parliament, have been put out of any such offices, places, or the benefit thereof, may be restored again to those places and offices, and to the benefit thereof, upon petition of that house whereof they are members. 23. That no office or employment, concerning the justice and government of the kingdom, or your own revenue, or degree of serjeant at law, or custody of any fort or castle, or place of trust, be sold or bestowed for money, to be paid to your majesty, of the use or bene-

and any of your servants, or any other; and that it be declared in parliament to be a breach of trust and duty, both to your maj. and the Commonwealth, in any of those who, under your majesty, shall have the bestowing of any such place, to take money for the same, either directly or indirectly, by himself or others; that the laws in force against selling of offices, be duly observed for the time to come, and the penalties thereby incurred not to be remitted by any non-obstante or dispensation; but that men may be preferred for their ability, merit, experience, and other public respects; the people eased of all excessive fees, and unnecessary delays; and the proceedings of justice made more easy, certain, and indifferently than of late they have been. 24. That your majesty would be pleased to discover the names of those persons who advised your maj. to issue out warrants for the sealing of the papers and studies of the lord Kimbolton, if any member of the house of commons; to send the sergeant at arms to the house of commons to demand some of their members; to issue out several warrants under your maj.'s hand to apprehend those members; for your majesty's coming thither in your own private person; the setting forth of a printed paper, in the form of a Proclamation, to apprehend those members; the exhibiting of Articles of Treason in the lords house against those members; and who advised and contrived the said Articles, or informed your maj. of the matter therein contained. 25. That your maj. be pleased, according to law, not to receive any private information or suggestion against any member of parliament, for things done in parliament; and that you will be pleased to remove the names of those persons who have given, or shall give, any such private information or suggestion to your majesty, upon the Petition of the respective houses of parliament, against whose members any such private information or suggestion have been, or shall be given; and that you would be pleased to make a public Declaration and promise, in parliament, to that purpose.—These things being obtained and confirmed by your majesty's freely favour and goodness, they humbly receive that, through the blessing of God, it will be an assured and effectual means to remove all jealousies and distempers betwixt your maj. and your people, and to establish your royal throne upon the sure foundation of their love and confidence; and thereupon your devoted and loyal subjects shall most cheerfully devote themselves, with their lives and fortunes, to maintain and defend your sacred person, and your royal power and authority; in a voluntary way to support and supply your maj. in so free and large a manner, as may make you as great and happy a prince as any of your most renowned ancestors; and, upon all occasions, they shall be ready to use their most and most faithful endeavours, that your majesty, your royal queen and princely issue, may enjoy all honour, happiness, and contentment in the midst of an humble, obedient, and affectionate people; whereby a hopeful way will be opened for your maj. to become a glorious instrument of the peace and prosperity of this kingdom, and of all your friends and allies abroad."

Mr. Pym's Speech thereupon.] After this his lordship reported further, That Mr. Pym said, "He was commanded by the knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons, to present this Declaration, of the Causes and Remedies of the mischiefs of these times, to their lordships; such as require a present remedy rather than a declaration, and afterwards to say something to prepare your lordships consent to it. He said, The mischiefs have been expressed with more danger and violence than many ages heretofore, and therefore their lordships will not wonder that something extraordinary be in the cure; yet the house of commons say they have kept themselves within the bounds of their duty and modesty, as such who are for the advantage of the king as well as of the subject. He said, If these Causes and Remedies be duly considered, in relation to the great distractions of the kingdom, their lordships would think all of them necessary and important, and most of them without exceptions; yet he was commanded to touch upon the principal matters, and remove some Objections; which he would do in few words, as speaking to those whose reasons would prevent discourses.—The first Objection is, 'The naming of ill Counsellors, which might seem as an encroachment upon the prerogative; which the commons, as well as your lordships, will be tender of, so far it stands with the public good, peace, and safety of the kingdom, for which all Powers and Government is framed.' Answer, 1. "That antiently, by the laws of this kingdom, the great offices of the realm were to be settled no other way, but with consent of parliament: if the great places are so, it is not strange the lesser should. 2. There is but a recommendation required; they have their authority still from the king. 'Tis known that private advisers are heard, who deserve not the credit which both houses of parliament are of; and so long as these are done by the king's grant, it affirmeth, not opposeth, his prerogative."—The second Objection is to another head of the first Article, 'That all officers should be put out, the innocent as well as the nocent: This may seem hard.' Answer, 1. "But this is done to avoid personal taxes, that they may go off in a general throng, who have not deserved well. 2. It will be a means for the more wary carriage of those, who are not yet so clear as to get a confidence with the subjects." The third Objection is to the Articles, 'That all Jesuits and Papists should be removed from the queen.' This is liable to an objection of debarring the queen from the exercise of her religion, and that is against the public treaty and faith given; and so may draw some dishonour, and may be an occasion of enmity against us.' Answer.

"That the house of commons considered that the law of God and the law of the land, was only fit for the representatives of the body of the kingdom to judge of; for if there must be idolatry against the law of God, it concerns them much to resist it, lest they should incur the divine wrath; and nothing concerns them more than to see the laws of this kingdom executed: herein we may displease Man, we shall not God. For the Public Faith and League, it is less than that with God; we must respect the higher, and not the lower; an contract can oblige against the law of God, neither can any contract bind us against the law of this kingdom."—The fourth Objection is, 'The Queen's taking an Oath.' Answer. "The commons desire it may be considered how great and how necessary a desire this is: For the power she hath had, in disposing of offices, is known to all your lordships; and to avoid this they can have no other remedy but some bond and tie upon her conscience. This will argue the solemnity of these desires; and this though it be unusual, the cause is so; the like urgent occasions, since the conquest, we have not had as now."—The fifth Objection is to that which concerned the Marriage of the king's children.' Answer. "That we never were in any condition which so pressed us to desire this, as now; and, having found so much danger by marriage with a contrary religion, we should do what we might, to avoid the like for the future; therefore it is necessary that we deal advisedly in this. The children of the king are his, yet they are the children of the kingdom also, and the law looks more to them than to private men's children; and yet even those the laws may restrain for avoiding public inconvenience. He said, Your lordships see religion almost gone within these two years, and if this parliament be not a means to prevent it, it will be gone indeed; and therefore, with relation to religion, this Article is necessary."—The sixth Objection is, 'The Restraint of making Peers, and that those, who were members of the house of commons, should be removed to that house.' Answer. "The commons conceive it agreeable to the nature of parliament, which as it is fit for your lordships to desire none should be made, but by your consents, so will the commons desire, for themselves, that none of their body may be taken away, but by their consent; and in the case of assistants in the peers house, taken from the house of commons, they have been remanded by that house in several cases." These are all the particular Objections. Concerning the general Objection, 'That seeing most of these cannot be done without a bill, why is this way taken of a Declaration?'—Answer. "That the necessity of the times will not wait for the passing of sundry bills, which must take up some time; but it will be a great comfort to the kingdom to have the king's assent before-hand, and it will much conduce to the settling the minds of men."

This Report being ended, it was ordered,

That the matter of it be taken into debate the next morning. But we hear so much of this Declaration for some time; the substance of it was, afterwards, converted into 19 propositions, which were sent to the king, and all fall in their proper place.

Order for bringing the Magazine at Hull up to London.] April 2. This day the house of lords was called over, after which a Message from the commons was received, consisting of several Articles, one of which was an Order of that house, to authorize sir John Hotham, Governor of Hull, to suffer the magazine of arms and ammunition there, to be embarked and brought to London; to which they desired their lordships concurrence. The lords agreed that this was requisite to be done.

Proceedings against Sandeford for exposing the Parliament, &c.] Information being given to the lords, That Edw. Sandeford, a tailor in London, had said, "That the earl of Warwick was a traitor; that all the parliament were traitors; that the earl of Warwick was a traitor, and wished his heart in his boots; that he cursed the parliament and wished Pym (calling him king Pym) and sir John Hotham, both hanged;" the said Edw. Sandeford was brought to the bar, and asked what he had to alledge in his defence; but not being able to disprove the charge, he and the witnesses against him were ordered to wait. Then the house agreed to the following sentence against him: 1. "That the said Sandeford should be fined to our sovereign lord king, in the sum of 100 marks. 2. That he shall stand on the pillory in Cheapside at Westminster, with a paper on his head declaring his offence. 3. That when he shall be taken off the pillory, in each place, he shall be whipped from thence at a cart's tail; the first day to the Fleet, and the second day to Newgate. 4. That he shall stand committed to the house of correction in Bridewell, that he be kept to work during his life."

The King refuses to let the Earl of Warwick command the Fleet.] The lord keeper acquainted the house, that he had received Message from the King, as an Answer to the desires of both houses concerning the earl of Warwick's being made commander of the Fleet; which was read in hæc verba:

"C. R. Right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, we greet you well; We were both at the form and matter of that Message Paper ye sent us, (in the name of both houses of parliament, in yours of the 28th of March) it being neither by way of petition, declaration, or letter; and, for the matter, we believe is the first time that the houses of parliament have taken upon them the nomination or commendation of the chief sea commander; but it adds to the wonder, that sir John Hotham, being already appointed by us for that service, upon the recommendation of the king, which is so well known that cannot be ignorant of it, and so fault so much with aged against him, another should be recommended to us; therefore our resolution upon this point is, That we will not alter him whom we have already appointed to command this war's fleet, whose every way sufficiency is so diversally known; the which we are confident our admiral, if there shall be occasion, will make most evident; against whose testimony we suppose our parliament will not expect. And though there were yet none appointed, or the said sir John, through some accident, not able to perform the service, yet the men of that profession are so well known to us besides many other reasons, that our admiral excepted because of his place, recommendations of that kind would not be acceptable to us. Given at our Court at York, the 15th day of March, 1642."

The first thing the lords did, after reading the Message, was to order it to be communicated to the commons; the earl of Warwick next desired to be present in parliament, a peer of this realm, on Monday the 4th of the next. Soon after a message was brought to the lower house, by sir Henry Vane, jun. to desire their lordships to join with the commons, to require the earl of Northumberland, the admiral, to depute the earl of Warwick to command this summer's fleet in chief; and that they would enjoin the said earl forthwith to undertake the charge, and put to sea immediately; but this was deferred to be considered of on Monday next. On which day the foregoing affair was taken into consideration, and, after some debate, it was resolved, that the lord admiral should depute the earl of Warwick as chief commander of the fleet, &c. the following lords entering their names as a Protest against it: Marq. of Hertford; earls of Bath, Devon, Monmouth, Berkeley, Cleveland, and Dover; lords Mowbray, North, Howard de Charlton, Savile, and four."

After this the lord admiral declared his consent to the desire of both houses to appoint the earl of Warwick; because, he said, it would be for the safety of his majesty and the whole kingdom; and the earl readily submitted to undertake the command. Then it was resolved, that something should be drawn up for indemnity, and a committee was appointed accordingly.

Further Proceedings in the Trial of Mr. Benyon. This day Mr. Benyon delivered in answer to the Impeachment of the commons, of the 31st of March, importing, his denial of having preferred the Petition there mentioned, with any intent to cross or hinder the Ordinance of parliament concerning the Militia; or much less to set division between the parliament and the city, &c. He said that he and one Gardiner, merchant, drew the said Petition, and that divers persons did subscribe the same; but denied that it was wickedly or maliciously contrived; that he, by false and sinister persuasions, did go about to procure any citizen to subscribe, contrary to their own intention and true meaning. That he, being a freeman and citizen of London, had taken an oath to defend and maintain the franchises and customs of the same; and, for above 30 years, had observed that the making and allowing of captains, and ordering of the trained bands and arms within the said city, were, from time to time, directed and disposed by the lord mayor and aldermen, and done by warrant of the lord mayor, for the time being, and not otherwise. Therefore this defendant, conceiving himself bound by the said oath, and not upon any wicked or malicious principles, did draw the said Petition, which he afterwards laid before learned counsel, by whom the same was approved, &c. That, as to the words charged in the Impeachment, to be spoken by him against the parliament and their privileges, he denied them; and said, that he never spoke any other words than such as were lawful and necessary to be used in prosecuting the petitions, which had been some time before preferred to parliament, touching the granting of protections, &c. and on which a bill was then depending in the upper house. He denied also the words charged on him for hindering the loan of money for the public use, and all other circumstances relative thereto.—This Answer being read, the lords ordered the further hearing of this cause to be at the bar of their house the 6th inst.

April 6. The lords proceeded in the trial Mr. Benyon, and the committee of the commons being come up, he was brought to the bar as a delinquent; when Mr. Serj. Wyld desired that the Impeachment against him might be again read; after which Mr. Glynn opened part of his Charge, which he made to consist of two Articles. 1. "Benyon's maliciously contriving, subscribing, procuring, and getting hands to a false, dangerous and seditious Petition, containing therein divers false, scandalous, and seditious matters. 2. For speaking divers false and scandalous speeches in derogation of the privilege of parliament." To prove the first, these witnesses were produced, and deposed as follows: Moss, scrivener, said, "That Mr. Gardiner brought the Petition to his shop to be subscribed, and Benyon brought many persons along with him to subscribe the same. That he appeared in it more than any other, coming 4 or 5 times a day, to inquire how the subscription went forward. He further said, That he subscribed the said petition himself, because he heard Benyon say that it was approved of by counsel. And he asking Benyon if it was not too late to present the said Petition to parliament; now that the Ordinance for the Militia was settled, he answered, It was not."—Edm. Harvey said, "He went with Benyon to see the said Petition, at Moss's shop; and, after he had read it, he told Benyon he would not subscribe it, because it was full of untruths; for the lord mayor hath no power over the militia, because he cannot draw out any of the Trained Bands, on Shrove-Tuesday, without authority from the king; and further he told Benyon, He heard the Ordinance for settling the Militia was passed already in parliament; and therefore thought it would come too late. Benyon answered, That he had taken Mr. Recorder's opinion on the Petition, and he thought it right; and said, it would not come too late."—S. Edmonds and J. Offley deposed much to the same purpose; and for the words, there was only Rob. Stevens produced to prove them.—After this Mr. Glynn observed, "That the time when the Ordinance for the Militia passed in parliament, was the 9th of Feb. last, and the discourse concerning this Petition was on the 19th. That the time when Benyon presented this seditious Petition was, when both houses had declared that the kingdom was in imminent danger. The consequence of this ill example was, that other counties had taken the same boldness to contrive petitions of this nature; and the king's Answer, of Feb. the 28th last, had succeeded it. For these great crimes and misdemeanors the committee desired, in the behalf of the house of commons, that their lordships would give some severe judgment against the said Benyon."

Mr. Benyon then made it his humble desire, That he might answer by his counsel; and that the same witnesses, which were produced now against him, might be present when his defence was made; and he to have liberty to cross-examine them; which was granted, and ordered that this cause be further proceeded in at 3 this afternoon.

April 6. p. m. The commons sent up a message to inform the lords, That sir Edw. Dering, being committed to the custody of the serjeant, had made his escape: they therefore desired that some speedy course might be taken to stop him at the ports and bring him back; which the lords ordered accordingly. They then proceeded in Mr. Benyon's cause; when divers witnesses were produced to shew, That there was nothing of sedition or malice in Benyon, in the management of the Petition, as is charged; but that, by the command of the lord mayor, he advised with the recorder about it, who approved of it both for the legal and customary part. He likewise shewed, that the practice had been for the lord mayor of London to make choice of the trained bands belonging to the city. To the second part of his Charge, concerning scandalous words, he proved, by 4 other witnesses, that he spoke no such words as were charged against him.

April 7. The lords took into serious consideration the Impeachment against Benyon, and likewise his Answer and Defence; and, after several questions, at last resolved on the following Sentence against him. 1. "That the said Benyon, for the first offence charged, (the second, for words being dropped) shall be disfranchised the city of London. 2. That he shall for ever, hereafter, be incapable of bearing any place or office in the commonwealth. 3. That he shall be fined 3000*l.* to the king. 4. That he shall be imprisoned in the castle of Colchester for 2 years; and, after that time to find such sureties for his behaviour as the house shall think fit.* All which sentence, the presence of the commons, was pronounced against him. The same day, the commons sent up an Impeachment against sir Wm. Mer, kn't. then high sheriff of the county Northampton, for high crimes and misdemeanors, for breaking the privileges of parliament and for endeavouring to disturb the peace of the kingdom by seditious words and actions. The principal complaint against this gentleman was, for publishing, by virtue of his major warrant, a printed Book, entitled, 'Some Petitions and Messages of Parliament, concerning the Militia of the Kingdom, with his Majesty's Answers thereto,' and granting a way of his own to enforce it. All which the gentleman had confessed; but the further consideration of this affair was deferred to another time.

Order concerning a further Reformation of the Church.] April 8. The commons sent up an Order concerning reforming some Inventions in the Church, to which they desired their lordships concurrence. The order was to this effect: "That the lords and commons declare, That they intended a due and necessary Reformation of the government and discipline of the Church, and to take away nothing in the one or the other, but what shall be and justly offensive, or, at least, unnecessary and burthensome; and for the better effect thereof, speedily to have consultation with godly and learned divines. Likewise to publish learned, and preaching ministers, good sufficient maintenance throughout the kingdom, &c. Agreed to, and ordered printed.

A Conference about removing the Garrison of Hull.] A conference was held this day between the two houses, the report of which was, "That the commons did not see any reason to alter their Resolution for removing the said ammunition from Hull to London, being so far remote, and the king at such a distance, it would retard the business to him, and delay would prove very prejudicial to so important a business as required the kingdom was at that time in imminent danger, and the North part of it they considered to be in the most: that it was a charge to keep a garrison of 900 men in that town: and it would be fruitless to send majesty about it, as they conceive, having so many denials of late of their just demands.—The lords entered into a debate on this subject, and it was resolved, to adhere to the former Vote concerning Hull; which was to remove the Magazine there without the king's consent.

* Lord Clarendon says, That the reason for Mr. Benyon's being committed to the Tower was, because his reputation was so bad in London, that they would not trust him in city prison.

April 9. This Resolution being communicated to the lower house, they desired, the next day, another conference on this subject; the mean while the lords appointed a committee to draw up some Reasons to offer to the commons, for their refusal to join with them in this last affair; which were to this purpose: That as it had ever been the course which, cases of like nature, the houses have formerly used, the lords do conceive it convenient to leave the same in this particular; because they find there is that malignity in the counsels & endeavours of many ill-affected persons, that they seek and wait for nothing more than to asperse the proceedings of parliament; which evil and dangerous practice will, this way, be best prevented." These Reasons being made known to the commons, they, that, agreed to join with the lords in an humble Petition to the king, to remove the magazine from Hull; which was done accordingly. But, at the same, they annexed to it their Petition; That the six Popish Priests, that had now lain long under condemnation, should be executed.

*A Voluntary Gift of 6000*l.* to the Speaker of the House of Commons.*] William Lenthall, Speaker of the house of commons, having explained to that house, that his strict and attendance on them had very much hurt both in his body and estate, 6000*l.* were that day voted, as a voluntary gift to him; which, though they said, it was but a small recompence to him, yet, hereafter, they would be ready to express a further thankfulness. Upon the Speaker rose up, and returned thanks to the house; assuring them that as had hitherto done, so he would continue to use them to the best of his abilities.

The King's Proposal to go into Ireland, to suppress the Rebellion.] April 11. The lord delivered a Letter, directed to himself, to the king, and another inclosed to the commons; the latter of which was instantly read, and verbatim:

"His majesty being grieved at the very soul at the calamities of his good subjects of Ireland, and being most tenderly sensible of the false & scandalous reports dispersed amongst the commons, concerning the Rebellion there; which sorely wounds his maj. in honour, but likewise greatly retards the reducing of that unhappy kingdom, and multiplies the distractions & divisions, by weakening the mutual confidence between him and his people; out of his pious regard to the honour of Almighty God, in establishing the true Protestant profession in that kingdom, and his princely care for the good of his dominions, hath firmly resolved, with all convenient speed, to go into Ireland, to chase those wicked and detestable rebels; (odious to God and all good men) thereby so to settle the peace of that kingdom, and the security of this, that the very name of Fears and Troubles may be no more heard of amongst his subjects.—As his maj. doubts not but that his parliament will cheerfully give all possible assistance to this good work; so he requires them, and all his loving subjects, to believe that he shall, upon these considerations, as earnestly pursue this design, (not declining any hazard of his person in performing that duty which he owes to the defence of God's true religion, and his distressed subjects) as for these and only these ends he undertakes it; to the sincerity of which profession he calls God to witness; with this farther assurance, That his maj. will never consent, upon any pretence whatsoever, to a toleration of the Popish profession there, or the abolition of the laws now in force against Popish recusants in that kingdom.—His maj. hath farther thought fit to advertise his parliament, that, towards this work, he intends to raise forthwith, by his commissions, in the counties near West-Chester, a guard for his own person; (when he shall come into Ireland) consisting of 2000 foot and 200 horse, which shall be armed at West-Chester from his Magazine at Hull: At which time all the officers and soldiers shall take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance. The charge of raising and paying whereof his maj. desires his parliament to add to their former undertakings for that war; which his maj. will well accept; but if their pay be found too great a burden to his good subjects, his maj. will be willing, by the advice of his parliament, to sell or pawn any of his parks, lands, or houses towards the supplies for the service of Ireland: With the addition of these levies upon the former of English and Scots agreed upon in parliament, he hopes so to appear in this action, that, by the assistance of Almighty God; in a short time that kingdom may be wholly reduced, and restored to peace and some measure of happiness; whereby he may cheerfully return to be welcomed home with the affections and blessings of all his good English people.—Towards this good work, as his maj. hath lately made dispatches unto Scotland, to quicken the levies there for Ulster; so he heartily wishes that his parliament here would give all possible expedition to those which they have resolved for Munster and Connaught; and hopes the encouragement which the adventurers (of whose interest his maj. will always be very careful) will hereby receive, (as likewise by the late signing of a commission for the affairs of Ireland, to such persons as were recommended to him by both houses of parliament) will raise full sums of money for the doing thereof.—His majesty hath been likewise pleased (out of his earnest desire to remove all occasions, which do unhappily multiply misunderstandings between him and his parliament) to prepare a bill to be offered to them by his attorney concerning the Militia; whereby he hopes the peace and safety of this kingdom may be fully secured, to the general satisfaction of all men, without violation of his majesty's just rights, or prejudice to the liberty of the subject. If this shall be thankfully received, he is glad of it; if refused, he calls God and all the world to judge on whose part the default is. One thing his maj. requires, if this bill be approved of, that if any corporation shall make their lawful rights appear, they may be reserved unto them. Before his maj. shall part from England, he will take all due care to intrust such persons with such authority in his absence, as he shall find to be requisite for the peace and safety of this kingdom, and the happy progress of this parliament."

This Message from the king was communicated to the commons at a conference this day; and, soon after, that house sent up word to the lords, That they had taken the Message into consideration; and, judging of it with their lordships, that it was a matter of great importance, they agree with them that it requires time to answer it. On which the lords adjourned till the next day.

The King requires the earls of Essex and Holland to attend him at York, or to quit their Offices. April 12. The earl of Essex, lord chamberlain, acquainted the house, That having formerly received a Message from his majesty, to give his attendance upon him at York, their lordships thought fit to command him to attend the great affairs then depending in this house. Since which his lordship had received another letter from the king, either to attend him at York, or else to deliver the ensigns of his office to the lord Falkland, which his lordship thought it his duty to lay before the house. The Letter was read in these words:

"Right Trusty and Well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, we greet you well: We are so much unsatisfied with the excuse you made for not obeying our command, for your attendance on us here, according to the duty of your place in our household, that we thought good, by these our letters, to second our former command; and that you may be the more inexcusable, we have accompanied our said command with our licence and dispensation inclosed for your absence from parliament, willing and commanding you, all delays and excuses set apart, to attend us here before the 18th of this month, when we have appointed to keep St. George's Feast. Or, in case you shall persist in your disobedience, we then require and command you to deliver up into the hands of the lord Falkland, one of our principal secretaries of state, for our use, the ensigns of your office; which, when we last parted from Whitehall, you offered to resign to us, rather than you would, at that time as we commanded you, wait on us so far as Hampton-Court; but we did then, of our grace and favour, wish you to consider of it, in hopes you would, upon further consideration, not have seconded that disobedience. Given at our Court at York, April the 9th, 1642."

The earl of Holland next acquainted the house that the king had sent him another letter, to the same purport as the former, either to attend his majesty at York, as groom of the stole, or else to resign up the ensigns of his place to the lord Falkland. The two earls then made a narrative of the whole business concerning their taking leave of his majesty at Whitehall, the day he went to Hampton-Court and how they were commanded by the committee, who then sat at Grocers Hall, in London, about the great business of the kingdom, to attend that committee. They then desired to know, Whether the house would give them leave to attend his majesty at York or not.

Resolutions in consequence thereof. They went into a debate on this matter; and, afterwards, resolved to command the two earls to attend on this house, on the great and important affairs now depending in parliament, notwithstanding his majesty's letters and dispensations; they obeying this order, went forth and revered up the ensigns of their places to the lord Falkland. The lord keeper Littleton was appointed by the king for the ungratefulness of demanding their resignations; but, at most earnest intreaty, was excused; and fell upon the former as secretary of state, the lords considering this business to be a matter of great importance, as concerning the liberty and privilege of parliament, and that that of Essex and Holland had done nothing what they ought to have done, in obeying commands of the house, took it into debate, and made the following resolutions.

1. "That the Attendance of the earls of Essex and Holland on this house, according to the order of this house, is no disobedience to the king's command. 2. That the removing the said earls from their places in court, because they obeyed the orders and commands of this house in their attendance here in parliament, according to his majesty's writs and summons to it, is against the privileges of parliament. 3. That the king's licence and dispensation, under his privy signet and sign manual, for any lords absence from parliament, the house shall command him to attend, not discharge his attendance on the said king. 4. That any lord's disobeying the commands of this house, to give his attendance here, notwithstanding any licence or dispensation, so said, is punishable by this house. 5. That a conference with the commons about this business."

April 13. The lords took into consideration the king's last Message, about his going to Ireland, and after a long and serious debate was resolved, nem. con. "That it is dangerous and unsafe; and that this house not consent unto his majesty's going to Ireland. Ordered, That this vote be communicated to the commons, and that they be desired to point a committee to join with one of the lords, to take into consideration this the king's Message, in all points except concerning the Militia."

April 15. The lord keeper reported the effect of a conference held yesterday between the commons did return the votes from their lordships, concerning the Message of Essex and Holland, agreed to by the commons some Alterations and Additions, to which they desired their lordships concurrence. The material of these were, 1. "That they had and the sending licences and dispensations on the king, to discharge the said earls from their attendance on parliament, was a high breach of privilege; and the displacing of those members, at this time and on this occasion, was an injury to the parliament and the whole kingdom. 2. That what person soever shall accept of either of those offices, thus taken from, until satisfaction be given to the parliament, shall be accounted to do an ignoble act, and to offer an affront to parliament; and may render himself unworthy of any place of honour or trust in the common-wealth. 3.

That these proceedings are the effect of evil counsel, to discourage good men from doing their duty; and tend to increase the division between the king and his people, and to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom." All the additional Resolutions were agreed to by the Lords.

Petition from both Houses to the King, against his going to Ireland. The lord keeper of the great seal reported, That Mr. Pym presented a draught of a Petition to be sent to the king, containing some Reasons against his going into Ireland; which was read as fol-loweth.

May it please your majesty; Your most loving and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, have duly considered the message received from your majesty, concerning your purpose of going into Ireland, in your person, to prosecute the war there with the aid of your English subjects, levied, quartered, and maintained at their charge;
and you are pleased to propound to us, in a matter wherein your maj. desires the advice of your parliament, but as already resolved on, and forthwith to be into execution; by granting out commissions for the levying of 2000 foot and 200 horses for a guard for your person when you shall come into that kingdom: Herein we cannot but, with all reverence and humility to your majesty, observe, that you have declined the great council the parliament, and varied the usual course of your royal predecessors in that a business of so great importance, concerning the peace and safety of your subjects, wherein they have a special interest in your majesty's promise, and by those great charges which they have disbursed, and for which they stand engaged, should be concluded and undertaken, without their advice: Wherefore we hold it our duty to declare, That if,
at this time, your maj. shall go into Ireland, it will very much endanger the safety of your person and kingdoms, and of all other states depending the Protestant religion in Christendom, and make way to that cruel and bloody oppression of the Papists, every where to root out the reformed religion; as the Irish have, in a great part, already effected in that kingdom, and, in all likelihood, would soon be attempted in other places, if the union of the strength and union of the two nations of England and Scotland did not much hinder and discourage the execution of any such design. And, that we may manifest to your majesty the danger and misery which such a journey and enterprize would produce, we present to your majesty the Reasons of this our humble opinion and advice: 1. Your royal person will be subject not only to the casualty of war, but to secret practices and conspiracies; especially your maj. continuing your profession to maintain the Protestant religion in that kingdom, which the Papists are generally bound by their vow to extirpate.

2. It will exceedingly encourage the rebels, who do generally profess and declare that your
maj. doth favour and allow their proceedings, and that this insurrection was undertaken by the warrant of your commission; and it will make good their expectation of great advantage by your majesty's presence, at a time of so much distraction in this kingdom, whereby they may hope we shall be disabled to supply the war there; especially there appearing less necessity of your majesty's journey at this time, by reason of the manifold successes which God hath given us against them. 3. It will much hinder and impair the means whereby this war is to be supported, and increase the charge of it; and, in both these respects, make it more insupportable to your subjects: and this we can confidently affirm, because many of the adventurers, who have already subscribed, do, upon the knowledge of your majesty's intentions, declare their resolutions not to pay in their money; and others, very willing to have subscribed, do now profess the contrary. 4. Your majesty's absence must necessarily very much interrupt the proceedings of parliament; and deprive the subject of the benefit of those further acts of grace and justice, which they shall humbly expect from your majesty, for the establishing of a perfect union and mutual confidence betwixt your maj.
and your people, and procuring and confirming the prosperity and happiness of both. 5.
It will exceedingly increase the jealousies and fears of your people, and render their doubts more probable, of some force intended by some evil counsels near your majesty, in opposition to the parliament, and in favour of the malignant party of the kingdom. 6. It will bereave your parliament of that advantage, whereby they were induced to undertake this war, upon your majesty's promise that it should be managed by their advice; which cannot be done if your majesty, contrary to their counsels, shall undertake to order and govern it in your own person.—Upon which, and divers other Reasons, we have resolved, by the fall and concurring agreement of both houses, that we cannot, with the duty which belongs to us, consent to any levies, or raising of soldiers to be made by your majesty, for your intended expedition into Ireland; or to the payment of any army or soldiers there, but such as shall be employed and governed according to our advice and direction; and if such levies shall be made by any such commission of your majesty, not agreed to by both houses of parliament, we shall be forced to interpret the same to be raised to the terror of your people, and disturbance of the public peace; and hold ourselves bound by the laws of the kingdom, to apply the authority of parliament to suppress the same.—And we do further most humbly declare, That if your maj. shall, by ill counsel, be persuaded to go contrary to this advice of your parliament, which we hope your maj. will not, we do not, in that case, hold ourselves bound to submit to any commissioners which your maj. shall chuse; but do resolve to preserve and govern the kingdom by the counsel and advice of parliament, for your maj. and your posterity, according to our allegiance and the law of the land.—Wherefore we most humbly pray and advise your maj. to desist from this your intended passage into Ireland, and from all preparation of men and arms tending thereunto, and to leave the managing of that war to your parliament; according to your majesty's promise made unto us, and your royal commission granted under your great seal of England, by advice of both houses; in prosecution whereof, by God's blessing, we have made a prosperous entrance by many defeats of the rebels, whereby they are much weakened and disheartened, and have no probable means of subsistence: and, if our proceedings shall not be interrupted by this interposition of your majesty's journey, we may hope, upon good grounds, that within a short time, (without hazard of your majesty's person, and so much dangerous confusion to your kingdoms, which must needs ensue, if you should proceed in this resolution) we shall be enabled fully to vindicate your majesty's right and authority in that kingdom; punish those horrible and outrageous cruelties which have been committed in the murdering and spoiling so many of your subjects; and bring that realm to such a condition as may be much for the advantage of your maj. and this crown, the honour of your government, and contentment of your people: for the better and more speedy effecting whereof, we do again renew our humble desires of your return to your parliament; and that you will please to reject all counsels and apprehensions which may any way derogate from that faithfulness and allegiance, which, in truth and sincerity, we have always borne and professed to your majesty, and shall ever make good to the utmost, with our lives and fortunes.

After the reading of this Petition, the lords resolved, That they agreed with the commons in the whole of it, excepting one expression, which was in the original, viz. 'And to desert the government and protection of your people, in this time of great danger and necessities, of the kingdom; which, upon this Remonstrance, the commons thought fit to expunge. Then the said Petition was ordered to be sent to the king at York.

Another Resolution of the commons was read and agreed to by the lords, which was, "That, in respect of the great fears and distractions of this kingdom, and for the security of his majesty's good subjects; and in regard that he has committed the managing of the wars in Ireland to the parliament; if any man shall endeavour to raise forces, for Ireland, otherwise, or continue any forces so raised, without consent of both houses of parliament, it is declared, That he is an enemy to the state, and liable to the censure of parliament." The vote to be sent to all sheriffs, to suppress and hinder all those that shall endeavour to raise forces contrary to it; as, also, to Mr John Hotham, at Hull, and to require him to observe the orders formerly given him.

The King's Message relating to the Garrison at Hull, &c. April 16. The lord keeper acquainted the house, that he had received a Letter from the King, with a Message inclosed, which he was commanded to communicate to both houses of parliament. It was to this effect.

"We rather expected, and have done a long, that you should have given us an account why a Garrison hath been placed in our town of Hull, without our consent, and soldiers selected there against law and the express words of the Petition of Right, than to be moved (for the avoiding of a needless charge you have put upon yourselves) to give our consent to the removal of our Magazine and Munition (our own proper goods) upon such general reasons, as indeed give no satisfaction to our judgment: and since you have made the business of Hull your argument, we would gladly be informed, why our own inclination, on the general rumour of the designs of Papists in the Northern parts, was not thought sufficient grounds for us to put a person of honour, virtue, and unblemished reputation, into a town and fort of our own, where our own magazine lay; and yet the same rumour be warrant enough for you to commit the same town and fort, without our consent, to the hands of Mr John Hotham, with a power unagreeable to the law of the land, or the liberty of the subject; and yet of this, in point of right or privilege, (for sure we are not without privilege) we have not all this while complained; and being confident that that place (where soever discourse there is of public or private instruction to the contrary) shall be speedily given up, if we shall require it; we shall be contented to dispose our ammunition there, as we have done in other places, for the publick ease and benefit; as, upon particular advice, we shall find convenient; though we cannot think it fit or consent that the whole Magazine be removed together; but when you shall agree upon such proportions as shall be held necessary for any particular service, we shall sign such warrant as shall be agreeable to wisdom and reason; and if any of them be designed for Ulster or Leinster, you know well the convenience will be more easy and convenient from the place they now are in. Yet we must tell you, that if the fears are so great from the Papists at home, & of Foreign force, as is pretended, it seems strange that you make not provision of arms and munition for defence of this kingdom, rather than seek to carry any more from hence, without some course taken for supply; especially if you remember your engagement to our loyal subjects, for that proportion of arms which is contained in our treaty. We speak not this, as not thinking the sending of arms to Ireland very necessary, but only for the way of the provision; for you know what great quantities we have assigned out of our several stores, which, in due time, we hope you will see replenished. For the charge of looking to the Magazine at Hull, as it was undertaken voluntarily by you at first, and, to say no more, unnecessarily; so you may free our good people of that charge, and leave it to us to look to, as the proper owner of it: and this, we hope, will give you full satisfaction in this point; and that you do not, as you have done in the raising of the Militia, send this Message out in complimentary ceremony, resolving to be your own carriers at last: for we must tell you, any attempt, or direction, shall be made, or done, in this matter, without our consent or approbation, we shall esteem it as an act of violence against us; and declare it to all the world as the greatest violation of our right, and breach of our privilege.—Concerning the six priests condemned; it is true they were released by our warrant, being informed that they were, by some restraint, disabled to take the benefit of our former proclamation: since that we have issued out another for the due execution of the laws against Papists; and have not solemnly promised on the word of a king, never to pardon any priest, without your consent, which shall be found guilty by law; having to banish these, having herewith sent a warrant to that purpose, if, upon second thoughts you do not disapprove thereof; but you think the execution of these persons so necessary to the great and pious work of reformation, we refer it wholly to you; declaring hereby, that, upon such your resolution, signified to the ministers of justice, our warrant for their reprieve is determined, and the law to take its free course.—And now let us ask you if we are willing to husband time, and to dispatch as much as may be under one Message; God knows the distractions of this kingdom want a remedy) will there never be a time to offer to, as well as to ask, of us? We will propose no more particulars to you, having a lack to please or be understood by you. Take your own time for what concerns our particular; but be sure you have an early speedy care of the public; that is, of the holy rule which preserves the public, the law of the land; preserve the dignity and reverence due to that. It was well said in a Speech made by a private person, but published by order of the house of commons this parliament, that the law is that which puts a difference between good and evil, betwixt just and unjust. If you take away the law, all things will fall into confusion; every man will become a law to himself; which, in the depraved condition of human nature, must needs produce many great enormities: lust will become a law, and envy will become a law; covetousness and ambition will become laws; and what dictates, what decisions, such laws will produce, may easily be discerned. So said that gentleman, and much more very well, in defence of the law and against arbitrary power: It is worth looking over and considering. And if the most zealous defence of the true Protestant profession, and the most resolved protection of the law, be the most necessary duty of a prince, we cannot believe this miserable distance and misunderstanding can be long continued between us; we having, often and earnestly, declared them to be the chiefest desires of our soul, and the end and rule of all our actions.—For Ireland; we have sufficiently, and we hope satisfactorily, expressed to all our good subjects our hearty sense of that sad business, in our several Messages on that argument; but especially in our last of the 8th of this month, concerning our resolution for that service; for the speedy, honourable, and full performance whereof, we conjure you to yield all possible assistance and present advice."

After the reading of this Message, a conference was desired with the commons about it, being a matter, as they termed it, of dangerous consequence; and a committee of lords were appointed to draw up heads for that purpose. Who soon after, brought in the following: "To let the commons know, that this house has resolved, That it is necessary the Magazine at Hull be removed to the Tower of London; because they believe that those evil counselors, who advised this Answer, wherein there is a threatening of the parliament, and an unjust charge of violation of the laws, have a design to stay those arms there; that they may make use of them to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom, and the ruin and subversion of it. To desire a committee of both houses may be appointed to draw up the Reasons, which induced the houses to desire the Magazine might be removed from Hull; resolving to publish them, with their Petition to the king, and his answer to it."—This proposition was agreed to by the commons.

April 18. Two votes of the commons were sent up to the lords concerning Hull, to which they desired their lordships concurrence: 1. "To urge the necessity of removing the Magazine there: 2. To indemnify sir J. Hotham and his son, and all other persons under their command, for doing what they had already done; and that they should have the assistance of parliament against any inconveniences they might incur by yielding obedience to their command, in this necessary and important service." Agreed to; the earls of Bath, Monmouth, Cleveland, and Dover, with the lords Mowbray, Grey, Howard, and Savile, dissenting.

April 22. A letter from the earl of Stamford to the lord keeper was read, importing his majesty's present Answer to the parliament's last Petition to him, "That he had thought something of it, and is much unsatisfied with many expressions therein: that he would shortly send to his parliament a particular Answer; but, for the present, he was resolved to do nothing concerning the Irish journey until they should hear from him again."

Sentence pronounced against the Attorney General.] April 23. A message was sent to the commons, to let them know that their lordships were ready to give Judgment against Mr. Attorney-General, if they would come, with their Speaker, to demand it. Accordingly the commons being come up, and the peers in their robes, the lord chief justice of the common pleas, in the absence of the lord keeper, pronounced Sentence upon him as follows:

"Whereas sir Edw. Herbert, knight, his majesty's Attorney General, hath been impeached by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, for the advising, contriving, and publishing certain false, scandalous, and malicious Articles of High Treason against the lord Kimbolton, one of the members of the house of peers; sir A. Haslerig, D. Hollis, John Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode, esqrs. being then, and yet, members of the house of commons; and for causing Articles of High Treason to be entered into the clerk's book of the said house of peers, which was done against the privileges of parliament, tending to the subversion of the antient rights and being of parliaments, and against the liberty of the subject, and contrary to his oath and the laws of this realm: The lords, having taken the said Charge into due consideration, do find him guilty of exhibiting the said Articles unto the house of peers, and causing the same to be entered in the clerk's book of the said house; intending thereby falsely, unlawfully, and maliciously to deprive the said houses of the said several members; all which doings were, and are, high breaches of the privileges of parliament tending to the subversion of the antient rights and being of parliaments, and contrary to the liberty of the subject, and are of great scandal to his maj. and his government, and against the laws of this realm; for which offences this high court doth award and adjudge, 1. That the said sir E. Herbert, his majesty's Attorney-General, is, by sentence of this house, disabled, and made incapable of being a member-assistant, or pleader, in either house of parliament, and of all offices, saving that of Attorney-general, which he now holds. 2. That Mr. Attorney-General shall be forthwith committed to the prison of the Fleet during the pleasure of this house."

The King's Answer to the Petition against his going to Ireland.] April 25. The lord keeper signified to the house, that he had received two letters from the king, wherein were two Messages inclosed, which he was commanded to communicate to the house, and they were read accordingly. The first was this:

"We are so troubled and astonished to find the unexpected reception and misunderstanding of our Message, of the 8th of April, concerning our Irish Journey; that being so much disappointed of the approbation and thanks we looked for to that Declaration, we have great cause to doubt, whether it be in our power to say or do any thing which shall not fall within the like interpretation. But as we have, in that Message, called God to witness the sincerity of the profession of our only ends for the undertaking that Journey; so we must appeal to all our good subjects and the whole world, whether the reasons alleged against that Journey be of weight to satisfy our understanding, or the counsel presented to dissuade us from it be full of that duty as is like to prevail over our affections.—For our resolving of so great a business without the advice of our parliament, we must remember you how often, by our Messages, we made the same offer, if you shall advise us thereunto; to which you never gave us the least Answer; but in your late Declaration told us, That ye were not to be satisfied with words; so that we had reason to conceive you rather avoided, out of regard to our person, to give us counsel to run that hazard, than that you disapproved the inclination. And what greater comfort, or security, can the Protestants of Christendom receive, than by seeing a Protestant King venture and engage his person for the defence of that profession, and the suppression of Popery, to which we solemnly protested, in that Message, never to grant a Toleration upon what pretence soever, or an abolition of any of the laws there in force against the professors of it. And when we consider the great calamities, and unheard of cruelties our poor Protestant subjects in that kingdom have undergone for the space of near or full six months; the growth and increase of the strength of those barbarous rebels, and the evident probability of foreign supplies, if they are not speedily suppressed; the very slow succours hitherto sent them from hence; that the officers of several regiments, who have long time been allowed entertainment from you for that service, have not raised any supply or succour for that kingdom; that many troops of horse have long laid near Chester untransported; that the lord lieutenant of Ireland, on whom we relied principally for the conduct and managing of affairs there, is still in this kingdom; notwithstanding our earnestness expressed that he should repair to his command. And when we consider the many and great scandals raised upon ourself by report of the rebels, and not sufficiently discountenanced here, notwithstanding so many professions of ours: And had seen a Book, lately printed by the order of the house of commons, intitled, 'A Remonstrance of divers remarkable Passages concerning the Church and Kingdom of Ireland;' wherein some examinations are set down, which how improbable or impossible soever, may make an impression in the ends of many of our weak subjects. And not only, when we duly weigh the dishonour which will perpetually lie upon this kingdom, if full and speedy relief be not dispatched thither: we could not, nor cannot, think of a better way to discharge our duty to Almighty God, for the defence of the true Protestant profession; or to manifest our affection to our three kingdoms, for their preservation, than by engaging our person in this expedition; as many of our royal progenitors have done, even in foreign wars, upon causes of less importance and piety, with great honour to themselves and advantage to this kingdom: and therefore we expected, at least, thanks for such our inclination.—For the Danger to our Person; we conceive it necessary and worthy a king to adventure his life to preserve his kingdom; neither can it be imagined that we will sit still, and let our kingdoms to be lost; and our good Protestant subjects to be massacred, without exposing our own person to the utmost hazard of their relief and preservation; our life, when it is most pleasant, being nothing so precious to us as it is, and shall be, to govern and serve our people with honour and justice. For any Encouragement to the Rebels, because of the reports they raised; we cannot conceive that the rebels are capable of a greater terror, than by the presence of their lawful king in the head of an army to chastise them: indeed, it will be an unspeakable advantage to them, if any reports of theirs could hinder them from doing any thing which were fit for us to do if such reports were not raised: This should quickly teach them, in this jealous age, to prevent, by such reports, any other persons, rising against them, whom they had no mind should be so employed.—We marvel that the venturers, whose advantage was the principal motive, next the reason before mentioned, should so much mistake our purpose, the interest we conceive must be much increased by the expedition, which we hope, by its blessing, to use in this service; this being the most probable way for the speedy conquest of the rebels: their lands are sufficiently secured by act of parliament.—We think not our kingdom used, that the Addition of so few men to your levies, for a Guard to our person in Ireland, should be thought fit for your relief: and much more, that having used so many cautions in that Message, both in the smallness of the number; in our having raised them until your Answer; in their being to be sent only near their place of shipping; in their being there to be armed, and that, not till they are ready to be shipped; in the provision, by the mouths, That none of them should be Papists; (all which appears sufficient to destroy all grounds of jealousy, of any force intended against them in opposition to the parliament, or against to any malignant party) any suspicion should, notwithstanding, be grounded upon it.—Neither can it be understood, when we recommended the managing of that war to you, That we intended to exclude ourselves, or not to be concerned in your councils; that if we found any expedient, (which in our conscience or understanding we thought necessary for that great work) we might not put it in practice: we look upon you as our great council, whose advice we always have and will, with great regard and deliberation, weigh and consider. But we look upon ourselves, as neither deprived of our understanding, or divested of any right we had, if there were no parliament sitting. We called you together by our own writ and authority, (without which you could not have met) to give us faithful counsel about our great affairs; but we resigned not up our own interest and freedom. We never subjected ourselves to your absolute determination. We have always weighed your counsels, as proceeding from a body intrusted by us: and when we have dissented from you, we have returned you the reasons, which have prevailed with our conscience and understanding, with that candour as a prince should use towards his subjects, and that affection which a father can express to his children. What application hath been used to rectify our understanding by reasons, or what motives have been given to persuade our affections, we leave all the world to judge; and then we must tell you, howsoever a major part may bind you in matter of opinion; we hold ourselves (and we are sure the law, and the constitution of the kingdom, hath always held the same) as free to dissent (till our reason be convinced for the general good) as if you delivered no opinion.—For our Journey itself, the circumstances of your Petition are such, as we know not well what Answer to return, or whether it were best to give any. That part which pretends to carry reason with it, doth no way satisfy us: the other, which is rather reprehension and menace than advice, cannot stagger us. Our Answer therefore is, That we shall be very glad to find the work of Ireland so easy as you seem to think it, which did not so appear by any thing known to us, when we sent our Message. And though we will never refuse, or be unwilling to venture our person, for the good and safety of our people; we are not so weary of our life, as to hazard it imperitiously. And therefore, since you seem to have received advertisements of some late and great successes in that kingdom, we will stay some time to see the event of those, and not pursue this resolution till we have given you a second notice. But if we find the miserable condition of our poor subjects of that kingdom be not speedily relieved; we will, with God's assistance, visit them with succours, as our particular credit and interest can supply us with, if you refuse to join with us. And we doubt not but the levies we shall make (in which we will observe punctually the former, and all other cautions, as may best prevent all fears and jealousies, and to use no power but what is legal) will be so much to the satisfaction of our subjects, as no person will dare presume to resist our commands, and if they should, at their peril. In the mean time, we hope our force wardness, so remarkable to that service, shall be notorious to all the world, and that all scandals laid on us in that business shall be clearly wiped away.—We were so careful that our Journey into Ireland should not interrupt the proceedings of parliament; nor deprive our subjects of any acts of justice, or further acts of grace, for the real benefit of our people; That we made a free offer of leaving such power behind, as should not only be necessary for the peace and safety of the kingdom; but fully provide for the happy progress of the parliament. And therefore we cannot but wonder, since such power hath been always left here by commission for the government of this kingdom, when our progenitors have been out of the same, during the sitting of parliaments: and since yourselves desired that such a power might be left here by us at our last going into Scotland, what law of the land you have now found to dispense with you from submitting to such authority, legally derived from us, in our absence, and to enable you to govern this kingdom by your own mere authority!—For our Return towards London, we have given you so full an Answer in our last Declaration, and in Answer to your Petition presented to us at York, the 26th of March last, that we know not what to add, if you will not provide for our security with you; nor agree to remove to another place, where there may not be the same danger to us: we expected that (since we have been so particular in the causes and grounds of our fears) you should have sent us word, that you had published such Declarations against future tumults, and unlawful assemblies; and taken such courses for the suppressing of seditious Sermons and Pamphlets, that our fears of that kind might be laid aside, before you should press our return.—To conclude; we could wish that you would, with the same strictness and severity, weigh and examine your messages and expressions to us, as you do those you receive from us; for we are very confident, that if you examine our rights and privileges, by what our predecessors have enjoyed; and your own addresses, by the usual courses of your ancestors; ye will find many expressions in this Petition warranted only by your own authority; which indeed we forbear to take notice of or to give Answer to, lest we should be tempted, in a just indignation, to express a greater passion than we are yet willing to put on. God, in his good time, we hope, will so inform the hearts of all our subjects, that we shall recover from the mischief and danger of this distemper, on whose good pleasure we will wait with all patience and humility.”

The foregoing Message was ordered to be sent down to the commons.

A Paper dispersed about, concerning the Nature of Allegiance.] The king's second Message was occasioned by a printed Paper, then industriously dispersed over the kingdom, concerning the regal power in the Militia; which we give as follows, from Husband's Collections; they not being in the Journals.

“A QUESTION answered: How LAWS are to be understood, and OBEDIENCE yielded: Necessary for the present State of Things, touching the MILITIA.

“Question: Now, in our extreme distractions, when foreign forces threaten, and, probably, are invited, and a malignant and Popish party at home offended; the Devil hath our bone, and raised a contestation between the king and parliament, touching the Militia. His majesty claims the disposing of it to left him, by the right of law; the parliament says, Rebus sic stantibus, et nolente rege, the ordering of it is in them.” Answer: “This Question may receive its solution by this distinction. That there is in laws an equitable and a literal sense. His majesty, let it be granted, intrusted, by law, with the Militia; but for the good and preservation of the realm against foreign invasions, or domestic rebellions; for it cannot be supposed that the parliament would ever, by law, intrust the Militia against themselves or of the common-wealth, that intrusts them to provide their weal, not for their woe: So that there is certain appearance, or ground of suspicion, that the letter of the law shall be proved against the equity of it, (that is, public good, whether of the body real, or representative) then the commander, going against its equity, gives liberty to the command to refuse obedience to the letter: for the law taken abstract from its original reason and is made a shell without a kernel, a substance, and a body without a soul. It is the execution of laws, according to their equity and reason, which, as I may say, is the spirit that gives life to authority; the letter kills.—Nor need this equity be pressed in the law, being so naturally implied and supposed in all laws that are not absolute, imperial, from that analogy which all laws hold with the natural; whereas government and governors borrow a reasonable respect. And, therefore, when the Militia of an army is committed to the king, it is not with any express condition that he shall not turn the mouths of his cannon against his own soldiers; for that is so naturally implied, that it is needless to be expressed; inasmuch that if he did attempt to command such a thing, against the nature of his trust and place, it did, ipso facto, dissolve the army in a right of disobedience; and we think that obedience binds men to cut their own throats, or at least their companions'. And, indeed, if this distinction be not allowed, then the legal and mixed monarchy is the greatest tyranny; for if laws invest the king in an absolute power, and the letter be controlled by the equity; then, whereas kings that are absolute monarchs, and do by will, and not by law, are tyrants, yet those that rule by law, and not by will, are hereby, a tyranny conferred upon them: and so the very end of laws, which is to give bounds and limits to the exercise of power, princes, is, by the laws themselves, disappointed; for they hereby give corroboration, and much more justification, to an arbitrary ranny, by making it legal, not assumed; such laws are ordained to cross, not to countenance: and therefore is the letter, where it seems absolute, always to receive qualification from the equity, else the aforesaid absurdity must follow."

The King's Complaint against the said Treasonable Paper.] The king's Message to the Lords, on occasion of the foregoing Paper, was as follows:

"His majesty having seen a printed Paper, stiled, 'A Question answered: How Laws are to be understood, and Obedience yielded?' which Paper he sends together with this message, thinks fit to recommend the consideration of it to his house of peers; that they by use all possible care and diligence for the finding out the author, and may give directions to his learned counsel, to proceed against him and the publishers of it, in such a way as shall be agreeable to the law and the course of justice, as persons who endeavour to stir up sedition against his majesty. And his majesty doubts not but they will be very sensible how much their own particular interest, as well as the publick government of the kingdom, is, and must be, shaken, if such licence shall be permitted to bold factious spirits, to withdraw his subjects strict obedience from the laws established, by such seditious and treasonable dispositions. And of doctrines of this nature his majesty doubts not, but that their lordships will publish their great dislike, it being grow up into frequent discourse, and vented in some pulpits, by those desperate turbulent preachers, who are the great promoters of the distempers of the time, 'That human laws do not bind the conscience;' which being once believed, the government and peace of the kingdom will quickly be dissolved. His majesty expects speedy account of their lordships exemplary justice upon the authors and publishers of this Paper."

The lords being of opinion, That the king's complaint against the authors and publishers of the foregoing Paper (as containing seditious expressions and treasonable distinctions) was of the nature of an inquisition; and holding it proper for things of that kind to begin in the house of commons, and to be brought up to their lordships in a parliamentary way, sent it down to them accordingly. But it was never more heard of in either house.

A Petition of the Yorkshire Gentry to the King for continuing the Magazine at Hull.] At a conference held this day, the commons delivered to the lords a copy of a Petition, which had been presented to the king by divers gentlemen of Yorkshire; which was read as follows:

The Humble PETITION of the GENTRY and COMMONS of the County of YORK.

"Most royal sovereign; Encouraged by your majesty's many testimonies of your gracious goodness to us and our county, which we can never sufficiently acknowledge; we do, in all duty and loyalty of heart, humbly address ourselves to your sacred majesty; beseeching you to cast your eyes and thoughts on the safety of your own royal person, your princely issue, and this whole county; a great means of which we conceive doth consist in the Arms and Ammunition at Hull, placed there by your princely care and charge; which, by your majesty, was conceived necessary for the defence of the Northern parts of this kingdom; and since, upon a general apprehension of danger from foreign parts represented to your majesty, thought fit, as yet, to be continued: we for our parts, conceiving ourselves to be still in danger, do humbly beseech your majesty, That you would be pleased to take such course and order, that your Magazine of Ammunition may still there remain, for the better securing of these and the rest of the Northern parts; and the rather, because we think it most fit, that that part of the kingdom should be best provided, where your sacred person doth reside; your person being the David, the light of Israel, and more worth than ten thousand of us, Who shall daily pray, &c."

This Petition was assented to, and delivered to the king, by these gentlemen, viz. sir F. Wortley, sir Wm. Wentworth, sir John Gibson, sir Tho. Metham, sir Rd. Hutton, sir Paul Neal, Mr. Bryan Palmes, Mr. Geo. Butler, Mr. Dawney, Mr. Mountain, capt. Frankland, and 8 or 10 more, whose names, as the Journals say, were not known.

The observations made by the House of commons on this Petition, were, "1. The preface is false, being stiled, 'A Petition of the Gentry and Commons,' when it was delivered only by a few. 2. That it is wholly grounded upon a presumption, that the king and prince will reside there; which is directly contrary to the continual desires of both houses of parliament, and to their petition for removing the Magazine from Hull, and their order thereupon. 3. That whereas it is pretended that the Magazine was placed there for the safety of the county, it was much to the damage and loss thereof; being so long overburdened with that and the army. 4. That most of these subscribers were the retractors of their names from that Petition, which the county of York presented to the king, for the calling of a parliament, and joined with the late earl of Strafford for the stopping of it.—On these considerations the commons conceive this Petition to be of dangerous consequence, and an affront to the parliament; done on purpose to increase the differences between the king and his people, to make a faction within that county: Therefore, the commons desire their lordships, That the subscribers to it may be summoned to appear, and answer the same in parliament." This was ordered accordingly.

The King's Message of Complaint against sir J. Hotham for refusing him Entrance into 4 G

Hull.] April 26. The lord keeper acquainted the lords, that he had received a Letter from the King, dated at Beverley, April 24th, with a Message inclosed in it, which he was commanded to deliver to the house; viz.

"His majesty having received the Petition inclosed from most of the chief of the Gentry near about York, desiring the stay of his majesty's arms and munition in his Magazine at Hull; for the safety not only of his majesty's person and children, but likewise of all these Northern parts, the manifold rumours of great dangers inducing them to make their said supplication; thought it most fit to go himself, in person, to his town of Hull, to view his arms and munition there; that thereupon he might give directions what part thereof might be necessary to remain there for the security and satisfaction of his Northern subjects; and what part thereof might be spared for Ireland, and the arming of his majesty's Scots subjects that are to go thither; or to replenish his chiefest magazine of the Tower of London; where being come upon the 23rd of this instant April, much contrary to his expectation, he found all the gates shut upon him, and the bridges drawn up, by the express command of sir John Hotham; who, for the present, commands a garrison there; and from the walls flatly denied his majesty entrance into his said town; the reason of the said denial being as strange to his maj. as the thing itself, it being, that he could not admit his majesty, without breach of trust to his parliament; which did the more incense his majesty's anger against him, for that he, most seditiously and traiterously, would have put his disobedience, upon his majesty's parliament; which his maj. being willing to clear, demanded of him, if he had the impudence to aver that the parliament had directed him to deny his maj. entrance; and that if he had any such order, that he should shew it in writing, for otherwise his maj. could not believe it; which he could no way produce, but maliciously made that false interpretation according to his own inferences, confessing that he had no such positive order, which his majesty was ever confident of: but his majesty, not willing to take so much pains in vain, offered to come into that his town with only 20 horse, finding that the main of his pretence lay, that his majesty's train was able to command the garrison; notwithstanding his majesty was so desirous to go thither in a private way, that he gave warning thereof but over night; which he refusing, but by way of condition, which his majesty thought much below him, held it most necessary to declare him traitor, unless, upon better thoughts, he should yield obedience; which he doubly deserved, as well for refusing entrance to his natural sovereign, as by laying the reason thereof, groundlessly and maliciously, upon his parliament. One circumstance his maj. cannot forget, That his son the duke of York, and his nephew the prince Elector, having gone thither the day before, sir John Hotham delayed letting of them out to his majesty, till after some consultation. Hereupon his maj. hath thought it expedient to demand justice of his parliament against the said sir J. Hotham, to be exemplarily inflicted on him, according to the laws; and the rather, because his maj. would give them a fit occasion to free themselves of this imputation, by him so injuriously cast upon them, to the end his maj. may have the easier way for the chastising of so high disobedience."

The Lords justify sir J. Hotham's Refusal. The lords entered into a serious debate of this Message and afterwards came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That sir J. Hotham according to this relation, hath done nothing but in obedience to the commands of both houses of parliament. 2. That this declaring sir J. Hotham a traitor, being a member of the house of commons, is a high breach of privilege of parliament. 3. That this declaring sir J. Hotham a traitor, without due process of law is against the liberty of the subject and the law of the land." It was also ordered, to be an immediate conference with the commons, to communicate the king's Message to them, and these votes upon it.

Impeachment of sir Edw. Dering, for promoting the Kentish Petition. This day the lord keeper reported a conference had with the commons, concerning sir Edward Dering. That they had presented the following impeachment against him:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of Sir Edward Dering, knt. and bart, by the Commons assembled in this present Parliament, the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, for high Crimes and Misdemeanors by him committed follows: *

I. "That whereas an Ordinance was late made and agreed upon by both houses of parliament, for the settling of the Militia of the kingdom, for the safety and preservation thereof in these times of imminent danger; the said sir Edward Dering, knowing thereof, and having been lately a member of the commons both in parliament, and by order of the said house for offences by him committed, expelled the same † out of a malicious and wicked intention to cross and hinder the said Ordinance; to interrupt and scandalize the proceedings of parliament; to set division between his maj. and the parliament; and to raise sedition and tumult in the county of Kent, and in other parts of this realm; in or about the month

* These proceedings against sir Edw. Dering are taken from the Lords Journals: That no mention made of them in Rushworth's Whitlocke. Lord Clarendon, indeed, tells "That several gentlemen of the county of Kent, who had subscribed and advised the Petition, were sent for as delinquents; and Charges and Articles of Impeachment were up against them." Vol. II. p. 437.

March last past, by practice and combination with R. Spencer, esq. sir Roger Twisden, and sir Geo. Strode, and others, did wickedly and maliciously contrive and frame certain dangerous and seditious Heads or Articles of a Petition to be presented to the parliament, for and in behalf of the gentry, ministers, and commonalty of Kent; amongst which some were to be of the like effect, viz. 1. 'That no member of the house of commons should be put out of the said house, without shewing a reason for the same; and that they shew some cause why.' The said sir Edw. Dering was put out of the said house. 2. That his majesty's subjects should not be bound by any Order of either of the said houses. 3. That no Ordinance of the said house touching the Militia should bind the subjects, without his majesty's assent thereto. And for the better effecting thereof, at the assizes holden for the said county, on Tuesday, the 22nd of March 1641, the said sir E. Dering, being then, and yet, a justice of the peace of the said county, together with the said Geo. Strode, and divers other justices of the peace of the said county, then present in court, the practice and combination aforesaid, did offer himself to serve on the grand inquest at the said assizes; albeit there was another sufficient grand jury then returned by the sheriff, (whereof he was none) and no exception taken the same; and that no justice of peace, or other gentlemen of that rank and quality in the county, had served upon any grand jury at the assizes, for many years then before: and the said sir E. Dering, together with the other justices of the peace, upon their said offer, being sworn and impannelled of the said jury, the said sir E. Dering, with the said sir Geo. Strode, by the practice and combination aforesaid, and to the intent and purpose aforesaid, tender the said heads to the said grand jury; and did then and there wickedly and unlawfully persuade, labour and solicit the rest of the grand jury to agree to the same; and have the said grand jury drawn into a Petition to the parliament, and presented by the said grand jury to the house of the said assizes and the rest of the commons there, to be, by them, assented to and agreed of; and did then and there wickedly procure the said grand jury to secrecy, and not discover any thing touching the said Petition, if it should be, by them, agreed upon and assented as aforesaid; falsely persuading them that they were thereunto bound by their oath. 4. That whereas the said grand jury did not, would agree to the said Petition or Heads; a great part of them did utterly refuse and dissent the same, and resolve to protest against yet the said sir E. Dering, together with the said sir G. Strode, by the practice and combination aforesaid, did, at the same assizes, wickedly and seditiously contrive and frame a dangerous, scandalous, and seditious Petition, and presented to the parliament, consisting of many of the heads aforesaid, and others, the same did present to the bench at the said assizes; and, by false and sinister suggestions, persuasions and solicitations, caused the same to be voted and assented to in open court; and did further say, That the same should be accompanied with 40,000 persons, and that they should meet at Deptford, Greenwich, or Blackheath, to go to the parliament; and did likewise openly move in court, That there might be three copies made of the said Petition, one to the house of lords, another to the commons, and a third to his majesty.—III. That the said sir E. Dering, together with the said R. Spencer, sir R. Twisden, sir G. Strode, and others, by the practice and combination, and to the intent aforesaid, at the said assizes, and at other times, did wickedly and seditiously publish the said Petition; and caused the same to be put into the hands of one Pope, an attorney at law, dwelling at Maidstone aforesaid, to make and deliver out copies thereof, to be dispersed throughout the said county; and divers copies thereof were given out and dispersed accordingly.—IV. That the said sir E. Dering, together with the rest of the said confederates, by the practice and combination aforesaid and to the intent aforesaid, did unlawfully, wickedly and maliciously, procure many hands to the said Petition; and did labour and solicit divers of the inhabitants of the said county to assemble and meet at Deptford or Greenwich, in the said county or some other place; thereabouts, in great multitudes, to go along with the said Petition; intending thereby to have raised commotion and sedition amongst the people, and to have awed the parliament.—All which doings of the said sir E. Dering and his confederates, were, and are, great and high breaches of the privileges of parliament; and contrary to his oath and the duty of a justice of peace; tending to sedition, and to the apparent danger of both his majesty's kingdoms of England and Ireland: and the said sir E. Dering being sent for to the house of commons, and under examination of a committee of both houses of parliament for the said offence, is since fled, in great contempt of both the said houses.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other accusation or Impeachment against the said sir E. Dering; and of replying to the Answer which he shall make to the said Articles, or any of them; and of offering proof of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or accusation which shall be exhibited against him, as the case, according to the course of parliament shall require; do pray that the said sir E. Dering may be put to answer to all and every the premises in the presence of the commons; and that such further proceedings, examinations, judgments and executions may be, upon every of them, had and used against him as is agreeable to law and justice." This being read, his lordship reported, "That the gentleman of the house of commons, that managed the conference, made some observations and said, That your lordships see by this that hath been read unto you, that 'Nondum recensit illi factum statet,' that notwithstanding the many strange and variable attempts against the parliament, and their wonderful and miraculous preservations, yet mischief is so fruitful and generative as to produce a new brood of serpents; which are continually hissing, maligning, and practising against the pious and noble endeavours of both houses, and against the peace, prosperity and happiness of this afflicted kingdom. If the evil and seducing spirit, which doth animate these designs, were asked from whence he comes, doubtless his answer would be, 'From compassing the earth;' having removed his scene into many several parts, and found so many friends and patrons of his audacious achievements, amongst whom this gentleman, sir E. Dering, is one; a man of mark and eminency; of wit, learning, and zeal, at least in shew and appearance; and yet all these miserably shipwrecked upon the shelves and sands of the Kentish shore. The thing itself appears to your lordships to be a manifest breach of the rules of law, justice, and religion; and yet under the cloak of all three, a fast must be proclaimed to take away Naboth and his vineyard. The yeomanry of Kent, heretofore in great esteem, is now become vile and contemptible; an extraordinary grand jury must be prepared of knights, gentlemen, and justices of the peace for some extraordinary service, which your lordships have heard what it is; they must descend from their places on the bench, and from themselves too, not to serve their country, (for that were no disparagement) but to serve their own unworthy, ambitious, and seditious ends.—This gentleman, a ringleader, late a member of the house of commons, the great grand jury of the whole kingdom; and there so highly esteeming of his own wisdom, is contented now to descend so low as to become one of the common jury of the county; such is the meanness and pusillanimity of high thoughts, as, for compassing of their own ends, to stoop to any condition how low soever it may be.—Having thus set the card, he plays the game very foully; he leads his fellows out of the way; and makes them, like jill hunters, instead of following the chace, at the quest of one ill mouth, to fall upon a flock of sheep. Their duty was to have enquired, diligently, of the matters given them in charge. Surely this was out of the charge, because the judge had told them it was out of his commission; and yet they leave other matters, which they were charged with, as accidents and trifles; and insist upon this, which they had nothing to do with, as the principal business.—He obtrudes on them divers monstrous and seditious heads; and, by sinister suggestions, labours and solicitations, which ought not to be used to a jury; and, by a kind of violence offered them, seeks to enforce them to a consent, contrary to their own reason, judgment, and consciences, when they refused, opposed, and protested against it. Failing of this, 'Flectere si nequeam Superos, Acheronta movebo.' Instead of enquiring upon the statute of witchcraft and conjuration, he useth his con-

jurations and enchantments upon them, to conjure them to secrecy; falsely persuading them that they will be bound unto it by their oath: when all this would not serve, he then applies himself to the bench; and, by the enchantments and conjurations used there, pretends as far as to have it there voted and assented to by such as were present; and, to give the more strength and countenance to it, would not the aid and concurrence of some appearing reverend divines, and of civilians also; as sticks not to affirm, that he can have 40 persons to attend the Petition; proclaims a meeting at Blackheath, a place fatal and ominous for actions of this nature; and all under colour of a Petition; being, in truth, a challenge, an abjuration, and a scandal upon the parliament; and purporting nothing but a desperate design to put not only Kent, but, for ought is known, all Christendom in combustion, carrying the sails full swollen with spite, arrogance, and sedition. The particular instances he forebore to trouble your lordships with, because you will find some of them upon perusal of the Petition. He said many arguments he might use in aggravation of the crime from the eminency of the power of the peer and the arrogance of his mind; the acrimony of his spirit, and from the topping place of Kent, which former ages hath found obnoxious to these infelicities; which this gentleman, so well read in story, should have been mindful of these troublesome times: but all these, and other circumstances, he left to your lordships noble and judicious consideration; desiring amongst other motives, that your lordships be pleased to reflect upon the acts of your justice in a case of like nature; which, first begun here, near at hand, might spread the flame and contagion over all the land; had not the great wisdom and justice of both houses, in due time, prevented it.—He said, He should add no more at this time, what he had read of a people in Africa, who sent a challenge to the wind; whereupon, at the meeting, the wind blew down mountains upon them, and overwhelmed them: he said, those bold and insolent adventurers, who had presumed to send a challenge, or defiance to the great houses, shall find the like stroke their wonted power and justice; and that they shall meet with such a wind as will blow down their high thoughts upon themselves, and their votes into their bosoms, and their chievious designs upon their own heads; which he was warranted, in the name of the house of commons, and of all the commons of England, to desire of their lordships; and that they will be pleased to make this gentleman the principal author of this foul act, a pattern and pattern of exemplary justice to present and future times."

Ordered, 'That sir Edw. Dering, bart. shall appear before the lords in parliament on the 2nd day of May, and put

• Mr. Benyon's Petition beforement

Answer unto an Impeachment of the house commons brought up against him, or else a house will proceed against him by default.

Further Votes and Orders relating to Hull. The house of commons having considered of the last Message and the Votes about Hull, it to desire another conference on this affair; which they acquainted the lords, That they agreed with them in these votes, and decided that they might be printed and dispersed over England: that two ships of war should be sent to the river Humber to clear the passage to Hull, under the command of the earl of Warwick: that a committee of both houses be sent into the North to take care of the parts and Hull; particularly, to thank John Hotham, the commanders and soldiers for him, with such inhabitants of the said town who they shall learn were forward in the vice, for their faithfulness in preserving that place; and to assure them that particular care will be taken to reward them according to their deserts.

There was read, also, an Information from persons, who said, That the king's coming Hull was on purpose to hang sir J. Hotham; and upon his refusal to let his majesty into it, he had proclaimed him a traitor: That Tho. Metham was raising forces for the king in Yorkshire, most of them Papists; and that there was a great resort of them at York: That posts and persons who brought letters to Hull from the parliament to Hull were stopped; forbidden to carry any on pain of death; and all intercourse prevented, both by land and water: In consideration of which, the commons think fit to desire their lordships concurrence in sending an Order to the sheriffs, lieutenants, justices of the peace, &c. in adjacent counties, to suppress all forces it shall be raised there, either to force the town of Hull, or to stop the passages to and from the same, to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom. Lastly, The commons desired the lords concurrence in a Declaration concerning these matters, and that the same might be printed and published.

The lords not only agreed with the commons, all these particulars; but went further: for they ordered all the persons who had signed the last Petition to the king, with others thereunto, to be sent for as delinquents, for being false against the parliament. The Declaration above-mentioned, was as follows:

"It is declared by the lords and commons in parliament, That the stopping of the passages between Hull and the parliament, and intercepting of messengers employed from the parliament to Hull, or from any that are the service of the parliament, or any letters whatsoever sent by any to or from the parliament, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament; which, by the laws of this kingdom and the protestation, we are bound to defend our lives and our fortunes, and to bring the authors thereof to condign punishment; and hereby all lords lieutenants and their deputies authorised by the Ordinance of both houses of parliament, all sheriffs, justices, mayors, bailiffs, constables, and other officers whatsoever, are required to give their utmost aid and assistance to all that are employed in the said service, for their better and more speedy, free, and safe passage: and to apprehend all such as, by colour of any warrant or other authority whatsoever, shall endeavour or go about to hinder any that are employed about the same, and them to apprehend, and in safe custody to send up to the parliament."

April 28. This day a message was brought up by Mr. OLIVER CROMWELL, to desire a conference. The purport of which was, the commons acquainted the lords, "That they had received information of a great meeting to be next day on Blackheath, in order to back the rejected Petition of Kent; and that reports were given out that they intended to shed blood: they, therefore, recommended to their lordships that proper care might be taken to prevent any mischief that might ensue." This was ordered accordingly by the lords.

An Order was made that sir J. Hotham have power to take up such ships, at Hull, as are fit for bringing away the Magazine there, to be convoyed by the two ships of war, already sent for that purpose.

The lords agreed with the commons to give Instructions and power to their commissioners, who were to be sent into the North; and, also, to another Declaration of both houses on the business of Hull, with an order of assistance to be given to the commissioners; which, with the late votes, were again ordered to be printed and published. The Declaration, &c. were in hæc verba.

"The lords and commons in parliament, finding just cause to fear not only the desperate designs of Papists, and others of the malignant party, at home; but also the malice of enemies, incited by them, from abroad; thought it necessary, for the safety of this kingdom, to secure the town of Kingston upon Hull, being one of the most considerable places for strength, and affording the best conveniency for landing of forces; and where a great part of the magazine of the kingdom for that time was placed; and for that end appointed sir J. Hotham, one of the members of the house of commons, being a gentleman of the same county, of a considerable fortune and approved integrity, to take upon him the government of the town, and to draw thither some of the Trained Bands for the guard thereof: in which apprehension and resolution they were the more confirmed by the sight of some intercepted letters of the lord Digby, (a principal person of that party) written to the queen and sir Lewis Dives; whereby that party discovered an endeavour to persuade his maj. to declare himself, and retire into some place of safety in this kingdom, in opposition to ways of accommodation with his people; and, to give the better opportunity to himself and other dangerous persons to resort thither; which could have no other end but to incline his maj. to take arms against his parliament and good subjects, and miserably to imbroil this kingdom in civil wars. About which time capt. Legge (a man formerly employed in the practice of bringing up the army against the parliament) had direction, by warrant produced by him under the king's hand and sign manual, to enter Kington upon Hull, and to draw thither such of the Trained Bands as he should think fit: and that the earl of Newcastle came thither in a suspicious way, and under a feigned name, and did endeavour to possess himself of the said town, by virtue of the like warrant and authority.—They further conceiving, that the Magazine there being of so great importance to this kingdom, would be more secure in the Tower of London, did humbly petition his maj. to give his consent the same might be removed; which, notwithstanding, his maj. did refuse; and thereupon some few ill-affected persons about the city of York, took upon them the presumption, in opposition to the desires, and in contempt of both houses, to petition his maj. to continue that Magazine at Hull; alledging it to be for the safety of his majesty, as if there could be a greater care in them of his majesty's royal person than in his parliament: and his majesty, the next day after the delivery of that Petition, being the 23rd of this instant April, took occasion thereupon to go to the town of Hull, attended with about 400 horse, (the duke of York and the prince elector being sent thither the day before) and required sir J. Hotham to deliver up the town into his hands; who perceiving his maj. to be accompanied with such force as might have mastered the garrison of the town; and having received intelligence of an intention to deprive him of his life, in case the king should be admitted, informed his maj. of the trust reposed in him by both houses of parliament, and that he could not, without breach of that trust, let him in; beseeching his maj. to give him leave to send to the parliament, to acquaint them with his majesty's commands, and to receive their directions thereupon, which he would do with all expedition. This Answer his maj. was not pleased to accept of; but presently caused him and his officers to be proclaimed traitors before the walls of the town; and thereupon dispatched a Message to both houses, therein charging sir J. Hotham with high treason, and aggravating his offence, because he pretended the parliament's command; in the mean while hindering him of all means of intelligence with the parliament, for his majesty immediately caused all passages to be stopped between him and them; and, in pursuance of the same, one of his servants, who was sent by him with letters to the parliament, to inform them of the truth of those proceedings, was apprehended, his letters taken from him, and his person detained; whereby, contrary to the common liberty of every subject, he was not only deprived of means to clear himself of that heavy accusation, but of all ways of intercourse, either to receive directions from them that trusted him, or to inform them what had happened. The lords and commons finding the said proceedings to be a high violation of the Privilege of parliament, of which his majesty had, several Messages, expressed himself to be tender; a great infringement of the Liberty the Subject and the law of the land, which his maj. had so often lately professed should be the rule to govern by; and tending to the endangering of his majesty's person and the kingdom's peace; thought fit, as well for the vindication of their own rights and privileges, as the indemnity of that worthy person employed by them, as for the clearing of their own proceedings, to publish these ensuing votes [Here the votes, mentioned at p. 1188, are repeated.]

Next follow the Instructions given to the Commissioners, which were not published before the former; viz.

“It is this day ordered by the lords and commons in parliament, That the earl of Stamford, the lord Willoughby of Parham, sir Edw. Dacres, sir Christ. Wray, sir S. Owfeld, Mr. Hatcher, shall forthwith repair intocolnshire; and from thence to Kingston upon Hull, and, if there be occasion, to any parts of Yorkshire; and pursue the directions following: 1. That if any forces are, or shall be, raised or gathered together in the county of York or Lincoln, either to force the town of Hull, or to stop any of the passages to or from the same, or any other way to disturb the peace of the kingdom, then they, or any of them, in the name and by the authority of both houses of parliament, shall require the lord lieutenant, or, in his absence, the deputy lieutenants of either of the said counties, respectively, to suppress and remove all such forces, and to free and keep open all the passages to and from Hull; and, in performance hereof, shall require the sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all other his majesty's officers and subjects, in the name of both houses of parliament, to assist therein as oft as they shall see cause. That they shall thank sir J. Hotham, the commanders, and particular soldiers under his command, and such of the inhabitants of the town who have observed the command of the parliament, and kept it in pursuance of the same; and give them all encouragement to continue in their care and fidelity in this service, conducting much to the safety and peace of the kingdom. 3. They shall, from time to time, certify the houses of all occurrences; and shall, as soon as any of them, return, as they shall see occasion.”

April 29. A message was brought from the commons, to let the lords know, “That they looked upon the late attempt upon Hull, as proceeding from the effect of some former offers of the lord Digby's Letters to the Commons, that he being impeached by them of High Treason, and a proclamation sent out to summon him to appear on a certain day, had a of conviction; and it being now six weeks past, and the said lord Digby not coming in; commons desire the lords would please to give a day for them to come up, and demand justice against him." Answer. That they will appoint a day, shortly, and give the commons notice of it.

Sir J. Hotham's Letter concerning the King's coming to Hull.] Another Message came up to the lords, by Mr. Hampden, and others, presented to their consideration a Letter, read to the Speaker; and, though there was no name subscribed, yet many of the members knew it to be of sir John Hotham's writing, and contained a true Narrative of the whole business concerning Hull. Which the lords commanded to be read as follows:—

Sir; I make no question but you have been, in general, of the business we have had at Hull; you had received the particulars before this, but that all ways have been stopped, by intercepting my letters: Two posts I sent expresses, both which were intercepted; and one of them, as I am informed, was taken prisoner to York. The parliament, as we all know, hath intrusted me with the safekeeping of this place: their orders I have performed to the best of my understanding, and with some endeavours, though with some hazard being misconceived by his majesty. If I in any thing, misbehaved myself, or not deserved my trust, I shall most willingly submit to their censures: only this I must make my humble request, if so it may seem to the wisdom of the parliament, that I have from them a quick resolution, in the manner as they shall find to be just. I have, by some letters sent by his majesty's town, that he hath advertised the parliament of this action of mine, and hath decreed a punishment against me: I shall in the parliament to take into consideration how deep an accusation I lie; and how I shall be to do them service here, if I receive not a speedy resolution.—The manner I shall faithfully (God willing) relate. It was: Upon Friday the 23rd of this instant, an alderman of Hull came to me, and said, He was newly come from York, and he was to give me notice that the duke of the prince Elector, and my lord Newcastle that night come to Hull, and stay the night, and go back next day to York. I had well wished they had taken some time, but being very desirous to give all content I could, (my trust always preserving way to their reception; and had led, for next day, a dinner, to have given the best welcome I could: But, late that night, I had some cause of suspicion that they meant not to depart the next day; wherefore I went to my lord Newport, who assured me it was not so, which a while comforted me; till about 9 of the clock, the prince, and the rest, being walking in the street called the South-End, sir Lewis Dives came in thither, and delivered me a Letter from his majesty; purporting, that he intended to visit his town of Hull and his Magazine there, and that I should provide for the reception of him and his train; that he doubted not of my obedience, else he must make his way into his town according to the laws of the land. This I confess put me to a great strait: on the one side being most extremely sorry to give his majesty the least cause of offence; on the other side the breach of a trust being, in my sense, so horrid a fact, as after that I should not have wished to live; I then began to put together circumstances, thus: Why such a journey, at such a time as this, should have been undertaken by so great personages; why should they deny their stay, when I had some cause to suspect it was resolved when they came; the numbers coming with them already received into the town; and, lastly, the extreme urging of the messenger, sir Lewis Dives. I had received of those that came along with them, whether of their servants or no I know not, 45 persons. I well knew of a party practising, by papists in Holderness, with some of the town. His majesty had in his train, to the best of all our judgments, 300 horse. I was advertised, (but the certainty I knew not) that 400 horse lay further off. All these put me to a sudden resolution to draw up the bridges, upon certain news of his majesty's approaching; having first sent out a gentleman to his majesty, humbly to intreat his majesty to forbear his coming to the town at that time, in regard I might not, without a breach of that trust committed to me, admit him and his train. This message met him 3 miles off; notwithstanding his majesty came on to the town gates, and sent for me thither: As I went, I met the mayor and some townsmen assembled to go to his majesty to the gates, whom I commanded to keep their houses; which accordingly they did, and myself went to the town wall next the port; Being there, his majesty demanded entrance: I, in the most humble manner I was able to express myself, begged of his majesty to take my case into his most princely consideration: that I had that place delivered me under that sacred name of trust: that I could not satisfy him, at that time, without incurring to me and my posterity the odious name of a villain and faith-breaker: that he would, for that time, withdraw; and, if my being in this town gave him the least cause of offence, if he would give me leave to advertise the parliament, I should get myself discharged never to come here: but nothing I could say could give any satisfaction to his majesty, who, as well as to myself, endeavoured to persuade all my captains and soldiers; but they were all of one mind with me, faithfully to perform our trust. Some of his majesty's train, with great earnestness, cried out to kill me and throw me over the wall; and they were not a few which did it.—This, and some other advertisements I had given of some attempts to be made upon my person, which, though in itself not at all considerable, yet at this time since that my perishing, by any sudden attempt, would have apparently hazarded the loss of this place, made me enter upon a resolute determination to intreat his majesty at that time to withdraw; and not to admit of his entrance (till I had advertised the parliament thereof) with any considerable company; and also being I saw that, with his presence, the townsmen begin to stagger; the mayor, contrary to my command, being come to the wall, and receiving from his majesty many gracious words. The conclusion was, his majesty, after persuasions would not prevail, caused me, and all that adhered to me, to be proclaimed traitors. Then he retired to a little house, without the walls; and, after one hour's stay, returned and demanded again my resolution. I made the same answer as before; and I think then (but I do not well remember it) he demanded entrance for himself and 20 horse; but in my judgment (as I well saw how the state of affairs stood) being fully satisfied, that if his person were in but with half that number, I was in no ways master of the town; I intreated his pardon in that. Soon after he went away and lodged at Beverley; from whence he sent, next day, two heralds to demand entrance to see his Magazine; but I still intreated his pardon; breach of trust still sounding horrid in my ears. Upon Tuesday after, came one Savage, a knight,* and Mr. Carey; I know neither of their Christian names. They said, they were sent by the king to deliver a letter to the mayor, and demanded entrance. I told them I would be responsible it should be delivered; which I did: It contained a great length, the chief, as I remember, confirming us all traitors; aggravations of my offence; and that he had advertised his parliament of it to have me punished according to my demerits; with command to the townsmen and soldiers not to obey me, nor to suffer the magazines to be removed. The sheriff, as I hear, hath refused to levy the Posse Comitatus; being it seems he conceives against law. All the gentry and justices are, as I hear, sent for to York. His majesty, at his being at the walls, told me, if I would not let him in, he would raise the Trained-Bands. Sir, as I was writing this, I received a letter by Mr. Askew, for which I must return my most humble thanks; and (God willing) the parliament may rest most assured, that there shall not want my utmost endeavours faithfully to serve them in my life and fortune. I shall desire you will represent to them the absolute necessity of present monies in some good proportion; the necessity of affairs having constrained me to call such other of the county in, as I was hopeful of would be assured to me, though not many, yet so as if they please to take some course for the sea ward, I hope to give a good account of this place. I am sorry to write who were the men; for there were many of those who were at the parliament door, when the king came to the house.

Proceedings of the Commons on the Kentish Petition.] April 30. The commons proceeded further in the affair of the Kentish Petition. Sir Edward Dering's Book of Speeches being lately reprinted, they referred the consideration of that matter to a committee; ordered the impression to be seized; and also to inquire who printed the said Petition, of which several bundles of copies had been found upon some of the petitioners. But notwithstanding these vigorous Resolutions of the commons, the men of Kent had the courage to come up to London with their Petition: for we find in the Journals the following entry, "The house being informed, that divers gentlemen of the county of Kent were at the door, that desired to present a Petition to the house, they were called in, presented their petition, and then withdrew; and their petition was read, and appeared to be the same that was formerly burnt, by order of both houses, by the hands of the common hangman." Hereupon some of the petitioners were called in, and examined; capt. Lovell, who said he preferred the Petition by command of the gentlemen assembled at Blackheath, was committed to the Gatehouse; and Wm. Boteler, who was also concerned therein having been at York since the assizes at Marlstone, was committed to the Fleet: but, if other gentlemen that presented the said Petition being called in, Mr. Speaker, by command of the house, told them, "The house has considered of the Petition that you presented. And they know you cannot be ignorant of our opinion both houses have formerly expressed of the same Petition: yet, considering that you are young gentlemen, misled by the solicitation of some not affected to the peace of the kingdom; and that, howsoever they intend to proceed against the chief agents and prime actors in this business, yet they are willing that you should be dismissed, hoping that you may hereafter prove good members of the commonwealth."

The King's second Message, demanding Satisfaction against Sir J. Hotham.] Two Messages from the King were this day delivered to the lords by the lord keeper: the one about the Hull affair, and the other concerning the Militia bill; viz.

"We are so much concerned in the most shameful affront (an indignity all our good subjects must disdain in our behalf) we received from sir John Hotham at Hull, that we are impatient till we receive justice from you, and are compelled to call again for an answer; being confident (however you would be so careful, though without our consent, to put a garrison into that our town, to secure it and our Magazine against any attempt of the Papists) that you never intended to dispose and maintain it against your sovereign: therefore we require you forthwith, for the business will admit no delay, that to take some speedy course that our said town and Magazine be immediately delivered up unto us; and that such severe exemplary proceedings be against those persons, who have offered us this insupportable affront and injury, by the law is provided; and till this be done, we shall intend no business whatsoever, but the business of Ireland: for if we be brought into a condition so much worse in any of our subjects; that, whilst you all enjoy your privileges, and may not have your sessions disturbed, or your titles questioned, only may be spoiled, throw out of our hands, and our goods taken from us; it is time to examine how we have lost those privileges; and to try all possible ways, by the help of the law, the law of the land, and the affection of good subjects, to recover them, and vindicate ourself from those injuries. And if we miscarry herein, we shall be the first of this kingdom that hath done so; having no other end, but to defend the true Protestant Profession, the Law of the Land, and Liberty of the Subject; and God so deal with us, as we continue in these resolutions. Given at our Court at York, April 28th, 1642.”

The King's Reasons for refusing to pass the Militia Bill.] The second Message ran thus: We have, with great deliberation and patience, weighed and considered (it concerning much to weigh the consequences of every bill before we pass it) your bill lately sent to us for the settling of the Militia: and though it hath not been usual to give any reason for refusal to pass any bill; (it being absolutely in our power to pass or not pass any act sent us by you, if we conceive it prejudicial to ourselves, or inconvenient for our subjects, for whom we are trusted, and must one day give account) yet in this business of the Militia, which being misunderstood amongst our subjects, hath been used as an argument, that we were not vigilant enough for the public safety: and lest we should be thought constant in our resolutions, and this bill the same we sent unto you, we have thought fit to give you, and all the world, particular satisfaction why we cannot, ought not, nor, pass this bill; being the first public notice to our remembrance, we have refused this bill: and therefore we must complain, having expressed ourself so clearly and particularly to you in this point, you should press upon us, which you could not but see that we must refuse; except we departed from those resolutions, grounded upon so much as we had so earnestly before acquaintance with, and against which you have not one argument to satisfy our judgment.—We are pleased that you have declined the unreasonable course of your Ordinance, (to which we are confident our good subjects have never yielded consent) and chosen the only right way of imposing on our people, which we would have allowed but for the reason after mentioned.—We refused to consent to your Ordinance; as for other things, so for that the power was put into the persons nominated therein by direction of both houses of parliament, excluding us from any power in the disposition or execution of it together with you. We then advised you, for many reasons, that a bill should be prepared; and after, in our Answer of the 26th of March last to the Petition of both houses, we told you, if such a bill should be prepared with that due regard to us, and care of our people in the limitation of the power and other circumstances, we should recede from nothing we formerly expressed. What passed (enough to have discouraged us from being further solicitous in that argument) after our full and gracious Answers, we are content to forget.—When we resolved on our Journey into Ireland (so that by reason of our absence there might be no want of settling that power, besides complying with your fears) we sent, together with a Message of that our purpose, a Bill for the settling that power for a year; hoping in that time to return to you; and being sure that, in much less time, you might do the business for which you seemed at first to desire this; which was, That you might securely consider our Message of the 20th of Jan. last. By that bill we consented to those names you proposed in your Ordinance; and, in the limitation of the power, we provided that ourself should not be able to execute any thing but by your advice; and when we should be out of the kingdom, the sole execution to be in you; with many other things of so arbitrary and uncircumscribed a power, that we should not have consented to, but with reference to the absence of our own person out of the kingdom; and thought it the more sufferable, in respect the time was but for a year; whether this be the bill you have now sent us to pass, let all the world judge.—You have, by this bill now tendered to us, without taking notice of us, put the power of the whole kingdom, the life and liberties of the subjects of all degrees and qualities, into the hands of particular men for two years. Can you imagine we will trust such an absolute Power in the hands of particular persons, which we refused to commit to both houses of parliament? Nay, is not the power itself too absolute, too unlimited, to be committed into any private hands? Hath not sir John Hotham's high insolency shewed us what we may expect from an exorbitant legal power, when he, by a power not warranted by law, dares venture upon a treasonable disobedience?—But we would willingly know (and indeed such an account in ordinary civility we might have expected) why we are, by this act, absolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of the Militia? Sure your Fears and Jealousies are not of such a nature, as are capable of no other Remedy, than by leaving us no power in a point of the greatest importance in which God and the law hath trusted us solely; and which we were contented to share with you by our bill, by putting it, and a greater, into the hands of particular subjects. What would all Christian princes think of us, after we had passed such a bill? How would they value our sovereignty? And yet sure our reputation with foreign princes is some ground of your security: Nay, we are confident, by that time you have thoroughly considered the possible consequence of the bill upon yourselves, and the rest of our good subjects, you and they will give us thanks for not consenting to it; finding their condition, had it passed, not to have been so pleasing unto them. We hope this animadversion will be no breach of your privileges. In this throng of business, and distemper of affections, 'tis possible second thoughts may present somewhat to your considerations which escaped you before.—We passed this parliament, at your entreaty, a bill concerning the Captives of Algiers; and waved many objections of our own to the contrary, upon information that the business had been many months considered by you. Whether it prove suitable to your intentions, or whether you have not, by some private orders, suspended that act of parliament, upon view of the mistakes, you best know; as likewise what other great alterations you have made in other bills passed this session. We cannot pass over the putting their names out of this Bill whom, before, you recommended to us in your Ordinance: it seems not thinking fit to trust those who would obey no guide but the law of the land; (we imagine you would not wish we should, in our estimation of others, follow that your rule) and the leaving out, by special provision, the present lord mayor of London, as a person in your disfavour; whereas we must tell you, his demeanor has been such, that the city and the whole kingdom is beholden to him for his example. *—To conclude; we do not find ourself possessed of such an excess of power, that it is fit to transfer, or consent it should be in other persons, as is directed by this bill: and therefore we shall rely upon that royal right and jurisdiction, which God and the law hath given us, for the suppressing of rebellion, and resisting foreign invasion, which hath preserved this kingdom in the time of all our ancestors, and which we doubt not but we shall be able to execute: and not more for our own honour and right, than for the liberty and safety of our people, we cannot consent to pass this Bill."

The two foregoing Messages being read, the lords took them both into serious consideration, and resolved to have a conference with the commons about them. The lord keeper was appointed to open the conference, and the earl of Essex to tell the commons, That this house conceived these Messages proceeded from the destructive counsels and advice of evil and wicked men about the king; therefore to desire them that the parliament might speedily consider of naming those ill counsellors; and that some course may be taken to have them, whatsoever they are within the king's dominions, that so they may be brought to condign punishment.—This conference being held, and the commons returned to their own house, they soon after sent up a message to the lords, importing, That they did agree in the matter of the last conference, about the king's two Messages; and had appointed a committee of their members to join with another of the lords, to consider what was fitting to be done in the business; with a larger power to take in consideration also, any thing else which concerns the safety of the kingdom; and that they might meet immediately. Also the commons desired their lordships would put the Ordinance for settling the Militia, into present execution. The lords agreed to both these articles, and ordered accordingly: Notwithstanding which the execution thereof went on but slowly. Some of the lords, appointed lieutenants of the shire, in, not being fond of their new offices, as we find, by the Lords Journals, that the most of Hertford, who had been nominated lieutenant of the county of Somerset, sent a message to the lords, That he should be very glad to obey the house, and to serve the commonwealth in what he may; but desires, at this time, to be excused accepting of the livery, for this reason, That he was not conversant in the Militia, and therefore was ignorant of what passed in it; and that if the king gives his consent to it, he hoped his lordships will not impose it upon him: upon the earl of Bedford was appointed in his Place. The lord Strange desiring to be excused from accepting the lieutenancy of Cheshire, and the earl of Cumberland of Westmoreland, the lord Say and Sele nominated to the one, and lord Hastings to the other. The earl of Lincoln declared himself ready to obey the commands of parliament, but, in regard that no counties were assigned him, but that of Lincoln, he desired to be excused hereupon the lord Willoughby of Parham appointed lieutenant of that whole county. The lord Paget, also, who had accepted the lieutenancy of Buckinghamshire, (and appointed his deputies, as Mr. Whitlocks and us) threw up his commission. This last most zealously concurred with the parliament in all their late measures: the Reason of this sudden change of conduct will appear in his own Letter in the sequel.

The Parliament's Second Declaration concerning Hull.] Another conference was that day held between the two houses, in which the commons presented a second Declaration, which had passed their house, to which they desired the lords concurrence. It was to this effect:

"The lords and commons in this parliament, being informed that, upon the

* Sir Richard Gournay, who had remarkably distinguished himself against the tumults raised about the time of passing the earl of Strafford's bill. He was afterwards removed from his office of lord mayor, &c. by the parliament.

his instant April, his majesty repaired to the town of Hull, and demanded it to be delivered up to him; and being denied by sir J. Hotham, appointed by both houses to keep that town, for the safety and peace of the kingdom, his majesty said, 'That if sir J. Hotham would not let him into the town, he would raise the trained-Bands and force him to it.' And being further informed, That, shortly after, the sheriff of Yorkshire did receive a Message intimating a command from his maj. to raise the trained-Bands and power of the county; and let the justices of the peace, and gentlemen of it, have been summoned to attend his maj. at York, as they have cause to believe, for the same purpose; to the great terror of his majesty's subjects in those parts, and the disturbance of the public peace: the lords and commons do declare, That the said command to muster, and the summoning the justices of peace, &c. to the purpose aforesaid, is against the laws of the land, and the liberty of the subject; and very derogatory from the honour and power of the parliament, now sitting, being his majesty's great council, and most ready and willing to advise and assist him in all things that may tend to the honour and safety of his person, the weal and happiness of the church and state. And they further declare, That if any persons whatsoever, in the said county of York, elsewhere, shall advise or assist in the raising of any forces to the purpose above, they shall be deemed as disturbers of the common peace, and enemies to the king and state; and shall receive such severe punishments as, by the laws of this land, are to be inflicted on offenders of such high nature."—Agreed to by the lords.

Counter Petition to the King from others of the Yorkshire Gentry, &c. May 2. At a conference held this day, the commons presented to their lordships consideration, a Petition delivered to his majesty, by some of the knights, gentry, and freeholders of the county of York. This Petition was framed on a different system from the last; representing that the work of a few gentlemen only; who look upon them to anticipate the demonstrations of duty, which they were informed both houses were preparing to lay before the king, his resolutions thereupon, directly opposite the Petition from parliament, about removing the Magazine from Hull, and tending to violent divisions between the king and his great council. They desired his majesty to apply himself to all good ways of union; that those ties, which, by the laws of God and man, are owed, and which were expressed in their Protestation, might not become a divided opposition; since the defence of his majesty's person, honour and estate, the power and privileges of parliament, and the lawful rights and liberties of the subject, taken jointly, did serve to strengthen each other, which they did equally labour to preserve to the utmost of their powers, lives, and estates.—After this, we read some Propositions made by the king to those Yorkshire gentlemen, and their Answer to them. The substance of the first was, To know whether they would defend his majesty's royal person from violence, according to their duty, or not? And to have their advice concerning his not being admitted into his town of Hull; how his majesty may be vindicated in his honour for the affront; and how he may be put in possession of his own. To which they answered,

"May it please your most sacred majesty: We shall be ready to defend your majesty's person from violence, by all such ways as the laws and our duty binds us: and for the means to vindicate your majesty's honour, and put you into possession of your town, we conceive the best advice we can offer is, humbly to desire your maj. to hearken to the counsel of the parliament; who, we assure ourselves, will be careful of your majesty's person and honour, and to whom you have been pleased to direct a Message."

A Committee of both Houses appointed to go into Yorkshire. On consideration of this, the commons said, "That they desired the lords to join with them in returning thanks to the Yorkshire gentry, for their conduct in this affair, and especially to the then high sheriff, sir Rd. Hutton, sir H. Cholmley, and Mr. Pelham, two members of their house. Likewise the commons said it was fit and necessary to send down some of their members, as a committee, into Yorkshire, with instructions from both houses; and they leave it to their lordships judgment, whether they would send any members of their house to join with them. Lastly, They desired that the committee of both houses, last appointed, might meet and expedite the Answer to the king's two last Messages concerning Hull, &c." All this was agreed to by the lords; and the lord Howard of Escrick was appointed to go with a committee of the commons to York.

The E. of Ormond's success in Ireland. This day the relation of a great victory, obtained by the English against the rebels in Leinster, was read in the commons, and ordered to be forthwith printed. Mr. Pym was also desired to prepare a Letter, to be sent to the earl of Ormond, in acknowledgment of his great service done therein. The commons afterwards ordered 500 l. to be laid out in a jewel to be presented to his lordship; and Mr. Goodwin was sent to the lords, to desire them to join in a Petition to the king to make the said earl a knight of the garter.

The twelve Bishops bailed. May 5. On the humble Petition of the 12 Bishops, imprisoned now in the Tower above 18 weeks, they were released by the lords, upon bail. The abp. of York and his sureties were bound in 5000 l. and he ordered not to go to his diocese during the disturbances in that county.

The Parliament's Answer to the King's Refusal to pass the Militia Bill. The lords, having considered the commons Declaration concerning the Militia, made some small amendments to it; which being agreed to, it was this day read in the house of lords in hæc verba:

"The lords and commons holding it necessary, for the peace and safety of this kingdom, to settle the Militia thereof, did, for that purpose, prepare an Ordinance of parliament; and, with all humility, did present the same to his majesty for his royal assent; who, notwithstanding the faithful advice of his parliament, and the several reasons offered by them of the necessity thereof, for the securing of his majesty's person, and the peace and safety of his people, did refuse to give his consent; and thereupon they were necessitated, in discharge of the trust reposed in them as the representative body of the kingdom, to make an Ordinance, by authority of both houses, to settle the Militia, warranted thereunto by the fundamental laws of the land: His maj. taking notice thereof, did, by several Messages, invite them to settle the same by act of parliament; affirming in his Message, sent in Answer to the Petition of both houses, presented to his majesty at York the 26th of March, 'That he always thought necessary the same should be settled, and that he never denied the thing, only denied the way; and for the matter of it, took exceptions only to the preface, as a thing not standing with his honour to consent to; and that himself was excluded the execution, and for a time unlimited.' Whereupon the lords and commons (being desirous to give his maj. all satisfaction that might be, even to the least tittle of form and circumstance) when his maj. was pleased to offer them a bill ready drawn, did, for no other cause than to manifest their hearty affection to comply with his majesty's desires and obtain his consent, entertain the same; and in the mean time no way declining their Ordinance, and to express their earnest zeal to correspond with his majesty's desire (in all things that might consist with the peace and safety of the kingdom, and the trust reposed in them) did pass that bill; and therein omitted the preamble inserted before the Ordinance, limited the time to less than two years, and confined the authority of the lieutenants to these 3 particulars, namely, Rebellion, Insurrection, and foreign Invasion; and returned the same to his majesty for his royal assent. But all these expressions of affection and loyalty, all these desires and earnest endeavours to comply with his majesty, have, to their great grief and sorrow, produced no better effect than an absolute denial even of that which his majesty, by his former Messages, as we conceive, had promised; the advice of evil and wicked counsels receiving still more credit with him than that of his great council of parliament, in a matter of so high importance, that the safety of his kingdom, and the peace of his people, depends upon it. But now, what must be the exceptions to this Bill? Not any sure, that was to the Ordinance; for a care was taken to give satisfaction in all those particulars. Then the exception was, Because that the disposing and execution thereof was referred to both houses of parliament, and his maj. excluded: and now, That, by the bill, the power and execution is ascertained and reduced to particulars, and the law of the realm made the rule thereof, his maj. will not trust the persons: the power is too great, too unlimited to trust them with. But what is that power? Is it any other, but in express terms to suppress Rebellion, Insurrection, and foreign Invasion? and who are those persons? are they not such as were nominated by the great council of the kingdom, and assented to by his majesty? and is it too great a power to trust those persons with the suppression of Rebellion, Insurrection, and foreign Invasion? surely the most wicked of them that advised his majesty to this Answer cannot suggest but that it is necessary, for the safety of his majesty's royal person and the peace of the kingdom, such a power should be put in some hands; and there is no pretence of exception to the persons.—His majesty, for the space of about 15 years together, thought not a power far exceeding this to be too great to intrust particular persons with, to whose will the lives and liberty of his people, by martial law, were made subject; for such was the power given lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants every county of this kingdom, and that without consent of his people or authority of law: but now, in case of extreme necessity upon the advice of both houses of parliament for no longer space than two years, a less power, and that for the safety of king and people, is thought too great to trust particular persons with, though named by both houses of parliament, and approved of by his maj. himself.—And surely, if there be a necessity to settle the Militia, (which his maj. was pleased to confess) the persons cannot be intrusted with power than this to have it at all effectual. In the precedents of former ages, when there happened a necessity to raise such a power, we find that power to a narrower compass; we witness the Commissions of Array in some king's reigns, and often issued out by the consent and authority of parliament.—The lords and commons therefore, intrusted with the safety of the kingdom and peace of the people (which they call God to witness is their aim) finding themselves denied these their necessary and just demands, and that they never be discharged before God or man, if they should suffer the safety of the kingdom, the peace of the people to be exposed to the rage of the malignant party at home, or the rage of enemies from abroad: and knowing no way to encounter the imminent and approaching danger, but by putting the people in a fit posture of defence, do resolve to put the said Ordinance in present execution; and require all persons in authority, by virtue of the said Ordinance, forthwith to put it in execution, and all others to obey it, according to the fundamental laws of the kingdom in such cases; as they tender the upholding be true Protestant religion, the safety of his majesty's person and his royal posterity, the peace of the kingdom, and the being of this common-wealth."

This Declaration was ordered to be forthwith printed and published, and warrants were sued for exercising the Militia, throughout the kingdom.*

The Parliament's Answer to the King's Messages concerning Sir John Hotham.] Next the answer to the King's two Messages about sir J. Hotham and Hull was read, and the Commissioners Instructions, which were both as follows:

be most Humble ANSWER of the LORDS and COMMONS in Parliament to two Messages from your sacred Majesty, concerning Sir J. Hotham's Refusal to give your Majesty Entrance into the Town of Hull.

"Your majesty may be pleased to understand, that we, your great council, finding manifold evidences of the wicked counsels and artifices of some in near trust and authority about you, to put the kingdom into a commotion, by drawing your majesty into places strength, remote from your parliament; and exercising your people to commotions, under pretence of serving your maj. against your parliament: lest this malignant party, by the advantage of the town and magazine of Hull, could be enabled to go through with their seditious intentions, did (in discharge of the trust that lies upon us, and by that power which, in cases of this nature, resides in) command the town of Hull to be secured a garrison of the adjoining Trained Bands, under the government of sir J. Hotham; requiring him to keep the same for the service of your maj. and the kingdom; wherein we have nothing contrary to your royal sovereignty that town, or legal property in the magazine. On consideration of sir J. Hotham's proceedings at your majesty's being there, we are, upon very good grounds, adjudged, That could not discharge the trust upon which, we make good the end for which, he was placed in the guard of that town and magazine, we had let in your majesty, with such counsellors and company as were then about you.—Therefore, upon full resolution of both houses, we have declared sir J. Hotham to be clear of all odious crime of treason; and have avowed. That he hath therein done nothing, but in obedience to the commands of both houses of parliament; assuring ourselves, that, upon mature deliberation, your maj. will not interpret obedience to such authority to be an affront to your majesty; or to be of that nature as to require any justice to be done upon him, or satisfaction to be made to your majesty; but that you will see just cause of joining with your parliament, in preserving and securing the peace of the kingdom; suppressing this wicked and malignant party, who, by false colours and pretensions of maintaining your majesty's prerogative against the parliament, wherein they fully agree with the rebels in Ireland, have been the causes of all our distempers and dangers.—For prevention whereof we know no better remedy, than settling the Militia of the kingdom according to the Bill which we have sent your majesty; without any intention of deserting or declining the validity or observance of that Ordinance, which past both houses upon your majesty's former refusal; but we still hold that Ordinance to be effectual by the laws of this kingdom.—And we shall be exceeding glad, if your majesty, by approving these our just, dutiful and necessary proceedings, shall be pleased to entertain such counsel, as we assure ourselves, by God's blessing, will prove very advantageous for the honour and greatness of your majesty, and the safety and peace of your people; amongst which we know none more likely to produce such good effects, than a Declaration from your maj. of your purpose to lay aside all thoughts of going into Ireland; and to make a speedy return into these parts, to be near your parliament: which, as it is our most humble desire and earnest petition, so shall it be seconded with our most dutiful care for the safety of your royal person; and constant prayers that it may prove honourable and successful, in the happiness of your majesty and all your kingdoms."

* Lord Clarendon observes hereupon, That being the first Order for printing, without previous communication or presentment to the king, his majesty was much troubled how to take proper notice of it.

The Parliament's Instructions to the Yorkshire Committee.] Then follow the Instructions, viz.

INSTRUCTIONS for Edw. lord Howard, Ferdinando lord Fairfax, sir Hugh Cholmley, sir Philip Stapylton, sir Henry Cholmley, Committees of both Houses of Parliament, or any three of them.

1. "You shall, in the name of both houses, declare and publish unto the sheriff of the county of York, the knights, gentlemen, and others, his majesty's subjects in that county, That sir J. Hotham was, by us, commanded to secure the town of Kingston upon Hull, and the Magazine there for his majesty's service and the peace of the kingdom, which, otherwise, would have been much endangered; and that, upon the same reason, what hath since been done there by him hath been necessary in pursuance of those directions; and is by us avowed and approved of, as warranted by the authority of both houses of parl. 2. You shall further take care, that such Resolutions and Orders of both houses, as have or shall be sent down, be put in execution; and shall require the sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all other his majesty's officers and loving subjects, to be aiding and assisting unto you for that purpose. 3. You shall take care, that no forces be raised for the forcing the town of Hull, or otherwise to disturb the peace of the kingdom; and, in case any be raised, you shall require the sheriff, in the name of both houses, to command them to disperse themselves; and, if they refuse so to do, that then the sheriff, by the same authority shall forthwith raise the power of the county for the suppressing of them; and you shall likewise by the same authority require the Lord Lieutenant, appointed by the Ordinance of Parliament, and, in his absence, the deputy Lieutenants, to draw together the Trained Bands, for the assistance of the said sheriff in so doing. 4. Whereas we are informed, That his majesty did, at York, propound unto the knights and gentlemen of that county, there assembled by his command, that they would join with him for the defence and assistance of his own person: you shall declare unto them, and all others, That it hath ever been, and still shall be, the chief care and endeavour of the parliament to provide for his majesty's safety; and that they do not know of any evil intended unto his royal person, which should move him to take such a course: that his greatest safety is in the affection, duty, and faithful advice of his parliament; and his greatest danger in his withdrawing himself from them, and proceeding in ways contrary to them: so as the disaffected and malignant party, under colour of his service, go about to raise a faction and a party against the parliament; which, at last, may break out into an open rebellion, to the destruction both of king and people, if it be not, through the blessing of God, prevented by the wisdom and authority of parliament. 5. That, in case there be a necessity for raising the forces of the county for the suppression of any insurrection and keeping the peace, you shall require sir John Hotham to deliver such proportion of arms and ammunition out of the magazine there, as shall be necessary for that service: and you shall publish and declare, That the parliament holds it lawful and necessary, to dispose of the public magazines of the kingdom for the defence of the kingdom; as likewise for the suppression of the rebellion in Ireland, which doth so much concern the safety of this kingdom: but that it is their intention, and resolution, to store them again; as holding it fit such a proportion shall still be in readiness, upon all occasions, for the service of the king and defence of the commonwealth. 6. Whereas we are informed, That divers persons, summoned to appear at the parliament, have received a command under his majesty's hand, not to come there, but to abide still near his majesty's person, for which service we conceive them to be of all others the most unfit; and that the sheriff hath also been commanded, by his majesty, not to execute any warrant or order upon them: you shall let the sheriff know, That the houses of parliament will expect that their orders and commands shall be obeyed, the same being his majesty's authority signified by his highest court; and that any restraint, or command, to the contrary, is against law and the privilege of parliament.

7. You shall endeavour to clear the proceedings of parliament from all imputations and aspersions, and shall, from time to time, certify us of all things you may conceive necessary for the present service: and, that we may have a speedy account of it, and that our direction to you, as well as your advertisements to us, may have a clear and ready passage, you shall lay a strict charge upon all post-masters, that they do not suffer any letters, or other dispatches directed to or from the parliament, to be intercepted or stayed: and, if any shall presume to make such stay of these dispatches, you shall direct the post-masters to repair to the justices of peace, constables, and all other officers, for their aid and assistance; who are hereby required to take special care there may be no such interruption. 8. You shall observe and execute all such farther directions and instructions, as you shall, from time to time, receive from both houses of parliament."

The Marq. of Hertford's Letter concerning the Prince of Wales. May 6. The earl of Essex presented a Letter to the lords, which he had received from the marquis of Hertford, governor to the prince of Wales, which was read to this effect:

"My noble lord; It being expected from me that I should give Answer to the house of peers, whether I would undertake that the prince should not be conveyed out of this kingdom, I humbly desire your lordship to make this Answer from me, That I will undertake that the prince shall go no further than his majesty goeth, for so it hath pleased him to assure me; and that he shall not stir from him. For any other undertaking I utterly disclaim it, as being a thing out of my power, and, consequently, a great rashness and presumption in me to undertake. Thus much I once more humbly pray your lordship to present, with my humble and earnest desire that the Order may be taken off, which may be prejudicial to me, especially since I have so far declared myself. God remove all jealousies from us, and put a true understanding between the king and his parliament; which shall ever be the earnest and hearty prayer of your lordship's most faithful brother, and humble servant, HERTFORD. York, May 5. 1642."

This Letter was referred to a committee of both houses, to consider what was to be done concerning the Prince's stay in England.

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Votes and Declarations concerning sir J. Hotham and Hull. May 7. This day the lord keeper presented to the lords a Letter he had received from the king, with a Message inclosed; which he said he was commanded to deliver to them, and which was read in these words:

"Since our gracious Message of the 24th of April last, to both houses of parliament (demanding justice for the high and unheard-of affront offered unto us at the gates of Hull by sir J. Hotham) is not thought worthy of

in Answer; but that, instead thereof, they have thought fit, by their printed Votes of the 18th of April last, to own and avow that: unparalelled act of Sir J. Hotham's to be done in obedience to the command of both houses of parliament, though at that time he could produce no such command; and with other Resolutions against our proceedings there; to publish a Declaration concerning that business, an appeal to the people; as if their interest with us, and for our satisfaction, were owing to no more purpose: though we knew this state of theirs to be very unagreeable to the safety and duty of former times; and unarrantable by any precedents but what themselves have made, yet we are not unwilling to issue with them in this way, and to let all the world know, how necessary, just, and lawful our proceedings have been in this point; so that the defence of these proceedings is in defence of the law of the land, of the liberty and property of the subject; and that by the same rule of justice, which is now offered us, all the private interest and title of all our subjects to all their lands and goods are unfounded and destroyed. Mr. Pym himself tells you, in his Speech against the earl of Stafford, (published by the Order of the house commons) 'The law is the safeguard, the study of all private interests; your honours, us lives, your liberties, and estates are all in keeping of the law; without this, every man hath a like right to any thing.' And we need vain be answered, What title any subject of our kingdom hath to his house or land, if we have not to our town of Hull? Or what right hath he to his money, plate, or jewels, if we have not to our magazine or munition? If we had ever such a title, we would lose when we lost it? And if that magazine or munition, bought with our own money, were ever ours; when and how that property got out of us? We very well know the great unlimited power of a parliament; but we are as well, that it is only in that sense, as we are a part of that parliament. Without and against our consent, the Votes of either both houses together must not, cannot, shall not (if we can help it, for our subject's sake as well as our own) forbid any thing that is enacted by the law, or enjoin any thing that is bidden by the law; but, in any such alterations which may be for the peace and happiness of the kingdom, we have not, shall not, have to consent: and we doubt not but that our good subjects will easily discern in this a miserable insecurity and confusion they are necessarily and inevitably be, if descents be altered, purchases avoided, assurances and conveyances cancelled, the sovereign legal society despised and resisted, by Votes of either of either, or both houses; this, we are in our case at Hull; and as it is ours to apply the same rule it may be theirs to maintain. Against any desperate designs of theists we have sufficiently expressed our real intentions, and shall be as forward to adventure our own life and fortune to oppose any such designs, as the nearest subject in our kingdom.—For the Malignant Party, as the law hath not to our knowledge defined their condition, so hath neither house presented them to us; under such a notion as we may well understand whom they intend; and we shall therefore only enquire after, and avoid, the malignant party under the character of persons disaffected to the peace and government of the kingdom; and such who, neglecting and despising the law of the land, have given themselves other rules to walk by, and so dispensed with their obedience to authority; of these persons, as destructive to the commonwealth, we shall take all possible caution.—Why any Letters intercepted from the Lord Digby (wherein he mentions a retreat to a place of safety) should hinder us from visiting our own fort; and how we have opposed any ways of accommodation with our parliament; and what ways and overtures have been offered in any way, or like any desire of such accommodation; or whether our Message of the 20th of June last, so oft in vain pressed by us, have not sufficiently expressed our earnest desire of it; let all the world judge: Neither is it in the power of any persons to incline us to take arms against our parliament and our good subjects, and miserably to imbroil this kingdom in civil wars. We have given sufficient evidence to the world how much our affections abhor, and our hearts bleed at, the apprehension of a civil war; and let God and the world judge; (if our care and industry be only to defend and protect the Liberty of the Subject, the Law of the Kingdom, our own just Rights (part of that law) and our honour, much more precious than our life: and if, in opposition to these; any Civil Wars shall arise) upon whose account the blood and destruction that must follow must be cast: God and our own conscience tells us that we are clear.—For Capt. Legge's being sent heretofore to Hull, (though, by the way, this is the first time we ever heard that he was accused for the practice of bringing up the army against the parliament; neither do we yet know that there is such a charge against him) or for the earl of Newcastle's being sent thither by our warrant and authority, we asked a question long ago, in our Answer to both houses concerning the Magazine at Hull, which we have cause to think is not easy to be answered: Why the general rumour of the designs of Papists in the Northern parts should not be thought sufficient ground for us to put in such a person of honour, fortune, and unblemished reputation, as the earl of Newcastle is known to be, into a town and fort of our own, where our own Magazine lay; and yet the same rumour be warrant enough to commit the same town and fort, without our consent, to the hands of Sir J. Hotham, with such a power, as is now too well known and understood? How our refusal to have that Magazine removed, upon the Petition of both houses, could give an advantage against us to have it taken from us, and whether it was a refusal, all men will easily understand who read our Answer to that Petition, to which it hath not been yet thought fit to make any reply.—For the condition of those persons who presented the Petition to us at York, (whom that Declaration calls, 'Some few ill-affected persons about the city of York') to continue the Magazine at Hull; we make no doubt but that Petition will appear to be attested, both in number and weight, by persons of honour and integrity, and much more conversant with the affections of the whole county, than most of those Petitions which have been received with so much consent and approbation: and for their presumption of interposing their advice, we the more wonder at that exception, when such encouragement hath been given, and thanks declared, to multitudes of mean and unknown People, Prentices and Porters, who have accompanied Petitions of very strange natures.—For the Manner of our going to Hull, we have clearly set forth the same in our Message to both houses on that business; and for any intelligence given to sir J. Hotham, of an intention to deprive him of his life, as we know there was no such intention in us, having given him all possible assurance of the same at our being there; so we are confident no such intelligence was given, or if it were, it was by some villain, who had nothing but malice, or design to fright him from his due obedience, to warrant him. And sir J. Hotham had all the reason to assure himself, that his life would be in much more danger by refusing to admit his king into his own town and fort, than by yielding him that obedience, which he owed, by his oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the protestation, and he well knew was due and warrantable by the laws of the land.—For the Number of our Attendants, (though that could be no warrant for such a disobedience in a subject) it is well known, as we expressed in our Message to both houses, to which credit ought to have been given, that we offered to go into the town with 20 horse only, our whole train being unarmed: and whosoever thinks that too great an attendance for ourself and our two sons, have sure an intention to bring us to a meaner retinue than they yet will avow.—Here then is our case, of which let all the world judge: we endeavoured to visit a town and fort of our own, wherein our own Magazine lay; a subject, in defiance of us, shuts the gates against us; with armed men resists, denies, and opposes our entrance; tells us, in plain terms, we shall not come in. We do not pretend to understand much law, yet, in the point of Treason, we have had much learning taught us this parliament; and if the sense of the statute, 25 Edw. 3. c. 2. be not very different from the letter, sir J. Hotham's act was no less than plain high treason: and we had been contemptibly stupid, if we had, after all those circumstances of grace and favour then shewed him, made any scruple to proclaim him traitor; and whether he be so or no, if he shall render himself, we will require no other trial, than that which the law hath appointed to every subject; and which we are confident we have not, in the least degree, in those proceedings violated, no more than we have done the privileges of parliament by endeavouring, in a just way, to challenge our own unquestionable privileges: for that in such a case, the declaring him traitor, being a member of the house of commons, without process of law, should be a breach of privilege of parliament (of which we are sure none extends to treason, felony, or breach of the peace) or against the liberty of the subject, or against the law of the land, we must have other reasons than his Votes.—We would know if sir J. Hotham had, with those forces by which he kept us out of our town of Hull, pursued us to the gates of York, which he might as legally have done, must we have staid from declaring him traitor, till process of law might have issued against him? Will fears and jealousies dispense with real and necessary forms; and must we, what actual war is levied upon us, observe forms which the law itself doth not enjoin? The case is truly stated; let all the world judge (unless the mere sitting of a parliament doth suspend all laws, and we are the only persons in England against whom treason cannot be committed) where the fault is: and whatsoever course we shall be driven to for the vindication of this our privilege, and for the recovery and maintenance of our known and undoubted rights, we do promise, in the presence of almighty God, and as we hope for his blessing to our success, that we will, to the utmost of our power, defend and maintain the true Protestant Profession, the Law of the Land, the Liberty of the Subject, and the just Privileges and Freedom of Parliament.—For the Order of Assistance given to the committees of both houses, concerning their going to Hull, we shall say no more, but that those persons named in that Order, we presume will give commands, or our good subjects obey, other than what are warranted by the law, but large and unlimited soever the Directions or the Instructions may be; for to that rule we shall apply our own actions, and by it require an account from other men. And that all our good subjects may the better know their duty in matters of this nature, we will them carefully to peruse the statute in the 11th year of Hen. 7. c. 1. We conclude with Mr. Pym's own words: 'If the prerogative of the king overwhelm the liberty of the people, will be turned to tyranny: if liberty undermine the prerogative, it will grow into anarchy: And so we say into confusion.'

The lords taking this Message into consideration, were of opinion, That it was the fruits of the evil Counsels and Advice given to the king; and therefore resolved to communicate the same to the commons, at a conference: and to move that the houses should speedily think of naming such persons as the evil counsellors about his majesty, that so the course may be advised how to remove them from him: accordingly their lordships sent to the commons, to desire a conference on a Message, received from the king, of a very high nature; at which a committee of both houses was appointed to prepare a speedy Answer.—In the report of this conference, made by Mr. Hollis to the commons, he observed, That the earl of Essex said in it, "That the lords observed these Messages from the king to go higher and higher; and believed the king to be of that goodness, that they came not from himself; but from such as are incendiaries, and had endeavour to raise a division between the king and parliament: That the lords had formerly moved them to name those evil counsellors, and did now press it again; and were ready to join with them in it, and did now lay at their doors, the commons being the representative body of the kingdom, and were most concerned in it."—Hereupon the commons made an Order, and appointed the Monday following for nominating the evil Counsellors and malignant Party about the king; but we do not find any thing further done in this bar.

Sir H. Ludlow reproved by the Speaker, for speaking on the King's.] The same day some exceptions having been taken at words spoke by Sir Henry Ludlow, he explained himself, and withdrew. And the house entered into debate thereof; after which he was called to his place: And Mr. Speaker told him, "That the words which he spoke, were words that had an aspect towards the king; and, when words fall on him, that may reflect upon his sacred person, he ought to weigh them, that they may be accompanied with that duty which is due from a loyal subject to so gracious a sovereign." It is not mentioned in the Journals what the words were: but, in the king's Declaration of August the 12th in this year, they are said to be these, "That the king was not worthy to be king of England."*

The Scots Privy Council's Opinion, as to the king's going to Ireland.] The king's Message to the parliament, concerning his going into Ireland, having been thought proper to be communicated to the privy council in Scotland, their Opinion thereupon was this day laid in the house of lords, and was as follows:

"The lords of the privy council of the kingdom of Scotland, in a full meeting, having, according to the importance of matters of so great weight and high concernment, maturely debated at length, considered the several Declarations, Messages, Answers, and Instructions sent to them from his majesty: as also what hath been represented unto them, in the Declaration of the parliament of England; do find themselves bound, in duty, to acknowledge that they esteem it no small happiness to receive true and full informations from the fountains; and not to be left to the muddy and wandering streams of private misreports, which are ready to mislead such as follow them, from the right understanding of the truth, into the dangerous bye paths of jealousies and error: the preventing whereof made this kingdom, in the time of their late troubles, so frequently to declare themselves and their intentions, both to the king's majesty and the kingdom of England.—They do also receive and embrace, with all humble respect and thankfulness, from his majesty, the large and lively expressions of his royal and religious resolution and care to maintain and preserve the true religion, liberties, and laws of his kingdoms, together with a right correspondence betwixt them; it being the true and only foundation of greatness and glory to himself and his posterity, and of peace and happiness to his people; for which this whole kingdom, being straitly bound by their common allegiance, natural obedience, and national oath never to be forgotten, will be ever most willing to spend their lives, fortunes, and what is dearest unto them.—They do in like manner, with reciprocal brotherly affection, acknowledge the large testimony of the care and zeal of the parliament of England, to keep a right understanding betwixt the two nations; which both parliaments have obliged themselves, by solemn vow and protestation, by all good ways and means to preserve; against which no sinister information, nor misreport, shall ever make this kingdom to fall into such misconstruction, as may be a violation of their own vow and protestation made in parliament: but, in the midst of this their joy and gladness, arising upon the professions and protestations both of king and parliament, they cannot but confess their unfeigned grief and great fears which they have received, upon the misunderstanding and so long distractions betwixt his majesty and his parliament: which, unless they be speedily removed, can bring forth no other fruits than the rejoicing and triumphs of the common enemies of our religion and peace; and such a world of evils to his maj. and his dominions, as they are loath to suffer themselves to think upon; but chuse rather to wrap them up in silence: wishing that they be made never more to appear, to the encouragement of ill affected persons, and the grief of the hearts of all good men.—And therefore, upon the one part, they wish and are confident, That the hon. houses of parliament, in their great wisdom and affection, will leave no fair and good means untried to induce his maj. to return unto them; that there may be a better understanding betwixt him and his people, and they honoured with his royal presence, and strengthened by his scepter and authority. And, although they know that they neither will, nor should meddle with the public actions of another kingdom, farther than as they are called and interested as fellow-subjects under one head and monarch: yet, since the hon. houses of parliament have thought meet to draw the practice of the parliament of Scotland into example, in the point of their Declaration; they are confident that the affection of the parliament will lead them, also, to the practice of this kingdom, in composing the unhappy differences betwixt his maj. and them; and, so far as may consist with their religion, liberty, and laws, in giving his maj. all satisfaction; especially in their tender care of his royal person, of his princely greatness and authority, and the prosperity of the kingdom.—Upon the other part, from the deep sense of his majesty's troubles, and from the love and loyalty of their hearts, their humble desire is, That his maj. may be pleased to hearken to the earnest desires and hearty invitations of his people, in returning to his parliament; which, as it is his great, so it is his best and most impartial, council; that, by the brightness of his majesty's presence and countenance, all the clouds of former jealousies and fears may be scattered; a mutual confidence may be revived; and his people satisfied, as the only means of happiness both to the king and kingdom; the reflection whereof, upon this kingdom, will also increase our happiness.—And, since his maj. hath been pleased to make known unto them his resolution to go for Ireland, in his royal person, they are bold, as his majesty's loving subjects and faithful counsellors, to give their humble opinion, That as they do, with their hearts, acknowledge his majesty's fatherly composing of the sufferings of his good subjects by the Rebellion there; his princely endeavours in quickening all means that may serve for their relief, and for the more speedy and powerful suppression of the rebels, and deliverance of his people, in offering to hazard his own royal person; than which there can be no greater demonstration of princely care and courage: so they, by their natural affection, and by their desire of the preservation of his majesty's person, (upon which dependeth the safety of this kingdom) are constrained, in all humility, to represent, That they conceive it to be a matter which requireth very mature deliberation, Whether his maj. shall hazard his own royal person in such a war, and thereby also put all his good subjects in great fears for him? Whether the great affairs and dangerous distractions of this kingdom of England (which never did more require his personal presence) may suffer his absence at this time? Whether his going, in person, against such base rebels be not descending too low from that highest dignity and royal eminency wherein God hath placed him, as his immediate viceroy? And whether it be not more for his majesty's honour and safety, and for the inward security of his people against their fears of danger to his majesty's person; and their outward quietness against danger to themselves, to command such forces of his willing subjects to go in that expedition, as, by God's help and assistance, may be more than sufficient to crush that rebellion, and to reduce the whole kingdom to his majesty's obedience? But, concerning this, they wish and hope that his maj. may be pleased to hear and consider the advice and council of his parliament of England, as being most nearly concerned in the matters of Ireland; although none be more saine their interest in his majesty's royal person.—In the end, they do humbly treat, That all means may be forborn which may make the breach wider and the wound deeper; and that no place be given to the evil spirit of division, which at such times worketh incessantly and resteth not: but that the fairest, the most Christian, and compendious way may be taken, by so wise a king and parliament, as may, against all malice and opposition, make his maj. and posterity more glorious and his kingdom more happy than ever: for this blessed and earnestly wished for conclusion, according to their manifold obligation and duty, they do offer their best endeavours; and for the present, have sent up the encl. Loudon, chancellor of the kingdom, who will give a more full declaration of their mind and desires.—ARCH. PRIMROSE, Clerk of the Council.”

The King forbids all Persons in Yorkshires to obey any Summons of Parliament.] May 4. The lords were informed that their Order, &c. were contemned in York; and this day two of their messengers, sent to bring up some persons as delinquents, appearing before them made oath that they received the following paper from secretary Nicholas:

“I have, according to your desires, acquainted his majesty with the three Orders you shewed me from the parliament, for summoning some of his majesty's servants, and others of this county, to attend the parliament to which he has commanded me to give this Answer: That he will not give way to any of his servants, or others of this county, shall go out of this shire, until he shall see justice done him by the parliament against J. Hotham, for the affront and indignity offered to his majesty at Hull.”

The first thing the lords did after reading this Paper, was to send an Order to the sheriff of the county of York, to bring, or cause to be brought, before them, the bodies of Tho. Darrel and sir John Hailes; and that the committee, residing in York, should see the Order put in execution. Next, the lords conceiving this business to be a great breach and contempt of the power of parliament; and regard the said persons were sent for at the desire of the commons; a committee of both houses was appointed to consider of the aforesaid paper, and what was proper to be done upon it.

Propositions of the Commons against Popish Recusants.] May 10. The lord keeper reports the effect of a conference, held yesterday, between the two houses, which consisted of several heads, presented by the commons; the first of which was matter of Religion, which, as the anchor of Christians, and the stay of Faith, they were very tender of. 1. The commons observed, “That the Papists had been very active since the Ordinance of parliament.”

disarming them; and they were informed that the Magazine at Monmouth was as much under the command of the earl of Worcester, as if it was in his own castle of Ragland; therefore they have ordered the magazine to be removed to Newport; to which they desired the lords concurrence, because of the great resort of Papists who live near Monmouth and Ragland, and of the activeness of the earl of Worcester, and his son. 2. They desired that the said earl, and all other recusants in those parts, might be forthwith disarmed, and their arms and ammunition sent to Newport; and another sent down, to the sheriff and justices of the county of Monmouth, for that purpose. The third head was on the great resort and influence of people that go to mass at ambassadors houses; which ought not to be suffered, because there was a petition, from both houses, presented to the king, touching this matter, 21 Dec. and again 1 Car. which were consented to; and those Answers amount to the form and value of a law. There was a positive law, also, against this, by act of parliament, which none are to go to mass, upon pain of 100*l*. That there was no such liberty to the king's subjects of our religion, neither Spain, Italy, Germany, nor France; and I should be as careful of our religion, as of their idolatries. Ambassadors are public ministers, and have great privileges, jurisdiction; but if they swerve from the due execution of them, and break the laws of the land, they are not to be suffered therein. At the commons lately gave a warrant to apprehend such of the king's subjects as went to mass at ambassadors houses; and one being apprehended as he went to the Portugal Ambassador's house, 60 yards from it, a tumult rose, and the party was rescued out of the hands of the officers, by the ambassador's men with others, swords being drawn; and the ambassador, out of his balcony, crying, 'Kill them, kill them.' This the commons hold to be an outrage of a very high nature; and do think fit that their house be vindicated for this affront; that they leave to their lordships speedy consideration. 4. Against one Chandler, an Englishman, and agent and consul for the English merchants at Lisbon, a Papist, for tampering and perverting his majesty's subjects from Protestant religion; and his wife, being a Papist, corrupts many wives and children. Therefore desire he may be recalled. 5. That Priests and Jesuits, the king's native subjects, being protected under the title of pleins and menial servants. That the commons were informed the Spanish ambassador industrious in advancing religion this way; hath 30 or 40 priests, who go in lay habits, attend on him as menial servants, yet go mad and pervert and corrupt the king's subjects from their religion. Priests and Jesuits, said, were locusts and vermin; who have done so much mischief in Ireland, and may do like here, in England, if not prevented; for opinions are, 'Juramentum fidelitatis proprio suo principi, datum auctoritate principis sive presidis, Romani Pontificis auctoritate posse dissolvi."—The lords, taking these matters into consideration, agreed with the commons in all these Propositions, except in the Portugal Ambassador's affair, which is not mentioned.

May 11. This day the commons, also, sent up Impeachments against sir George Strode and Rd. Spencer, esqrs; concerned in the affair of the Kentish Petition.

Letter to the Parliament from their Committee at York.] May. 12. The house of lords and commons received letters from their Committee at York, both to the same purpose, which were read in these words:

"We came hither, to York, upon Sunday last, and then understood that his majesty had commanded the gentry of this county to wait upon him on Thursday next. Yesterday being Monday, we were admitted to the king's presence, where we delivered your Declaration; and this afternoon he sent for us, and gave us this Answer inclosed, giving us a strict command to carry it up ourselves to parliament. We told him, 'That we were commanded to stay here and attend upon him, and use our best endeavours in keeping the peace of the country. He replied, 'That if we would positively disobey him, and stay here, he would advise us not to make any party, or hinder his service in the country, for, if we did, he would clap us up.' We humbly answered, 'That our denying to go at this time was no personal disobedience in us to his majesty, but that we were engaged in our duty to the parliament, and in our honour; having undertaken to observe those Instructions we had received, and were tending only to his honour and the peace of the kingdom; but not to make nor nourish any party; nor could we be commanded from staying here to execute them, without a great breach of the privilege of parliament. Upon this our humble excuse, that we could not depart thence, his majesty enjoined us to attend his person on Thursday, to hear what he should say to the gentlemen that were summoned to appear. After divers other passages he commanded us to shew him our Instructions, and withdrawing into a private room from the great company that was there present, he heard them read, took one of our copies, and so dismissed us. Thus far we thought good to give you an account of our employment; which, how full soever it may be of difficulties, yet shall we not be discouraged to do any thing, that, according to the trust reposed in us, shall conduce to the quiet and peace of the kingdom, and the honour of the parliament. In which hope we rest your faithful friends and servants, FEE. FAIRFAX, HU. CHOLMLEY, PHIL. STAPYLTON, H. CHOLMLEY. York, May 10, 1642."

The King's Reply to the Parliament's Answer concerning sir J. Hotham, &c.] Then was read the king's Answer to the Parliament's Declaration concerning Hull, which came along with this letter. It was as follows:

"His majesty was in good hope that the reason why you, so long, deferred your Answer to his Messages concerning Hull, was, That you might the better give him satisfaction therein; which now adds the more to his astonishment, finding this Answer, after so long advisement, to be of that nature which cannot but rather increase than diminish the present distractions, if constantly adhered unto by the parliament. Was it not too much, that his majesty's town of Hull had a garrison put into it, to the great charge of the country and inconvenience to the poor inhabitants, without his majesty's consent and approbation, under colour, at that time, of foreign invasion, and apprehensions of the Popish party; but now the reasons thereof must be enlarged with a scandal to his majesty and his faithful servants, only to bring in the more specious pretence for the avowing of sir J. Hotham's treasonable insolency? His maj. hath often heard of the great trust, that, by God and man's laws, is committed to the king, for the defence and safety of his people, but, as yet, hath never understood what trust or power is committed to either or both houses of parliament, without the king, they being summoned to counsel and advise the king; but by what law, or authority, they possess themselves of his majesty's proper right and inheritance, he is confident, that as they have not, so they cannot shew.—His majesty hitherto, hath not given the least interruption to public justice; but you, rather than suffer one of your members to come so much as to a legal trial for the highest crime, will make use of an Order of parliament to countenance treason, by declaring him free from that guilt which all former ages never accounted other; and that without so much as enquiring the Opinion of the judges: for his maj. is confident that you would have mentioned their opinion, if you had asked the same.—Therefore his maj. expects, that, upon further and better consideration of the great and necessary consequence of the business of Hull, and seriously weighing how much this doth concern the peace and quiet of the kingdom, you will, without further instance from his majesty, give him full and speedy justice against sir J. Hotham; and he leaves all his good people to think what hope of justice there is left for them, when you shall refuse or delay to give your own sovereign satisfaction: and, as his maj. hath already said, Till this be done he will intend no business whatsoever, other than that of Ireland.' And his majesty likewise expects, that in the way you have expressed in this your Answer, you will not put the Militia in execution, until you can shew him by what law you have authority to do the same without his consent; or if you do, he is confident that he shall find much more obedience, according to law, than you against law: and his maj. shall esteem all those that shall obey you therein, to be disturbers of the peace of the kingdom, and, in due time, call them legally to a strict account for the same. As for Ireland, his majesty refers you to his former Answer. And, lastly, concerning his Return, he never heard that the standing of a king's government and his faithful servants, the refusing of him justice is a case of treason, and the seeking to take away his undoubted and legal authority, under the pretence of putting the kingdom into a posture of defence, were arguments to induce a king to come near or hearken to his parliament."

The lords and commons had another conference on the subject of the foregoing Letter and the king's Answer: the result of which, as to the former, was, that both houses resolved to maintain their Commissioners at York, in those things they had done, and should further do, in obedience to their commands, for preserving the peace of the kingdom.

Sir Geo. Strode and Mr. Spencer were brought to the lords bar, where the Impeachment of the Commons were read to them; but both these accusations are wanting in the Journals. The loss of which is the less to be regretted since they most probably differed little from those already given against sir Edward Dering.

May 13. Both houses joined in a Resolution to declare, "That any person whatsoever shall arrest or imprison the persons of the lords and gentlemen, or any of them, or any other Member of either House, that are, shall be, employed in the service of both houses of parliament; or shall offer violence to them for doing of any thing in pursuance of their commands, or the Instructions of both houses given unto them, shall be held disturbers of the proceedings of parliament, and public enemies of the state; and that all persons so bound by the Protestation, to endeavour bringing them to condign punishment: That letter of thanks be sent to the Commons at York, and a copy of these Votes with it."

May 14. A bill, intitled, 'An Act to read Peers, hereafter made, from sitting or rising in parliament', was read a third time in the lords, and passed; the earls of Monmouth, Bristol, and Dover, with the lords Mordaunt, Howard of Charlton, and Capell, only dissenting.

The King's Reasons against the Bill of Levies for Ireland.] May 16. The lord privy seal (the earl of Manchester) being this day appointed Speaker of the house of lords, in the absence of the lord keeper, delivered a Letter from the king, in which was a Message closed. The parliament had passed assent to his majesty a bill, 'For levying 10,000 £ for the Service of Ireland; to which he returned this Answer:

"His majesty hath ever shewed himself ready to do any thing that might conduce to the suppression of the barbarous Rebellion in Ireland, that he doubts not but all the world is very well satisfied of his true zeal, and that therefore he doth not conceive why the parliament should desire a new way of levying money for that service; especially since his maj. has been so far from refusing any Levies, that bath offered, formerly, to levy 10,000 men, volunteers, in case the parliament would promise to pay them; which, at that time, if not refused, at least, was not accepted. Besides, you may well remember, that when his majesty declared to raise 2000 foot and 200 horse, for his own guard, upon his intention of going into Ireland, the answer to that was, That it was too great an addition of charge to the country, they having already undertaken the pay of so many men; and therefore his maj. cannot but wonder, what means they can now find to pay 10,000 men, when, but a little while ago, they thought 2000 too much. But, being it is for so necessary a work, his maj. will not examine the reason of this sudden alteration of opinion, being glad that means will be so easily found for so great a supply, as this or 10,000 men will be; only he cannot give us that the manner of levying them should be altered: Therefore he offers to levy the above-named number, in the old accustomed way, under such commanders as his parliament shall have no cause to disapprove of; but he holds it very inconvenient to sign the bill sent into him by way of an Instruction; not knowing the many inconveniences that, upon passing thereof, may happen. His majesty likewise takes notice, that above half those men, for which he hath already given commission, are yet unlevied, or, at least, not gone; so that if the parliament like of the old way of levying, which he can conceive no reason why they should eschew, he undertakes there shall be no time lost in these aforesaid levies. York, May 13, 1642."

After reading this Message the commons sent sir Wm. Lewis up to the lords with a Declaration, containing a recapitulation of all the Errors and Miscarriages in Government, from the dissolution of the last parliament; to which were added many letters, examinations, warrants, and depositions; all which they had voted to be printed, and also published in all parish churches. Sir W. Lewis was directed to desire their lordships concurrence therein, and to give them satisfaction, if desired, in these particulars: 1. "Whether the king hath ever given other denial to any public bill offered unto him by parliament, than by suspending his assent for a time? 2. Whether a Petition, brought up by the commons, and approved of by the lords, hath ever been refused by the king? 3. Whether any person hath ever been adjudged a traitor, for executing the king's verbal commands, against the laws of the land?"

The Form of the King's Oath, &c. ordered to be considered.] This day the commons appointed a committee, consisting of Mr. Selden, Mr. Glyn, sir S. D' Ewes, Mr. Whitlock, Mr. Bridgeman, and others, to consider of the Form of the King's Oath, as it is upon record, and in books of good authority, and of the statute of 25 Edw. 3. concerning the same; next, to consider, whether kings, in refusing the, in former times, gave any other answer than 'Le Roy's answer;' and to consider what persons have been proceeded against for high treason, notwithstanding they had the king's command; and to search precedents, what parliaments have done, heretofore, in like case of the king's absence from parliament; and the parliament's putting forces in places of strength, to preserve them for the king and parliament.

The Yorkshire Committee's Account of the King's Propositions to the Gentry, &c. of that County.] May 16, p. m. The lord privy seal, still sitting as Speaker, in the absence of the lord keeper, acquainted the house, That a Letter was come from York, directed to the lord keeper, or to the Speaker of the house of lords for the time being, which was commanded to be read. This Letter is omitted in the Journals, and it is only said, that divers Papers were read: and, indeed, there are many similar omissions in them, about this time; which are now supplied from the Collectors, or Pamphlets, of those days. The Letter and Papers, mentioned above, came from the Committee at York; and were sent, alike, to the Speakers of each house. That to the commons was as follows:

"Sir; In our last Letter we gave you an Account of our first and second waiting on the king. We wrote to you then, that his maj. commanded us to attend him yesterday, being Thursday, to hear what he said to the gentlemen; which, a little before the meeting, he seconded by a particular Message. Being come thither, his maj. caused the several Messages between him and the parliament, mentioned in this inclosed Paper, to be read. This was done with much humming and applause of the king's Messages, by some persons who had placed themselves near about where his maj. stood: but when any thing from the parliament came to be read, with so much hissing and reviling of the parliament, that though, in respect and duty to the king's person we could not resent it as otherwise we should have done; yet we have since expostulated, and complained of it to his majesty. Some were so bold as to say openly, 'That the parliament-men should set their houses in order, for many of them should shortly have their heads off;' one of which (as since we are credibly informed) was one Hurst, a servant to Mr. Wm. Crofts.—In this, which was said by the king, you will see what reason we had to vindicate ourselves; and therefore we immediately repaired to the dean's house, with all the other gentlemen, and there we took notice of the rough usage we had received: we told them, That it was neither indiscretion nor disobedience in us, (as his majesty was pleased to call it) to deliver the parliament's Message; or to stay here, though commanded to the contrary, since we conceived no man needed to be satisfied in so clear a case as this, That every member of each house ought to obey their commands, when they were pleased to employ them: but since his maj. thought fit to bid them take heed of us, not knowing what doctrine of disobedience we might preach to them. under colour of obeying the parliament, we appealed to every man, Whether we had, in word or deed, in public or in private, done any thing that became not honest men, and persons employed from the parliament: That we had communicated our Instructions to his majesty, being that whereby we would avow all our actions, and that we were confident it would not be said we had transgressed them. This was very well taken and justified by the country.—Yesterday there came divers thousands of Freeholders to this City, though none but the gentry were summoned; but receiving a command from the king not to come to court, they forebore, and stayed in the Castle-Yard; yet sent this Petition inclosed to his majesty, and received the Answer annexed thereunto. There was likewise a committee of 12 gentlemen appointed, yesternight, to consider of drawing up an Answer to the King's Proposition concerning a Guard: but nothing could be then done, because it was past 3 o'clock before the gentlemen were admitted to the king. This morning the Freeholders assembled again in the Castle-Yard; there they made this Protestation inclosed, of their Right of Voting in what concerneth the peace of the country, as having their interest therein.—When we all met this morning again at the dean's house, we, who are your committees, received this message by sir Edw. Stanhope, 'That he came from his majesty to command us, that we should depart from this meeting; and if we did stay, his maj. would judge us guilty of what he spake of yesterday, which was, Tampering.' Notwithstanding which command, we read the 4th Article of our Instructions to the whole company, that being pertinent to the business we were then upon; and desired them to consider, whether the parliament had not expressed therein such a care of the king's safety, that there would be little need of Guards. We told them, That we had a good right of being there as Freeholders of the county, but that in obedience to the king we would depart for this time; yet whensoever there should be occasion of our being there, in pursuance of our Instructions from the parliament, we should be ready. The whole company received great satisfaction, and desired a copy of that Instruction, which we gave them.—We were the more willing, at that time, to go from thence, because we should not only give obedience to the king's command, which otherwise he would have said we constantly disobeyed; but because the committee of 12 appointed yesternight, were then to withdraw; so that there was nothing for the present for us to do: we immediately went to the king, and besought him, That since we were continually so discountenanced by him, in the face of our county, he would be pleased to let us know in particular wherein we had given the occasion; for we otherwise conceived we were deprived of that liberty, which was our due in respect of that interest we had here.

His majesty was pleased to tell us, 'That if we would lay aside that condition of committees from the parliament, he would not hinder us to be there as gentlemen of the county.' We humbly replied, 'That we could not lay that down, nor could we be absent from any meeting, where our presence was required for the service, as committees from the parliament.' To which his majesty said, 'That indeed he thought we could not lay it down, neither was it reasonable that we should have Votes, and be in a double capacity.' The committees hath been together most part of this day; but not agreeing, six of them have drawn up the Answer inclosed, which they have communicated to the gentlemen and freeholders; the greater part of the gentlemen, and all the Freeholders, have agreed to, and subscribed it. The other six have concluded upon this odd Answer, consenting to a Guard of Horse; but to this we do not hear they have gotten names, nor can we get a copy of those names as yet, though these be very few; yet which they can bring in any horse or no, we cannot judge. The king hath received both these resolutions, which, with his Answers to them, you likewise have here inclosed: And first

HIS MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

"Gentlemen; I have cause of adding, and altering, what I meant to say. When I sent out the summons for this day's appearance, little thought of these Messengers, or of such a message as they brought; the which, because it confirms me in what I intend to speak, that I desire you should be truly informed of all passages between Me and the Parliament, you shall here read,—first, my Answer to the Declaration of both houses concerning the Answer of the Parliament to my two Messages concerning Hull, together with my Reply to the same; and my Message to both houses declaring the Reasons why I refused to pass the bill concerning the Militia." All which being read his Majesty proceeded: "I will make no paraphrases upon what ye have heard, more-befitting a lawyer than a king, only this observation, That since Treason is countenanced so near me, it is time to look to my safety. I avow that it was part of my wonder, The men (whom I thought, heretofore, discreet and moderate) should have undertaken this employment; and that since they came, I have delivered them the Answer you have heard, and commanded them to return personally to it to the parliament, they should have disobeyed Me, upon pretence of the Parliament's Command. My end in telling you this, is to warn you of them; for since these men have brought me such a Message, and disobeyed so lawful a command, I will not wonder what their intent of staying here is; only bid you take heed, not knowing what doctrine of disobedience they may preach to you under colour of obeying the parliament. Historians have found and kept you quiet, the occasion of which was a chief cause of my coming thither."

happits and disorders made me leave the South, and not to make this the seat of a war, & malice would (but I hope in vain) make me believe: now, if disturbances do come, I know whom I have reason to suspect.—To be short; you see that my Magazine is going to be taken away from me (being my own property) directly against my will: the Ordinance for the Militia (against law and my consent) is going to be put in execution: and, my, sir J. Hotham's Treason is countenanced; all this considered, none can blame me to apprehend dangers; therefore I have sought fit (upon these real grounds) to tell you, That I am resolved to have a Guard (the Regiment having had one all this while upon imaginary jealousies) only to secure my person; in which I desire your concurrence and assistance; and that I may be able to protect me, the laws, and the true Protestant profession, from any affront or injury that may be offered; which I mean to maintain myself, without charge to the country; intending no other to keep them on foot, than I shall be assured of my just apprehensions, by having sanction in the particulars before-mentioned."

ANSWER of several of the Yorkshire GENTRY, to the KING's PROPOSITION for a Guard.

To the King's most excellent Majesty. knights and gentlemen, whose names are subscribed, do unanimously present this answer to your majesty's Proposition concerning the raising of a Guard of horse, for the safety and defence of your sacred person: to this Proposition, as we conceive ourselves bound by our allegiance, we do willingly assent. For that purpose humbly desiring, that the aforesaid Guard may be raised by authority; and likewise that it may consist of Persons unquestionable in their religion, gentlemen."

Substance of his Majesty's REPLY, sent by Mr. Secretary NICHOLAS: His majesty gave them thanks, for it appeared as a satisfactory Answer; and in it had shewed great circumspection and wisdom, by choosing such whose loyalty could not be questioned, by excluding recusants and suspected to be disaffected."

ANSWER of those GENTLEMEN and FREEHOLDERS, who subscribed the same at the Dean's house where the Sheriff was: May it please your most sacred majesty; Propositions, delivered to us yesterday to your majesty, are of so high concern to the weal and peace of the whole kingdom and do so nearly touch upon the affection and fidelity of all your subjects in general, as being but a part of one county only, do not give it is safe for us to advise therein; we humbly beseech your maj. to impute no Grounds of your majesty's Fears and uneasies to your high court of parliament, whose most loyal care and affection to your majesty's honour and safety, and the prosperity of your subjects and dominions, we are most confident; and whatsoever shall be advised by your great council therein we shall most willingly embrace, and give our concurrence and assistance to it as shall become us in whose fidelity and affection your majesty hath often declared especial trust; and albeit we do not presume to advise your maj. in that particular, being of transcendent consequence; nevertheless, in the behalf of those members of parliament lately employed to attend your maj. from both houses, being all of them gentlemen of quality and estate in this county, and trusted to serve in that most honourable assembly, we humbly crave your majesty's leave to express our confidence in their unstained loyalty and affection to your maj. to be such, as your maj. may securely admit their attendance to negotiate their employments, till they be recalled by the parliament: and for their fidelity, we all engage ourselves to your majesty; and we are most assured that your royal person shall be secure in the general fidelity of your subjects of this county, without any extraordinary Guard."

His Majesty's ANSWER returned by the Sheriff.

"His majesty expects the like affection from you that he doth from the other gentlemen, and he hath the same confidence in you that he hath in the others."

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The Humble PETITION of many Thousands of your Majesty's peaceably-affected SUBJECTS of the County of York.

"Sheweth; That many of your Petitioners being, in their late desires of petitioning your majesty, denied access, kept back with violence, and receiving great affronts from some that have dependency on your majesty, and others there assembled; yet no provocation could remove them from their patience and duty. These proceedings are taken more to heart, your petitioners conceiving it undeniable that they have an interest in the commonwealth, and are as dutiful and loyal subjects to your maj. as any whosoever; though divers of them have been since uncivilly pressed by some, in your majesty's name, to subscribe a Paper, stiled, 'The Answer to your Majesty's Propositions,' and threatened thereto (upon which blows followed); and that, when your majesty's army should be on foot, those should be first pillaged that refused such subscription; which we humbly conceive is positively contrary to your majesty's own expressions, and is to the high dishonour of your majesty, and the great afflictment and disturbance of your majesty's liege people.—Therefore your petitioners, having too just cause to fear your majesty's royal heart is still in danger to be possessed with some distaste of your petitioners, humbly supplicate your maj. to conceive better things of them, and to cast your eye upon the present state of this your kingdom; that, as your maj. hath often declared your affection to this county, so your love might now be expressed in preserving the peace thereof; and that your maj. would admit of a right information of the clear intentions of your petitioners, who are confident that no so absolute and hearty observance to your majesty's just commands can be demonstrated, as what your maj. in parliament shall declare; which if it be divided, (as God forbid) our hearts even tremble to consider the diminution of the honour and safety of your majesty's posterity, and the dangers the kingdom will unavoidably be put upon; since it is clear to every understanding, that it is not a divided part of one, or several counties, that can afford that honour and safety to your maj. as the whole kingdom, which you may command; no ground or fear of danger remaining, if a good confidence were begot betwixt your maj. and the parliament, whose grave and loyal counsels are, as we humbly conceive, the visible way, under God, to put a speedy end to the troubles of Ireland, and establish your throne in righteousness. And, lastly, your petitioners do humbly supplicate, that we may represent our unfitness to become judges betwixt your majesty and the parliament in any thing, or dispute the authority of either, which they humbly conceive do fortify each other; it being most unfit for them to act any thing therein but by their prayers for a right understanding between your maj. and them, which we shall heartily do, as also for your majesty long and prosperous reign; and, as we are bound by our late Protestation, shall be ready to maintain your majesty's just Rights, the Privileges and Power of Parliament, and the lawful Liberties of the Subject."

The KING'S ANSWER to the foregoing PETITION of the County, by Mr. Secret Nicholas.

"His majesty having with some care considered this Petition, being the first of this nature that hath been presented to him, what any appearing well affected to his service (though he hath heard of many to the contrary have misdeemeaned themselves, hath commanded me to give you this Answer: That doth, totally, disavow the proceedings complained of in the Petition; and expects of you, and all others his loyal subjects, shall be satisfied with his several gracious Declarations and constant peaceable practice towards people; and for further assurance, upon proof made against any man who hath committed any violence in words or actions, with just provocation, full reparation shall be made to the parties injured.—As for the other of this Petition, his majesty saith, That he is confused he does not well know what his Answer to give to it; and the rather because it is grounded upon misinformation of his majesty's proceedings and intentions; in particular, his maj. saith, He never intended to have you to be judges betwixt him and his parliament. For the rest of this petition he refers to his Messages, Declarations and Answers; whereby it will clearly appear That his desire and intention is, only, the serving of the true Protestant protestant laws of the land, the liberty of his people, the peace of the kingdom in general, and the good of this county in particular."

The PROTESTATION of the Freeholders of Yorkshire.

"Whereas his majesty was pleased to summon to the gentry of this county to be at his court at York, the 10th of instant, to advise with him in some particular concerning the honour and safety of his majesty's person, and the well-being and safety of this our country; and in the said summons was pleased to enjoin the freeholders of this county, out of a better respect of putting them out of any dangerous charge; yet we, the undersigned, since our loyalty to his maj. our greatest ign, and conceiving ourselves, according to the proportions of our estates, equally interested in the common good of the county, did take the boldness to come in person to York, and were ready to attend his majesty's pleasure there: And whereas his majesty being pleased upon to propound several things to the purpose aforesaid, at the meeting of the county, to consider a fit Answer to return to his majesty thereupon, the doors of the meeting-house were shut against us, and we utterly excluded; and, in our absence, a referee of knights and gentlemen chosen, without our knowledge or consent, to draw up the said Answer: we the freeholders who petitioned his majesty the day aforesaid, conceiving ourselves abundantly wronged in the election of the said referee, not owing any warrant, by writ, or otherwise, the same; and that we ought not, however, to be concluded by any resolution of theirs without our assent in their election, do, absolutely, protest and declare against the said election; and, as far as concerns us, disavow and disavow shall be the result of their consultation thereupon; and do desire a new and fair election of a referee may be made, we admit to our free votes in the same, and some one more, to be nominated by us, allowed to deliver our sense for us at another meeting: and that we shall not make good, in the least respect, any thing whatsoever which shall otherwise be concluded upon."

"Sir, his majesty had declared himself yesterday, that he would raise that regiment which was sir Rob. Strickland's, for his foot-guard; but he hath now laid aside that resolution. The freeholders of the county are now duly summoned to attend his majesty about week hence, the three Ridings upon three several days: but for what service we know not. You have here a large Narrative of the sages at this meeting. What dangers this poor country lies under, we humbly refer to your wisdom to judge, not taking upon us to deliver any opinion. The business lasted so long, that it hindered us from giving a more speedy account. This is what, at this time, is sent from Your most obedient friends and servants, PER. FAIRFAX. CHOLMLEY, PHIL. STAPYLTON, HENRY DUNLEY.—York, May 13. 1642."

May 17. A conference was held this day in relation to the foregoing affairs; the report of which was, "That the commons desired to press a good correspondency between both houses, to prevent the mischiefs that were else likely to ensue. They, likewise, observed with care, wisdom, and diligence, the committee do proceed; and desired that notice might be taken of it, and thanks returned to them and the high sheriff, also to those gentry and freeholders who, in all these proceedings, have expressed their affection and loyalty to his majesty and parliament, for their good service therein." Ordered, That the Letter and Papers from York should be forthwith printed and published in one book.*

The intended Removal of the Term to York
VOL. II.

[voted illegal.] This day the lords were informed of a rumour, That a command was come for removing the next Term to York, which would be very prejudicial to the kingdom; therefore they sent the earl of Essex and lord Kimbolton to the lord keeper, to know if he had heard any thing of it. After some other business done, the two lords returned from the lord keeper, and said, "That his lordship confessed he had received a Letter from the king, the last night, importing the adjournment of the next Term to York, and to order a proclamation and writs out for that purpose: that he was to advise with the Judges concerning the manner of them; and, accordingly, he had acquainted them with it, but nobody else; though nothing, as yet, was done in it."—The lords, taking this matter into consideration, were of opinion, That it was illegal to remove the Term, in regard of the late act of parliament for the continuance of it: that it was contrary to the practice, and inconsistent with the sitting of parliament, and to the express writs which call assistants to that house. Then the question was put, Whether the king's removing the Term to York, from Westminster, the parliament sitting, was not illegal? It passed in the affirmative. They further ordered, That the lord keeper should not issue out any writs, or seal any proclamation to that purpose. This vote, &c. to be communicated to the commons, at a conference, and then to be forthwith printed and published.

Resolutions against the King's demanding the Attendance of any Subject.] At this conference the commons acquainted the lords with another letter from the king, directed to captain Philip Skippon, captain of the military garden, in St. Martin's in the Fields, London, commanding the said captain's immediate personal attendance on his majesty at York, on pain of his highest displeasure. On which the commons had passed the following Votes: Resolved, 1. "That for his majesty, at his pleasure, to command any free-born subject to attend his person, not bound thereunto by special service, is against the law of the land. 2. That this command of his majesty, to call captain Philip Skippon, serjeant-major-general of the forces of London, to attend his majesty's person at York, is against the law of the land and the liberty of the subject. 3. That his majesty's commanding captain P. Skippon, to attend his majesty's person, being employed by both houses to attend their service, without their consent, is against the privilege of parliament. 4. That captain P. Skippon shall continue to attend the service of both houses, according to their former commands."

An Order of the said house was also read, importing, That it be referred to the committee of lords and commons, appointed to consider of his majesty's last Messages, to make a Remonstrance to him, and shew how much against law, and the liberty of the subject, commands of this nature are; to represent to him the interruption that they cause to the proceedings of parliament, and the affairs of Ireland, with the inconveniences that are like to ensue upon them; and to desire they may be forborne hereafter.

Declaration of both Houses against taking Arms by his Majesty's Command.] A Letter, directed to Edw. lord Howard and the Committee at York, was read, with a Declaration of Parliament; the Letter was to no other purpose, than thanking them for their good services, &c. and to order them to deliver the inclosed to the high sheriff, and press the execution of it there, as was intended to be done in the other counties of England. Which Instrument was in these words:

"The lords and commons in parliament do declare, That it is against the laws and liberties of the kingdom, that any of the subjects thereof should be commanded by the king to attend him at his pleasure, but such as are bound thereunto by special service: and that whosoever, upon pretence of his majesty's command, shall take arms, and gather together with others, in a warlike manner, to the terror of the king's people, shall be esteemed disturbers of the public peace; and to do that which may introduce a precedent of very dangerous consequence for the future, and may produce most mischievous effects for the present; considering the great distempers of the kingdom, and what pernicious counsellors and incendiaries are now about the king; and how desperate and ill-affected divers persons, attending upon his majesty, have shewed themselves to the parliament and to his other good subjects, threatening and reproaching them publicly, even in his majesty's presence. For preventing and avoiding such great mischiefs as may thereupon ensue, it is Ordered and Ordained by both houses of parliament, That if the Trained-Bands, or any other his majesty's subjects, shall, upon pretence of any such command, be drawn together and put into a posture of war, the sheriff of that county where there shall be such raising or drawing together of armed men, do forthwith raise the power of the county to suppress the same, and to keep his majesty's peace according to law. And that the lord lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, justices of the peace, and all other his majesty's subjects, be aiding and assisting to the several and respective sheriffs in performance hereof, as they will answer the contrary at their peril."

Further Orders for the Security of Hull.] May 18. The lord admiral acquainted the lords, That he had received a Letter from Hull, from some captains, sent with their ships there, by order of parl. to bring away the Magazine, alledging, that they had received a command from the king, dated at York, the 10th of May, upon their allegiance, not to put on board any part of that Magazine, &c. they therefore desired their lordships to take some course for their indemnity in obeying the commands of this house.—Then the lord admiral's Letter and the king's Warrant for stoppage were read; and a conference being held upon it, some more hints were communicated by the commons, concerning the safety of Hull; as, That sir J. Hotham complained he wanted a committee, of reputation, to assist him: that he found the towmen false: that he wanted mills to grind corn: and that the commons sent thither, some time since, were come away. To remedy all which, the commons had prepared the Form of a Letter to be sent down to Hull, with an Order; also they had appointed another committee to go thither, and desired to know if their lordships would appoint any of their house for that purpose. The lords agreed to this in every particular, and the lord Willoughby of Parham was named as a commissioner from that house.

The Speaker's Letter to Sir J. Hotham thereupon.] The Letter to sir J. Hotham, with Order of parliament, was then read, as follows:

"Sir; Your letter of the 16th of May I received this morning, and forthwith communicated it to the house; who do very much approve your diligent and prudent carriage in discharge of the great trust reposed in you much concerning the peace and safety of the whole kingdom; and thank you for the same. If the house had sooner known of the coming away of the committee, and of the great necessity that some such assistance should there, they would sooner have provided have had their absence forthwith supplied by others; for which purpose they have now solved of seven more of this house to be added to the former committee, as you may perceive by the Order inclosed, whereof they intend that four shall always be resident with you there.—According to your desire, you receive an Order of both houses for the Encouragement and Indemnity of the captains and masters of the ships, of whose obedience therefore we are assured, by their profession in their letters to the lord admiral, That what both houses of parliament shall order, they shall with their utmost endeavours perform, for his majesty's safety and the good of this state; which, being an expression of so good affection to the service of the parliament, this house takes especial notice; and desires you to give them thanks in their name, as also to the members, of whose forwardness in this service you are also informed.—The house doth also require, That the Magazine, that is already shipped, may be sent with all convenient speed, with perfect inventories of what is in the ship; and what you have kept behind to remain there, for the defence of the place, in case there be occasion; two of the ships of war be designed for the convoy of the Magazine; the other two shall be appointed to attend in the harbour, for the better security of that coast."

[there shall be further order.—We understand the proceedings in Yorkshire; and, though there be some disaffected, yet there appears so great a part of the county to be well disposed to the peace of the kingdom, that it is hoped they will so over-awe the other party, to keep them quiet. I send you inclosed a copy of the Order of both houses, which was yesterday sent to the committees at York, to be delivered to the sheriff; who hath carried himself so worthily and faithfully, that there is no doubt whatsoever of him. Mr. Hilliard's report is, That he will do his duty in obeying authority and directions of parliament, for serving this kingdom from the miseries and calamities of a civil war; which is earnestly laboured to be kindled by some evil counsellors about the king, who can find no way to escape the punishment of their own wickedness, but by the confusion of the whole state. It is much wondered that there should be in that town so blind, as not to discern the chief intended to the common-wealth, if it had not, by the wisdom of the parliament, been secured from the Malignant Party; or so affected as not to concur in the furtherance of that which is necessary for the public good, wherein the safety of that town and their own interests are involved: but as their perverseness I make you more watchful, so your watchfulness will make them less hurtful; and it is desired the proceedings in Yorkshire will every day more open their eyes to see the dangers and miseries like to overwhelm those parts, if rest, well-affected people do not join with parliament to prevent the same.—The king means to send away two of the committees forthwith; and, when they have been fully informed, by sir Christ. Wray, of the matters which you write they shall understand by him, it is resolved to send to you in. And I am commanded to tell you, that you may rest assured, as you have the authority of parliament, and the strength of the greatest and best part of the kingdom; so you shall receive the prayers of all that truly affect the prosperity and peace of this church and state concurring with you, to which I add the good respect and best wishes of Your most ready and humble servant, W. LENTHALL.]

The ORDER inclosed was as follows:

Whereas the lords and commons in parliament thought fit and necessary, for the safety of the king and kingdom, That the Magazine of Arms and Ammunition, at Kingston upon Hull, should be removed from thence to the Tower of London, and did order the same accordingly; and have appointed several ships for the transporting and wafting thereof, which are ready at Hull, for that service: It is ordered, by both houses of parliament, That said Magazine and Arms shall be forthwith removed, and brought away from Hull to the Tower of London; and the captains, stewards, masters and other officers and companies of the said ships are hereby required and enjoined, forthwith, to perform the same, notwithstanding any command to them directed to the contrary. And for the indemnity of captains Driver, Swanly, Moyers, and Piggot, and such other captains, lieutenants, masters, officers, mariners, and all other persons, which have done or shall do any thing according to the said Ordinance of both houses of parliament, or in execution thereof, touching the removing, shipping or transporting the said Magazine, or any part thereof from Hull, to the Tower of London as aforesaid: It is declared and ordered, by both houses of parliament, That they, and every of them, shall have the assistance of both the said houses against any inconveniency which may happen to them, or any of them, by or for obeying the said commands in this so necessary and important service."

Lord Savile's Letter upon refusing to attend the Parliament. May 19. The earl of Holland acquainted the lords that he had received a Letter from the lord Savile, at York, which was read as followeth:—

"My Lord; Yesterday there came hither a mean base fellow, with an order, process, or warrant, for I know not what to call it, to attach divers of the peers and some others, and amongst the rest myself; for coming away without leave, as I imagine, for I know no other guilt that I can pretend to; though there was no cause, so much as in general, expressed in the warrant, according as, by the law of the land, and Petition of Right, is required. When he delivered me his warrant I was going with your brother Newport to Galtres Park, to take the air; and, at my return, found the messenger committed for some offence, which, it seems, they did lay to his charge; and the king, calling all the company about him, charged me, upon my allegiance, not to depart the town without his consent. I saw great joy in many to see me herein so used in the face of my country; to be arrested by such a fellow, for a crime so small, as for the safety of my life, after so long an attendance, to go to my own house; and at a time when all cursed me for the good offices I did contrary to their designs; as I shall report to your commissioners here, who know much of my ways. So, my lord, I am, as you imagine, in a great distraction; but of this I am certain that no private spleen shall debar me from doing my poor endeavours for the public, so far as it is now fit for me to appear. I pray God that things be not so carried as suddenly to endanger the peace of us all. My lord, I am, &c.

York, May 14, 1642.

"SAVILE."

Another Letter from the Committee at York, relating to the King's raising a Guard. Next was read a Letter from the lord Howard, one of the Committee at York, to the lord keeper, containing a further account of the king's proceedings in that city, which was in these words:

"My lord; Yesternight, somewhat late, there came to our hand this printed Paper enclosed:

'By the King: C. R. Whereas, upon summons from us, divers gentlemen of this our county of York did attend us on Thursday the 12th day of this instant May, when we declared our Resolution, for the reason then delivered by us, to have a Guard to secure and defend our person; and desired therein the concurrence and assistance of the gentry of this county: and whereas divers gentlemen of this county, for many reasons and occasions, could not then appear to receive our pleasure on that behalf, whereunto divers have subscribed: we have therefore thought good hereby to give notice, as well to those gentlemen who were not then present, as to those who did then attend us, that our command is, That as well those gentlemen who are charged with horse, as others, appear at York upon Friday the 12th day of this month, in such manner and equipage as will be convenient for the Guard of our person: and we require and command, That, in the interim, no other warrant, order, or command whatsoever, shall distract or hinder this our service: and we further will and command, That this our Order be forthwith published by the sheriff of this our county, for which this shall be his sufficient warrant. Given at our Court at York, May 14, 1642.

“My lord; We conceiving the above Paper to be illegal, waited on the king in the morning, telling him, ‘We thought it our duty to represent to his majesty, of what dangerous consequence it was to command the whole county to bring in their horse, which would be occasion of great jealousies, and might breed great distractions.’ His majesty’s Answer was, ‘That howsoever it was expressed, yet he never intended to have any come in but voluntarily.’ We replied, ‘That this bore another sense, and that it would be our duty to give notice of it to the parliament.’ When we were gone, the marquis of Hertford, the lord Savile, and lord chief justice Bankes, repaired to the king, and soon after brought us the following Paper in Answer to what we had said to his majesty; with a command to write up the substance of it to your lordship: but thinking it not fit to take upon us to write his majesty’s sense, lest we should be mistaken, I have here sent you the very Paper itself, as we had it from the lords before-mentioned.

“My Lord; We waited, this day, upon his majesty, concerning a printed Summons published the 14th of this instant May, humbly to know his majesty’s meaning therein; at which time he was graciously pleased to signify his intention unto us, That his meaning was, thereby, to accept of the voluntary offers of those gentlemen, who had, or should, tender their services unto him for the Guard of his person: and, out of that number that should appear before him, at the time prefixed, he would chuse such a competent number as might serve for the safeguard of his royal person; likewise telling us, That he had declared to those gentlemen, who did attend him at the last meeting, that he no ways intended hereby to increase the number of the Traigned Bands.

“My lord, these lords do, every one of them, protest, That they never knew any thing of this printed Paper till we shewed it to them. I acquainted your lordship, in my last letter, That his majesty had laid aside the resolution of raising that regiment which was sir Robert Strickland’s; but, this afternoon, we understand it is to meet to-morrow by warrants from his majesty; a copy of one of them I send your lordship here inclosed; as also a Letter from his majesty to the gentry of Yorkshire.

The WARRANT: To the Constables of Newcastle and Bennuingsborough.

‘By virtue of a Warrant from his majesty, to me directed, his will and command is to give order to all the several petty constables, within this division or hundred, to cause all the Trained bands and Soldiers of sir Rob. Strickland’s regiment, with their officers and arms, to meet at Sutton in the Forest, on Tuesday next, the 17th of this instant May, by 8 in the morning; where they shall receive further commands and directions by the colored serjeant-major of the said regiment. Fail at your peril.’—T. GRO-VEOR. May 15, 1642.

THE KING’S LETTER.

‘To our trusty and well-beloved the gentry of Yorkshire, and others of this our county of York, whom it doth or may concern; We have, with great contentment, considered your dutiful and affectionate Answer to our Proposition concerning the unsufferable affront which we received at Hull. We have not been deceived in that confidence we had in your affection, wherefore we desire you to assure the rest of your countrymen, who, through negligence, were omitted to be summoned, that we shall never abuse your love, by any power wherewith God shall enable us, to the violation of the least of your liberties, or the diminution of those immunities, which we have granted you this parliament; (though thereby beyond the acts of most, if not of all, our predecessors) being resolved, with a constant firm resolution, to have the law of this land duly observed; and shall endeavour only so to preserve our just royal rights, as may enable us to protect our kingdom and people, according to the antient honours of the kings of England; and according to the trust which, by the blessing of God and this land, is put into the crown, being sufficiently warned, by the late affront at Hull, not to transfer the same out of our power, concerning which affront we will take some time to advise which way we may usefully employ your affections: in the mean time we shall take it well from all such as shall personally attend us, so followed and provided as they shall think fit, for the better safety of our person; because we know not what sudden violence or affront may be offered unto us, having lately received such an actual testimony of rebellious intentions from sir J. Hotham at Hull. Being thus secured by your affections and assistance, we promise you our protection against any contrary power whatsoever; and that you shall not be molested for your humble and modest Petition, as of late you have been threatened. Given at our Court at York, May 16, 1642.'

"My lord, I know not what the success of this will be; or what the sheriff will do upon it, he is newly gone out of town. My lord, this is, at this time, what I am to acquaint you with, who am, &c.

York, May 16, 1642. "EDW. HOWARD."

Lord Savile voted guilty of a Contempt, &c.] May 19. p. m. The lords took into consideration the lord Savile's Letter; and, after debate, came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That the lord Savile's going from parliament, and refusing to come when this house sent for him, is a great contempt, and a high breach of the privileges of parliament. 2. That when the high court of parliament sends for a delinquent to appear before them, the king's laying his commands upon him not to appear, tends to the overthrow of the power of parliament and justice of the kingdom. 3. That the lord Savile for his high contempt, in refusing to come when the house sent for him, shall not sit nor vote in this house during this session of parliament."

Ordered, That a writ of Habeas Corpus shall be sent down to the sheriff, to bring up to this house the Messenger imprisoned at York. Also, to have a conference with the commons on this affair, and this high Breach of the Privilege of Parliament; and to consider of a course, how to bring delinquents to deserved punishment, in such a manner as may best agree with public justice, and best preserve the peace of the kingdom.

The Parliament resolves, that the King intends to make War against them, &c.] May 20. The lords took into consideration the present Dangers and Distractions of the Kingdom; and appointed a committee of 8 peers to peruse all the Messages and Declarations which had come from the king, to collect together all the material expressions therein that concerned the parliament, and to report them to the house. This committee, immediately, withdrew; and, very soon after, the lord Kimbolton brought in the following Resolutions, which were afterwards agreed to by both houses; and, with a Petition to the king annexed, were ordered to be printed and published. Resolved, upon the petition "That it appears that the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intends to make war against the parliament; who, in all their consultations and actions, have proposed no other end unto themselves, but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and oyalty to his person. 2. That whensoever the king maketh war upon the parliament, it is a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of this government. 3. That whosoever shall serve, or assist him in such wars, are traitors by the fundamental laws of this kingdom; and have been so adjudged by two acts of parliament; and ought to suffer as traitors."

The Parliament's Petition sent to the King with the Resolutions.] The Petition sent to the king, with the above Resolutions, was as follows:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The Humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS assembled in Parliament.

"Your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons in this parliament, do humbly represent unto your majesty, That notwithstanding your frequent professions to your parliament and the kingdom, and the late expression in your Answer of the 13th of May, to the Petition of the county of York, 'That your desire and intention is only the preserving of the true Protestant profession, the Laws of the land, the liberty of your People, and the peace of the kingdom;' nevertheless, with great grief, we perceive, by your Speech of the 12th of May, and the Paper printed in your majesty's name, in the form of a Proclamation, bearing date the 14th of May, and other evidences, that, under colour of raising a Guard to secure your person, (of which guard, considering the fidelity and care of your parliament, there can be no use) your majesty doth command troops, both of horse and foot, to assemble at York; the very beginnings whereof were apprehended by the inhabitants of that county to be an affrightment and disturbance of your majesty's liege people, as appears by their Petition presented to your majesty; the continuing and increase of which forces is, and must needs be, a just cause of great jealousy and danger to your parliament, and to your whole kingdom. Therefore we do humbly beseech your maj. to disband all such forces, as, by your command, are assembled; and relying for your security, as your predecessors have done, upon the law, and the affections of your people, you will be pleased to desist from any further designs of this nature, contenting yourself with your usual and ordinary Guards; otherwise we shall hold ourselves bound in duty towards God, the trust reposed in us by the people, and the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom, to employ our care and utmost power to secure the parliament, and to preserve the peace and quiet of the kingdom."

Lord Herbert censured for objecting to the Resolutions.] In the debate on the second of the above Votes, the lord Herbert of Cherbury, speaking these words, 'I should agree to it, if I could be satisfied that the king would make War upon the Parliament without cause,' he was commanded to withdraw; but, because it was then late, his lordship was committed to the gentleman-usher, for the present, until the house took this business into further consideration. The next day the lord Herbert presented a Petition to the lords, declaring his sorrow for letting fall certain Words in the midst of a period, which had given offence; and therefore desired their lordships benign interpretation of them. This Petition satisfied the house, and he was released upon it. His lordship then moved the house, That he might have leave to go into the country for his health; and, if he could not find it there, to go beyond sea for it, to France, to the Spa, or elsewhere; which was granted: but he went directly to the king at York, as will appear in the sequel.

The King's Answer to the Parliament's last Declaration relating to the Militia. The lords being informed, That a book, intitled, 'An Answer, by way of Declaration, to a Printed Paper, intitled, a Declaration of both houses of parliament, in Answer to his majesty's last Message concerning the Militia,' was put out in the king's name, which the house conceived to have many expressions in it, laying imputations on the parliament: It was ordered, That the printer * should be sent for, and to bring his warrant or authority with him for printing that book. The said Answer was as follows:

"We very well understand how much it is below the high and royal dignity wherein God hath placed us, to take notice of, much more to trouble ourself with answering, those many scandalous and seditious Pamphlets and printed Papers, which are scattered with such great licence throughout the kingdom, notwithstanding our earnest desire, so often in vain pressed, for a reformation; * though we find it evident, That the minds of many of our weak subjects, have been, and still are, poisoned by those means; and that so general a terror hath possessed the minds and hearts of all men, that while the presses swarm, and every day produceth new Tracts against the established government of the church and state, most men want the courage or conscience to write, or the opportunity and encouragement to publish, such composed sober animadversions, as might either preserve the minds of our good subjects from such infection, or restore and recover them when they are so infected; but we are contented to let ourself fall to any office that may undeceive our people, and to take more pains this way by our own pen, than ever king hath done, when we find any thing that seems to carry the reputation and authority of either, or both houses of parliament: and will not have the same refuted or disputed by common and vulgar pens, till we are thoroughly informed whether those acts, have, in truth, that countenance and warrant they pretend. Which regard of ours we doubt not but, in time, will recover that due reverence (the absence whereof we have too much reason to complain of) to our person and our Messages, which in all ages hath been paid (and no doubt is due) to the crown of England.—We have therefore taken notice of a printed Paper, intitled, 'A Declaration of both Houses of Parliament, in Answer to our last Message concerning the Militia, published by Command:' the which we are unwilling to believe (both for the matter of it, the expressions in it, and the manner of publishing it) can result from the consent of both houses: neither do we know by what lawful command such uncomely and irrelevant mention of us can be published to the world. And though Declarations of this kind have of late, with too much boldness, broken in upon us and the whole kingdom, when one, or both houses have thought fit to communicate their counsels and resolutions to the people; yet we are unwilling to believe, that such a Declaration as this should be published in Answer to our Message, without vouchsafing at least to send it to us as their Answer: Their business, for which they are met by our writ and authority, being to counsel us for the good of our people, not to write against us to our people; no consent of ours, for their long continuing together, enabling them to do any thing, but what they were first summoned by our writ to do. At least we will believe, though Misunderstanding and Jealousy (the Justice of God will overtake the Fomenters of that Jealousy, and the Promoters and Contrivers of that Misunderstanding) might produce (to say no worse) those very untoward expressions; yet if those houses had contrived the Declaration as an Answer to our Message, they would have vouchsafed some Answer to the Question proposed in ours, which we perceived did and must evidently prevail over our understanding; and, in their wisdom and gravity, they would have been sure to have stated the matters of fact, as (at least to ordinary understandings) might be unquestionable: neither of which is done by that Declaration. We desired to know why we were, by that Declaration, absolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of the Militia; and must appeal to all the world, Whether such an attempt be not a greater and juster ground for Fear and Jealousy in us, than any one that is avowed for those destructive Fears and Jealousies, which are so publicly owned, almost the ruin of the kingdom. But we have been told, 'That we must not be jealous of a Great Council of both houses of parliament.' We are not, no more than they are of us, the king; and hitherto they have not avowed any jealousy of, or disaffection to, our person: but imputed all to our evil Counsellors, to a Malignant Party that are not of their minds: so to do (and we do it from our soul) professes a Jealousy of our parliament; but of some turbulent, seditious, and ambitious nature, which, being not so clearly discerned, may have an influence even upon the actions of the houses: and if this Declaration hath passed such consent, (which we are not willing to believe) it is not impossible but that the apprehension of such tumults, which have driven from our city of London, for the safety of the person, may make such an impression in other men, not able to remove from the danger, as to make them consent, or not to own a dissent, in matters not agreeable to their consciences.

* Robert Barker, the king's printer, who attended accordingly, and produced the secretary of states warrant as his voucher.

understanding.—We mentioned, in that our answer, our dislike of the putting of their names out of the bill whom before they recommended to us in their pretended Ordinance, and the leaving out, by special provision, the present lord mayor of London, to all which the declaration affords no answer; and therefore we cannot suppose it was intended for an answer to that our Message, which whosoever looks upon, will find to be in no degree answered by that Declaration.—But it informs our subjects, after the mention with what humility the Ordinance was prepared and presented to us, (a matter very evident in the Petitions and Messages concerning it) and our refusal to give our consent, notwithstanding the several reasons offered of the necessity thereof, the securing of our person, and the peace and safety of our people, (whether any such reasons were given, the weight of them, and whether they were not clearly and candidly answered by us, the world will easily judge) 'That they were at last necessitated to make an Ordinance by authority of both houses, to settle the Militia, warranted thereto by the Fundamental Laws of the Land:' but if that Declaration had indeed intended to have answered us, would have told our good subjects what those fundamental Laws of the Land are, and where to be found; and would at least have mentioned one Ordinance, from the first beginning of parliament to this present parliament, which laboured to impose any thing upon the subject without the king's consent; for of such all inquiry we can make, could never produce one instance. And if there be such a secret law, which hath lain hid from the beginning of the world to this time, and now is discovered to take away the just legal Power of the king, we wish there be not some other secret law discovered when they please) for the subversion and destruction of the Liberty of the subject; for, no doubt, if the Votes of both houses have any such authority to make a new law, it hath the same authority to repeal the old; and in what will become of the long established rights and liberties of the king and subject, particularly of Magna Charta, will be easily discerned by the most ordinary understandings. It is true we did (out of our tenderness to the constitution of the kingdom, and care of the people, which we are bound to defend, and become most assured of the unjustifiableness of the pretended Ordinance) invite and desire that our houses of parliament to settle the same should be fit of that nature, by authority of Parliament: but were we therefore obliged to pass whatsoever should be brought us of that kind? We did say in our answer to the Petition of both houses, presented to us at York the 20th of March last, that we have said the same in other Messages before) 'That we always thought it necessary business of the Militia should be settled, that we never denied the thing, only denied the way; and we say the same still, and the many disputes and votes upon lords lieutenants, and their commissions (which were begun by us, or our father) had so discountenanced that authority, which for many years together was happily looked upon with reverence and obedience by the people; we did, and do, think it very necessary that some wholesome law be provided for that business; but we declared, in our Answer to the pretended Ordinance, we expected that that necessary power should be first invested in us, before we consented to transfer it to other men: neither could it ever be imagined, that we would consent that a greater power should be in the hands of a subject, than we were thought worthy to be trusted with ourself; and if it shall not be thought fit to make a new Act, or Declaration, in this point, we doubt not but we shall be able to grant such commissions, which shall, very legally, enable those we trust, to do all offices for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, if any disturbance shall happen.—But that Declaration saith, 'We were pleased to offer them a Bill ready drawn, and that they (to express their earnest zeal to correspond with our desire) did pass that Bill; yet all that expression of affection and loyalty, all that earnest desire of theirs to comply with us, produced no better effect than an absolute denial even of what, by our former Messages, (as that Declaration conceives) we had promised; and so proceeds (under the pretence of mentioning evil and wicked Counsels) to censure and reproach us in a dialect, that we are confident our good subjects will read with much indignation on our behalf. But sure, if that Declaration had passed the examination of both houses of parliament, they would never have affirmed, 'That the Bill we refused to pass was the same we sent to them; or have thought that our Message,' wherein the difference and contrariety between the two Bills is so particularly set down, would be answered with the bare averring them to be 'one and the same bill.' No more would they have declared (when our exceptions to the Ordinance and the Bill are so notoriously known to all our people) 'That, care being taken to give satisfaction in all the particulars we had excepted against in the Ordinance, we had found new exceptions to the Bill;' and yet this very Declaration confesseth, that our exception to the Ordinance was, That in the disposing and execution thereof we were excluded. And was not this an express reason in our Answer, for our refusal of the Bill, which this Declaration will needs confute? 'But the power was no other than to suppress Rebellion, Insurrection, and foreign Invasion; and the persons trusted no other than such as were nominated by the Great Council of the kingdom, and assented to by us.' And that Declaration asks, 'If that be too great a power to trust those persons with?' Indeed whilst so great liberty is used in voting and declaring men to be enemies to the Common-Wealth, (an English phrase we scarcely understand) and in censuring men for their service and Attendance upon our person, and in our lawful commands, great heed must be taken into what hands we commit such a power to suppress Insurrection and Rebellion. And if Insurrection and Rebellion have found other definitions than what the law hath given them, we must be sure that no lawful power shall justify those definitions: and if there be learning found out to make sir John Hotham's taking arms against us, and keeping our town and fort from us, no treason or rebellion, we know not whether a new discovery may not find it rebellion in us to defend ourself from such arms, and to endeavour to recover what is so taken from us: and therefore it concerns us (till the known law of the land be allowed to be judge between us) to take heed into what hands we commit such power. Besides, can it be thought that, because we are willing to trust certain persons, we are obliged to trust them in whatsoever they are willing to be trusted? We say, no private hands are fit for such a trust, neither have we departed from any thing, in the least degree, we offered or promised before; though we might, with as much reason, have withdrawn our trust from some persons we before had accepted, as they did from others whom they recommended.—For the Power which we are charged to have committed to particular persons, for the space of 15 years, by our commissions of lieutenancy; it is notoriously known, that it was not a power created by us, but continued very many years, and in the most happy times this kingdom hath enjoyed, even those of our renowned predecessors queen Elizabeth, and our father of happy memory: and whatever authority was granted by those commissions, which were kept in the old forms, the same was determinable at our pleasure; and we know not that they produced any of those calamities, which might give our good subjects cause to be so weary of them as to run the hazard of so much mischief as that Bill, which we refused, might possibly have produced.—For the Precedents of former ages in the Commissions of Array; we doubt not but that when any such have issued out, the king's consent was always obtained, and the Commissions determinable at his pleasure; and then what the extent of power was, will be nothing applicable to this case of the Ordinance.—But whether that Declaration hath refuted our reasons for our refusal to pass the Bill or no, it hath resolved and required all persons in authority thereby to put the Ordinance in present execution; and all others to obey it, according to the fundamental Laws of the land: but we, whom God hath trusted to maintain and defend those fundamental Laws (which we hope he will bless to secure us) do declare, That there is no legal power in either or both houses, upon any pretence whatsoever, without our consent, to command any part of the Militia of this kingdom; nor hath the like ever been commanded by either or both houses since the first foundation of the laws of this land; and that the execution of, or the obedience to, that pretended Ordinance, is against the fundamental Laws of the Land, against the Liberty of the Subject, the Right of Parliaments, and a high Crime in any that shall henceforth execute the same.—We do therefore charge and command all our loving subjects, of what degree or quality soever, upon their allegiance, and as they tender the peace of this kingdom, from henceforth, not to muster, levy or array, summon or warn, any of our Trained-Bands, to rise, muster, or march by virtue or under colour of that pretended Ordinance: and to this Declaration and command of ours we expect and require a full submission and obedience from all our loving subjects upon their allegiance; as they will answer the contrary at their perils, and as they tender the upholding of the true Protestant profession, the safety of our person and our royal posterity, and the peace and being of this kingdom.”

Message of Thanks from the Parliament to the Scots Privy Council.] May 21. The following Message of Thanks, from both houses, was ordered to be sent to the Privy Council in Scotland, for their advising the king to return to his Parliament, &c.

“The Declaration of the lords of the privy council of the kingdom of Scotland, made the 22nd of April, 1642, see p. 1217, having been perused and seriously considered by the lords and commons of the parliament in England, they have, by the consent of both houses, ordered, That, in their name, the commissioners for the kingdom of Scotland be intreated to return Thanks to that honourable table of the Privy Council of Scotland, for their great affection expressed to his majesty and this kingdom, and for their wise and sound counsel given the king to return to his parliament, being the best and most impartial council, and to be aside his purpose of going into Ireland; both which they have fully concurred with the humble Petitions and desires presented to his majesty from both houses.—And as they have never given his majesty any just cause of Jealousy or Fears; but, in all their proceedings have aimed at his honour, happiness, and safety without any other design, but only to preserve and secure the true Protestant Religion, and the ancient Liberties of this Kingdom; so they carefully endeavour, by all fit means, to work in his majesty a right understanding of their loyal intentions and most affectionate desires for the common good of his majesty and his kingdoms; which can have no lasting secure foundations but in the mutual confidence betwixt him and his parliament: for the better obtaining whereof they intreat them to continue and renew such their good advice to his majesty, and to suppress the attempts of those who, upon causeless pretences and suggestions, shall persuade them to interpose those unhappy differences, in such a manner may weaken the confidence, or endanger the peace of the two kingdoms: and that the lordships will please to remember with what caution and tenderness, the state of Scotland have heretofore endeavoured that that king dom might receive no prejudice by any proceedings of his majesty's privy council of England; the example of whose wisdom herein this parliament is willing to follow, and will always be very careful of the preservation of the mutual affection betwixt the two kingdoms; according to the treaties ratified in both parliaments, the brotherly affection which they bear to that nation, and the interest they have in the prosperity thereof, so much conducing to the establishment and security of the true religion and just liberties of this kingdom. For the better improving and applying this mutual union and correspondence to the settling of the present troubles, it is desired by both houses of this parliament of England, That their lordships will send a Catalogue of those several Messages, Declarations, Answers and Instructions, which they have received from his majesty, that concern this kingdom; that so they may the better remove any doubt or mistake of their actions, which may be drawn from any such writings; and they likewise intend to send to the Council of Scotland, such Declarations, Petitions, and Remonstrances as they shall see occasion to make to their majesty and this kingdom; whereby their lordships may be the more fully informed of the true Grounds of their proceedings, and the amity and mutual intelligence betwixt the two kingdoms may be held in continual practice and exercise for the good of both."

Declaration of both Houses recapitulating the Messages, &c. between them and the King.

About this time a long Declaration, or Remonstrance, of Parliament was published in pursuance of an Order of both houses, of the 19th instant, for that purpose. As this piece contains a Recapitulation of all the Errors and Incurriages in Government from the dissolution of the last parliament, and also a Vindication of the proceedings of this parliament in consequence thereof, it is too important to be omitted, merely on account of its prolixity; and especially as the proceedings subsequent thereto would be rendered utterly unintelligible by the omission of this and similarly long Declarations. An abridgement thereof would be to no purpose, seeing that several of the succeeding contests, between the king and parliament, took their rise from particular phrases and expressions made use of in them:

"The infinite mercy and providence of almighty God hath been abundantly manifested, from the beginning of this parliament, in great plenty of protections and blessings; whereby hath not only delivered us from many wicked plots and designs, which, if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and destruction upon this kingdom; but, out of those attempts, hath produced divers evident and remarkable advantages to the furtherance of our services, which we have been desirous to inform to our sovereign lord the king, and to the church and state, in providing for the public peace and prosperity of his majesty and all his realms; which, in the presence of the same all-seeing Deity, we protest to have been, and still to be, the only end of all our counsels and endeavours; wherein we have resolved to continue freed and enlarged from all private aims, personal respects, or passions whatsoever. In which resolution we are nothing discouraged, although the heads of the Malignant Party, disappointed of their prey, the Religion and Liberty of this kingdom, which they were ready to seize upon and devour before the beginning of this parliament, have still persisted, by new practises, both of force and subtlety, to recover the same again; for which purpose they have made several attempts for the bringing up of the army: they afterwards projected the false accusation of the lord Kimbolton and the 5 members of the house of commons; which being in itself of an odious nature, they yet so far prevailed with his majesty as to procure him to take it upon himself; but when the unchangeable duty and faithfulness of the parliament could not be wrought upon, by such a fact as that, to withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from his majesty; they have, with much art and industry, advised his majesty to suffer divers unjust scandals and imputations upon the parliament to be published in his name; whereby they might make it odious to the people, and, by their help, to destroy that, which, hitherto, hath been the only means of their own preservation. For this purpose they have drawn his majesty into the Northern parts, far from the parliament, that so false rumours might have time to get credit, and the just defences of the parliament find a more tedious, difficult and disadvantageous access, after those false imputations and slanders had been first rooted in the apprehension of his majesty and his subjects; which, the more speedily to effect, they have caused a press to be transported to York, from whence several Papers and Writings of that kind are conveyed to all parts of the kingdom, without the authority of the great seal, in an unusual and illegal manner, and without the advice of his majesty's privy counsel; from the greater and better part whereof having withdrawn himself, as well as from his great council of parliament, he is thereby exposed to the wicked and unfaithful counsels of such as have made the wisdom and the justice of parliament dangerous to themselves; and this danger they labour to prevent by hiding their own guilt, under the name and shadow of the king; infusing into him their own fears, and, as much as in them lies, aspersing his royal person and honour with their own infamy; from both which it hath always been as much the care, as it is the duty, of the parliament to preserve his majesty, and to fix the guilt of all evil actions and counsels upon those who have been the authors of them. Amongst divers Writings of this kind, we, the lords and commons in parliament, have taken into our consideration two printed Papers; the first containing a Declaration which we received from his majesty, in Answer to that which was presented to his majesty, from both houses of parliament, at Newmarket, the 9th of March, 1641, the other, his majesty's Answer to the Petition of both houses, presented to his majesty the 26th of March, 1642; both which are filled with harsh censures and causeless charges upon the parliament, concerning which we hold it necessary to give satisfaction to the kingdom, seeing we find it very difficult to satisfy his majesty; whom, to our great grief, we have found to be so engaged to, and possessed by, those misapprehensions which evil counsellors have wrought in him, that our most humble and faithful Remonstrances have rather irritated and embittered, than any thing allayed or mitigated, the sharp expressions which his majesty hath been pleased to make in Answer unto them; for the manifestation whereof, and of our own innocence, we desire that all his majesty's loving subjects may take notice of these particulars. We know no occasion given by us, which might move his majesty to tell us, 'That in our Declaration, presented at Newmarket, there were some expressions different from the usual language to princes.' Neither did we tell his majesty, either in words or in effect, 'That if he did not join with us in an act, which his majesty conceived might prove prejudicial and dangerous to himself and the whole kingdom, we would make a law without him, and impose it upon the people.' That which we desired was That, in regard of the imminent danger of the kingdom, the Militia, for the security of his majesty and his people, might be put under the command of such noble and faithful persons as they had all cause to confide in: and such was the necessity of this preservation, that we declared, 'That if his majesty should refuse to join with us therein, the two houses of parliament, being the supreme court and highest council of the kingdom, were enabled, by their own authority, to provide for the repulsing of such imminent and evident danger, not by any new law of their own making, as hath been untruly suggested to his majesty; but by the most antient law of this kingdom, even that which is fundamental and essential to the constitution and substance of it.' Although we never desired to encourage his majesty to such Replies as might produce any contestation betwixt him and his parliament, of which we never found better effect than loss of time and hinderance of the public affairs; yet we have been far from telling him, 'Of how little value his words would be with us, much less when they are accompanied with actions of love and justice.' His majesty hath more reason to find fault with those wicked counsellors, who have so often bereaved him of the honour, and his people of the fruit, of many gracious Speeches which he made to them; such as those in the end of the last parliament; 'That on the word of a King, and as he was a gentleman, he would redress the grievances of his people, as well out of parliament as in it.' Were the searching the studies and chambers, yea, the pockets, of some, both of the nobility and commons, the very next day; the commitment of Mr. Bellasis John Hotham, and Mr. Crew; the continued oppressions by Ship-Money, Coat and Conduct-Money, with the manifold imprisonments, and other Vexations thereupon, and other ensuing violations of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, (all which were the effects of the evil Counsel, and abundantly declared in a general Remonstrance of the State of the kingdom) actions of love and justice suitable to such words as those? As gracious was his majesty's Speech in the beginning of this parliament, 'That he was resolved to put himself freely and clearly, upon the love and affection of his English subjects.' Whether his casual complaints and jealousies, the unjust imputations so often cast upon his parliament, the denial of their necessary defence by the maintenance of the Militia, his dangerous absencing himself from his great council, like to produce such a mischievous division in the kingdom have not been more suitable to other men's counsels than to his own words, will easily appear to any indifferent judgment. Neither have his latter Speeches been better used and preserved by these evil and wicked counsellors, could any words be fuller of love and justice than these, in his Answer to the Message sent the house of commons the 31st of December 1641, 'We do engage unto you solemnly Word of a king, that the security of all and one of you from violence is, and ever shall be much our care, as the preservation of our children.' And could any actions be fuller of injustice and violence than that of the attorney-General, in falsely accusing the six members of parliament, and the other proceed thereupon, within three or four days after the Message? For the full view whereof let the Declaration, made of those proceedings be perused. By these instances (we could say many more) let the world judge, who do to be taxed with disvaluing his majesty's words they who have, as much as in them lies, and sullied them with such foul counsels to the parliament, who have ever manifested with joy and delight, their humble thanks for those gracious words and actions of love and justice, which have been conformed thereunto. The king is pleased to disavow having any such evil counsel, or counsels as are mentioned in our Declaration, or knowledge; and we hold it our duty to avow there are such, or else we must say That all the ill things, done of late in his majesty's name, have been done by him wherein we should neither follow the dictates of the law, nor the affection of our own hearts, which is, as much as may be, to clear him from all imputation of misgovernment, and lay the fault upon his ministers. The accusing of six members of parliament, justifying Mr. Attorney in that false action; the violent coming to the house of commons; the denial of the Militia; the sending Messages to both houses, contrary to the nom of former kings ; the long and remote absence of his majesty from parliament ; the heavy and wrongful taxes upon both houses ; he cherishing and countenancing a discontented party in the kingdom against them : these certainly are the fruits of very ill counsel, up to put the kingdom into a combustion, to under the supplies of Ireland, and to countenance the proceedings and pretensions of the rebels there ; and the authors of these evil counsels, we conceive must needs be known to his majesty ; and we hope our labouring with his majesty to have these discovered and brought to a just censure, will not so much wound his honour in the opinion of his good subjects, as his labouring to preserve and conceal them. And whereas his majesty saith, He could wish that his own immediate actions, which he avows on his own honour, might not be so roughly censured under that common style of evil counsellors : we could also heartily wish, we had not cause to make that style so common ; but how often and undutifully soever these wicked counsellors fix their dishonour upon the king, by making his majesty the author of those evil actions which are the effects of their own evil counsels, we his majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects can use no other plea, according to that maxim in the law, the King can do no Wrong ; but if any ill be committed in matter of state, the council must answer for it ; if in matters of justice, the judges. We lay no charge upon his majesty, which should put him upon that apology, concerning his faithful and zealous affection to the Protestant profession ; neither doth his majesty endeavour to clear those in greatest authority out him, by whom we say, that design hath been potentially carried on for divers years ; and rather wish that the mercies of Heaven, than judgments, may be manifested upon them ; that there have been such, there are so many and frequent evidences, that we believe there is none, either Protestant or Papist, who hath had any reasonable view of the passages of latter times, but, either in fear or hope, did expect a sudden issue of this design. We have no way transgressed against the Act of Oblivion, by remembering the intended war against Scotland, as a branch of that design to alter religion, by those wicked counsels, from which God did then deliver us, which we ought never to forget.—That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and cherished by the Popish and malignant party in England, is not only affirmed by the rebels, but may be cleared by many other proofs : the same rebellious principles pretended religion, the same politic ends are went in both ; and their malicious designs and practices are masked and disguised with the same false colour of their earnest zeal to vindicate his majesty's prerogative from the supposed oppression of the parliament : how can these treacherous pretences have been countenanced by some evil counsel about his majesty may appear in this, That the Proclamation, whereby they were declared Traitors, was so long withheld as to the 2nd of Jan. though the Rebellion broke forth in Oct. before ; and then no more but 40 copies appointed to be printed, with a special command from his majesty not to exceed that number ; and that none of them should be published till his majesty's pleasure were further signified, as by the warrant appears ;* so that a few only could take notice of it : this was made more observable, by the late contrary proceedings against the Scots ; who were, in a very quick and sharp manner, proclaimed traitors ; and those Proclamations forthwith dispersed, with as much diligence as might be, through all the kingdom, and ordered to be read in all churches, accompanied with public prayers and execrations. Another evidence of favour and countenance to the rebels, in some of power about his majesty, is this, That they have put forth, in his majesty's name, a causeless complaint against the parliament, which speaketh the same language of the parliament which the rebels do ; thereby to raise a belief in men's minds, that his majesty's affections are alienated, as well as his person is removed, from that his great council. All which doth exceedingly retard the supplies of Ireland, and more advance the proceedings of the rebels, than any jealousy or misapprehension begotten in his subjects, by the declaration of the rebels, the injunctions of Rosetti, or the information of Tristram Whitcombe : so that, considering the present state and temper of both kingdoms, his royal presence is far more necessary here than it can be in Ireland, for the redemption or protection of his subjects there. And whether there be any cause of his majesty's great indignation, for being reproached to have intended force or threatening to the parliament, we desire them to consider who shall read our Declaration ; in which there is no word tending to any such reproach : and certainly we have been more tender of his majesty's honour in this point, than he, whosoever he was, that did write this Declaration ; where, in his majesty's name, he doth call God to witness, ' He never had any such thought, or knew of any such resolution of bringing up the army ; which, truly, will seem strange to those, who shall read the deposition of Mr. Goring, the information of Mr. Percy, and divers examinations of Mr. Wilmot, Mr. Pollard, and others ; the examinations of Capt. Legge, sir Jacob Astley, and sir John Conyers; and consider the condition and nature of the Petition, which was sent unto sir Jacob Astley, under the approbation of C. R. which his majesty doth now acknowledge to be his own hand, which, being full of scandal to the parliament, might have proved dangerous to the whole kingdom, if the army should have interposed betwixt the king, and them, as was desired.—We do not affirm That his majesty's warrant was granted for the passage of Mr. Jermaine, after the desire of both houses for the restraint of his servants; but only, That he did pass over, after that restraint, by virtue of such a warrant. We know the warrant bears date the day before our desire; yet it seems strange to those who know what great respect and power Mr. Jermaine had in court, that he should begin his journey in such haste, and in apparel so unfit for travel, as a black sattin suit and white boots, if his going away were designed the day before.—The Accusation of the lord Kimbolton and the five Members of the house of commons, is called a Breach of Privilege; and truly so it was, and a very high one, far above any satisfaction that hath been yet given. How can it be said to be 'largely satisfied,' so long as his maj. laboured to preserve Mr. Attorney from punishment, who was the visible actor in it? So long as his maj. hath not only justified him, but, by his letter, declared, 'That it was his duty to accuse them; and that he would have punished him, if he had not done it?' So long as those members have not the means of clearing their innocence, and the authors of that malicious charge undiscovered, though both houses of parliament have several times petitioned his majesty to discover them; and that not only upon grounds of common justice, but by act of parliament, his majesty is bound to do it? So long as the king refuseth to pass a bill for their discharge, alledging, 'That the Narrative in that bill is against his honour;' whereby he seems still to avow the matter of that false and scandalous accusation, though he deserts the prosecution; offering to pass a bill for their acquittal, yet with intimation, 'That they must desert the avowing their own innocence?' which would more wound them in honour, than secure them in law. And, in vindication of this great privilege of parliament, we do not know that we have invaded any privilege belonging to his majesty, as is alledged in this Declaration. But we look not upon this, only, in the notion of a Breach of Privilege, which might be, though the accusation were true or false; but under the notion of a heinous crime in the Attorney and all other subjects who had a hand in it; a crime against the law of nature; against the rules of justice, that innocent men should be charged with so great an offence as Treason, in the face of the highest judicatory of the kingdom; whereby their lives and estates, their blood and honour, are endangered, without witness, without evidence, without all possibility of reparation, in a legal course; yet a crime of such a nature, that his majesty's command can no more warrant, than it can any other acts of injustice. It is true, those things which are evil in their own nature, such as a false testimony or false accusation, cannot be the subject of any command, or induce any obligation of obedience upon any man, by any authority whatsoever; therefore the Attorney, in this case, was bound to refuse to execute such a command, unless he had some such evidence or testimony as might have warranted him against the parties, and be liable to make satisfaction if it should prove false: and it is sufficiently known to every man, and adjudged in parliament, that the king can be neither relator, informer, nor witness. If it rest as it is, without further satisfaction, no future parliament can be safe, but that the members may be taken and destroyed at pleasure; yea the very principles of government and justice will be in danger to be dissolved.—We do not conceive that numbers do make an assembly unlawful; but when either the end or manner of their carriage shall be unlawful. Divers just occasions might draw the citizens to Westminster, where many public and private Petitions, and other causes, were depending in parliament; and why that should be found more faulty in the citizens, than the resort of great numbers every day in the term to the ordinary courts of justice, we know not. That these citizens were notoriously provoked and assaulted at Westminster, by colonel Lunsford, captain Hide, with divers others, and by some of the servants of the abp. of York, is sufficiently proved; and that afterward they were more violently wounded, and most barbarously mangled with swords by the officers and soldiers near Whitehall, many of them being without weapons, and giving no cause of distaste, is likewise proved by several testimonies: but of any scandalous or seditious misdemeanors of theirs, that might give his maj. good cause to suppose his own person, or those of his royal consort or children, to be in apparent danger, we have had no proof ever offered to either house; and if there had been any complaint of that kind, it is no doubt the houses would have been as forward to join in an Order for the Suppressing of such tumults, as they were, not long before, upon another occasion, when they made an Order to that purpose: whereas those officers and soldiers, which committed that violence upon so many of the citizens at Whitehall, were cherished and fostered in his majesty's house; and when, not long after, the common council of London presented a Petition to his majesty for reparation of those injuries, his majesty's Answer was, without hearing the proof of the complainants, 'That if any citizen were wounded or ill treated, his maj. was confidently assured that it happened by their own evil and corrupt demeanour.'—We hope it cannot be thought contrary to the duty and wisdom of a parliament, if many concurrent, and frequently reiterated and renewed, advertisements from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts; if the solicitation of the Pope's nuncio and our own discontented fugitives, do make us jealous and watchful for the safety of the state. And we have been very careful to make our expressions thereof so easy and so plain to the capacity and understanding of the people, that nothing might, justly, stick with them with reflection upon the person of his majesty; wherein we appeal to the judgment of any indifferent person, who shall read and strue our own words.—We must maintain the Ground of our Fears to be of that moment that we cannot discharge the trust and duty which lies upon us, unless we do apply ourselves to the use of those means, to which the law hath enabled us, in cases of this nature, by the necessary defence of the kingdom: and if his majesty doth graciously declare, 'The law shall be the Measure of his Power;' so lo we most heartily profess, That we shall always make it the Rule of our Obedience."
 Vol. II,

Prudent Omissions in the KING'S ANSWER.

"The next Point of our Declaration was, with such caution, artificially passed over by him who drew his majesty's Answer; it being indeed the foundation of all our misery and his majesty's trouble, That he is pleased to hear several taxes upon his parliament, without any particular charge to which they may give satisfaction; and that he hath often conceived displeasure against particular persons upon misinformation, and although those informations have been clearly proved to be false, yet he would never bring the accusers to question; which layeth an impossibility upon honest men of clearing themselves, and gives encouragement unto false and unworthy persons to trouble him with untrue and groundless informations. Three particulars we mentioned in our declaration, which the penner of that Answer had good cause to omit, viz. 'The Words proposed to be spoken at Kensington; the pretended Articles against the Queen; and the groundless Accusation of the 6 Members of the parliament;' there being nothing to be said in defence or denial of any of them.—Concerning his majesty's desire to join with his parliament, and with his faithful subjects, in defence of Religion and the Public good of the kingdom;' we doubt not but he will do it fully when evil Counsellors shall be removed from about him; and until that be, as we shewed before of words, so must we also say of laws, that they cannot secure us: Witness the Petition of Right, which was followed with such an inundation of illegal taxes, that we had just cause to think that the payment of 820,000 l. was an easy burden to the common-wealth in exchange of them: and we cannot but justly think, that, if there be a continuance of such counsellors and favour to them, they will, by some wicked device or other, make the bill of the Triennial Parliament, and those other excellent laws mentioned in his majesty's Declaration, of less value than words.—That excellent bill, for the 'Continuance of this Parliament,' was so necessary, that, without it, we could not have raised such great sums of money for the service of his maj. and the common-wealth as we have done; and, without which, the ruin and destruction of the kingdom must needs have followed: and we are resolved the gracious favour of his majesty expressed in that bill, and the advantage and security which, thereby, we have from being dissolved, shall not encourage us to do any thing, which, otherwise, had not been fit to have been done. And we are ready to make it good before all the world, that although his maj. hath passed many bills very advantageous for the subject; yet, in none of them, have we bereaved his majesty of any just, necessary, or profitable prerogative of the crown.—We so earnestly desire his majesty's Return to London, that upon it, we conceive, depends the very safety and being of both his kingdoms. And therefore we must protest, That, as for the time past, neither the government of London, nor any laws of the land, have lost their life and force for his security; so, for the future, we shall be ready to do or say any thing that may stand with the duty or honour of a parliament, which may raise a mutual confidence betwixt his majesty and us, as we do wish, and as the affairs of the kingdom do require.—Thus far the Answer to that which is called his majesty's Declaration hath led us, now we come to that which is intitled, 'His Majesty's Answer to the Petition of both houses, presented to him at York the 20th of March, 1642.' In the beginning whereof his maj. wisheth, 'That our Privileges on all parts were so stated, that this way of correspondence might be preserved, with that freedom which hath been used of old.' We know nothing introduced by us, that gives any impediment hereunto; neither have we affirmed our privileges to be broken, when his majesty denies us any thing, or gives a reason why he cannot grant it; or that those, who advised such denial, were enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and favourers of the Irish Rebellion; in which aspersion, that is turned into a general assertion, which, in our Votes, is applied to a particular case; wherefore we must maintain our Votes, 'That those who advised his majesty to contradict that which both houses, in the question concerning the Militia, had declared to be law, and command it should not be obeyed, is a high Breach of Privilege; and that those who advised his majesty to absent himself from his parliament, are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and justly to be suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland.' the Reasons of both are evident; because, in the first, there is a great derogation from the trust and authority of parliament; and, in the second, as much advantage to the proceedings and hopes of the rebels, as may be. And we hold it a very causeless imputation upon the parliament, That we have herein any way impeached, much less taken away, the freedom of his majesty's vote; which doth not import a liberty for his majesty to deny any thing, how necessary soever, for the preservation of the kingdom; much less a licence to evil counsellors to advise any thing, though never so destructive to his majesty and his people.—By the Message of the 20th of Jan. his maj. did propound to both houses of parliament, 'That they would, with all speed, fall into a serious consideration of all those particulars which they thought necessary, as well for the Upholding and Maintaining his majesty's just and regal Authority, and for Settling his Revenue, as for the present and future establishing our privileges; the free and quiet enjoying our estates; the liberties of our persons; the security of the true religion professed in the church of England; and the settling of ceremonies in such a manner as may take away all just offence; and to digest it into one entire body.'—To that point of Upholding and Maintaining his Royal Authority; we say nothing hath been done to the prejudice of it, that should require any new provision. To the other, of Settling the Revenues; the parliament hath no way abridged or disordered his just revenue; but it is true, that much waste and confusion of his majesty's estate hath been made, by those evil and unfaithful ministers, whom he hath employed in the managing of it; whereby his own ordinary expences would have been disappointed, and the safety of the kingdom more endangered, if the parliament had not, in some measure, provided for his household, and for some of the forts, more than they were bound to do; and they are still willing to settle such a revenue upon his maj. as may make him live royally, plentifully, and safely; but they cannot, in wisdom and fidelity to the commonwealth, do this, till he shall chuse such counsellors and officers as may order and dispose it to the public good; and not apply it to the ruin and destruction of his people, as heretofore it hath been: but this, and the other matters concerning ourselves, being works of great importance, and full of intricacy, will require so long a time of deliberation, that the kingdom might be ruined before we should effect them; wherefore we thought it necessary, first to be suitors to his maj. so to order the Militia, that, the kingdom being secured, we might, with more ease and safety, apply ourselves to debate of that Message; wherein we have been interrupted by his majesty's denial of the Ordinance concerning the same; because it would be in vain for us to labour in other things, and, in the mean time, to leave ourselves naked to the malice of so many enemies, both at home and abroad: yet we have not been altogether negligent of those things, which his maj. is pleased to propound in that Message; we have agreed upon a Book of Rates, in a larger proportion than hath been granted to any of his majesty's predecessors, which is a considerable support of his majesty's publick charge; and have likewise prepared divers propositions and bills for the preservation of our religion and liberties, which we intend shortly to present to his majesty; and to do whatsoever is fit for us, to make up this unpleasant breach betwixt his maj. and the parliament.—Whereas divers exceptions are here taken concerning the Militia; first, 'That his majesty never denied the thing, but accepted the persons, except for corporations; only that he denied the way.' To which we answer, That that exception takes off London, and all other great towns and cities, which makes a great part of the kingdom; and for the way of Ordinance, it is ancient, more speedy, more easily alterable; and, in all these and other respects, more proper and more applicable to the present occasion, than a Bill, which his majesty calls 'the only good old way of imposing upon his subjects.' It should seem that neither his majesty's royal predecessors, nor our ancestors, have heretofore been of that opinion; for in 37 Edw. 3. we find this remedy. 'The chancellor made declaration of the challenge of the parliament: the king desired to know the griefs of his subjects, and to redress enormities. The last day of the parliament the king demanded of the whole estates, Whether they would have such things as they agreed on, by way of Ordinance or Statute; who answered, By way of Ordinance, for that they might amend the same at their pleasure; and so it was.* But his majesty objects further, 'That there is somewhat in the Preface, in which he could not consent with justice to his honour and innocence; and that thereby he is excluded from any power in the disposing thereof.' These objections may seem somewhat, but indeed will appear nothing, when it shall be considered, That nothing in the preamble lays any charge upon his majesty; and in the body of the Ordinance, that excludes his royal authority in the disposing or execution of it; but only it is provided, 'That it should be signified by both houses of parliament,' as that channel through which it will be best derived, and, most certainly, to those ends for which it is intended: and let all the world judge, whether we have not reason to insist upon it, That the strength of the kingdom should rather be ordered according to the direction or advice of the Great Council of the land, equally intrusted by the king and the kingdom, than that the safety of the king, parliament, and kingdom should be left at the devotion of a few unknown counsellors; many of them not intrusted at all by the king in any public way, nor at all confided in by the kingdom. We wish the Danger were not imminent, or not still continuing; but we cannot conceive that the long time spent in this debate is evidence sufficient, 'That there was no such necessity or danger, but a bill might easily have been prepared; for when many cannot do concur to the danger of a state, the interruption of any one may hinder the execution of the rest, and yet the design be still kept on.

foot for better opportunities: who knows whether the ill success of the rebels in Ireland hath not hindered the insurrection of the Papists here? Whether the preservation of the six Members of the parliament, falsely accused, hath not prevented that plot of the breaking the neck of the parliament, of which we were informed from France, not long before they were accused? Yet, since his maj. had been deposed to express his pleasure rather for a Bill than an Ordinance, and that he sent in one to that purpose, we readily entertained it; and, with some small and necessary alterations, speedily passed the same: but, contrary to the custom of parliament, and our expectations grounded upon his majesty's own invitation of us to that way, and the other reasons manifested in our Declaration concerning the Militia, of the 5th of May, instead of his royal writ, we met with an absolute refusal.—If it be a matter of those our Votes of the 15th and 16th of March, be according to law, we hope his majesty will allow the subjects to be bound to them; because he hath said, 'He will make a Law the rule of his Power:' and if the question be, Whether that be law which the lords and commons have once declared to be; who shall be the judge? Not his majesty, for the king judgeth not of matters of law, but his courts; and his courts, though sitting in his authority, expect not his assent in matters of law: not any other courts, for they cannot judge in that case, because they are inferior; no appeal lying to them from parliament, the judgment whereof is, in the eye of the law, the king's judgment in his highest court; though the king, in his person, he neither present nor assenting thereunto.—The reasons at which his majesty takes exceptions to these: 1. 'That the king's absence so far from the parliament, is not only an objection, but may be a destruction to the affairs of Ireland.' 2. That when the lords and commons shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach the privilege of parliament. 3. That those reasons that advised his maj. to absent himself from the parliament, are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and justly may be suspected to be favourers of the Rebellion in Ireland. That the kingdom hath been of late, and is, in so imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a Popish and discontented party at home, that there is an urgent and intreatable necessity of putting his majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his majesty and his people. 5. That the lords and commons, fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their duty to provide a suitable prevention, have, in several Petitions, addressed themselves to his majesty for the ordering and disposing of the Militia of the kingdom, in such a way as was agreed upon, by the wisdom of both houses, to be most effectual and proper for the present exigencies of the kingdom, yet could not obtain it; but his majesty did, several times, refuse to give his royal assent thereunto. 6. That in this case of extreme danger, and his maj.'s refusal, the Ordinance of parliament agreed upon by both houses, for the Militia, doth oblige the people; and ought to be obeyed, by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.—By all which it doth appear, that there is no colour of this tax, 'That we go about to introduce a new law,' much less to exercise an arbitrary power; but indeed to prevent it: for this law is as old as the kingdom. That the kingdom must not be without a means to preserve itself; which, that it may be done without confusion, this nation hath intrusted certain hands with a power to provide, in an orderly and regular way, for the good and safety of the whole; which power, by the constitution of this kingdom, is in his maj. and in his parliament together; yet since the prince, being but one person, is more subject to accidents of nature and chance, whereby the commonwealth may be deprived of the fruit of that trust which was in part reposed in him; in cases of such necessity, that the kingdom may not be enforced presently to return to its first principles, and every man left to do what is right in his own eyes, without either guide or rule, the wisdom of this state hath intrusted the houses of parliament with a power to supply what shall be wanting on the part of the prince; as is evident by the constant custom and practice thereof, in cases of non-age, nature's disability, and captivity; and the like reason doth, and must, hold for the exercise of the same power in such cases, where the royal trust cannot be or is not discharged, and that the kingdom runs an evident and imminent danger thereby; which danger, having been declared by the lords and commons in parliament; there needs not the authority of any person or court to affirm, nor is it in the power of any person or court to revoke, that judgment.—We know the king hath ways enough, in his ordinary courts of justice, to punish such seditious Pamphlets and Sermons as are any way prejudicial to his rights, honour, and authority; and if any of them have been so insolently violated and villified, his majesty's own counsel and officers have been to blame, and not the parliament; never we did restrain any proceedings of that kind in other courts, nor refuse any fit complaint to us. The 'Protestation Protested' was referred by the commons house to a committee, and the author not being produced, the printer was committed to prison, and the book voted by that committee to be burnt; but sir Edw. Dering, who was to make that report of the Votes of that committee, neglected to make it: The 'Apprentices Protestation' was never complained of; but the other seditious pamphlet, 'To your Tears, O Israel,' was once questioned, and the full prosecution of it was not interrupted by any fault of either house; whose forwardness to do his maj. all right therein may plainly appear, in that a committee of lords and commons was purposely appointed to take such informations as the king's counsel should present, concerning seditious words, practices or tumults, pamphlets, or sermons, tending to the derogation of his majesty's rights or prerogative; and his counsel were enjoined by that committee, to inquire and present them, who several times met thereupon, and received this Answer and Declaration from the king's counsel, 'That they knew of no such thing as yet.'—If his maj. had used the service of such a one in penning this Answer, who understood the laws and government of this kingdom, he would not have thought it legally in his power to deny his parliament a Guard, when they stood in need of it, since every ordinary court hath it; neither would his majesty, if he had been well informed of the laws, have refused such a guard as they desired, it being in the power of inferior courts to command their own guard; neither would he have imposed upon them such a guard under a commander which they could not confide in; which is clearly against the privileges of parliament, and of which they found very dangerous effects, and therefore desired to have it discharged: but such a guard, and so commanded, as the houses of parliament desired, they could never obtain of his majesty; and the placing of a guard about them contrary to their desire, was not to grant a guard to them, but, in effect, to set one upon them. All which considered, we believe, in the judgments of any indifferent persons, it will not be thought strange if there were a more than ordinary resort of people at Westminster, of such as came willingly, of their own accord, to be witnesses and helpers of the safety of them whom all his majesty's good subjects are bound to defend from violence and danger; or that such a concourse as this, they carrying themselves quietly and peaceably as they did, ought, in his majesty's apprehension, or can, in the interpretation of the law, be held tumultuary and seditious.—When his majesty, in that question of 'Violation of the Laws,' had expressed the observation of them indefinitely, without any limitation of time; although we never said or thought any thing that might look like a reproach to his majesty, yet we had reason to remember that it had formerly been otherwise, lest we should seem to desert our complaints and proceedings thereupon, as his maj. doth seem but little to like or approve of them; for although he doth acknowledge here that great mischief which grew by that arbitrary power then complained of, yet such are continually preferred and countenanced as were friends or favourers of, or related unto, the chief authors and actors of that arbitrary power and of those false colours and suggestions of imminent danger and necessity, whereby they did make it plausible unto his majesty; and, on the other side, such as did appear against them are daily discountenanced and disgraced; which, whilst it shall be so, we have no reason to judge the disease to be yet killed and dead at root; and therefore no reason to bury it in oblivion. And whilst we behold the spawn of those mischievous principles cherished and fostered in that new generation of counsellors, friends and abettors of the former, or at least concurring with them in their malignity against the proceedings of this parliament, we cannot think ourselves secure from the like or worse danger.—And here the penner of the Answer bestows an admonition upon the parliament, bidding us 'take heed we fall not on the same error, upon the same suggestion; but he might have well spared this, which could have shewed wherein we had committed any power otherwise than by the rule of the law, or could have found a more authentic or higher judge in matters of law than the court of parliament. It is declared in his majesty's name 'That he is resolved to keep rule himself, and, to his power, to require some of all others.' We must needs acknowledge that such a resolution is like to be much happiness and blessing to his majesty, all his kingdoms; yet, with humility, we confess we have not the fruit of it, in that of the lord Kimbolton, and the other 5 Members, accused contrary to law, both common and statute law, and yet remaining untried, which case was remembered in our Declaration as a strange and unheard-of violation of our law; but the penner of this Answer thought it pass it over, hoping that many would read his maj.'s Answer, which hath been so carefully perused, who would not read our Declaration. Whereas, after our ample thanks and acknowledgement of his majesty's favour in passing many good bills, we said, 'That truth and necessity enforced us to add this, that, in about the time of passing those bills, some sign or other hath been on foot, which, had taken effect, would not only have done us of the fruit of those bills, but would have reduced us to a worse condition of confusion than that wherein the parliament found it.' It is now told us, 'That the king made most sensible of what we cast upon him in requital of those good bills;' whereas, in our usual tenderness of his majesty's honour, we did not mention him at all: but so vicious are those wicked counsellors to the dishonour of their master and sovereign, as much as they can, they lay their own shame and guilt upon his shoulders.—Here is also called to witness 'his majesty's intentions at the passing of those laws.' We will not question; neither did we give occasion for such a solemn assertion of this is. The Devil is likewise defied to prove there was any design, with his majesty's knowledge or privy. This might well have been spared; for we spake nothing of his maj. but since we are so far taxed as to have affirmed, 'That we laid a notorious and malicious imputation upon his majesty,' we have thought it necessary for the just defence of our innocence, to cause the Oaths and Declarations, which have been taken

design, to be published in a full Narration, to the satisfaction of all his majesty's subjects, out of which we shall now offer some few particulars; whereby the world may judge whether we could have proceeded with more tenderness towards his majesty than we have done. Mr. Piercy confesseth, 'That the king first asked us, Whether he were engaged in any cabal concerning the army, and commanded him to go with Mr. Piercy, Mr. Jermyn, and some others whom they should find within at Mr. Piercy's chamber, where they took the oath of secrecy; and then debated of a design, pronounced by Mr. Jermyn, to secure the Tower, and to consider of bringing up the Army to London.' And captain Legg confessed 'He had received the draught of a Petition in the king's presence;' and his majesty acknowledged it was from his own hand. And whosoever reads the sum of that Petition, as it was proved by the testimony of sir Jacob Ashley, sir John Meyers, and captain Legg, will easily perceive some points in it apt to beget in them some discontent against the parliament. And can any man believe there was no design in the causation of the lord Kimbolton and the rest, which his majesty doth avow himself to be both a commander and an actor? These things being so, it will easily appear to be as much against the rules of prudence, that the penner of this Answer should entangle his maj. in this necessary apology; as it is against the rules of justice, that any reparation from us should either yielded or demanded.—It is professed in his majesty's name, 'That he is truly sensible of the burdens of his people;' which gives us hope that he will take that course which will be most effectual, to ease them of these burdens; that is, to join with his parliament in preserving the peace of the kingdom; which, by his absence from them, hath been much endangered; and which, by hindering the voluntary adventurers for recovery of Ireland, and disabling the subjects to discharge the great tax laid upon them, is like to make the war much more heavy to the kingdom. And for his majesty's wants; the parliament have been no cause of them: we have not diminished his just Revenue; but have much increased his public Charge, and somewhat his private. And we shall be ready, in a parliamentary way, to settle his revenue in such an honourable proportion, as may be answerable both, when he shall put himself into such a state of government, that his subjects may securely to enjoy his just protection for their religion, laws, and liberties.—We never refused his majesty's gracious offer of a free and general Pardon, only we said, 'It could be no security to our present Fears and Jealousies: and we gave a reason for it, 'That those fears do not arise out of any guilt of our own actions; but out of the evil designs and attempts of others.' And we leave it to the world to judge, whether we, herein, have deserved so heavy a tax and exclamation, 'That it was a strange world when princes' proffered favours are counted reproaches,' such are the words of his majesty's Answer. We do esteem that offer as an act of princely grace and bounty; which, since this parliament began, we have humbly desired we might obtain; and do still hold it very necessary and advantageous for the generality of the subjects, upon whom these taxes and subsidies lie heaviest; but we see, upon every occasion, how unhappy we are in his majesty's misapprehensions of our words and actions.—We are fully of the king's mind as it is here declared, 'That he may rest so secure of the affections of his subjects, that he should not stand in need of foreign force to preserve him from oppression;' and are confident, that he shall never want an abundant evidence of the good wishes and assistance of his whole kingdom; especially if he shall be pleased to hold to that gracious resolution of building upon that sure foundation, 'the Law of the Land;' but why his maj. should take it ill, that we, having received informations so deeply concerning the safety of the kingdom, should think them proper to be considered of, we cannot conceive; for although the name of the person were unknown, yet that which was more substantial to the probability of the report was known; that is, that he was servant to the lord Digby; who, in his presumptuous Letter to the queen, and other letters to sir L. Dives, had intimated some wicked propositions suitable to that information: but that this should require reparation, we hold it as far from justice as it is from truth, 'That we have mixed any malice with these rumours, thereby to feed the fears and jealousies of the people.'—It is affirmed, 'his majesty is driven' (but not by us yet) 'from us.' Perchance hereafter, if there be opportunity of gaining more credit, they will not be wanting who will suggest unto his majesty, That it is done 'by us.' And if his majesty were driven from us, we hope it was not by his own fears, but by the fears of the lord Digby and his retinue of cavaliers: and those not fears of any tumultuary violence, but of their just punishment for their manifold insolence, and intended violence, against the parliament; and this is expressly declared by the lord Digby himself, when he told those cavaliers, 'That the principal cause of his majesty's going out of town was to save them from being trampled in the dirt: but of his majesty's person there was no cause of fear, in the greatest heat of the people's indignation after the accusation; and at his majesty's violent coming to the house there was no shew of any evil intention against his royal person: of which there can be no better evidence than this, That he came next day without a guard into the city, where he heard nothing but prayers and petitions; no threatnings or irreverent Speeches that might give him any just occasion of fear, that we have heard of, or that his maj. express: for he stayed near a week after at Whitehall, in a secure and peaceable condition; whereby we are induced to believe, that there is no difficulty nor doubt at all, but his majesty's residence near London may be as safe as in any part of the kingdom. We are most assured of the faithfulness of the city and suburbs; and for ourselves, we shall quicken the vigour of the laws, the industry of the magistrate, and the authority of parliament, for the suppressing of all tumultuary insolencies whatsoever; and for the vindicating of his honour from all insupportable and insolent scandals, if any such shall be found to be raised upon him, as are mentioned in this Answer: and we therefore think it altogether unnecessary, and exceeding inconvenient, to adjourn the parliament to any other place.—Where the desire of a good understanding betwixt the king and the parliament is, on both parts, so earnest, as is here professed of his majesty to be in him, and we have sufficiently testified to be in ourselves, it seems strange we should be so long asunder: It can be nothing but evil and malicious counsel, misrepresenting our carriage to him in disposing his favours to us: and as it shall be far from us to take any advantage of his majesty's supposed straits, as to desire, much less to compel, him to that which his honour or interest may render unpleasant and grievous to him; so we hope that his maj. will not make his own understanding or reason the rule of his government; but will suffer himself to be assisted with a wise and prudent counsel, that may deal faithfully betwixt him and his people: and that he will remember that his resolutions do concern kingdoms; and therefore ought not to be moulded by his own, much less by any other private person, which is not alike proportionable to so great a trust. And therefore we still desire and hope that his maj. will not be guided by his own understanding, or think those courses straits and necessities, to which he shall be advised by the wisdom of both houses of parliament, which are the eyes in this body politic, whereby his maj. is, by the constitution of this kingdom, to discern the differences of those things which concern the public peace and safety thereof.—We have given his majesty no cause to say, 'That we do meanly value the discharge of his public duty.' Whatsoever acts of grace or justice have been done, they proceeded from his maj. by the advice and counsel of his parliament; yet we have and shall always answer them with constant gratitude, obedience, and affection: and although many things have been done, since this parliament, of another nature, yet we shall not cease to desire the continued protection of Almighty God upon his majesty; and most humbly petition him to cast from him all those evil and contrary counsels, which have, in many particulars formerly mentioned, much detracted from the honour of his government, the happiness of his own estate, and prosperity of his people. And having past so many dangers from abroad, so many conspiracies at home, and brought on the public work so far, through the greatest difficulties that ever stood in opposition to a parliament, to such a degree of success, that nothing seems to be left in our way able to hinder the full accomplishment of our desires and endeavours for the public good; unless God in his justice do send such a grievous curse upon us, so as to turn the strength of the kingdom against itself, and to effect that by their own folly and credulity, which to power and subtlety of their and our enemies could not attain; that is, to divide the power from the parliament, and to make them sensible to the ends and aims of those who would destroy them: therefore we desire the king to take notice of this last most desperate and mischievous Plot of the Malignant Party, which is acted and prosecuted in many parts of the kingdom, under the plausible notions of saving them up to a care of preserving the king's prerogative, maintaining the discipline of the church, upholding and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service, and encouraging of learning. Upon these grounds divers mutinous Petitions have been framed in London, Kent, and other counties; and his majesty's subjects have been solicited to declare themselves for the king, against parliament; and many false and foul aspersions have been cast upon our proceedings, as if had been not only negligent, but are at these points; whereas we desire nothing more than to maintain the purity and power of religion, and to honour the king in all his prerogatives. And for encouragement and advancement of piety and learning, we have earnestly endeavoured, and still do, to the utmost of our power, that all parishes have learned, pious, and sufficient preachers, and all such preachers competent living. Many other Bills and Propositions are in preparation for the king's profit and honour, the people's safety and prosperity; in the proceedings whereof we are much hindered by his majesty's absence from the parliament, which is altogether contrary to the use of his predecessors, and the privileges of parliament, whereby our time is consumed by a multitude of unnecessary Messages, and our innocents wounded by causeless and sharp invectives. Yet we doubt not but we shall overcome this at last, if the people suffer not themselves to be deluded with false and specious promises, and so drawn to betray us, to their own undoing, who have ever been willing to hazard the undoing of ourselves, that they might not be betrayed by our neglect of the trust reposed in us; but, if it were possible, they should do herein, yet we would not fail, through God's grace, still to persist in our duties, and to go beyond our own lives, estates, and advantages as those who think nothing worth the enjoyment without the liberty, peace, and safety of the kingdom; nor any thing too good to be hazarded, in discharge of our consciences, for obtaining of it; and shall always repose ourselves upon the protection of Almighty God, which we are confident shall never be wanting.

us, while we seek his glory; as we have and it, hitherto, wonderfully going along with in all our proceedings."

A fourth Letter to the Parliament from their committee at York.] To support the allegations set forth in the foregoing Declaration, were added a great number of Examinations, Letters, Warrants, and Depositions, selected out of such as had been laid before both Houses, and digested into order by committees appointed for that purpose.

May 23. Another letter from lord Howard, York, directed to the lord keeper, dated the 21 of May, was read to the lords in hæc hæc hæc:

"My lord; By my last I sent your lordship copy of a Warrant, from his majesty to the ad constable, for summoning the regiment, sir Rob. Strickland's, which being met together, their officers have drawn them hither this city, and billeted them here; where by and by, divers were called to attend at the court, as guard to his majesty's person. We do not know that there is any colonel or lieutenant colonel: one capt. Duncomb, who is serjeant-major, and one who was sent for as a delinquent touching the Petition for staying the Magazine, the active man who both raised them, and commands in chief. At their first coming to us, we attended his majesty, but we could not prevail for the disbanding of them. We have delivered your Ordinance to the sheriff, and required him to do his duty. His Answer is, He would do it to the utmost of his power; but that these being now without his county, he could not meddle with them; but he would give advice what was fit for him to do. Short-after he returned to us, and said, the king had sent for him, and inquired if he had not received commands from the parliament; he then showed him the Ordinance, and, after his majesty read it, he required him, on his allegiance, to obey any of those commands: but how the sheriff will demean himself for the future, in preventing the raising of any more of the Trained Bands, we do not know.—This day the horse were mustered, who were summoned to be here yesterday; and not only those who came on their voluntary offers, but others appeared upon summons by the printed paper, the copy of which I sent in my last letter; the whole number, as we are informed, are under 200. It is told us, his majesty will keep about 50 here for his guard, and that the rest should be ready to attend upon summons, and are dismissed for the present. On Friday at the freeholders, copyholders, and all other the farmers, are summoned to be here: but upon what occasion, or what the event will be, I cannot tell. My lord, your lordship's &c. A. HOWARD. York, May 21, 1642." P. S. The sheriff came to us this day and delivered the annexed Paper, as an Answer to those commands enjoined by the Ordinance.

"Since the receiving of your Order, I cannot find there are any in this county who are assembled together in a posture of war, or disturbers of the public peace. When any such shall appear, I will be most ready to discharge the duty of a faithful subject, according as I am obliged by my oath and the law of the land. RD. HUTTON."

The next thing we find memorable in this day's transactions, is an Order of the lords to discharge the Guards, which had attended both houses for a long time, until they should receive further commands; and that the house of commons should be acquainted therewith.

The Lord Keeper Littleton deserts the Parliament, and joins the King.] May 23. p. m. The lords were informed, That the lord keeper having leave of the house to be a few days absent for his health, was gone to York, and had parted with the Great Seal two days before. Hereupon it was ordered, That the gentleman-usher attending that house, or his deputy, should forthwith take into custody the rt. hon. Edw. lord Littleton, and bring him before the lords in parliament; and together, with him, the Great Seal, if it be in his custody. Ordered also, That all sheriffs, mayors, constables, and other his majesty's officers, shall be aiding to the gentleman-usher or his deputies.

The King gets possession of the GREAT SEAL.] Some further account of this remarkable affair may be here very proper; because the king's getting possession of the Great Seal was thought, by all parties, a most considerable advantage. The lord keeper Littleton, by having declared his opinion in favour of the Ordinance for the Militia; by refusing to demand of the earls of Essex and Holland the resignation of their offices of chamberlain of the household and groom of the stole, as before-mentioned (p. 1172), and by complying with the prevailing party in opposition to the king, had highly disgusted his maj.; inasmuch that his leaving the parliament was by them absolutely unexpected. Lord Clarendon has given us a very particular narrative of the manner by which this affair was conducted; and which is the more to be regarded, because he was the very person intrusted by the king to bring it about. The whole is too long for our purpose, we shall therefore content ourselves with some of the most remarkable circumstances, and refer to his lordship's History for the rest.—"At an interview of the lord keeper and Mr. Hyde, (between whom there had been frequent visits) the latter with great freedom and plainness, told his lordship, 'How much he had lost the esteem of all good men, and that the king could not but be exceedingly dissatisfied with him;' and discoursed over the matter of his vote upon the Ordinance for the Militia. As soon as Mr. Hyde had entered upon this discourse, which he heard with all attention, they being by themselves in his study at Exeter-House, he rose from his chair and went to the door; and finding some persons in the next room, he bad them to withdraw; and, locking both the door of that room and of his study, he sat down himself, making Mr. Hyde sit down too, he began, 'With giving him many thanks for his friendship to him, which, he said, he had ever esteemed; and he could not more manifest the esteem he had of it and him, than by using that freedom again with him which he meant to do. Then he lamented his own condition; and that he had been preferred from the Common Pleas, where he knew both the business and the persons he had to deal with, to the other high office he now held; which obliged him to converse and transact with another sort of men, who were not known to him, and in affairs which he understood not, and had not one friend among them with whom he could confer upon any doubt which occurred to him.—He spoke then of the unhappy state and condition of the king's business; how much he had been, and was still, betrayed by persons who were about him; and with all possible indignation against the proceedings of the parliament; and said, 'They would never do this, if they were not resolved to do more: that he knew the king too well, and observed the carriage of particular men too much, and the whole current of public transactions these last five or six months, not to foresee that it could not be long before there would be a war between the king and the two houses; and of the importance, in that season, that the Great Seal should be with the king.' Then he fell into many expressions of his duty and affection to the king's person, as well as to his high degree; and, 'That no man should be more ready to perish with, and for, his majesty, than he would be: that the prospect he had of this necessity had made him carry himself towards that party with so much compliance, that he might be gracious with them, at least that they might have no distrust of him, which he knew many had endeavoured to infuse into them; and that there had been a consultation, within few days, whether, in regard that he might be sent for by the king, or that the Seal might be taken from him, it would not be best to appoint the Seal to be kept in some such secure place, as that there might be no danger of losing it; and that the keeper should always receive it for the execution of his office, they having no purpose to disoblige him. And the knowledge he had of this consultation, and fear he had of the execution of it, had been the reason why, in the late debate upon the Militia, he had given his vote in such a manner as he knew would make very ill impressions with the king, and many others who did not know him very well; but that, if he had not in that point submitted to their opinion, the Seal had been taken from him that night; whereas, by his compliance in that vote, which could only prejudice himself, and not the king, he had gotten so much into their confidence, that he should be able to preserve the Seal in his own hands till the king required it, and then he would be as ready to attend his majesty with it.'—Mr. Hyde was very well pleased with this discourse, and asked him, 'Whether he would give him leave, when there should be a fit occasion, to assure the king, that he would

perform this service when the king should require it?' He desired 'That he would do so, and pass his word for the performance of it, as soon as his majesty pleased;' and so they parted. The king, being informed of what had passed at this interview, was at first very unwilling to rely upon the lord keeper's promises, but being at length satisfied of his good intentions towards him, resolved. 'That he would such a day of the week following, send for the Keeper and the Seal;' and that it should be, as had been advised, upon a Saturday afternoon, as soon as the house of lords should rise, because then no notice could be taken of it till Monday. Mr. Hyde, who had continued to see the keeper frequently, and was confirmed in his confidence of his integrity, went now to him; and finding him firm in his resolution, and of opinion, in regard of the high proceedings of the houses, that it should not be long deferred; he told him, 'That he might expect a messenger the next week, and that he should once more see him, when he would tell him the day; and that he would then go himself away before him to York.' Accordingly on the Saturday following, between 2 and 3 of the clock in the afternoon, Mr. Elliot, a groom of the bedchamber to the prince, came to the keeper, and found him alone in the room where he used to sit; and delivered him a letter from the king, in his own hand, wherein he required him, with many expressions of kindness and esteem, 'to make haste to him; and if his indisposition' (for he was often troubled with gravel and sharpness of urine) 'would not suffer him to make so much haste upon the journey as the occasion required, that he should deliver the Seal to the person who gave him the letter; who, being a young man, would make such haste as was necessary; and that he might make his journey by those degrees which his health required.' The keeper was surprized with the messenger, whom he did not like; and when he found that he knew the contents of the letter, which he hoped would not have been communicated to any man who should be sent. He answered him with much reservation; and when the other, with bluntness, (for he was no polite man) demanded the Seal of him, which he had not thought of putting out of his own hands, he answered him, 'That he would not deliver it into any hands but the king's;' but presently recollecting himself, and looking over his letter again, he quickly considered, that it would be hazardous to take the Seal himself such a journey; and that by any pursuit of him, which he could not suspect, he should be seized upon, and the Seal would be very unhappily disappointed of, which he had reason so much to depend upon; and that his misfortune would be imputed to his own fault and infidelity; (without doubt, he abhorred with his heart, and the only way to prevent that mischief, was to appear innocent under it, was to deliver the Seal to the person trusted by the king himself.

to receive it; and so, without telling him any thing of his own purpose, he delivered the Seal into his hands; who forthwith put himself on his horse, and, with wonderful expedition, presented the Great Seal into his majesty's own hands, who was infinitely pleased both with it and the messenger.* The lord keeper, that evening, pretended to be indisposed, and that he would take his rest early, and therefore ordered, that nobody should be admitted to speak with him; he then called serjeant Lee to him, who was the person that waited upon the Seal, and in whom he had great confidence, and told him secretly, 'That he was resolved, the next morning, to go to the king, who had sent for him; but he knew well how much malice he should contract by it from the parliament, which could use all the means they could to apprehend him; and he himself knew not how he should perform the journey, therefore he put himself entirely into his hands; that he should cause his horses to be ready against the next morning, and only his own groom to attend him, and he to guide the best way; and that he would not impart it to any other person.' The honest serjeant was very glad of the resolution, and cheerfully undertook all things for the journey; and so sending the horses out of town, the keeper put himself in his coach very early the next morning; and as soon as they were out of the town, he and the serjeant, and one groom, took their horses, and made a great journey that day, it being about the beginning of June;† that, before the end of the third day, he kissed the king's hand at York. He had purposely procured the house of peers to be adjourned to a later hour, in the morning for Monday, than it used to be. That day passed without any man's taking notice of the keeper's being absent; and many, who knew he was not at his house, thought he had been gone to Cranford, to his country house, whither he frequently went on Saturday nights, and was early enough at the parliament on Monday mornings; and so the lords the more willingly consented to the later adjournments for those days."

The Lords appoint a Committee to consider of an Accommodation with the King.] The lord-keeper's unexpected conduct occasioned; as lord Clarendon adds, "so great a dejection in the house of lords, that, upon the news thereof, the earl of Northumberland, who had been of another temper, moved, That a Committee might be appointed, to consider how there might be an Accommodation between the king and his people, for the good, happiness and safety of both king and kingdom." A Committee was appointed accordingly; and, upon that occasion,

The E. of Bristol's Speech thereupon.] The earl of Bristol made the following speech: * "My lords; I have spoken so often upon the subject of Accommodation, with so little acceptance, and with so ill success, that it was in my intention not to have made any further essay in this kind; but my zeal to the peace and happiness of this kingdom, and my apprehensions of the near approach of unspeakable miseries and calamities, suffer me not to be master of mine own resolution.—Certainly this kingdom hath, at all times, many advantages over the other monarchies of Europe; as, of situation, of plenty, of rich commodities; of power both by sea and land; but more particularly at this time, when all our neighbouring states are, by their several interests, so involved in war, and with such equality of power that there is not much likelihood of their mastering one another, nor of having their differences easily compounded; and thereby, we alone being admitted to trade to all places, wealth and plenty, which ever follow where trade flourisheth, are in a manner cast upon us.—I shall not trouble your lordships by putting you in mind of the great and noble undertakings of our ancestors; nor shall I pass higher than the times within mine own remembrance. Queen Elizabeth was a princess disadvantaged by her sex, by her age, and chiefly by her want of issue; yet if we shall consider the great effects wrought upon most of the states of Christendom by this nation, under her prudent government (the growth of the monarchy of Spain chiefly by her impeached; the United Provinces by her protected; the French in their greatest miseries relieved; most of the princes of Germany kept in high respect and reverence towards her and this kingdom; and the peace and tranquillity wherein this kingdom flourished, and which hath been continued down unto us by the peaceable government of king James, of blessed memory, and of his now majesty, until these late unhappy interruptions) we cannot

* Mr. Rushworth adds this remarkable circumstance relating to the carrying off the Great Seal: "In Mr. Elliott's passage towards York, the Author of the Collections met him at Witham, a post stage between Grantham and Stamford, who, with a fall off his horse, and hurt his shoulder; and seeing the Author, an old acquaintance, demanded, What News? thinking he had been sent after him by the parliament to recover the Great Seal) To which he replied to Mr. Elliott, (not imagining he had then with him the Great Seal) 'That he came from York; that the king was well; and that he was going with letters from the committee of parliament at York, to both houses, wherein some Answers from the king were inclosed to the parliament.' To which Mr. Elliott, replied, 'It was fit the author should make haste; and therefore,' said he, 'take my horses which are ready saddled, fearing lest the Author should raise the country against him; so we parted at that time.'

but judge this nation equally capable, with any other, of honour, happiness, and plenty.—Now if, instead of this happy condition, in which we have been, and might be, upon a sober and impartial inquiry we shall find ourselves to have been, for some few years last past, involved in so many troubles and distractions, and at the present to be reduced to the very brink of miseries and calamities; it is high time for us to consider by what means we have been brought into them, and by what means it is most probable we may be brought out of them.—This kingdom never enjoyed so universal a peace, neither hath it any visible enemy in the whole world, either infidel or Christian; our enemies are only of our own house, such as our own dissensions, jealousies, and distractions have raised up: and certainly where they are found, especially betwixt a king and his people, no other cause of the unhappiness and misery of a state need to be sought after; for civil discord is a plentiful source, from whence all miseries and mischiefs flow. The scripture telleth us of the strength of a little city united, and of the instability of a kingdom divided within itself: so that, upon a prudent enquiry, we may assign our own jealousies and discords for the chief cause of our past and present troubles, and of our future fears. It must be confessed, that, by the counsel and conduct of evil ministers, the subjects had cause to think their just liberties invaded; and from thence have our former distempers grown: for it is in the body politic of a monarchy, as in the natural body, the health whereof is defined to be, 'Partium corporis æqua temperies,' an equal temper of the parts: so likewise a state is well in health and well disposed, when sovereign power and common right are equally balanced, and kept in even temper, by just and equitable rules.—And truly, my lords, by the goodness of his majesty, and by the prudent endeavour of the parliament, this state is almost reduced to that equal and even temper; and our sickness is rather continued out of fancy and conceit, (I mean fears and jealousies) than out of any real distempers. I well remember, that, before the beginning of this parliament, some noble lords presented a Petition unto the king; and in that petition did set down all or most of the Grievances and distempers of the kingdom which then occurred to them. To these, as I conceive, the parliament have procured, from his majesty, such redresses as are to their good satisfaction. Many other things for the ease, security, and comfort of the subject, have been, by their great industry, found and propounded; and, by his majesty's goodness, condescended unto. And now we are come so near the happiness of being the most free and most settled nation in the Christian world, our dangers and miseries will grow, every day, greater and nearer, if not speedily prevented. The king, on his part, offereth to concur with us in the settling all the liberties and immunities, either for the property of our goods or liberty of our persons, which we have received from our ancestors, or which himself hath granted unto us; and as to what shall yet remain for the good and comfort of his subjects, he is willing to hearken to all our just and reasonable propositions; and for the establishing the true Protestant religion, he woos us to it; and the wisdom and industry of the parliament hath now put it in a hopeful way. The rule of his government, he professeth, shall be the laws of the kingdom; and, for the comforting and securing of us, he offereth a much more large and more general pardon than hath been granted by any of his predecessors. And truly, my lords, this is all that ever was, or can be pretended unto by us. We, on the other side, make profession, That we intend to make his majesty a glorious king; to endeavour to support his dignity; and to pay unto him the duty and obedience, which, by our allegiance, several oaths, and late Protestations, we owe unto him, and to maintain all his just regal and prerogatives; which I conceive to be much as his majesty will expect from us.—that, my lords, we being both, thus reciprocally, agreed of that which in general we make both king and people happy, shall most unfortunate, if we shall not bring our inclinations and endeavours so to propose and settle particulars, as both king and people may know what will give them mutual satisfaction; which certainly must be the first towards the settling of a right understanding betwixt them. And in this I should not conceive any great difficulty, if it were once into a way of preparation. But the great difficulty may seem to be, How that we may be settled and agreed upon may be cured? This is commonly the last point treaties betwixt princes, and of the great niceness; but much more betwixt a king and his subjects, where that confidence and love which should be betwixt them is once lost, and, to speak clearly, I fear that this may be our case, and herein may consist the chief difficulty of accommodation? for it is no easier to compose differences arising from a son, yea, even from wrongs, than it is to settle jealousies; which, arising out of diffidence and distrust, grow and are varied upon every occasion.—But, my lords, if there be no endeavour to allay and remove them, they will every day increase and gather strength; nay, they are already grown to that height, and the king replies to those direct terms of opposition, that if we make not a present stop, it is to be feared will speedily pass further than verbal contentations. I observe, in some of his majesty's answers, a Civil War spoken of: I confess it is a word of horror to me, who have been an eye-witness of those inexpressible calamities that in a short time, the most plentiful and flourishing countries of Europe have been brought into by an intestine war. I further observe, 'That his majesty protesteth against the miseries that may ensue by a war, and that he desires the clearing of them.' It is true that a protestation that kind is no actual denouncing of war, it is the very next degree to it; ultima monition, as the civilians term it, the last monition: so that we are upon the very brink of our miseries. It is better keeping it of them than getting out of them; and, in state, the wisdom of prevention is infinitely beyond the wisdom of remedies. If, for the sake of this nation, these misunderstandings would produce the least act of hostility, it is almost to be believed how impossible it were to put any stay to our miseries: for a civil war admits of none of those conditions of quarter, by which cruelty and blood are, amongst other enemies, kept from extremities: it, if it should but so happen, which God of his goodness avert, that, mutually, forces and arms should be raised, jealousies and fears would be so much increased thereby, that any accommodation would be rendered full of difficulty and length; and the very charge of maintaining them (whilst first a cessation of arms, and then a general accommodation were treating) would consume the wealth of the kingdom.—And of this we had lately a costly example: for in those unhappy times, betwixt England and Scotland, after there was a stop made any further acts of hostility, and a desire of peace expressed on both sides; commissioners nominated, and all the articles propounded; the keeping of the armies together for our mutual securities, whilst the cessation at Ripon and the peace at London were in treating, at this kingdom not much less than a million pounds. And if two armies be once on foot in England, either a sudden encounter may destroy one of them, or the keeping of them both on foot must destroy the kingdom. I hope, therefore, we shall make it our endeavour, by moderation and calmness, yet to stay to our so near approaching miseries; and that we shall hearken to the wise advice of our brethren of Scotland, in their late Answer to the king and parliament, (p. 1217); wherein they earnestly treat us, ‘That all means may be forborne which may make the breach wider, the wound deeper; and that no place be given to the evil spirit of division, which at such times worketh incessantly, and resteth not; but the fairest, the most Christian, and expeditious way may be taken by so wise a king and parliament, as may, against all malice and opposition, make his majesty and posterity more glorious, and his kingdoms more happy in ever.’ And, in another place they say, ‘That since this parliament hath thought meet to draw the practice of the parliament of Scotland into example, in the point of their Declaration, they are confident that the affection of this parliament will lead them, also, to the practice of that kingdom in composing the unhappy differences betwixt his majesty and them; and (so far as may consist with their rights, liberties, and laws) in giving his majesty satisfaction, especially in their tender care for his royal person, of his princely greatness and authority, and the prosperity of the kingdom.’—Certainly, my lords, this is wise and brotherly advice, and I doubt not but we are all desirous to follow it. We must not then still dwell upon generals, for generals produce nothing; but we must put this business into a certain way, whereby particulars may be descended unto; and the way that I shall offer, with all humility, is, That there may be a select Committee of choice persons of both houses, who may, in the first place, truly state and set down all things in difference betwixt the king and the subject, with the most probable ways of reconciling them. Secondly, To descend unto the particulars which may be expected by each from other, either in point of our supporting of him, or his relieving of us. And, lastly, How all these conditions, being agreed upon, may be so secured as may stand with the honour of his majesty and the satisfaction of the subject.—When such a committee shall have drawn up the heads of the Propositions, and the way of securing them, they may be presented unto the houses; and so offered unto his majesty, by such a way as the parliament shall judge most probable to produce an Accommodation.—My lords, what I have yet said unto you, hath been chiefly grounded upon the apprehensions and fears of our future dangers. I shall say something of the unhappiness of our present state, which certainly standeth in as much need of relief and remedy, as our fears do of prevention; for although the king and people were fully united, and that all men who now draw several ways, should unanimously set their hand to the work, yet they would find it no easy task to restore this kingdom to a prosperous and comfortable condition: if we take into our consideration the deplorable state of Ireland, likely to drain this kingdom of men and treasure; if we consider the debts and necessity of the crown, the engagements of the kingdom, and the great and unusual contributions of the people; which last, although they may not be so much to their discontent, for that they have been legally raised, yet the burden hath not been much eased. Let us likewise consider the distractions (I may almost call them confusions) in point of religion; which, of all other distempers, are the most dangerous and destructive to the peace of a state.—Besides these public calamities, let every particular man consider the distracted and uncomfortable state of his own condition; for mine own part, I must ingenuously confess unto your lordships, that I cannot find out, under the different commands of the king and the parliament, any such course of caution and wariness, by which I can promise to myself security or safety. I could give your lordships many instances of the inconsistency and impossibility of obeying these commands; but I shall trouble you only with one or two. The Ordinance of parliament, now in so great agitation, commandeth all persons in authority to put it in execution, and all others to obey it according to the fundamental laws of the land: the king declar-eth

it to be contrary to the fundamental laws, against the liberty of the subject and rights of parliament; and commandeth all his subjects, of what degree soever, upon their allegiance, not to obey the said Ordinance, as they will answer the contrary at their perils.—So likewise, in point of the king's commanding the attendance of divers of us upon his person, whereunto we are obliged by several relations of our services and oaths: in case we comply not with his commands, we are liable to his displeasure, and the loss of those places of honour and trust which we hold under him: if we obey his commands without the leave of the parliament, which hath not been always granted, we are liable to the censure of parliament: and of both these we want not fresh examples; so that, certainly, this cannot but be acknowledged to be an unhappy and uncomfortable condition.—I am sure I bring with me a ready and obedient heart, to pay unto the king all those duties of loyalty, allegiance, and obedience which I owe unto him: and I shall never be wanting towards the parliament, to pay unto it all those due rights and that obedience which we all owe unto it; but, in contrary commands, a conformity of obedience to both is hardly to be lighted on. The reconciliation must be in the commanders and the commands, and not in the obedience or the person that is to obey, and therefore, until it shall please God to bless us with a right understanding betwixt the king and parliament, and a conformity in their commands, neither the kingdom in public, nor particular men in private, can be reduced to a safe or comfortable condition.—I have said thus much to give occasion to others to offer likewise their opinions; for if we shall sit still, and nothing tending to the stay of the unhappy misunderstanding betwixt the king and his people, be propounded, it is to be feared that our miseries will hasten so fast upon us, that the season and opportunity of applying remedies may be past. I have herein discharged my conscience suitable to that duty which I owe to the king my sovereign and master, and suitable to that zeal and affection which I shall ever pay to the happiness and prosperity of the kingdom; towards which I shall ever faithfully contribute my humble prayers and honest endeavours; and I shall no way doubt, whatsoever success this my proposition may have, it will be accompanied with the good wishes of your lordships, and of all peaceable and well-minded men."

But we find no report entered in the Lords' Journals from the before-mentioned committee, notwithstanding this speech for an Accommodation.

Order of both Houses for dispersing their Votes, &c.] May 24. The commons sent up an Ordinance, to which they desired the lords concurrence, for giving power to their committee at York to command the lord mayor and sheriffs of that city, and all sorts of head constables and petty constables under them, to take all Orders, Votes and Declarations of parliament from the committee, and see them circulated through their several districts. Likewise, That the said lord mayor &c. should publish in all market towns, that the Trained Bands ought not to rise, or be called together, by any personal command of the king; but that, as affairs then stood, such command were against law, tending to the great disturbance and danger of the kingdom. Declaring an amnesty to such as should not obey, and punishment to those that did, &c. Which ordinance was agreed to by the lords.

The Commons appoint Commissioners to assist sir J. Hotham at Hull, and consider of Ways to raise Money.] At the same time sir W. Strickland, Mr. Alured, Mr. Wharton, sir W. Airmyn, Mr. John Hotham, Mr. H. Darley, and Mr. Peregrine Pelham, all members of the house of commons, were appointed commissioners: to go down to Hull, to be assistants to the governor thereof, upon such orders and directions as they should receive from both houses. As sir Edw. Ayscough, sir John Wray, sir W. Airmyn, Mr. Ilchester, and Mr. Broxholm, were sent into Lincolnshire, to preserve the peace in that county.

For several days last past the commons had been busy in raising Money, and this day a committee of their house was appointed to their vote, That the king, seduced by evil counsel, did intend to levy war upon his parliament, to consider how a stock of Money, by any other means, may be provided for the better defence of his majesty's person, the parliament, and the public peace of the kingdom, against any such force.

This extraordinary diligence of the parliament seems to have been owing to the frequent desertions from that body; for, lord Claremont informs us, That the number of members in both houses, that resorted to the king at York about this time, increased daily; and particularly those of the lords: That he had called all the peers to council, communicating to them all such Declarations as he thought fit to publish in Answer to those of the parliament; and all Messages and whatever else necessary to be done for the improvement of his condition: and, having now the Great Council with him, issued such Proclamations as were reasonable for the preservation of the peace.

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Declaration of the 19th of May.] And next published the following Answer to the Parliament's Declaration of the 19th of the month:

"If we could be weary of taking any pains for the satisfaction of our people, and to receive them of those specious mischievous insinuations, which are daily instilled into their ears, to shake and corrupt their loyalty and affection to us and our government; after so full and ample Declaration of ourself and our intentions, and so fair and satisfactory Answers to all such matters as have been objected to us, by a multiparty present of both houses of parliament, we might well give over this labour of our people."

and sit still till it shall please God so to enlighten the affections and understandings of our good subjects on our behalf, (which we doubt not but that, in his good time he will do) that they may see our sufferings are their sufferings: but since (instead of applying themselves to the method proposed by us, 'of making such solid particular Propositions as might establish a good understanding between us, or of following the advice of our council of Scotland, (with whom they communicate their affairs) in forbearing all means that may make the breach wider and wound deeper') they have chosen to pursue us with new reproaches, or rather to continue and improve the old: by adding and varying little circumstances and language, in matters formerly urged by them, and fully answered by us, we prevailed with ourself, upon very mature and particular consideration of it, to answer the late Printed Book intitled, 'A Declaration, or Remonstrance, of the Lords and Commons,' which was ordered, the 19th of this instant May, to be printed and published, hoping then that they would not put us to any more of this trouble; but that this would have been the last of such a nature, they would have communicated to our people; and that they would not, as they have done since, thought fit to assault us with a newer Declaration,* indeed of a very new nature and learning, which must have another Answer. And we doubt not but that our good subjects, in a short time, will be so well instructed in the differences and mistakings between us, that they will plainly discern, without resigning their reason and understanding to our prerogative, or the infallibility of a now major part of both houses of parliament infected by a few malignant spirits, where the fault is.—Though we shall, with humility and alacrity, be always forward to acknowledge the infinite mercy and providence of Almighty God vouchsafed so many several ways to ourself and this nation; yet since God himself doth not allow that we should fancy and create dangers ourself, that we might manifest and publish his mercy in our deliverance, we must profess we do not know those Deliverances, mentioned in the beginning of that Declaration, 'from so many wicked plots and designs, since the beginning of this parliament; which if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and destruction upon this kingdom.' We well know the great labour and skill that hath been used, to unsettle and affright our good subjects with fears and apprehensions of plots and conspiracies; the several pamphlets published, and letters scattered up and down, full of such ridiculous contemptible animadversions to that purpose; is though they found, for what end God knows, very unusual countenance, no sober man would be moved with them: but we must confess, we have never been able to inform ourself of any such 'Pernicious formed design against the peace of this kingdom, since the beginning of this parliament,' as is mentioned in that Declaration, or that might be any warrant to those great fears both our houses of parliament seemed to be transported with; but we have great cause to believe more mischief and danger hath been raised and begotten to the disturbance of this kingdom, than cured or prevented by those fears and jealousies: and therefore, however the rumour and discourse of plots and conspiracies may have been necessary to the designs of particular men, they shall do well not to pay any false devotions to Almighty God, who discerns whether our dangers are real or pretended.—For the 'bringing up the Army to London;' as we have heretofore, by no other direction than the testimony of a good conscience, called God to witness, 'We never had, or knew of any such resolution;' so, upon the view of the Depositions now published with that Declaration, it is not evident to us there was ever such a design, unless every loose discourse or argument be instance enough of such a design; and it is apparent, that what was said of it, was near three months before the discovery to both houses of parliament; so that if there were any danger threatened that way, it vanished, without any resistance or prevention by the wisdom, power, or authority of them.—It seems the intention of that Declaration, whatsoever other end it hath, is to 'answer a Declaration they received from us, in Answer to that which was presented to us at Newmarket the 9th of March last, and likewise to our answer to the Petition of both houses, presented to us at York the 26th of March last. But before that Declaration falls upon any particulars of our said Declaration or Answer, it complains, 'That the heads of the Malignant Party have, with much art and industry, advised us to suffer divers unjust scandals and imputations upon the parliament, to be published in our name, whereby they might make it odious to the people, and, by their help, destroy it:' but not instancing in any one scandal or imputation so published by us, we are still to seek for the heads of that Malignant Party. But our good subjects will easily understand, That if we were guilty of that aspersion, we must not only be active in raising the scandal, but passive in the mischief begotten by that scandal, we being an essential part of the parliament: and we hope the just defence of ourself and our authority, and the necessary vindication of our innocence and justice, from the imputation laid on us by a major part, then present of either, or both houses, shall no more be called a 'Scandal upon the parliament,' than the opinion of such a part be reputed 'an act of parliament.' And we hope our good subjects will not be long misled by that common expression in all the Declarations, wherein they usurp the word 'Parliament,' and apply it to countenance any Resolution or Vote which some few have a mind to make, by calling it, 'The Resolution of Parliament; which can never be without our consent: neither can the Vote of either, or both houses, make a greater alteration in the laws of this kingdom, so solemnly made by the advice of their predecessors with the concurrence of us and our ancestors, either by commanding or inhibiting any thing, besides the known rule of the law, than our single direction or mandate can do, to which we do not ascribe such authority.—But that Declaration informs our people, 'That the Malignant Party hath drawn us into the Northern parts far from our parliament.' It might more truly and properly have said, That it hath driven, than drawn, us hither. For we confess our journey hither, (for which we have no other reason to be sorry, than with reference to the cause of it) was only forced upon us by the true Malignant Party, which contrived and countenanced those barbarous tumults and other seditious circumstances, of which we have so often complained, and hereafter shall say more; and which indeed threatens so much danger to our person, and laid so much scandal upon the whole Privilege and Dignity of Parliament, that we wonder it can be mentioned without blushes or indignation: but of that anon. But why the Malignant Party should be charged with causing a Press to be transported to York, we cannot imagine; neither have any papers or writings issued from thence, to our knowledge, but what have been extorted from us by such provocations, as have not been before offered to a king. And no doubt it will appear a most trivial and fond exception, when all presses are open to vent whatsoever they think fit to say to the people, (a thing unwarranted by former custom) that we should not make use of all lawful means to publish our just and necessary Answers thereunto. As for the authority of the Great Seal, though we do not know that it hath been necessary to things of this nature, the same shall be more frequently used hereafter, as occasion shall require; to which we make no doubt the greater and better part of our privy council will concur, and whose advice we are resolved to follow, as far as shall be agreeable to the good and welfare of the kingdom.—Before that Declaration vouchsafes to insist on any particulars, it is pleased to censure both our Declaration and Answer, to be 'filled with harsh censures, and causeless charges upon the parliament,' (still misapplying the word 'parliament' to the Vote of both houses) concerning which they resolve to give satisfaction to the kingdom, since they find it very difficult to satisfy us.' If, as in the usage of the word parliament, they have left us out of their thoughts; so, by the word 'kingdom,' they intend to exclude all our people who are out of their walls, (for that's grown another phrase of the times, the Vote of the major part of both houses, and sometimes of one, is now called, 'The Resolution of the whole kingdom') we believe it may not be hard to give satisfaction to themselves;

otherwise we are confident (and our conscience proceeds from the uprightness of our own conscience) they will never be able so to sever the affections of us and our kingdom, that what cannot be satisfaction to the one, shall be to the other. Neither will the style of 'Honorable and Faithful,' and telling us, 'That they will make us a great and glorious king,' in their Petitions and Remonstrances, so deceive our good subjects, that they will pass over the reproaches, threats, and menaces they are stuffed with; which sure could not be more gently apprehended by us, than by saying, 'Their expressions were different from the usual language to princes;' which that Declaration tells you, 'we had no occasion to say.' But we believe, whoever looks over that Declaration presented to us at Newmarket, to which was an Answer, will find the language throughout it to be so unusual, that, before this parliament, it could never be paralleled; and under pretence of justifying their fears, it gives so much countenance to the discourse of the rebels of Ireland, as if they had a mind good subjects should give credit to it: otherwise, being warranted by the same evidence which they have since published, they would have as well declared, 'That those rebels publicly threaten the rooting out the name of English, and that they will have a king of their own, and no longer be governed by us;' as they say, 'That they do nothing but by authority, and that they call themselves, The Queen's Army.' And therefore we have no reason to complain of the absence of justice and integrity in that Declaration, besides the unfitness of other expressions.—Neither do we mistake the substance or logic of the Message to us at Theobald's, concerning the Militia; which was no other, and is stated to no other (even by that Declaration which proved us) than a plain threat, 'That if refused to join with them, they would make law without us: nor hath the practice at that time been other, which will never be justified to the most ordinary (if not partial) understandings, by the mere averring it to be 'according to the fundamental laws of the kingdom,' without giving any direction, to the most cunning and learned men in the laws may be able to find those foundations. And we must appeal to all the world, whether they might not, with as much justice, and by as much law, have seized upon the estate of every member of both houses, who dissented from that pretended Ordinance (which much the major part of the house peers did two or three several times): they have invaded that power of ours of the Militia, because we (upon reasons which have not so much as pretended to answer) refused to consent to that Proposition.—And no better effects than 'loss of time and hindrance of public affairs have been found by our Answers and Replies,' let all good men judge by whose default; and whose want of duty such effects have been: For as our end (indeed ly end) in those Answers and Replies, hath been the settlement and composure of publick Affairs, so we are assured, and most men do believe, That if that due regard and reverence had been given to our words, and that consent and obedience to our counsels, which we did expect, there had been, before this time, a peaceful calm upon the face of the whole kingdom; every man enjoying his own, with all possible peace and security that can be imagined; which surely those men do not desire, so (after all those acts of justice and favour used by us this parliament, all those affronts and sufferings endured and undergone by us) it fit still to reproach us with Ship-Money, and Conduct-Money, and other things so undantly declared (as that Declaration itself confesses) in the General Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, passed in November 1642; which we wonder to find now avowed to the Remonstrance of both houses; and which we assure was presented to us by the act of commons only, and did never pass, if we are confident at that time could never be passed, the house of peers; the concurrence and authority of which was not then thought necessary. Shall we believe those remedies to be the voice of the kingdom of England? That all our loving subjects, eased, refreshed, strengthened, and abundantly satisfied by our acts of grace and favour towards them, willing to be involved in these unthankful expressions? We must appeal to the Thanks Acknowledgements published in the Petition of most of the counties of England; to the testimony and thanks we have received from both houses of parliament, how seasonable, agreeable, this usage of us is to our merit their former expressions.—We have not at swerved or departed from our resolution, words, in the beginning of this parliament. We said, 'We were resolved to put ourselves, fully and clearly, upon the love and affection of our English subjects;' and we say so still, as far as concerns England. And we call Almighty God to witness, that all our complaints of jealousies, which have never been cause, were not against our houses of parliament, some few schismatical, factious, and ambitious spirits; and upon grounds, as short time, fear, will justify to the world. Our Denial of the Militia, and our Absenting ourself from London, have been the effects of an upright faithful affection to our English subjects, that we may be able (through all the inconveniences we are compelled to wrestle with) best to preserve and restore their religion, and liberties unto them.—Since the proceedings against the lord Kimbolton and the members is still looked upon, and so often used, as so great an advantage against us, that no Retraction made by us, nor no actions at that time committed against us and the of the land, under pretence of vindication of Privilege, can satisfy the contrivers of that Declaration: but that they would have our good subjects believe, the accusation of those six Members must be a plot for the breaking the neck of the parliament; (a strange arrogance, if any of those members had the penning of that Declaration) and that it is so often urged against us, as if, by that single casual mistake of ours, in form only, we had forfeited all duty, credit, and allegiance from our people; we must without ceasing endeavour to excuse that, (which in truth was an error, our going to the house of commons) give our people a clear and full Narration of the matter of fact; assuring ourself that our good subjects will not find our carriage in that business such as hath been reported.—When we resolved, upon such grounds, as, when they shall be published, will satisfy the world, That it was fit for our own safety and honour, and the peace of the kingdom, to proceed against those persons, though we well know there was no degree of privilege in that case; yet, to shew our desire of correspondence with the two houses of parliament, we chose, rather than to apprehend their persons by the ordinary ministers of justice, (which, according to the opinion and practice of former times, we might have done) to command our Attorney General to acquaint our house of peers with our intention, and the general matters of our charge, (which was yet more particular than a mere accusation) and to proceed accordingly; and, at the same time, sent a sworn servant, a sergeant at arms, to our house of commons, to acquaint them, That we did accuse, and intended to prosecute, the 5 Members of that house, for high treason; and did require that their persons might be secured in custody: This we did, not only to shew that we intended not to violate or invade their privileges, but to use more ceremony towards them, than we then conceived, in justice, might be required of us; and expected at least such an Answer as might inform us, if we were out of the way; but we received none at all; only, in the instant, without offering any thing of their privileges to our consideration, an Order was made, and the same night published in print, 'That if any person whatsoever should offer to arrest the person of any member of that house, without first acquainting that house therewith, and receiving further order from that house, that it should be lawful for such members, or any person, to resist them, and to stand upon his or their guard of defence, and to make resistance, according to the Protestation taken to defend the privileges of parliament;' and this was the first time that we heard the Protestation might be wrested to such a sense; or that, in any case, though of the most undoubted and unquestionable privilege, it might be lawful for any person to resist and use violence against a public minister of justice, armed with lawful authority; though we well knew, that even such a minister might be punished for executing such authority. Upon viewing this

Order we must confess we were somewhat amazed, having never seen or heard of the like, though we had known members of either house committed without so much formality as we had used, and upon crimes of a far inferior nature to those we had suggested; and having no course proposed to us for our proceeding, we were upon the matter only told, 'That against those persons we were not to proceed at all; that they were above our reach, or the reach of the law,' it was not then easy for us to resolve what to do: If we employed our ministers of justice in the usual way for their apprehension, (who, without doubt, would not have refused to execute our lawful commands) we saw what resistance and opposition was like to be made, which, very probably, might have cost some blood; if we sat still and desisted upon this terror, we should, at the best have confessed our own want of power, and the weakness of the law: In this strait we put on a sudden resolution, to try whether our own presence, and a clear discovery of our intentions (which haply might not have been so well understood) could remove those doubts, and prevent those inconveniences which seemed to have been threatened; and, thereupon, we resolved to go in our own person to our house of commons, which we discovered not till the very minute of our going, when we sent out orders, That our servants, and such gentlemen as were then in our court, should attend us to Westminster; but giving them express command (as we have asserted in our Answer to the Ordinance) That no accidents or provocation should draw them to any such action as might imply a purpose of force in us; and ourself (requiring those of our train not to come within the door) went into the house of commons; the bare doing of which, we did not then conceive would have been thought more a breach of privilege, than if we had gone to the house of peers, and sent for them to come to us, which is the usual custom. We used the best expressions we could to assure them how far we were from any intention of violating their privileges; that we intended to proceed legally and speedily against the persons we had accused; and desired, therefore, if they were in the house, that they might be delivered to us, or, if absent, that such course might be taken for their forthcoming as might satisfy our just demands; and so we departed, having no other purpose of force, if they had been in the house, than we have before protested before God, in our Answer to the Ordinance. You have an account of our part of this story fully, let our people judge freely of it: What followed on their part, (though this Declaration tells you, 'It could not withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from us'; it may be any part of theirs it did not) we shall have too much cause hereafter to inform the world.—There will be no end of the discourse of upbraiding us with evil Counsellors, if, upon our constant denial of knowing any, they will not vouchsafe to inform us of them;

and after 8 months amusing the kingdom with the expectation of a discovery of a Malicious Party, and of evil Counsellors, they will not at last name any, nor describe them: let the actions and lives of men be examined, who have contrived, counselled, actually consented to grieve and burden our people; and if such be about us, or any against whom any notorious malicious crime can be proved, if we shelter and protect any such, let our injustice be published to the world; but till that is done, particularly and manifestly, (for we shall never conclude any man, upon a bare general Vote of the major part, of either, or both houses, till it be evident that major part is without passion or affection) we must look upon the charge this Declaration puts on us, cherishing and countenancing a discontented party of the kingdom against them, as heavier and unjuster tax upon our justice of honour, than any we have or can lay upon the framers of that Declaration.—And now, countenance those unhandsome expressions whereby usually they have implied our civility at, or want of zeal against the Rebellion of Ireland, so odious to all good men, they have found a new way of exprobration 'That the Proclamation against those bloody traitors came not out till the beginning of January, though that Rebellion broke out in October; and then, by special command for us, but 40 copies were appointed to be printed.' It is well known where we were at that time, when that Rebellion broke forth, in Scotland: that we, immediately from thence, commended the care of that business to the houses of parliament here, after we had provided for all fitting supplies from our kingdom of Scotland: that after our return hither observed all those forms for that service, which we were advised to by our council of Ireland or both houses of parliament here: and no Proclamation issued out sooner, (of which for the present we are not certain; but that others before that time were issued by directions) it was, because the lords justices of the kingdom desired them no sooner; when they did, the number they desired was but 20, which they advised might be signed by us; which we, for expedition of the same, commanded to be printed, a circumstance required by them; thereupon we signed more of them than our justices desired: all which was very well known to some members of one or both houses of parliament, who let the more to answer for, if they forthwith express it at the passing of this Declaration, and if they did express it, we have the good reason to complain that so envious an accusation should be cast on us to our people, as they knew well how to answer their own objection.—What that 'Complaint is against parliament, put forth in our name, which such an evidence and countenance to rebels, and speaks the same language as parliament, which the rebels do,' we cannot understand. All our Answers and Declarations have been, and are, owned by us, and have been attested under our own hand: if any other had been published in our name, and without our authority, it would be easy for both houses of parliament to discover and apprehend the authors: and we wish, that whosoever was trusted with the drawing and penning of that Declaration, had no more authority or cunning to impose upon, or deceive, a major part of those Votes by which it passed, than any man hath to prevail with us to publish, in our name, any thing but the sense and resolution of our own heart; or that the contriver of that Declaration could, with as good a conscience, call God to witness, That all his counsels and endeavours have been free from all private aims, personal respects, or passions whatsoever, as we have done, and do, That we never had, or knew of, any Resolution of bringing up the army to London. And since this new device is found out, instead of answering our Reasons, or satisfying our just demands, to blast our Declarations and Answers, as if they were not our own, a bold senseless imputation; we are sure that every Answer and Declaration published by us, is much more our own, than any one of those bold, threatening and reproachful Petitions and Remonstrances are the acts of either or both houses. And if the penner of that Declaration had been careful of the trust reposed in him, he would never have denied, (and thereupon found fault with our just indignation) in the text or margin, 'That we had never been charged with the intention of any force, and that in their whole Declaration there is no word tending to such a reproach;' the contrary whereof is so evident, that we are, in express terms, charged in that Declaration, 'That we sent them gracious Messages, when, with our privacy, the bringing up the army was in agitation.' And even in this Declaration they seek to make our people believe some such thing to be proved in the Depositions now published; wherein, we doubt not, they will as much fail, as they do in their censure of that Petition shewed formerly to us by captain Legge, and subscribed by us with C. R. which, notwithstanding our full and particular Narration of the substance of that Petition, the circumstances of our seeing and approving it, this Declaration is pleased to say, 'Was full of scandal to the parliament, and might have proved dangerous to the whole kingdom.' If they have this dangerous Petition in their hands, we have no reason to believe any tenderness to us-ward hath kept them from communicating it: if they have it not, we ought to have been believed. But that all good people may compute their other pretended dangers by their clear understanding of this, (the noise whereof hath not been inferior to any of the rest) we have recovered a true copy of the very Petition we signed with C. R. which shall, in fit time, be published; and which, we hope, will open the eyes of our good people.—Concerning our Warrant for Mr. Jermin's passage, our Answer was true and full; but for his black satin suit, and white boots, we can give no account.—We complained in our Declaration, and as often as we have occasion to mention our Return and Residence near London, we shall complain, of the barbarous and seditious tumults at Westminster and Whitehall; which indeed were so full of scandal to our government, and danger to our person; that we shall never think of our return thither, till we have justice for what is past, and security for the time to come. And if there were so great a necessity, or desire of our return as is pretended, in all this time; upon our so often pressing desires, and upon causes so notorious, we should, at least, have procured some order for the future: But that Declaration tells us, 'We are upon the matter mistaken; the resort of the citizens to Westminster was as lawful, as the resort of great numbers, every day in the term, to the ordinary courts of justice.' They knew no Tumults, Strange! Was the disorderly appearance of so many thousand people, with staves and swords, crying through the streets, Westminster-Hall, and the passage between both houses, in so much as the members could hardly pass to and fro, 'No Bishops' 'Down with the Bishops,' no Tumults? What member is there of either house that saw not those numbers, and heard not those cries? and yet lawful assemblies! Were not several members of either house assaulted, threatened, and ill treated? And yet no Tumults! Why made the house of Peers a Declaration, and sent it down to the house of commons, for suppressing of Tumults, if there were no Tumults? And, if there were any, why not was such a Declaration consented to and published? When the attempts were so visible, and the threats so loud to pull down the Abbey at Westminster, had not we just cause to apprehend, That such people might continue their work to Whitehall? Yet no Tumults! What a strange time are we in, that a few impudent, malicious (to give them no worse term) men should cast such a strange mist of error before the eyes of both houses of parliament, as that they either cannot, or will not, see how manifestly they injure themselves, by maintaining these visible untruths? We say no more. By the help of God and the law, we will have justice for those Tumults.—From excepting, (how weightily let every man judge) to what we have said, that Declaration proceeds to censure us for what we have not said, for the 'prudent Omissions' in our Answer: We forbore to say any thing of the 'Words spoken at Kensington, or the Articles against our dearest consort, and of the accusation of the six Members.' Of the last we had spoken often, and we thought enough of the other two; having never accused any, though, God knows, what truth there might be in either, we had no reason to give any particular Answer.—We do not reckon ourself bereaved of any part of our prerogative, which we are pleased freely, for a time, to part with by Bill; yet we must say, we expressed a great trust in our two houses of parliament, when we divested ourself of the power of dissolving this parliament; which was a just, necessary, and proper prerogative: but we are glad to hear their Resolution, 'That it shall not encourage them to do any thing which, otherwise, had not been fit to have been done.' If it do, it will be such a breach of trust, as God will require an account for at their hands.—For the Militia; we have said so much of it heretofore, and the point is so well understood by all men, that we will waste no more time in that dispute. We never said, 'There was no such thing as an Ordinance;' (though we know that they have been long disused) 'but that there was never any Ordinance, or can be, without the King's consent; and that is true: and the unnecessary precedent cited in the Declaration, doth not offer to prove the contrary. But enough of that. God and the law must determine that business.—Neither hath this Declaration given us any satisfaction concerning the votes of the 15th and 16th of March last; which we must declare and appeal to all the world, in this point, to be the greatest violation of our privilege, the law of the land, the liberty of the subject, and the right of the parliament, that can be imagined. One of those Votes is, (and there needs no other to destroy the king and people) 'That when the lords and commons' (it is well the commons are admitted to their part in judicature) 'shall declare what the law of the land is, the same must be assented to, and obeyed;' that is the sense in few words. Where is every man's property, every man's liberty? If a major part of both houses declare that the law is, That the younger brother shall inherit, what is become of all the families and estates in the kingdom? If they declare, That by the fundamental law of the land, such a rash action, such an unadvised word, ought to be punished by perpetual imprisonment, is not the liberty of the subject, durante bene placito, remediless; That Declaration confesseth, 'They pretend not to a power of making new laws; that, without us, they cannot do that.' They need no such power, if their Declaration can suspend this Statute from being obeyed or executed, and make this Order, which is no Statute, to be obeyed and executed: If they have power to declare the lord Digby's waiting on us at Hampton-Court, and thence visiting some officers at Kingston, with a coach and six horses, to be levying of war, and high treason; and sir John Hotham's defying us to our face, keeping our town, fort, and goods against us by force of arms, to be an act of affection and loyalty; what needs a power of making new laws? Or is there such a thing as law left? We desire our good subjects to mark the reason and consequence of these Votes; the progress they have already made; and how infinite that progress may be. First, they vote the 'kingdom is in imminent danger' (it is above three months since they discerned it) 'from enemies abroad, and a Popish and discontented party at home.' That is matter of fact. The law follows: This Vote hath given them 'authority by law (the fundamental laws of the kingdom) to order and dispose of the Militia of the kingdom, and, with this power, and to prevent that danger, to enter into our towns, seize upon our Magazine, and by force, keep both from us.' Is not this our case? First, they vote, 'We have an intention to levy war against our parliament;' That is matter of fact: Then they declare such as shall assist to be guilty of High Treason; that is the law, and proved by two statutes, themselves know to be repealed: No matter for that, they 'declare' it. Upon this ground they exercise the Militia, and so actually do that upon us, what they have 'voted' we intend to do upon them. Who doth not see the confusion that must follow upon such a power of 'declaring?' If they should now 'vote,' That we did not write the Declaration, but that such an one did it, which is still matter of fact; and then 'declare' it, That, for so doing, he is an enemy to the common-wealth; what is become of the law? The man was born to? And if all their zeal for the defence of the law, be but to defend that what they 'declare' to be law, their own Votes will not be in their power to satisfy any man their good intentions to the public peace, to such who is willing to relinquish his title to Magna Charta, and hold his life and fortune by Vote of a major part of both houses. In word; we deny not but they may have power to 'declare' in a particular doubtful case, but regularly brought before them, what law is; but make a general Declaration, whereby a known rule of the law may be crossed or altered, they have no power, nor can exercise any; without bringing the life and liberty of the subject, to a lawless and arbitrary subjection. We complained (and let the world judge the justice and necessity of that Complaint) of the multitude of seditious Pamphlets and sermons; and that Declaration tells us, 'They know we have ways enough in our ordinary courts of justice to punish these.' So we have to punish Tumults and Riots; and yet they will not serve our turn to keep our towns, our forests, and parks, from violence. And it may be, though those courts have the power to punish, they may have lost the skill to define what Riots and Tumults are; otherwise a jury in Southwark, legally impanelled to examine a riot there, would not have been superseded, and the sheriff enjoined not to proceed, by virtue of an Order of the house of commons; which it seems, at that time, had the sole power of 'declaring.' But it is no wonder that they, who could not see the Tumults, do not consider the Pamphlets and Sermons; though the author of the 'Protestation protested' be well known to be Burton, the infamous disturber of the peace of this church and state; and that he preached it at Westminster, in the hearing of divers members of the house of commons: but of such Pamphlets and seditious Preachers (divers whereof have been recommended, if not imposed upon sev-

parishes by some members of both houses, what authority we know not) we shall hereafter take a further account.—We confess we are little skill in the laws, and those that have most we now find are much to seek; yet cannot understand or believe, 'That every ordinary court, or any court, hath power to do what Guard they please, and under what command they please; neither can we imagine what dangerous effects they found by the word we appointed them; or, indeed, any the next occasion why they needed a guard at all. But of all the imputations so causelessly and unjustly laid upon us by that Declaration, we stand at wonder at that charge, so apparently and manifestly untrue, 'That such are continually offered and countenanced by us, who are patrons or favourers of, or related unto, the chief authors or actors of that arbitrary power heretofore practised and complained of: and, on the other side, That such as did appear justly, are daily discountenanced and discredited.' We would know one person that contributed to the ills of those times, or had vengeance upon those that did, whom we do, manifestly have countenanced or preferred. Nay, are confident, (and we look for no other at our hands) as they have been always most violent assertors of the public liberties, so, if we found us inclined to any thing not agreeable to honour and justice, they would leave us no sorrow: Whether different persons have and do not receive countenance elsewhere, upon what grounds, let all men judge; whether we have not been forward enough to honour and prefer those of the most contrary opinion, how little comfort soever we have of those preferments; in bestowing of which, hereafter, we shall be more guided by their actions than opinions; and therefore we thought good cause to bestow that Admonition (for assure you it was an Admonition of our own) in both our houses of parliament, 'To take heed of inclining, under the specious shews of necessity and danger, to the exercise of such arbitrary power they before complained of.' If our advice will do no harm; and we shall be glad to see it followed.—And are all the specious promises, and loud professions, 'Of making a great and glorious king; of settling a better Revenue upon us than any of our ancestors have enjoyed; of making us to be honored at home, and feared abroad,' resolved on this, 'That they will be ready to settle the Revenue in an honourable proportion, when we shall put ourselves in such a posture of government, that our subjects may be secure to enjoy their just protection for their Religion, Liberty, and Liberties? What posture of government they intend we know not; nor can we give what security our good subjects can require for their Religion, Laws, and Liberties, which we have not offered, or fully given. And is it suitable to the duty and dignity of both houses of parliament, to answer our particular angry expressions of the causes of our removal from London (so generally known to the kingdom) with a scoff, 'That they hope we were driven from thence, not by our own fears, but by the fears of the lord Digby and his retinue of cavaliers?' Sure the penner of that Declaration inserted that ungrave and insolent expression (as he hath done divers others) without the consent or examination of both houses, who would not so lightly have departed from their former professions of duty to us.—Whether the Way to a good Understanding between us and our people hath been as zealously pressed by them, as it hath been professed and desired by us, will be easily discerned by those who observe, that we have left no public act undone on our part, which, in the least degree, might be necessary to the peace, plenty, and security of our subjects; and that they have not dispatched one act which hath given the least evidence of their particular affection and kindness to us; but, on the contrary, have discountenanced and hindered the testimony other men would have given us of their affections: witness the stopping and keeping back the bill of Subsidies, granted by the clergy, almost a year since; which, though our personal wants are so notoriously known, they will not, to this time, pass: so not only forbearing to supply us themselves, but keeping the love and bounty of other men from us; and afford no other Answers to all our desires, all our Reasons, (indeed not to be answered) than, 'That we must not make our understanding or reason the rule of our government; but suffer ourselves to be assisted' (which we never denied) by our Great Council. 'We require no other liberty to our will, than the meanest of them do, (we wish they would always use that liberty) not to consent to any thing evidently contrary to our conscience and understanding; and we have, and shall always give, as much estimation and regard to the advice and counsel of both our houses of parliament, as ever prince hath done: but we shall never (and we hope our people will never) account the contrivance of a few factious seditious persons, (a Malignant Party, who would sacrifice the commonwealth to their own fury and ambition) the wisdom of parliament; and that the justifying and defending such persons (of whom, and of their particular sinister ways to compass their own bad ends, we shall shortly inform the world) is not the way to preserve parliaments; but is the opposing and preferring the consideration of a few unworthy persons, before their duty to their king, or their care of the kingdom.' They would have us remember, 'That our Resolutions do concern kingdoms; and therefore not to be moulded by our own understandings.' We well remember it; but we would have them remember, That when their consultations endeavour to lessen the office and dignity of a king, they meddle with that which is not within their determination; and of which we must give an account to God and our other kingdoms, and must maintain with the sacrifice of our life.—Lastly, That Declaration tells you of a 'present desperate and malicious Plot the

Malignant Party is now acting, under the plausible notions of stirring men up to a care of preserving the king's prerogative; maintaining the discipline of the church; upholding the reverence and solemnity of God's service; and encouraging learning; (indeed plausible and honourable notions to act any thing upon) 'and that upon these grounds divers mutinous Petitions have been framed in London, Kent, and other places.' Upon what Grounds would these men have Petitions framed? Have so many Petitions (even against the form and constitution of the kingdom, and the laws established) been joyfully received and accepted? And shall Petitions framed upon these Grounds be called 'Mutinous?' Hath a multitude of mean, unknown, inconsiderable, contemptible persons about the city and suburbs of London, had liberty to petition against the government of the church; against the Book of Common Prayer; against the Freedom and Privilege of Parliament; and been thanked for it: and shall it be called Mutiny in the gravest and best citizens of London, or in the gentry and commonalty of Kent, to frame Petitions upon these Grounds; and to desire to be governed by the known laws of the land, not by Orders and Votes of either, or both houses? Can this be thought the wisdom and justice of both houses of parliament? Is it not evidently the work of a faction within, or without, both houses, who deceive the trust reposed in them; and have now told us what Mutiny is, That to stir men up to a care of preserving our prerogative; maintaining the discipline of the church; upholding and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service; and encouraging of learning, is 'Mutiny!' Let Heaven and earth, God and man, judge between us and these men. And however such Petitions are there called 'mutinous,' and the Petitioners threatened, discountenanced, censured, and imprisoned; if they bring such lawful Petitions to us, we will graciously receive them; and defend them and their rights against what power soever, with the uttermost hazard of our being.—We have been the longer (to our very great pain) in this Answer, that we might give the world satisfaction, even in the most trivial particulars which have been objected against us; and that we may not be again reproached with any more 'prudent Omissions.' If we have been compelled to sharper language than we affect, let it be considered, how vile, how insufferable our provocations have been; and except to repel force be to assault, and to give punctual and necessary Answers to rough and insolent demands be to make invectives, we are confident the world will accuse us of too much mildness; and all our good subjects will think, we are not well dealt with; and will judge of us, and of their own happiness and security in us, by our actions; which we desire may no longer prosper, or have a blessing from God upon them and us, than they shall be directed to the glory of God, in the maintenance of the true Protestant profession; in the preservation of the property and liberty of the subject, in the observation of the laws; and to the maintenance of the rights and freedom of parliament, in the allowance and protection of all their just privileges."

A 5th Letter from the committee at York.]

May 25. Another Letter from the lord Howard, at York, directed to the lord keeper, was received, and read as follows:

"My lord; In obedience to the command of the house, we waited yesterday on his majesty and presented him with the Petition and Votes of both houses (p. 1212). He was pleased to tell us, 'That he would not give us a present Answer, but that we should have one soon.' We do not, as yet, hear of any resolution to lay down these Guards; the Foot are still the same number they were; the Horse, we hear, do increase; so likewise, do men's fears and apprehensions. The Prince is made captain of these Horse, a brother of sir John Ron's lieutenant, and one of sir Ingleby Dunsons, a gentleman of this country, is cornet. His majesty had summoned the freeholders, copyholders, and substantial farmers of this county, to be here, at York, on Friday next; but, this afternoon, we hear there is warrant from the king, to the high sheriff, to defer that meeting till Friday come next. Your lordship's humble servant, Ed. Howard, York, May 23, 1642."

An Order of the House of Lords for calling in their absent Members.] This day the lords took notice of several of their house being sent on the king's letters to attend him at York; and judging it contrary to the privilege of that house, resolved to consider what was fit to be taken with these deserters. Upon it was ordered, That the lords going to York, or other places, contrary to a former order of this house, shall be sent for, and taken into custody, to answer their contempt due to this house; and, in case they refuse to come, then the house would give judgment against them for the same. The lords North and Brooke were appointed to put down the names of such peers as were absent without leave &c. This was done accordingly, and presented to the house under the following distinctions:

Remonstrance of both Houses, in Answer to King's Declaration concerning Hull, &c.] y 26. Another long Remonstrance, or Declaration, having been framed by the commons, and sent up to the lords, was this day read in that house, and agreed to: the earls Bristol, Monmouth, and Devonshire, with lords Mowbray, Grey de Ruthyn, Howard Charlton, Pierpoint and Capel, dissent.
Ordered, That this Declaration be forthwith printed and published, as follows: *

* From the original edition, printed for us in Frank, 1642. The Declarations and proceedings of parliament having been
Vol. II.

" Although the great affairs of this kingdom, and the miserable and bleeding condition of the kingdom of Ireland, affords us little leisure to spend our time in Declarations, or in Answers and Replies; yet the Malignant Party about his majesty, taking all occasions to multiply calumnies upon the houses of Parliament, and to publish sharp invectives under his majesty's name against them and their proceedings; (a new engine which they have invented to heighten the distractions of this kingdom, and to beget and increase distrust and disaffection between the king, his parliament, and the people) we cannot be so much wanting to our own innocency, or to the duty of our trust, as not to clear ourselves from those false aspersions; and (which is our chiefest care) to disabuse the people's minds, and open their eyes, that under the false shews and pretexts of the law of the land, and of their own rights and liberties, they may not be carried into the road-way that leads to the utter ruin and subversion thereof.—A late occasion that these wicked spirits of division have taken to defame, and indeed to arraign, the proceedings of both houses of parliament, hath been from our Votes of the 26th of April, and our Declaration concerning the business of Hull; which because we put forth before we could send our Answer concerning that matter unto his majesty, those mischievous instruments of dissent, between the king, the parliament, and the people; whose chief labour and study is to misrepresent our actions to his maj. and to the kingdom, would need interpret this as an Appeal to the People, and a declining of all intercourse between his majesty and us, as if we thought it to no purpose to endeavour any more to give him satisfaction; and, without expecting any longer our Answer, they themselves have, under the name of a Message from his majesty to both houses of parliament, indeed made an Appeal to the People; as the Message itself doth in a manner grant it to be, offering to join issue with us in that way; and, in the nature thereof, doth clearly shew itself to be none other: therefore we shall likewise address our Answer to the Kingdom, not by way of Appeal, as we are charged; but to prevent them from being their own executioners; and from being persuaded, under false colours of defending the law and their own liberties, to destroy both with their own hands; by taking their lives, liberties, and estates out of those hands whom they have chosen and intrusted therewith; and resigning them up unto some evil counsellors about his majesty, who can lay no other foundation of their own great-printed frequently about this time, in an incorrect manner by unlicensed printers, we find, in the title of this Declaration, the following remarkable Certificate. " According to an Order, made in the house of commons on Saturday last, I have examined this copy with the original, and have mended it. H. Elsing. Cler. Parl. D. Com."

ness, but upon the ruin of this, and, in it, of all parliaments, and, in them, of the true religion and the freedom of this nation.—These are the men that would persuade the people, that both houses of Parliament (containing all the Peers, and, representing all the Commons of England) would destroy the laws of the laud and liberty of the people; wherein, besides the trust of the whole, they themselves, in their own particulars, have so great an interest of honour and estate, that we hope it will gain little credit with any that have the least use of reason, that such as must have so great a share in the misery, should take so much pains in the procuring thereof; and spend so much time, and run so many hazards, to make themselves slaves and destroy the property of their estates.—But that we may give particular satisfaction to the several imputations cast upon us, we shall take them in order, as they are laid upon us, in that Message.—First, we are charged ‘for the avowing of that act of sir John Hotham, which is termed unparalleled, and an high and unheard-of affront unto his majesty;’ and, as if we needed not to have done it, ‘he being able,’ as is alledged, ‘to produce no such command of the houses of parliament.’—Although sir J. Hotham had not an Order that did express every circumstance of that case, yet he might have produced an Order of both houses which did comprehend this case, not only in the clear intention, but in the very words thereof; which knowing in our consciences to be so, and to be most necessary for the safety of the kingdom, we could not but in honour and justice avow that act of his; which we are confident will appear to all the world to be so far from being an affront to the king, that it will be found to have been an act of great loyalty to his majesty, and to his kingdom.—The next charge upon is, ‘That, instead of giving his majesty satisfaction, we published a Declaration concerning that business, as an Appeal unto the People; as if our intercourse with his majesty, and for his satisfaction, were now to no more purpose;’ which course is alledged to be very unagreeable to the modesty and duty of former times, and not warrantable by any precedents, but what ourselves have made.—If the penner of this Message had waited a while, and had not expected that two houses of parliament, (especially burthened as they are at this time with so many pressing and urgent affairs) should have moved as fast as himself, he would not have said that Declaration was instead of an Answer to his majesty; which we did dispatch with all the speed and diligence we could, and have sent it to his majesty by a committee of both houses; whereby it appears, that we did it not upon that ground, ‘that we thought it was no more to any purpose to endeavour to give his majesty satisfaction.’ And as for ‘the duty and modesty of former times, from which we are said to have varied, and to want the warrant of any precedents therein, but what ourselves have made:’ if we have made any precedents in this parliament, we have made them for posterity; upon the same or better grounds of reason and law than those were, upon which our predecessors first made any for us. And as some precedents ought not to be rules for us to follow, so none can be limits to bound our proceedings, which may and must vary according to the different condition of times; and for this particular ‘of setting forth Declarations, for the satisfaction of the people, who have chosen and intrusted us with all that is dearest to them;’ if there be no example for it, it is because there were never any such monsters before, that ever attempted to disaffect the people from a parliament, or could ever harbour a thought that it might be effected: were there ever such practices to poison the people with an ill apprehension of the parliament? Were there ever such imputations and scandals laid upon the proceedings of both houses? Were there ever so many and so great breaches of privilege of parliament? Were there ever so many and so desperate designs of force and violence against the parliament, and the members thereof? If we have done more than ever our ancestors have done, we have suffered more than ever they have suffered; and yet in point of modesty and duty, we shall not yield to the best of former times; and we shall put this in issue, Whether the highest and most unwarrantable proceedings of any of his majesty’s predecessors, do not fall short of, and much below, what hath been done to us this parliament: and on the other side, Whether we should make the highest precedents of other parliaments our patterns, there would be cause to complain of ‘Want of modesty and duty in us;’ when we have not so much as suffered such things to enter into our thoughts, when all the world knows they have put in actual.—Another Charge which is laid very high upon us (and which were indeed a very great crime if we were found guilty thereof) is, ‘That, in avowing this act of sir J. Hotham, we do, in consequence, confound and destroy the law and interest of all his majesty’s good subjects to their lands and goods; and that upon this ground, That his majesty hath the same title to his own town of Hull, which any of his subjects have to their houses or lands; and the same to his Magazine or Munition there, that any man hath to his money, plate, or jewels; and therefore that they ought not to have been disposed of without or against his consent, no more than the house, land, money, plate, or jewels, of any subject ought to be, without or against his will.’—Here that is laid down for a principle, which would indeed pull up the very foundation of the liberty, property, and interest of every subject in particular, and of all the subjects in general; if we should admit it for a truth, ‘That his majesty hath the same right and title to his Towns and Magazine (bought with the public monies, as we conceive that at Hull to have been) that every particular man hath to his house, lands, and goods;’ for his majesty’s towns are no more his own, than his kingdom is his own; and his kingdom is no more his own, than his people are his own; and if the king had a property in all his owns, what would become of the subjects property in their houses therein? And if he had a property in his kingdom, what would become of the subjects property in their lands throughout the kingdom? Or of their liberties, if his maj. had the same right in their persons, that every subject hath in their lands, or goods? And what should become of all the subjects interest in the towns and forts of the kingdom, and in the kingdom itself, if his maj. might sell, or give them away, or dispose of them at his pleasure, so a particular man may do with his lands and with his goods? This erroneous maxim, being infused into princes, 'That their kingdoms are their own, and that they may do with them what they will, (as if their kingdoms were for them, and not they for their kingdoms) is the root of all the subjects misery, and of all the invading of their just rights and liberties; whereas, indeed, they are only intrusted with their kingdoms, and with their towns, and with their people, and with the public treasure of the commonwealth and whatsoever is bought herewith: by the known law of this kingdom, the very jewels of the crown are not the king's proper goods, but are only intrusted to him for use and ornament thereof; as the towns, forts, treasure, magazine, offices and people of the kingdom, and the whole kingdom itself, are intrusted unto him for the good and safety and best advantage thereof: and as this trust is for the use of the kingdom, so ought it to be managed by the advice of the houses of parliament, whom the kingdom hath trusted for that purpose; it being their duty to see it be discharged according to the condition and trust thereof; and, as much as in them lies, by all possible means to prevent the contrary; which, if it hath been their chief care and only aim in the disposing of the town and magazine of Hull, in such manner as they have done, they hope it will appear clearly to all the world, that they have discharged their own trust, and not invaded that of his majesty's; much less, his property, which, in this case, they could not do. But admitting his majesty hath, indeed, a property in the Town and Magazine of Hull, who doubts but that a parliament may dispose of any thing wherein his majesty or any subject hath a right, in such a way as that the kingdom may not be exposed to hazard or danger thereby? which is our case in the disposing of the town and magazine of Hull. And whereas his maj. doth allow him, and a greater, power to a parliament, but in that sense only as he himself is a part thereof; we appeal to every man's conscience, that hath observed our proceedings, whether we have joined his maj. from his parliament; who have, in all humble ways, sought his concurrence with us; as in this particular about Hull, and for the removal of the Magazine there, so also in all other things; or whether these evil Counsellors about him have not separated him from his parliament, not only in distance of place, but also in the discharge of this joint trust with them for the peace and safety of the kingdom, in this and some other particulars.—We have given no occasion to his majesty to declare his resolution with so much earnestness, 'That he will not suffer either, or both houses, by their Votes, without or against his consent, to enjoin any thing that is forbidden by the law, or to forbid any thing that is enjoined by the law;' for our Votes have done no such thing: and as we shall be very tender of the law; (which we acknowledge to be the safeguard and custody of all public and private interests) so we shall never allow a few private persons about his majesty, nor his maj. himself, in his own person and out of his court, to be judge of the law; and that contrary to the judgment of the highest court of judicature: in like manner, 'That his majesty hath not refused to consent to any thing, that might be for the peace and happiness of the kingdom,' we cannot admit it in any other sense, but as his maj. taketh the measure of what will be for the peace and happiness of the kingdom, from some few ill-affected persons about him; contrary to the advice and judgment of his great council of parliament.—And because the advice of both houses of 'Parliament' hath, through the suggestions of evil counsellors, been so much undervalued of late, and so absolutely rejected and refused; we hold it fit to declare unto the 'Kingdom,' (whose honour and interest is so much concerned in it) what is the privilege of the great council of parliament herein, and what is the obligation that lieth upon the kings of this realm to pass such bills as are offered unto them by both houses of parliament, in the name, and for the good, of the whole kingdom; whereunto they stand engaged, both in conscience and in justice, to give their royal assent: in conscience, in respect of the Oath that is, or ought to be, taken by the Kings of this realm at their coronation; as well to confirm, by their royal assent, such good laws as their people shall choose; and to remedy, by law, such inconveniences as the kingdom may suffer; as to keep and protect the laws already in being. This may appear both by the Form of the Oath upon record, and in books of good authority, and by the statute of the 25th Edw. 3, intitled, 'The Statute of Provisors of Benefices;' the form of

* It appears by the Commons' Journals of the 19th of this month, that there was a Division in the house, upon the question, 'Whether this clause beginning with these words, 'In conscience, &c.' should stand as part of this Declaration?' It was carried in the affirmative by 103 voices against 61. This enables us to correct a mistake of lord Clarendon's, wherein he says, speaking of the time of the passing this Declaration, 'That, in debates of the highest consequence, there was not usually present in the house of commons the fifth part of their just numbers.'

A CLAUSE in the PREAMBLE of a STATUTE made the 25th of Edward III. intitled, The Statute of Provisors of Benefices,

"Whereupon the said commons have prayed our said lord the king, that since the right of the crown of England, and the law of the said realm is such, that, upon the Mischiefs and Damages which happen to his realm, he ought, and is bound by his oath, with the accord of his people in his parliament, thereof to make Remedy and Law; and in removing the Mischiefs and Damages which thereof ensue, that it may please him thereupon to ordain remedy: Our lord the king seeing the Mischiefs and Damages beforementioned; and having regard to the said statute, made in the time of his said grandfather, and to the causes contained in the same, which statute holdeth always his force, and was never defeated, repealed, nor annulled in any point; and by so much he is bounden by his Oath to cause the same to be kept as the law of his realm, though that, by sufferance and negligence, it hath been since attempted to the contrary; also having regard to the grievous complaints made to him by his people, in divers his parliaments holden heretofore, willing to ordain Remedy for the great Damages and Mischiefs which have happened, and daily do happen, to the church of England by the said cause, &c."

"Here the lords and commons claim it directly, as the right of the crown of England, and of the law of the land, That the king is bound by his Oath, with the accord of his people in parliament, to make Remedy and Law upon the Mischiefs and Damages which happen to this realm; and the king doth not deny it, although he take occasion, from a statute formerly made by his grandfather, which was laid as a part of the ground of this Petition, to fix his Answer upon another branch of his Oath; and pretermits that which is claimed by the lords and commons, which he would not have done if it might have been excepted against.—In justice they are obliged thereunto, in respect of the trust reposed in them, which is as well to preserve the kingdom by the making of new laws where there shall be need, as by observing of laws already made. A kingdom being many times as much exposed to ruin for the want of a new law, as by the violation of those that are in being; and this is so clear a right, that no doubt his maj. will acknowledge it to be as due unto his people as his protection; but how far forth he is obliged to follow the judgment of his parliament therein, that is the question. And certainly, besides the words in the king's Oath, referring unto such laws as the people shall choose, as in such things which concern the public weal and good of the kingdom, They are the most proper judges, who are sent from the whole kingdom for that very purpose; so we do not find, since laws have passed by way of bills (which are read thrice in both houses, and committed, and every part and circumstance of them fully weighed and debated upon the commitment, and afterwards passed in both houses) that ever the kings of this realm did deny them, otherwise than is expressed in that usual Answer, 'Le Roy-s'avisera;' which signifies rather a suspension than a refusal of the royal assent: and in those other laws, which are framed by way of Petition of Right, the houses of parliament have taken themselves to be so far judges of the rights claimed by them, that when the king's Answer hath not in every point, been fully according to their desire, they have still insisted upon their claim, and never rested satisfied till such time as they had an Answer according to their own demands; as was done in the late Petition of Right and in former times upon the like occasion: and if the parliament be judge between the king and his people in the question of Right, (as by the manner of the claim in Petitions of Right, and by Judgments in Parliament, in cases of illegal Impositions and Taxes, and the like, it appeareth to be) why should they not be so also in the question of the common Good and Necessity of the kingdom, wherein the kingdom hath as clear a right as to have the benefit and remedy of law, as to any thing whatsoever? And yet we do not deny but in private bills and also in public acts of grace, as Pardons, and the like Grants of Favour, his majesty may have a greater latitude of granting or denying, as he shall think fit.—All this considered, we cannot but wonder, That the contriver of this Message should deceive the people of this land to be so void of common sense, as to enter into so deep a mistrust of those that they have reposed, and as his maj. ought to repose, so great a trust in, as to despair of any security in their private estate, by descents, purchases, assurances, or conveyances; unless his maj. should, by his Voice, prevent the prejudice they might receive therein, by the Votes of both houses of parliament: as if they, who are especially chosen and entrusted for that purpose, and, who themselves, must needs have so great a share in all Grievances of the subject, had wholly cast off all care of the subject's good; and his maj. had, lely taken it up: and as if it could be imagined, That they should, by their Votes, overthrow the right of descents, purchases, or of conveyance or assurance, in whose judgment the kingdom hath placed all their particular interests, if any of them should be called in question in any of those cases; and that a knowing not where to place them with easier security) without any appeal from them, to any other person or court whatsoever. But indeed we are very much to seek how the case of Hull should concern descents and purchases, or conveyances and assurances, less it be in procuring more security to men their private interests, by the preservation of a whole from confusion and destruction; and much less do we understand how the 'Sovereign Power' was resisted and despised therein: certainly no command from his majesty, and his high court of parliament, where the 'Sovereign Power' resides, was disobeyed: Sir John Hotham; nor yet was his majesty's authority derived out of any other court, or by any legal commission, or by any other way wherein the law hath appointed his majesty's commands, to be derived to his subjects: and what validity his 'verbal commands' are, without any such stamp of his authority upon them, and against the Order of both houses of Parliament; and whether the not submitting thereto be a resisting and despising of the Sovereign authority, we leave it to all men to judge, that all understand the government of this kingdom.—We acknowledge, 'That his majesty hath made many expressions of his zeal and intentions against the desperate designs of Papists;' and yet it is also as true, that the counsels, which have prevailed of late with him, have been little suitable to those expressions and intentions: for what doth more advance the open and bloody design of the Papists in Ireland, (whereon the secret plots of the Papists we do, in all likelihood, depend) than his majesty's absenting himself, in that manner as he doth, from his parliament, and setting forth such sharp invectives against them; notwithstanding the humble Petitions, and other means, which his parliament hath addressed to him for his return, and for his satisfaction concerning their proceedings? And what is more likely to give a rise to the designs of Papists (whereof there are so many in the north near to the town of Hull) and of other malignant and ill-affected persons, which are ready to join with them, or to the attempts of foreigners from abroad, than the continuing of us at great Magazine at Hull, at this time, contrary to the desire and advice of both houses of parliament? So that we have too much reason to believe, that the Papists have still the same way and means, whereby they have increased upon his majesty's counsels for their own advantage.—For the Malignant Party, his majesty needeth not a definition of the law, and yet a more full character of them from both houses of parliament, for to find them out; if he will please only to apply the character, that himself hath made of them, to those unto whom it doth properly and truly belong, who are so much disaffected to the peace of the kingdom, as that they endeavour to disaffect his maj. from the houses of parliament, and persuade him to be at such a distance from them both in place and affection. Who are more disaffected to the government of the kingdom, than such as lead his maj. away from hearkening to his parliament, (which, by the constitution of this kingdom is his greatest and best council) and persuade him to follow the malicious counsels of some private men, in opposing and contradicting the wholesome advices and just proceedings of that his most faithful council and highest court? Who are they that not only neglect and despise, but labour to undermine the law, under colour of maintaining of it, but they that endeavour to destroy the fountain and conservatory of the law, which is the parliament? And who are they that 'set up rules for themselves to walk by, other than such as are appointed by law,' but they that will make other judges of the law than the law hath appointed; and so dispense with their obedience to that which the law calleth 'Authority,' and to their determinations and resolutions to whom the judgment doth appertain by law? For when private persons shall make the law to be their rule, according to their own understandings, contrary to the judgments of those that are competent judges thereof, they set up unto themselves other rules than the law doth acknowledge. Who these persons are, none knoweth better than his maj. himself; and if he will please to take all possible caution of them, as destructive to the common-wealth and himself, and would remove them from about him, it would be the most effectual means to compose all the distractions, and to cure the distempers of this kingdom.—For the lord Digby's Letter, we did not make mention of it as a 'ground to hinder his majesty from visiting his own Fort; but we appeal to the judgment of any indifferent man that shall read that Letter, and compare it with the posture that his majesty then did, and still doth, stand in towards the parliament, and with the circumstances of that late action of his majesty in going to Hull, whether the advisers of that journey intended 'only a visit' of that Fort and Magazine. As to the ways and overtures of Accommodation, and the Message of the 20th of Jan. last, 'so often pressed, but still in vain,' as is alledged, our Answer is, That although, so often as the Message of the 20th of Jan. hath been pressed, so often have our privileges been clearly infringed; in that a way and method of proceeding should be prescribed unto us, as well for the settling of his majesty's Revenue, as for the presenting of our own desires: A thing which, in former parliaments, hath always been excepted against as a breach of privilege; yet, in respect of the matter contained in that Message, and out of our earnest desire to beget a good understanding between his maj. and us, we swallowed down all matters of circumstance; and had, e'er this time, presented the chief of our desires to his majesty; had we not been interrupted with continual Denials, even of those things that were necessary for our present security and subsistence; and had not those denials been followed with perpetual invectives against us and our proceedings; and had not those invectives been heaped upon us so thick one after another, (who were already in a manner wholly taken up with the pressing affairs of this kingdom, and of the kingdom of Ireland) that, as we had little encouragement from thence to hope for any good Answers to our desires, so we had not so much time left us to perfect them in such a manner as to offer them unto his majesty.—We confess it is a resolution most worthy of a prince, and of his majesty, 'To shut his ears against any that would incline him to a Civil War, and to abhor the very apprehension of it;' but we cannot believe that mind to have been in them that came with his majesty to the house of commons; or in them that accompanied his maj. to Hampton-Court, and appeared in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames; or in divers of them that followed his maj. now lately to Hull; or in them that, after, drew their swords at York, demanding 'who would be for the king;' nor in them that advised his maj. to declare sir John Hotham a traitor, before the Message was sent concerning that business to the parliament; or to make Propositions to the gentlemen of the county of York, to assist his maj. to proceed against him in a way of force, before he had, or possibly could receive an Answer from the Parliament, to whom he had sent to demand justice of them against sir J. Hotham for that fact: and if those malignant spirits shall ever force us to defend our religion, the kingdom, the privileges of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the subjects, with our swords, the blood and destruction that shall ensue thereupon, must be wholly cast upon their account, God and our own consciences tell us that we are clear; and we doubt not but God and the whole world will clear us therein.—For captain Legge, we did not say, 'That he was accused, or that there was any charge against him for the bringing up of the army;' but that he was employed in that business. And for that question concerning the earl of Newcastle, mentioned by his majesty, which is said 'to have been asked long since, and that it is not easy to be answered;' we conceive that it is a question of more difficulty, and harder to be answered, Why, when his maj. held it necessary, upon the same grounds that first moved from the houses of parliament, that a governor should be placed in that town, sir J. Hotham, a gentleman of known fortune and integrity, and a person of whom both houses of parliament had expressed their confidence, should be refused by his majesty; and the earl of Newcastle (who, by the way, was so far named in the business of the bringing up of the army, that although there was not ground enough for a judicial proceeding, yet there was ground of suspicion; at least his reputation was not left so unblemished thereby, as that he should be thought the fittest man in England for that employment of Hull) should be sent down, in a private way, from his majesty, to take upon him that government; and why he should disguise himself under another name, when he came thither, as he did?—But whosoever shall consider, together with these circumstances, that of the Time when sir J. Hotham was first appointed by both houses of parliament to take upon him that employment; which was presently after his majesty's coming to the house of commons, and upon the retiring of himself to Hampton-Court, and the lord Digby's assembling of cavaliers at Kingston upon Thames, will find reason enough why that town of Hull should be committed rather to sir J. Hotham, by the authority of both houses of parliament, than to the earl of Newcastle, sent from his maj. in the manner that he was: and for the power that sir J. Hotham has from the houses of parliament, the better it is known and understood, we are confident the more it will be approved of and justified. And as we do not conceive, That his majesty's refusal to have that Magazine removed could give any advantage against him to have it taken from him; and as no such thing is done, so we cannot conceive for what other reason any should counsel his majesty not to suffer it to be removed, upon the desire of both houses of parliament; except it be that they had an intention to make use of it against the parliament.—We did not except against those that presented a Petition to his majesty at York, for the continuance of the Magazine at Hull, 'in respect of their condition, or in respect of their number, because they were mean persons, or because they were few;' but because they being but a few, and there being so many more in the county of as good quality as themselves, (who have, by their Petition to his majesty, disavowed that act of theirs) that they should take upon themselves the style of 'All the gentry and inhabitants of that county;' and, under that style, should presume to interpose their advice contrary to the Votes of both houses of parliament; and if it can be made appear, that any of these Petitions, that are said to have been presented to the houses of parliament, 'and to have been of a strange nature,' were of such a nature as that before-mentioned, we are confident they were never received with our consent and approbation.—Whether there was 'an intention to deprive sir J. Hotham of his life, if his majesty had been admitted into Hull; and whether the information were such; as that he had ground to believe it, we will not bring it into question; for that it was not, nor ought to have been, the Ground for doing what he did; neither was the 'number of his majesty's attendants,' for being more or fewer, much considerable in this case: for although it be true, That if his majesty had en-

red 'with 20 horse only,' he might haply have found means to have forced the entrance of the rest of his train, who, being once in the town, would not have been long without arms; that was not the 'Ground' that sir J. Hotham is to proceed upon; but upon the admittance of the king into the town at all, so as to 'deliver up the town and magazine unto him, and to whomsoever he should give the command thereof,' without the knowledge and consent of both houses of parliament, by whom he was trusted to the contrary; and his majesty having declared that 'to be his intention,' concerning the town, in a Message that he sent to parliament not long before he went to Hull, saying, 'That he did not doubt but that town would be delivered up to him, whensoever he pleased, as supposing it to be kept against a siege;' and in like manner concerning the Magazine, in his Message of the 24th of April; wherein it is expressed, 'That his majesty sat thither with a purpose to take into his hands the Magazine, and to dispose of it in such a manner as he should think fit:' upon these terms sir J. Hotham could not have admitted his majesty, and made good his trust to the parliament; though his majesty would have excused 'alone,' without any attendance at all his own, or of the prince or duke, his sons, which we do not wish to be less than they are their number, but could heartily wish they were, generally, better in their conditions.—In close of this Message, his majesty states the case of Hull, and thereupon inferreth, 'That the act of sir J. Hotham was levying of war against the king, and consequently that it was less than high treason, by the letter of the statute of 25 Edw. 3. c. 2. unless the sense of that statute be very differing from the letter thereof.—In the stating of this case divers particulars may be observed, wherein it is not only stated; as, first, That his majesty's going to Hull was 'only an endeavour to visit a man and fort of his;' whereas it was indeed to possess himself of the town and magazine there, and to dispose of them as he himself should think good, without, and contrary to, the advice and orders of both houses of parliament; as doth clearly appear by his majesty's Declaration of his intention therein, and his Messages to both houses, immediately before and after that journey. Nor can we here that any man, that shall consider the circumstances of that journey to Hull, can think that his majesty would have gone thither at that time, and in that posture he was pleased to put himself in towards the parliament, if he had intended only 'a visit to the town and magazine.' Secondly, It is said to be 'his majesty's town, and his own magazine;' which be understood in that sense as was before expressed, as if his majesty had a private interest property therein, we cannot admit it to be so. Thirdly, (which is the main point of all) J. Hotham 'is said to have shut the gates against his majesty, and to have made resistance with armed men in defiance of his majesty;' whereas it was indeed in Obedience to his majesty and his authority, and for his service, and the service of the kingdom; for which use only all that interest is that the king hath in the town, and it is no farther his to dispose of, than he useth it for that end: and sir J. Hotham being commanded to keep the town and magazine for his majesty and the kingdom, and not to deliver them up, but by 'his majesty's authority signified by both houses of parliament,' all that is to be understood by those expressions of his 'denying and opposing his majesty's entrance, and telling him, in plain terms, he should not come in,' was only this, 'That he humbly desired his majesty to forbear his entrance till he might acquaint the parliament, and that his authority might come signified to him by both houses of parliament, according to the trust reposed in him.' And certainly if the letter of the statute of 25 Edw. 3. c. 2. be thought to import this, That no war can be levied against the king, but what is directed and intended against his person; or that every levying of forces for the defence of the king's authority, and of his kingdom, against the personal commands of the king opposed thereunto, though accompanied with his presence, is levying war against the king, it is very far from the sense of that statute; and so much the statute itself speaks, besides the authority of Book-cases, and Precedents of divers traitors condemned upon that interpretation thereof: for if the clause of levying war had been meant only against the king's person, what need had there been thereof, after the other branch of treason, in the same statute, of compassing the king's death, which would necessarily have implied this? And because the former clause doth imply this, it seems not at all to be intended in this latter branch; but only the levying war against the king, that is, against his laws and authority; and the levying war against his laws and authority, though not against his person, is levying war against the king; but the levying of force against his personal commands, though accompanied with his presence; and not against his laws and authority, but in the maintenance thereof, is no levying of war against the king, but for him.—Here is then our case: In a time of so many successive plots and designs of force against the parliament and kingdom; in a time of probable invasion from abroad, and that to begin at Hull, and to take the opportunity of seizing upon so great a Magazine there; in a time of so great distance and alienation of his majesty's affections from his parliament, and in them from his kingdom which they represent, by the wicked suggestions of a few malignant persons, by whose mischievous counsels he is wholly led away from his parliament, and their faithful advice and counsels: in such a time, the lords and commons in parliament commanded sir J. Hotham to draw in some of the Trained Bands of the parts adjacent to the town of Hull, for the securing of that town and magazine, for the service of his majesty and of the kingdom; of the safety whereof there is a higher trust reposed in them than any where else, and they are the proper judges of the danger thereof.—This town and magazine, being intrusted to sir J. Hotham, with express orders not to deliver them up but by the king's authority signified by both houses of parliament; his majesty, contrary to the advice and direction of both houses of parliament, without the authority of any court, or of any legal way wherein the law appoints the king to speak and command, accompanied with the same evil counsels about him that he had before, by a verbal command requires sir J. Hotham to admit him into the town; that he might dispose of it, and of the magazine there, according to his own, or rather according to the pleasure of those evil counsellors, who are still in so much credit about him; in like manner the lord Digby hath continual recourse unto, and countenance from, the queen's majesty in Holland; by which means he hath opportunity still to communicate his traitorous suggestions and conceptions to both their majesties; such as those were concerning 'his majesty's retiring to a place of strength, and declaring himself; and his own advancing of his majesty's service in such a way beyond the seas, and after that resorting to his majesty in such a place of strength;' and divers other things of that nature, contained in his Letter to the queen and to sir Lewis Dives; a person that had not the least part in this late business of Hull, and was presently dispatched away into Holland, soon after his majesty's return from Hull: for what purpose we leave the world to judge.—Upon the refusal of sir J. Hotham to admit his maj. into Hull, presently, without any due process of law, before his majesty had sent up the narration of his fact to the parliament, he was proclaimed traitor; and yet it is said, 'That therein there was no violation of the subjects right, nor any breach of the law, nor of the privilege of parliament,' though sir J. Hotham be a member of the house of commons: and 'that his majesty must have better reason than bare Votes to believe the contrary.' Although the Votes of the lords and commons in parliament, being the great council of the kingdom, are the reason of the king and of the kingdom, yet these Votes do not want clear and apparent reason for them: for if the solemn proclaiming a man a traitor signify any thing, it puts a man, and all those that any way aid, assist, or adhere unto him, into the same condition of traitors, and draws upon him all the consequences of treason; and if this may be done by law, without due process of law, the subject hath a very poor defence of the law, and a very small, if any, proportion of liberty thereby: and it is as little satisfaction to a man that shall be exposed to such penalties, by that declaration of him to be a traitor, to say, 'He shall have a legal trial afterwards,' as it is to condemn a man first and try him afterwards: and if there can be a necessity for any such proclaiming a man a traitor without due process of law, yet there was none in this case; for his maj. might have as well expected the judgment of the parliament, which was the right way, as he had leisure to send to them to demand justice against sir J. Hotham. And the breach of privilege of parliament is as clear, in this case, as the subversion of the subject common right: for though the privileges of parliament do not extend to those cases, mentioned in the Declaration, of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, so as to exempt the members of parliament from punishment, yet from all manner of process and trial, as it doth in other cases; yet it doth privilege them in the way and method of their trial and punishment, and that the parliament should have the cause first brought before them, that they may judge of the fact and of the grounds of the accusation, and how far forth the manner of their trial may concern, or not concern, the privilege of parliament; otherwise it would be in the power, not only of his majesty, but every private man, under pretence of treason or those other crimes, to take any man from his service in parliament, and so as many, after another, as he pleaseth; and consequently, to make a parliament what he will, and when he will; which would be a breach of so essential a privilege of parliament, that the very being thereof depends upon it, and therefore we no ways doubt, but that one that hath taken the Protestation, according to his solemn vow and oath, defying it with his life and fortune. Neither doth sitting of a parliament suspend all or any in maintaining that law which upholds the privilege of parliament, which upholds the parliament, which upholds the kingdom: and we so far from believing, 'That his majesty is the only person against whom treason cannot be committed,' that, in some sense, we acknowledge he is the only person against whom it can be committed; that is, as he is king; and that treason which is against the kingdom is against the king, than that which is against a person, because he is king: for that very person is not treason as it is against him as a man, but as a man that is a king, and as he is intrusted to the kingdom, and stands as a pillar intrusted with the kingdom, and discharging that trust.—Now the case is truly stated, that all the world may judge where the fault lies, although we must avow, that there can be no competent judge of this, or any other case, but a parliament; and we are as content, that his maj. shall never have cause to resort to any other court, or course, for vindication of his just privileges, and for recovery and maintenance of his known and undoubted rights, if there should be any violation or violation thereof, than to his highness of parliament. And in case those evil counsellors about him shall drive him into any other course, from and against his parliament, whatever are his majesty's expressions and intentions, we shall appeal to all men's consciences, and desire that they would by due hands upon their hearts, and think with themselves, whether such persons, as have of late, and still do resort to his majesty, and have his ear and favour most, either have been, or are more zealous assertors of the true Protestant Profession, (although we believe they are more earnest in the Protestant Profession, than in the Protestant Religion) or of the law of the land, the liberty of the subject, and the privileges of parliament, than the members of both houses of parliament, who are insinuated to be deserters, if not the destroyers of them: whether, if they could master this parliament by force, they would not hold up the same power to deprive us of all parliaments; which are the sound and pillar of the subjects liberty, and that which only maketh England a free monarchy.—In the Order of Assistance to the Committees of both houses; as they have no directions or instructions, but what have the law for their limits, and the safety of the land for their ends; we doubt not but all persons mentioned in the Order, and all his majesty's good subjects, will yield obedience to his majesty's authority expressed therein by both houses of parliament: and that all men may the better know their duty in matters of that nature, and upon how firm a ground they go that follow the judgment of parliament for their guide, we wish them, specially, to consider the true meaning and sound of that statute, made in the 11 Hen. c. 1. which is printed at large in the end of his majesty's Message of the 4th of May. The statute provides, 'That none that shall attend upon the king, and do him true service, shall be attainted or forfeit any thing.' What is the scope of this statute? To provide that none should suffer as traitors for serving the king in his wars, according to the duty of their allegiance? If this had been all, it had been a needless and ridiculous statute. Was it intended, (as they may seem to take the meaning of it to be, that caused it to be printed after his majesty's Message) that they should be free from all crime and penalty who should follow the king, and serve him in war, in any way whatsoever; whether it were for or against the kingdom, and the laws thereof? That cannot be, for that could not stand with the duty of their allegiance; which, in the beginning of the statute, is expressed to be, 'to serve the king for the time being in his wars, for the defence of him and the land;' and therefore if it be against the land, (as it cannot be understood to be otherwise, if it be against the parliament, the representative body of the kingdom) it is a declining from the duty of allegiance; which this statute supposeth may be, though men should follow the king's person in the war: otherwise there had been need of such a proviso in the end of this statute, 'That none should take benefit thereof that should decline from their allegiance.' It therefore which is the principal view in the statute, is, 'The serving of the king for the time being,' which cannot be meant of a ship-warbeck, or any that should call himself king; but such a one as, whatever his title might prove, either in himself or in his ancestors, should be received and acknowledged for such by the kingdom, the consent whereof cannot be discerned but by parliament; the act whereof is the act of the whole kingdom, by the personal suffrage of the peers, and the delegate consent of all the commons of England: and Henry 7, a wise king, considering that what was the case of Richard 3, his predecessor, might, by chance of battle, be his own; and that he might at once, by such a statute as this, satisfy such as had served his predecessor in his war, and also secure those that should serve him; who might otherwise fear to serve him in the wars, lest, by chance of battle, that might happen to him also, (if a duke of York had set up a title against him) which had happened to his predecessor, he procured this statute to be made, 'That no man should be accounted a traitor for serving the king in his wars for the time being;' that is, which was for the present allowed and received by the parliament on behalf of the kingdom; and, as it is truly suggested in the preamble of the statute, it is not agreeable to reason or conscience that it should be otherwise; seeing men would be put upon an impossibility of knowing their duty, if the judgment of the highest court should not be a rule and guide to them: and if the judgment thereof should be followed, where the question is, Who is king? Much more, What is the best service of the king and kingdom? And therefore those that shall guide themselves by the judgment of parliament, ought, whatever happen, to be secure and free from all account and penalties, upon the grounds and equity of this very statute.—We shall conclude: That although those wicked counsellors about his majesty have presumed, under his majesty's name, to put that dishonour and affront upon both houses of parliament, as to make them the countenancers of treason; enough to have dissolved all the bands and sinews of confidence between his majesty and his parliament, of whom the maxim of the law is, 'That a dishonourable thing ought not to be imagined of them;' yet we doubt not but it shall, in the end, appear to all the world, that our endeavours have been most hearty and sincere, for the maintenance of the true Protestant Religion, the king's just Prerogative, the Laws and Liberties of the Land, and the Privileges of Parliament; in which endeavours, by the grace of God, we will still persist, though we should perish in the work; which, if it should be, it is much to be feared, That Religion, Laws, Liberties, and Parliaments, would not be long-lived after us."

Orders of Parliament against removing the Records to York, &c.] May 27. This day there was a report made in the house of lords, of a conference held the day before, in which the commons desired, That since they were informed of the king's resolution to remove the next Term to York, some course might be taken to prevent the removal of the Records, at Westminster, to that place. Agreed to; and an Order was sent to all the keepers of the records, for that purpose.—They proposed, That a committee of lords might be appointed to join with one of their house, to consider of some fit means for the present defence of the kingdom. A committee of twelve lords was appointed accordingly.—They also informed the lords that they had received Letters from sir J. Hotham, and others, by which their lordships might see the Malignant Party were still working designs to disturb the peace of the kingdom. Then a Letter from sir J. Hotham to Mr. Hampden, was read, dated May the 25th, containing a design, by one Beckwith and others, to surprize the town of Hull; also another from the mayor of Beverley, to the same purpose. Ordered, That Mr. Beckwith shall be sent for as a delinquent.

The lords examined several messengers, sent down to take into custody the gentlemen who signed a late Petition to the king against removing the Magazine from Hull. * These declared, That they had served them all with the Order, most of them personally; and that those had shewn them the king's Warrant for not obeying that order. A copy of one of the Warrants was read as follows:

"C. R. We strictly charge and command you, Francis Wortley, kn^t. upon your allegiance, and upon pain of our heavy displeasure, not to go or remove out of this county, upon any occasion or command whatsoever; but to stay and abide therein, to attend our service, as we shall direct. And hereby we likewise charge all our subjects and officers, of what quality soever, to forbear arresting or attaching you, Francis Wortley, as they will tender our royal resentment at their peril. Dated at our court at York, April 23, 1642."

Further Instructions from the Parliament, to their Commissioners in Lincolnshire and at Hull.] This day the commons sent up a copy of some Instructions to the Committees of both houses, appointed to go down into Lincolnshire and to Hull; which were agreed to by the lords, and were as follows:

INSTRUCTIONS for sir Edw. Ayscough, kn^t. sir Christ. Wray, sir Anthony Irby, sir John Wray, sir Wm. Army, Mr. Hatcher, and Mr. Broxholme, Committees of the House of Commons assembled in Parliament, or to any three of them.

"You shall, in the name of us the lords and commons, declare and publish unto the sheriff of the county of Lincoln, the knights, gentlemen, and others, his majesty's subjects in that county, That sir John Hotham was, by us, commanded to secure the town of Kingston upon Hull, and the Magazine there, for his majesty's service and the peace of the kingdom; which otherwise would have been much endangered: and that, upon the same reason, what hath since been there done by him, hath been necessary in pursuance of those Directions; and is by us avowed, and approved of, warranted by the authority of parliament. 2. You shall further take care, that such Regulations and Orders of both houses, as have been made, shall be, sent down, be put in execution; and shall require the sheriff, justices of peace, and all other his majesty's officers and loving subjects, to be aiding and assisting unto you for that purpose. 3. You shall take care, that Forces be raised for the forcing the Town of Hull, or otherwise to disturb the peace of the kingdom: and, in case any be raised, you shall require the sheriff, in the name of both houses, to command them to disperse themselves; and if they refuse so to do, that then the sheriff, by the same authority, forthwith raise the power of the county, for suppressing of them; and you shall likewise by the same authority require the lieutenant appointed by the Ordinance of parliament, and in his absence, the deputy lieutenant, to draw together the Trained-Bands, for the assistance of the sheriff in so doing. 4. Because it is not improbable that, under pretence of raising a Guard for his majesty's person, the knights, gentlemen, freeholders and others the inhabitants, may be drawn together to the county of Lincoln, as we hear they have been in other places; you shall declare unto them and all others, That it hath ever been, and still shall be, the chief care and endeavour of the parliament to provide for his majesty's safety: That they do not know of any evil intended to his royal person, which should move him to take such a course: That his great safety is in the affection, duty, and faithful service of his parliament; and his greatest danger in thus withdrawing himself from them, and proceeding in ways contrary unto them; so that the disaffected and malignant party, to the colour of this service, go about to raise a faction and a party against the parliament; which at last, may break out into open rebellion, the destruction of the king and people, if it be not (through the blessing of God) prevented by the wisdom and authority of parliament. That, in case there be a necessity of raising the forces of the county for the suppressing of an insurrection and keeping the peace, you shall require sir J. Hotham to deliver such proportion of arms and ammunition out of the Magazine at Hull, as shall be necessary for that service; and you shall declare, That the parliament holds it lawful and necessary to dispose of the public Magazines of the kingdom, for the defence of the kingdom; as likewise for the suppression of the Rebellion in Ireland, which doth so much concern the safety of this kingdom: but that it is their intention, and resolution, to store them again; as holding it that such a preparation should be in readiness upon all occasions, for the service of the king and defence of the common-wealth. 5. You all endeavour to clear the proceedings of the witness from all imputations and aspersions; and shall, from time to time, certify us all things you conceive necessary for the present service: and, that we may have a speedy account of it, and that our directions to you, as well as your advertisements to us, may have a safe and ready passage, you shall lay a strict charge upon all postmasters, that they do not suffer any letters, or other dispatches, to or from parliament, to be intercepted or stayed: and, if any shall presume to make such stay of those dispatches, you shall direct the postmasters to carry to the justices of the peace, constables, and all other officers, for their aid and assistance;

 so are hereby required to take special care that there may be no such interruption. 7. Those you that are Commissioners for Hull shall stay there, as often as you shall see it needed for preservation of that town. 8. You shall be careful to require the lord Willoughby of Parham, lord lieutenant of the county of Lincoln, to send such numbers of the Trained-Bands and others, for the safeguard of the town of Hull, as you shall conceive to be needfull;
 according to the Order made by both houses in that behalf. 9. You shall take the best courses it may be, that all needfull provisions be sent to the supply of the market at Hull, as it is usual, without any stop or interruption by war or hind. 10. And, if you shall find any infected persons raising any parties or factions against the parliament, or spreading any scandals or aspersions upon their proceedings, or to disturb the peace of the kingdom; you shall cause all such persons, upon good proof of their misdemeanors, to be arrested and sent to answer their offences, as to law and justice shall appertain. 11. You shall observe and execute all such further Directions and Instructions as you shall, from time to time, receive from both houses of parliament. 12.
 Whereas it doth appear to the lords and commons, that the king, seduced by wicked counsell, intends to make war against the parliament;
 before, if any person whatsoever shall endeavour to levy any soldiers, or to draw together any of the Trained-Bands, by colour or pretext of any commissions from his majesty, under the Great Seal or otherwise, you shall require a copy of such Warrant and Command;
 if you shall in the name, and by the authority, of both houses of parliament, require such persons to forbear the execution of any such: and you shall command and require all his majesty's subjects to forbear to obey any such command, till you shall have sent up the copy thereof to the parliament, and receive other directions from the lords and commons therein: It is also ordered by the lords and commons in parliament, That Francis Willoughby of Parham, lord lieut. of the county of Lincoln, shall be careful, from time to time, to supply and relieve the town of Hull; and that, upon any letter or request made unto him by sir J. Hotham, or any 4 of the Commissioners of both houses there residing,

13. Whereas, by Order of the lords and commons in parliament, made the 28th of April last, the earl of Stamford, the lord Willoughby of Parham, sir Edw. Ayscough, sir Christ.
 Wray, sir S. Owfield, and Mr. Hatcher, were appointed to repair to the county of Lincoln, and from thence to Kingston upon Hull; and, if there should be occasion, to any other part of Yorkshire, for the performance of certain Instructions therein expressed, as by that Order, and Instructions thereunto annexed, doth and may appear: It is this day ordered, That the former Order above mentioned shall still continue in force, and that sir Wm. Strickland, Mr. Allured, Mr. John Hotham, Mr. Peregrine Pelham, and Mr. Wharton, shall be added to the former Committee; and that the said earl of Stamford, the lord Willoughby of Parham, sir Edward Ayscough, sir C. Wray, sir S. Ow-field, Mr. Hatcher, sir W. Strickland, Mr. Allured, Mr. J. Hotham, Mr. Peregrine Pelham, and Mr. Wharton, or any 4 of them, shall have full power to put the said forementioned Order and Instructions into execution: as likewise the Instructions under written, and all other Instructions which they shall hereafter receive from both houses of parliament. 1st, They shall assist sir J. Hotham, governor of Hull, with their best counsel and advice, and by all other means, for the safe keeping of that town for the security of the king and kingdom, in such manner as shall be requisite. 2dly, They shall take care to write to the lord lieut. of Lincolnshire, to send into Hull, for the defence thereof, such further supplies of Trained-Bands and others, as they find needfull for the preservation of the town. 3dly, They shall be careful, that the remainder of the Magazine, thought fit to be stayed there for the defence of that town, be preserved from wastes and embezzling; and that a perfect account shall be kept of whatsoever arms, powder, or ammunition, shall be taken out by warrant from the governor, and how the same is employed: 4thly, If the ships laden with the Magazine be not gone, you are to hasten it as much as may be, and you shall require the captains of the other two ships appointed for the better security of Hull to remain there, and diligently to attend their charge: and you shall let those captains know, as likewise the other officers and the companies of the said ships, how well their readiness in this service of the king and kingdom is taken by both houses of parliament, and you shall give them therein all due and fit encouragement. 5thly, Whereas there was, heretofore, an Order made, That 500 arms, half of them pikes and corslets, and the other half muskets, borrowed of the county of Lincoln, and employed in his majesty's service at Berwick, should be restored out of the Magazine at Hull, according to his majesty's promise and direction in that behalf. 6thly, You shall desire sir J. Hotham to give present order that the like number of Arms, with swords and other furniture appertaining to so many pikes, corslets, and muskets, shall be forthwith delivered to such person or persons as shall be appointed by the lord-lieut. of the county of Lincoln, or any two of the deputy lieutenants thereof."

A Committee appointed to consider of Means to prevent a Civil War.] May 27. p. m. A message was brought up from the commons, to desire that the joint-committee, before appointed to consider of proper means for the present defence of the kingdom, might have power to take into consideration all things to procure and preserve the peace thereof, and to prevent a Civil War. Agreed to by the lords. Accordingly, the next day the earl of Northumberland, from the said committee, exhibited a draught of some Propositions, fit to be presented to the king; which were commanded to be read, and some alterations were made in them. They were then but 14 in all, but being sent down to the commons, they were by them increased to 19 Articles, as will be seen in their proper place.

Order to stop Arms and Ammunition going to York.] An Order was agreed to by both houses, directed to the sheriffs and others of the several counties, within 150 miles of York, to take care to stop all Arms and Ammunition carrying to that place. Likewise another to suppress the raising and coming together of any soldiers, horse or foot, by any warrant, order, or commission, from the king, &c. The preamble to these Orders begins thus, "Whereas it appears that the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intends to make war against his parliament, and under colour of a Guard, doth command troops, both of horse and foot, to assemble at York, &c. *"

The Magazine of Hull brought to London.] May 30. The lords were informed by the lord admiral, That he had received a Letter from the earl of Warwick, by the captains of the ships which brought the Magazine from Hull to London, that the said captains desire to be discharged from any further care of it; and he moved that a warrant might be granted for receiving the said Magazine into the Tower. The captains were called in, and, after having the thanks of the lords, for their care and diligence in this matter, they were recommended, with their seamen, to the commons, for some gratuity, to encourage others to do the like.

Lord Keeper Littleton's Petition to the Lords.] A Petition from the lord keeper Littleton was read, in these words:

To the right hon. the LORDS assembled in Parliament: The Humble PETITION of EDWARD LITTLETON, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal,

"Sheweth, That, in his person, he is very willing to submit to your lordships Order of the 23d of this instant May, so far as is possible for him to perform, he being in so weak a condition of body, as appears by the Affidavit an-nexed, that he is not able to travel towards Westminster without danger of his life: and further beseecheth your lordships to be informed of this truth, that Saturday last, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, was the first time that he ever heard of his going to York; when he received his majesty's commands, under his sign manual and privy signet, to take his journey immediately, without reply or delay, towards York, and keep the same secret, whereunto he was enjoined upon his allegiance and fidelity and other obligations; which he taking into his consideration, with his oaths formerly taken, conceived he was bound in conscience to obey, and doth humbly beg your lordships pardon for not asking leave, which he could not possibly do, the house not sitting till Monday, and himself enjoined to take his journey instantly. And he further taketh the boldness to inform your lordships, that the king's majesty hath expressly commanded him, upon his allegiance, not to depart from him. And, lastly, he beseecheth your lordships to continue him in your good opinion until he shall advise, or consent unto, any thing against the public good of this commonwealth; and he shall daily pray for your lordships increase of happiness.—EDWARD LITTLETON."

The AFFIDAVIT above referred to.

"Tobias Peaker, servant to the lord keeper maketh oath, That upon Monday night last, being the 23d of this instant May, he conceived that his lord would then have died; and that he is at present troubled with divers infirmities and diseases, so that he is not able to travel without endangering of his life."—The consideration of this Petition was deferred to another time.

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Petition for disbanding his Guard.] Then the lord Wharton, speaker of the house of peers, in the absence of the lord keeper, acquainted the lords that he had received a Letter from the king, commanding him to communicate the inclosed to them; which was an Answer to a Petition of both houses, concerning the disbanding of his Guard, which had been presented to him at York, May 22, along with those Votes of both houses wherein it was declared, That the king intended to make war against the Parliament. The Answer was in these words:

"We cannot but extremely wonder, that the causeless jealousies concerning us, raised and fomented by a Malignant Party in this kingdom, which desires nothing more than to snatch to themselves particular advantages out of a general combustion, (which means of our advantage shall never be ministered to by our fault or seeking) should not only be able to seduce a weak party in this our kingdom, but seem to find so much countenance from both houses; as that, our majesty's Guard, without further design than for the safety of our person, (an action so lawful and so peaceable, upon causes so manifest)

and necessary) should not only be looked upon, and petitioned against by them, as a cause of jealousy, but declared to be the raising of a war against them, contrary to our former professions of our care of religion and law. And we no less wonder, that this action of ours should be said (in a very large expression) 'to be apprehended by the inhabitants of this county, as an affrightment and disturbance to our people,' having been as well received here, as it is every where to be justified; and (we speak now of the general, not of a few seduced particulars) assisted and sped by this county, with that loyal affection and alacrity as is a most excellent example set to the rest of the kingdom, of their care of our safety upon all occasions; and shall never be forgotten by us, nor, we hope, by our posterity; but shall be ever paid to them in that which is the proper expression of a prince's gratitude, a perpetual vigilant care to govern them justly, and to preserve the only rule by which they can be so governed, the law of the land. And we are confident, that if you were yourselves eye-witnesses, you would so see the contrary, as to give little present thanks, and hereafter little credit, to your informers: and if you have no better intelligence of the inclinations and affections of the rest of the kingdom, certainly the minds of our people (which to some ends and purposes you represent) are but ill represented unto you.—Have you, so many months together, not contented yourselves to rely for security (as your predecessors have done) upon the affection of the people; but, by your own single authority, raised to yourselves a Guard, and that sometimes of no ordinary numbers, and in no ordinary way; and could not all those pikes and protestations, that army on one side, and that navy on the other, persuade us to command you to dishband your forces, and to content yourselves with your ordinary (that is, with no) Guard; or work in us an opinion, that you appeared to levy war against us, or had any further design? And is it possible that the same persons should be so apt to suspect and condemn us, who have been so unapt, in the same matter, (upon much more ground) to tax or suspect them? This is our case, notwithstanding the care and fidelity of our parliament; our art is kept by armed men, against us; our proper goods, first detained from us, and then, contrary to our command, by strong hand, offered to be carried away; in which, at once, all our property, as a private person, and all our authority, as a king, are wrested from us: and yet for us to secure ourself in a legal way, that sir J. Hotham may not by the same forces, or by more raised by pretence of the same authority, (for they say he raiseth daily some, and we know it no new thing for him to pretend orders that he cannot shew) continue the war that he hath levied against us, and as well imprison our person, as detain our goods; and as well shut us up in York, as shut us out of Hull, is said to be esteemed a cause of great jealousy to the parliament; a raising war against them; and of danger to the whole kingdom; while these injustices and indignities offered to us are countenanced by them, who ought to be most forward in our vindication and their punishment, in observance of their oaths and of the trust reposed in them by the people, and to avoid the dissolution of the present government: upon which case the whole world is to judge, whether we had not reason, not wholly to rely upon the care and fidelity of our parliament, (being so strangely blinded by malignant spirits, as not to perceive our injuries) but to take some care of our own person; and, in order to that, to make use of that authority which the laws declare to be in us: and whether this Petition, with such a threatening conclusion, accompanied with more threatening Votes, gives us not cause rather to increase than diminish our Guard; especially since we saw, before the Petition, a Printed Paper, dated the 17th of May, underwritten, Hen. Elsing, Cler. Parl. D. Com. commanding, in the name of both lords and commons, the sheriffs of all our counties to raise the power of all those our counties; to suppress such of our subjects, as, by any of our commands, shall be drawn together, and put (as that Paper calls it) in a posture of war; charging our officers and subjects to assist them in the performance thereof, at their perils: for though we cannot suspect that this Paper (or any bare Votes, not grounded upon law or reason, or quotation of repealed statutes) should have any ill influence upon our good people; who know their duties too well, not to know, that to take up arms against those, who, upon a legal command, (that is, ours) come together to a most legal end, (that is, our security and preservation) were to levy war against us; and who appear in this county (and we are confident they are so throughout the kingdom) no less satisfied with the legality, convenience, and necessity of these our Guards, and no less sensible of the indignities and dangers which makes it necessary, than we are ourself; yet if that Paper be really the act of both houses, we cannot look upon it, but as the highest of scorn and indignities; first, to issue commands of force against us, and, after those have appeared useless, to offer, by Petition, to persuade us to that which that force should have effected.—We conclude this Answer to your Petition, with our counsel to you, That you join with us in exacting satisfaction for that, unparalleled, and yet unpunished, action of sir J. Hotham; and that you command our fort and goods to be returned to our own hands: that you lay down all pretences (under pretence of necessity, or declaring what is law) to make laws without us, and, by consequence, make a cypher of us: That you declare effectually against Tumults, and call in such Pamphlets (punishing the authors and publishers of them) as, seditiously, endeavour to disable us from protecting our people; by weakening, by false aspersions, and new false doctrines, our authority with them, and their confidence in us. The particulars of which Tumults and Pamphlets we would, long since, have taken care that our learned counsel should have been enabled to give in evidence, if, upon our former offer, we had received any return of encouragement from you in it. And if you do this, you then (and hardly till then) will persuade the world, 'That you have discharged your duty to God, the trust reposed in you by the people, and the fundamental laws and constitutions of the kingdom, and employed your care and utmost power to secure the parliament,' (for we are still a part of the parliament, and shall be, till this well-founded monarchy be turned to a democracy) 'and to preserve the peace and quiet of the kingdom,' which, together with the defence of the Protestant profession, the Laws of the Land, and our own just Prerogative, (as a part of and a defence to those laws) have been the main end, which, in our consultations and actions, we proposed to ourselves."

This day Mr. Pickering, a messenger, declared upon oath what lords he saw at York, and what he met going thither; on which it was ordered, That the said lords should be sent for to appear here, on the 8th of June next, or else the house would proceed to give judgment against them for their offence.

A Committee appointed to borrow Money of the Citizens of London.] May 31. The commons being still in great distress for want of Money, it was this day ordered, That a message be sent to the lords, to desire that a committee of both houses might be appointed to go to the city, and represent to them the great necessity they were in, at this time, for present Money; to inform them of the sum required, and the security for it; and to desire that these necessities might be recommended to the particular wards of the city. Ordered, also, That some members of this house be sent to the lord mayor, to desire him to call a common hall, to meet on Thursday next, the 2nd of June.

Order of Parliament against the King's disposing of the Jewels of the Crown.] June 1. At a conference, the commons exhibited an Order they had made against the pawning or selling the Jewels of the Crown: to this the lords agreed; an abstract of which is as follows: "Whereas it doth appear to the lords and commons in parliament, That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, doth intend to levy war against his parliament; and that the Jewels of the Crown, which, by the laws of the land ought not to be alienated, are either pawned or sold in Amsterdam, or some other parts abroad; and thereby great sums of money provided, to be returned to York, to the king's servants, or agents, for his use. And whereas it is more than probable, that this great provision of money, in such an extraordinary way, is to maintain their intended war, and thereby, to bring the whole kingdom into utter ruin and confusion; it is therefore declared, by the lords and commons in parliament, that whosoever hath been, or shall be, an actor in the selling or pawning any of the said Jewels, or shall bring any money in specie into the kingdom, or shall accept of any bill from abroad, for the payment of any sum of money for or upon any of those Jewels, and shall pay such sum according to such bill, after notice of this order, &c. such person shall be held a promoter of this present war, and an enemy to the state; and ought to give satisfaction, out of his own estate, to the public."

The Parliament's Nineteen Propositions to the King.] This day, a Petition, with 19 Propositions annexed, was agreed on by both houses to be sent to their Committee at York, to be by them presented to the king, as a foundation for a final end of all differences between them. All which ran in hæc verba:

The HUMBLE PETITION and ADVICE of the Houses of PARLIAMENT, with Nineteen Propositions sent unto his MAJESTY, the 3rd of June, 1642.

"Your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament having nothing in their thoughts and desire more precious and of higher esteem (next to the honour and immediate service of God) than the just and faithful performance of that duty to your maj. and this kingdom; and being very sensible of the great distractions and distempers, and of the imminent dangers and calamities which those distractions and distempers are like to bring upon your maj. and your subjects: All which have proceeded from the subtle insinuations, mischievous practices, and evil counsels of men disaffected to God's religion, your majesty's honour and safety, and the public peace and prosperity of your people; after a serious observation of the causes of those mischiefs, do, in all humility and sincerity, present to your maj. their most dutiful Petition and Advice, that out of your princely wisdom, for the establishing your honour and safety, and gracious tenderness to the welfare and security of your subjects and dominions, you will be pleased to grant and accept these their humble desires and propositions; as the most necessary and effectual means, through God's blessing, of removing those jealousies and differences which have happily fallen betwixt you and your people, and procuring both your majesty and them a constant course of honour, peace, and happiness.

1. "That the lords and others of your majesty's privy council, and such great officers and ministers of state, either at home or beyond the seas, may be put from your privy council, and from those offices and employments, excepting such as shall be approved by both houses of parliament; and that those persons put into places and employments, those that are removed, may be approved by both houses of parliament; and that the privy council shall take an oath to the execution of their places, in such form as shall be agreed upon by both houses of parliament.

2. That the great affairs of the kingdom may not be concluded or transacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unsworn counsellors; but that such matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, which is your majesty's great and supreme council, may be debated, resolved, and transacted only in parliament, and not elsewhere; and such as shall presume to do any thing to the contrary, shall be reserved to the censure and judgment of parliament: and such other matters of state as are proper for your majesty's privy council, shall be debated and concluded by such of the nobility and others as shall, from time to time, be chosen for that place, by approbation of both houses of parliament. That no public act concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which are proper for your privy council, may be esteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unless it be done by the advice and consent of the major part of your council, attested under their hands: and that your council may be limited to a certain number, not exceeding 25, nor under 15; and if any counsellor's place happen to be void in the intervals of parliament, it shall not be supplied without the assent of the major part of the council; which choice shall be confirmed at the next sitting of the parliament, or else to be void.

3. That the lord high steward of England, lord high constable, lord chancellor or lord keeper of the great seal, lord treasurer, lord privy seal, the earl marshal, lord admiral, warden of the Cinque-Ports, chief governor of Ireland, chancellor of the exchequer, master of the wards, secretaries of state, two chief justices and chief baron, may be always chosen with the approbation of both houses of parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, by assent of the major part of the council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of counsellors.

4. That he, or they, unto whom the government and education of the king's children shall be committed, shall be approved of by both houses of parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, by the assent of the major part of the council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of counsellors: and that all such servants as are now about him, against whom both houses shall have any just exception, shall be removed.

5. That no Marriage shall be concluded or treated, for any of the king's children, with any foreign prince, or other person whatsoever abroad, or it home, without the consent of parliament; under the penalty of a premunire unto such, as shall so conclude, or treat any marriage as aforesaid. And that the said penalty shall not be pardoned or dispensed with, but by the assent of both houses of parliament.

6. That the laws in force against Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants, be strictly put in execution, without any toleration or dispensation to be contrary; and that some more, effectual course may be enacted, by authority of parliament, to disable them from making any disturbance in the state, or eluding the law by trusts, or otherwise.

7. That the Votes of Popish lords in the house of peers may be taken away, so long as they continue Papists; and that his majesty would consent to such a bill as shall be drawn, for the education of the children of Pupists by Protestants in the protestant religion.

8. That your majesty will be pleased to consent, That such a Reformation may be made of the church-government and Liturgy, as both houses of parliament shall advise, wherein they intend to have consultations with divines, as is expressed in the Declaration to that purpose; and that your maj. will contribute your best assistance to them for the raising of a sufficient maintenance for preaching ministers throughout the kingdom: and that your maj. will be pleased to give your consent to laws for the taking away of innovations and superstition, and of pluralities, and against scandalous ministers.

9. That your majesty will be pleased to rest satisfied with that course that the lords and commons have appointed for ordering the Militia, until the same shall be further settled by a bill; and that you will recall your Declarations and Proclamations against the Ordinance made by the lords and commons concerning it.

10. That such members of either house of parliament as have, during this present parliament, been put out of any place and office, may either be restored to that place and office, or otherwise have satisfaction for the same, upon the petition of that house whereof he or they are members.

11. That all privy counsellors and judges may take an Oath, the form whereof to be agreed on, and settled by act of parliament, for the maintaining of the Petition of Right, and of certain statutes made by the parliament, which shall be mentioned by both houses of parliament: and that an inquiry of all the breaches and violations of those Laws may be given in charge, by the justices of the King's-bench, every term, and by the judges of assize in their Circuits, and Justices of Peace at the Sessions, to be presented and punished according to law.

12. That all the Judges and all officers, placed by approbation of both houses of parliament, may hold their places, Quamdiu bene se gesserint.

13. That the justice of parliament may pass upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom, or fled out of it: and that all persons cited by either house of parliament, may appear and abide the censure of parliament.

14. That the General Pardon, offered by your majesty, may be granted with such exceptions as shall be advised by both houses of parliament.

15. That the Forts and Castles of this kingdom may be put under the command and custody of such persons, as your majesty shall appoint, with the approbation of your parliament; and in the intervals of parliament, with the approbation of the major part of the council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of counsellors. 16. That the extraordinary Guards, and Military forces, now attending your majesty, may be removed and discharged; and that for the future, you will raise no such guards, or extraordinary forces, but according to the law, in case of actual rebellion or invasion. 17. That your majesty will be pleased to enter into a more strict alliance with the States of the United Provinces, and other neighbouring princes and states of the Protestant Religion, for the defence and maintenance thereof against all designs and attempts of the Pope and his adherents to subvert and suppress it; whereby your majesty will obtain a great access of strength and reputation, and your subjects be much encouraged and enabled in a parliamentary way, for your aid and assistance, in restoring your royal sister and her princely issue to those dignities and dominions which belong unto them, and relieving the other distressed Protestant princes who have suffered in the same cause. 18. That your majesty will be pleased, by act of parliament, to clear the lord Kimbolton and the 5 Members of the house of commons, in such manner that future parliaments may be secured from the consequence of that evil precedent. 19. That your majesty will be graciously pleased to pass a Bill, 'For restraining Peers made hereafter from sitting or voting in parliament,' unless they be admitted thereunto with the consent of both houses of parliament."

"And these our humble desires being granted by your majesty, we shall forthwith apply ourselves to regulate your present Revenue, in such sort as may be for your best advantage; and likewise to settle such an ordinary and constant increase of it as shall be sufficient to support you royal dignity in honour and plenty, beyond the proportion of any former grants of the subjects of this kingdom to your majesty's royal predecessors. We shall likewise put the town of Hull into such hands as your majesty shall appoint, with the consent and approbation of parliament, and deliver up a just account of all the Magazine; and cheerfully employ the uttermost of our power and endeavour, in the real expression and performance of our most dutiful and loyal affections, for preserving and maintaining the royal honour, greatness, and safety of your majesty and of your posterity."

The Commons order their Members to be summoned.] June 2. The commons ordered all their members to be summoned to appear in the house by the 16th under a penalty of 100*l.* for each absentee, to be employed in the wars of Ireland. Their committee at York were also required to order all the members who were there without leave of the house, to return to their duty in parliament: and to declare to them that their going away at this time, and continuance at York, is a great affront to the house, and a countenancing of the war intended against the parliament.

June 3. The committee sent into the city to borrow Money, for the service of Ireland, reported, That the citizens expressed great cheerfulness and forwardness to further the Supply and had promised to raise 100,000*l.* with speed.

The earls of Northumberland and Pembroke exhibited Letters from the king, commanding their attendance on him at York; which the lords thought proper to forbid, and ordered them the thanks of the house for their respect in this matter. A Declaration was also ordered to be drawn up, setting forth the tendency of the king's sending for several the lords to York; with the ill consequences and dangers thereof.

This day the lords read, a third time a bill, 'For the calling an assembly of learned Divines, to be consulted with by parliament for the settling the government and discipline of the church, and for the vindicating and clearing the doctrine of the Church of England from false aspersions and interpretations.' On the question, resolved, That the bill pass.

*The Parliament borrow 100,000*l.* from the Citizens of London.*] June 4. An Ordinance of parliament, as a security to several companies and citizens of the city of London, for their late loan of 100,000*l.* at 8 per cent was agreed to by the lords; which has this preamble: "Whereas, amongst many other great and unexpressible blessings of Almighty God upon this parliament, it hath pleased him to stir up the hearts of many good and well affected people, to yield their willing and ready help and assistance to the supply of the great and pressing necessities of this kingdom of the kingdom of Ireland; in which pious and charitable work the citizens of London, by their singular forwardness and affection, have been exemplary to all other parts of this kingdom; and, in times of great exigence and necessity, have lent and advanced great Sums to the public use; as well by their purses and persons as other innumerable services, contributed their actual help to the parliament, for the support of this state and kingdom from apparent danger and destruction: and whereas the said citizens, in further manifestation of their constant fidelity and true affection to the public have now again been moved to lend, &c."

Order for exercising the Militia.] To preserve the peace of the kingdom, the following Ordinance of parliament was this day agreed to, by which may be understood the Resolution of both houses at this time:

"It is this day ordered by the lords and commons in parliament, That the deputy lieutenants of the several and respective counties within the kingdom of England and dominions of Wales, that are not members of the house of commons, be hereby required and enjoined to be present at the days and places which are or shall hereafter be appointed by the lords or their deputies, for the training, mustering, and exercising of the inhabitants the said counties; according to the authority given unto them by an Ordinance of both Houses of parliament. And it is further ordered that all deputy-lieutenants, as well as those that are members of the house of commons as others, shall give such dispatch preparing of Warrants, Commissions, or orders, and subscribing of the same, as the vice shall require: and for such as shall use, or neglect so to do, that their names certified unto us by their fellow-deputies, or any one of them, that shall or do perform the said service.—And it is further ordered, That it is the intention of both Houses, for the better encouragement of so good a work, so much conducing to the safety of his majesty's person and kingdoms, that each of their members at the times and places appointed, or to be appointed, for the execution of the said Ordinance, shall be sent down to give their personal attendance upon the service."

The King's Answer to the Parliament's Remonstrance of the 26th of May.] About this time the king published his Answer to the parliament's Remonstrance of the 26th of May; which was as follows:

"Though whosoever looks over the late Remonstrance, entituled, 'A Declaration of the Lords and Commons of the 26th of May,' will think we have much reason to be pleased with it; yet we cannot but commend the dealing and ingenuity of the framers contrivers of that Declaration, (which hath wrought in a hotter and quicker forgetfulness any of the rest) who would no longer allow us to be affronted, by being told, 'They would make us a great and glorious king,' but they used all possible skill to reduce us to extreme want and indigency; and that they would make us to be loved at home, and feared abroad,' whilst they endeavoured, in all possible ways to render us odious to our subjects, and contemptible to all foreign princes; but like round-dealing men, tell us in plain English, 'That they have done us no wrong, because we are not capable of receiving any; That they have taken nothing from us, because we had never any thing of our own to give.' If this doctrine be true, and that indeed we ought to be of no other consideration than they have informed our people in that Declaration, that gentleman is much more excusable, that said publicly (unreproved) 'That the happiness of this kingdom doth not depend on, or upon any of the royal branches of the root;' and the other, who said, 'we were worthy to be king of England;' language monstrous to be allowed by either house of parliament, and of which, by the help of the law, we must have some examination. But we doubt not, all our good subjects will plainly discern, through the mask and disguise of their hypocrisy, what their design is: will no more look upon the framers and contrivers of that Declaration as both houses of parliament, (whose freedom and just pri-viliges we will always maintain, and in whose behalf we are as much slandered as for ourselves) but as a Faction of Malignant, Schismatical, and Ambitious Persons, whose design is, and always hath been, to alter the whole frame of government, both of church and state, and to subject both king and people to their own lawless arbitrary power and government; of whose persons, and of whose design, we shall, within a very short time, give our good subjects, and the world, a full, and, we hope, a satisfactory Narration.—The contrivers and penners of that Declaration (of whom we would be only understood to speak, when we mention any of their undutiful acts against us) tell you, 'That the great affairs of this kingdom, and the miserable and bleeding condition of the kingdom of Ireland, will afford them little leisure to spend their time in Declarations, Answers, and Replies.' Indeed the miserable and deplorable condition of both kingdoms would require somewhat else at their hands: but we would gladly know how they have spent their time since their recess, (now almost 8 months) but in Declarations, Remonstrances, and Invectives against us and our government, or in preparing matter for them. Have we invited them to any such expence of time, by beginning arguments of that nature? Their leisure, or their inclination, is not as they pretend: and what is their printing and publishing their Petitions to us, their Declarations and Remonstrances of us, their odious Votes and Resolutions, sometimes of one, and sometimes of both houses, against us (never in this manner communicated before this parliament) but an Appeal to the People? And in God's name, let them judge of the persons they have trusted.—Their first quarrel is (as it is always, to let them into their frank expressions of us and our actions) against the Malignant Party, whom they are pleased still to call, and never prove to be, our evil counsellors; but, indeed, nothing is more evident by their whole proceedings, than that by the Malignant Party they intend all the members of both houses, who agree not with them in their opinion, (hence have come their distinction of 'good' and 'bad' lords, of persons 'ill affected' in the house of commons, who have been proscribed, and their names listed and read in tumults) and all the persons of the kingdom, who approve not of their actions: so that if, in truth, they would be ingenious, and name the persons they intend, Who would be the men, upon whom that imputation of Malignity would be cast, but they who have stood stoutly and immutably for the Religion, the Liberties, the Laws, for all public interests, so long as there was any to be stood for: they, who have always been, and are zealous Professors, and, some of them, as able and earnest Defenders of the Protestant doctrine against the Church of Rome, as any are; who have often and earnestly besought us to consent, 'That no indifferent and unnecessary Ceremony might be pressed upon weak and tender consciences,' and, 'That we would agree to a bill for that purpose? they, to whose wisdom, courage, and counsel the kingdom oweth as much as it can to subjects; and upon whose unblemished lives envy itself can lay no imputation, nor endeavoured to lay any, until their virtues brought them to our knowledge and favour? Let the Contrivers of this Declaration be faithful to themselves, and consider all those persons of both houses, whom they, in their own consciences, know to dissent from them in the Matter and Language of that Declaration, and in all those undutiful actions, of which we complain; and will they not be found in honour, fortune, wisdom, reputation, and weight (if not in number) much superior to them? So much for the 'evil Counsellors.' Now, what is the 'evil Counsel' itself? Our coming from London (where we, and many whose affections to us are very eminent, were in danger every day to be torn in pieces) to York; where we, and all such who will put themselves under our protection, may live (we thank God, and the loyalty and affection of this good people) very securely: our not submitting ourself absolutely (and renouncing our own understanding) to the Votes and Resolutions of the contrivers of that Declaration, when they tell us, 'They are above us, and may' (by our own authority) 'do with us what they please;' and our not being contented, that all our good subjects' lives and fortunes shall be disposed of by their Votes, but by the 'known law of the land.' This is the 'evil counsel' given and taken. And will not all men believe there needs much power and skill of the Malignant Party to infuse this counsel into us? And now apply the argument the contrivers of that Declaration make for themselves: 'Is it probable, or possible, such men whom we have mentioned (who must have so great a share in the misery) should take such pains in the procuring thereof, and spend so much time, and run so many hazards, to make themselves slaves, and to ruin the freedom of this nation?' We say, with a clear and upright conscience to God Almighty, 'Whosoever harbours the least thought in his breast of ruining or violating the public Liberty or Religion of this kingdom, or the just Freedom and Privilege of Parliament, let him be accursed; and he shall be no counsellor of ours that will not say, Amen.' For the contrivers of that Declaration, we have not said any thing which might imply any inclination in them to be Slaves: that which we have charged them with, is 'invading the public liberty;' and our presumption may be very strong and vehement, that (though they have no mind to be Slaves) they are not unwilling to be Tyrants: what is Tyranny, but to admit no rule to govern by but their own wills? And we know the misery of Athens was at the highest, when it suffered under the thirty Tyrants.—If that Declaration had told us (as indeed it might, and as, in justice, it ought to have done) that the Precedents of any of our Ancestors did fall short and much below what hath been done by us, this parliament, in point of grace and favour to our people, we should no otherwise have wondered at it, than at such a truth, in such a place: but when, to justify their having done more than ever their predecessors did, it tells our good subjects (as most injuriously, most insolently doth) 'That the highest and most unwarrantable precedents of any of our predecessors be full short, and much below what hath been done to them this parliament by us,' we must confess ourself amazed, and not able to understand them: and we must tell those ungrateful men (who dare tell their king, 'That they may without want of modesty and duty, depose him, that the condition of our subjects, when whatsoever accidents and conjunctures of time it was at the worst, under our power, (in which, by no default of ours, they shall be again reduced) was, by many degrees, more pleasant and happy, than that to which the furious pretence of Reformation hath brought them: neither are we afraid of the high precedents of other parliaments, which the men boldly (our good subjects will call it would tell us, 'They might without want of modesty and duty, make their patterns.' If we had other security against those precedents, their modesty and duty, we were in a miserable condition, as all persons will be who depend upon them. That Declaration will not allow inference; 'That, by avowing the advice of sir John Hotham, they do destroy the life and interest of all our subjects to their lands and goods;' but confesseth, 'if they were found guilty of that charge, it were indeed a very great crime.' And do they not, in that Declaration, admit themselves guilty of a very crime? Do they not say, 'Who doubts that a parliament may dispose of any thing wherein we or our subjects have a right, such a way as that the kingdom may not be in danger thereby?' Do they not then call themselves 'This parliament' and challenge its power without our consent? Do they not extend this power to all cases, where the necessity or the common good of the kingdom is concerned? And do they not arrogate unto themselves alone the judgment of this danger, necessity, this common good of the kingdom? What is, if this be not, to unsettle the security of all men's estates, and to expose them to the arbitrary power of their own? If a Parliament shall at any time, by cunning or force, accident, or accident, prevail over a major part of the houses; and pretend that they are evil counsellors, a Malignant Party about the king, whom the liberty and religion of the kingdom are both in danger, (this they may do; and have done it) then they may take away the king from the king or people, whatsoever their Judgment, shall think fit: this is what they have 'declared' it so. Let the king judge, whether we charge them unjustly, whether they are not guilty of the crime, whether themselves confess, being proved, is a great one; and how safely we might commit the power these people desire into their hands, who, in all probability, would be no second possessed of it, than they would revive that ragedy which Mr. Hooker relates of the Anabaptists in Germany; who, talking of nothing but faith, and of the true fear of God, and that riches and honour were vanity, at first, upon the great opinion of their humility, zeal, and devotion, procured much reverence and estimation with the people; after, finding how many persons they had ensnared with their hypocrisy, they began to propose to themselves to reform both the ecclesiastical and civil government of the state; then, because possibly they might meet with some opposition, they secretly entered into a league of association; and, shortly after, finding the power they had gotten with the credulous people, enriched themselves with all kind of spoil and pillage, and justified it upon our Saviour's promise, 'The Meek shall inherit the earth;' and declared their title was the same which the righteous Israelites had unto the goods of the wicked Egyptians: this story is worth the adding at large, and needs no application.—But we must by no means say 'That we have the same title to our town of Hull, and the munition there, as any of our subjects have their lands or money;' that is 'a principle at pulls up the foundation of the liberty and property of every subject.' Why, pray? 'Because the king's property in his towns, and in his goods, bought with the public money' (as they conceive our magazine at Hull was) 'is consistent with the subjects property in their lands, goods, and liberty.' do these men think, at as they assume a power of declaring law, and whatsoever contradicts that Declaration takes their Privileges; so that they have a power of declaring sense and reason, and imposing logic and syllogisms on the schools, as well as law upon the people? Doth not all mankind know, that several men may have several rights and interests in the self same house and land, and yet neither destroy the other? Is not the interest of the lord Paramount consistent with that of the Mesne lord, and his with that of the tenant, and yet their properties and interests not at all confounded? and by may not we then have a 'full lawful interest and property in our town of Hull, and yet our subjects have a property in their houses and lands? But we 'cannot sell or give away, at our pleasure, our towns and forts, as a private man may do his land or goods.' What then? any men have no authority to let or set their houses, or sell their land; have they therefore no title to them, or interest in them? May they be taken from them, because they cannot sell them? The purpose of our journey to Hull is neither to sell it, or give it away.—But for the Magazine and the munition there, 'That we bought with our own money, we might easily have sold that, lent, or given it away.' No; 'we bought it with the public money;' and the proof is, 'They conceive it so;' and upon this conceit have voted, That it shall be taken from us. Excellent justice! Suppose we had kept this money by us, and not bought arms with it, would they have taken it from us upon that conceit? Nay, may they not wheresoever this money is (for through how many hands soever it hath passed, it is the public money still, if ever it were) seize it and take it from the owners? But the towns, forts, magazine, and kingdom is intrusted to us, and we are a person trusted.' We are so, God and the law hath trusted us, and we have taken an oath to discharge that trust for the good and safety of our people: what Oaths they have taken we know not, unless those which, in this violence, they have manifestly and maliciously violated. May any thing be taken from a man because he is trusted with it? Nay, may the person himself take away the thing he trusts, when he will, and in what manner he will? The law hath been otherwise, and we believe will be so held, notwithstanding their Declarations.—But this trust ought to be managed by their advice, and the kingdom hath trusted them for that purpose: impossible! That the same trust should be irrevocably committed to us and our heirs for ever, and the same trust, and a power above that trust (for such is the power they pretend) be committed to others: did not the people that sent them look upon them as a body but temporary, and dissoluble at our pleasure: and can it be believed, that they intended them for our guardians and comptrollers in the managing of that trust which God and the law hath granted to us and our posterity for ever? What the extent of their commission and trust is, nothing can better teach them, than the writ whereby they are met. We called them (and without that call they could not have come together) to be our counsellors, not commanders; (for however they frequently confound them, the offices are several) and counsellors, not in all things, but in some things, 'De quibusdam arduis,' &c. And they will easily find amongst their precedents, that queen Elizabeth (upon whose time all good men look with reverence) committed one Wentworth, a member of the house of commons, to the Tower, sitting the house, only for proposing 'That they might advise the queen in a matter she thought they had nothing to do to meddle in.' But 'we are trusted:' and are we the only person trusted? And may they do what their own inclination and fury leads them to? Were not they trusted by us, when we first sent for them; and were they not trusted by us, when we passed them our promise that we would not dissolve them? Can it be presumed (and presumptions go far with them) that we trusted them with a power to destroy us, and to dissolve our government and authority? If the people might be allowed to make an equitable construction of the laws and statutes, (a doctrine avowed by them) would not all our subjects swear, we never intended by that act of continuance, that they should do what they have since done? Were they not trusted by those that have sent them? And were they trusted to alter the government of church and state, and to make themselves perpetual dictators over the king and people? Did they intend that the law itself should be subject to their votes, and that whatsoever they say or do, should be lawful because they declare it so? The Oaths which they have taken who sent them, and without taking which themselves are not capable of their place in parliament, makes the one incapable of giving, and the other of receiving, such a trust; unless they persuade our good subjects, That we are the only supreme head and governor in all causes, and over all persons, within our dominions; and yet that they have a power over us to constrain us to manage our trust, and govern our power according to their discretion.—The contrivers of that Declaration tell us, That they will never allow us (an humble and dutiful expression) to be judge of the law; that belongs only to them; they may and must judge and declare.' We all know what power the Pope, under the pretence of interpreting Scriptures, and declaring articles of faith (though he declines the making the one or the other) hath usurped over men's consciences; and that, under colour of having power of ordering all things for the good of men's souls, he intitles himself to all the kingdoms in the world. We will not accuse the framers of this Declaration (how bold soever they are with us) that they incline to Popery; of which another maxim is, 'That we must submit our reason and understanding, and the Scripture itself, to that declaring power of his!' Neither will we tell them, though they have told us so, that they use the very language of the rebels of Ireland: and yet they say those rebels declare, 'That whatsoever they do, is for the good of the king and kingdom.' But our good subjects will easily put the case to themselves, Whether, if the Papists in Ireland in truth were, or by act or accident had made themselves the major part of both houses of parliament there, and had pretended the trust (in that Declaration) from the kingdom of Ireland; and thereupon had voted their religion and liberty to be in danger of extirpation from a Malignant party of Protestants and Puritans; and therefore that they should put themselves into a posture of defence; that the forts and Militia of that kingdom were to be put into the hands of such persons as they could confide in: that we were indeed 'trusted' with the towns, forts, magazines, treasures, offices, and people of the kingdom, for the good, and safety, and best advantage thereof; but as this trust is for the use of the kingdom, so it ought to be managed by the advice of both houses of parliament, whom the kingdom had 'trusted' for that purpose; it being their duty to see it discharged according to the condition and true intent thereof, and by all possible means to prevent the contrary. We say, let all our good subjects consider, if that Rebellion had been plotted with this formality, and those circumstances declared to be legal, (at least, according to the equitable sense of the law) and to be for the public good, and justifiable by necessity; of which they were the only judges) whether, though they might have thought their design the more cunning, they would believe it the more justifiable? Nay, let the framers of this Declaration ask themselves, If the evil counsellors, the Malignant Party, the persons ill-affected, the Popish lords, and their adherents should prove now, or hereafter to be a major part of both houses, (for it hath been declared a great part of both houses have been such, and so might have been the greater part,) that the greater part of the house of peers was such, and we have not heard of any of their conversions: and thereupon it hath been earnestly pressed, That the minor part of the lords might join with the major part of the house of commons) were we bound to consent to all such alterations as these men should propose to us, and resolve to be for the public good; and must the liberty, property, and security of our subjects depend on what such voters should declare to be law? Was the Ordinance of the Militia unfit and unlawful, whilst the major part of the lords refused to join in it? (as they did two, if not three, several times; and it was never heard, before this parliament, that they should be so, and so often, pressed after a dissent declared) and did it grow immediately necessary for the public safety, and lawful by the law of the land, as soon as so many of the dissenting peers were driven away (after their names had been required at the bar, contrary to the freedom and foundation of parliaments) that the other opinion prevailed? Doth the life and liberty of the subject depend upon such accidents of days and hours, that it is impossible for him to know his right in either? God forbid! But now, to justify their transgression of our antient, unquestioned, undoubted Right, settled and established on us and our posterity by God himself; confirmed and strengthened by all possible titles of compacts, laws, oaths, perpetual and uncontradicted custom to our people; what have they alledged 'to declare to the kingdom' as they say 'the declaration that lyeth upon the king of this realm to pass all such bills, as are offered unto them by both houses of parliament?' (a thing never heard of till this day) an Oath (authoritative enough for them to break all theirs) that is ought to be, taken by the kings of this realm, which is, as well to remedy by law such inconveniences the kingdom may suffer, as to keep and protect the laws already in being: and the form of this Oath (they say) appears upon a record there cited, and by a clause in the preamble of a statute made in the 25th year of king Edw. 3. We are not enough acquainted with Records to know, whether that be fully and ingenuously cited, and when, and how, and why the several clauses have been inserted, or taken out of, the Oaths formerly administered to the kings of this realm; yet we cannot possibly imagine the assertion, that Declaration makes, can be deduced from the words, or the manner of that Oath; for, unless they have a power of

declaring Latin as well as law, surely elegerit signifieth, 'hath chosen' as well as, 'will chuse'; and that it signifieth so here (besides the authority of the perpetual practice of succeeding ages, a better interpreter than their Votes) is evident by the reference it hath to customs; consuetudines quas vulgus elegerit; and could it be a Custom which the people should use after this Oath taken, and should a king be sworn to defend such customs? Besides, is it be imagined that he should be bound by such to pass such laws (and such a law is the law they brought to us of the Militia) as should take the power, wherewith he is trusted, out of himself into the hands of other men: and so vest and disable him of all possible power to reform the great business of the oath, which is to protect them? If we give away all our power, or if it be taken from us, we cannot protect any man: and what discharge would it be, for us, either before God or man, (when we are good subjects, whom God and the law hath committed to our charge, shall be wronged and spoiled) to say, 'That we trusted others to protect them; that is, to do that duty for us, which is essentially and inseparably our own. But, that all our good subjects may see us faithfully these men (who assume this trust from them) desire to discharge their trust, we shall be contented to publish for their satisfaction (a matter notorious enough, but which we ourselves never thought to have been put to publish, and which the farmers of that Declaration might as well have made use of as a Latin Record they knew many of our good subjects could not, and many of themselves do not understand) the Oath itself we took at our Coronation, warranted and enjoined to it by the custom and directions of our predecessors; and the ceremony of their and our taking it, as they may find it in the Records of the Exchequer: this it is,

"The sermon being done, the archbishop saith to the king, and asks his willingness to take the Oath usually taken by his predecessors. The king sheweth himself willing, ariseth and goeth to the altar; the archbishop administred these Questions, and the king answers them severally. Episcopus. Sir, will you maintain and keep, and, by your Oath, confirm to the people of England, the laws and customs which were granted by the kings of England; your lawful and religious predecessors; and, namely, the laws, customs, and franchises granted to the clergy, by the glorious king St. Edward, your predecessor, according to the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel established in this kingdom, and agreeable to the prerogative of his kings thereof, and the ancient customs of this realm? Rex. I grant, and promise to keep them.

Episcopus. Sir, will you keep peace and godly agreement entirely, according to your power, with God, the holy church, the clergy, and the people? Rex. I will keep it.—Episcopus. Sir, will you, to your power, cause law, justice, and discretion, in mercy and truth, to be executed in all your judgments? Rex. I will.—

Episcopus. Sir, will you grant to hold and keep the laws and rightful customs which the commonalty of this your kingdom have; and will you defend and uphold them to the honour of God, so much as in you lieth? Rex. I grant, and promise so to do.—Then one of the bishops reads this Admonition to the king, before the people, with a loud voice. 'Our lord and king, we beseech you to pardon, and to grant, and to preserve unto us, and to the churches committed to our charge, all canonical privileges, and due law and justice; and that you would protect and defend us, as every good king, in his kingdom, ought to be protector and defender of the bishops, and the churches under their government.' The King answereth, 'With a willing and devout heart I promise and grant my pardon, and that I will preserve and maintain to you, and the churches committed to your charge, all canonical privileges, and due law and justice; and that I will be your protector and defender, to my power, by the assistance of God, as every good king, in his kingdom, in right ought to protect and defend the bishops, and churches under their government.' Then the king ariseth, and is led to the Communion Table, where he makes a solemn Oath, in sight of all the people, to observe the premisses; and, laying his hand upon the book, saith, 'The things which I have before promised I shall perform and keep: So help me God and the contents of this book.'

"Now, let all the world judge whether such doctrine, or such conclusions, as these men teach, can follow, or have the least pretence from this Oath.—For the preamble of the statute they cite, that tells us, 'That the king is bound to remedy, by law, the mischiefs and damages which happen to his people.' He is so: But is the king bound by the preamble of that statute, to renounce his own judgment, his own understanding, in these mischiefs, and of those remedies? How far forth he is obliged to follow the judgment of his parliament, that Declaration still confesseth to be a question. Without question none can take upon them to remedy, even mischiefs, but by law, for fear of greater mischiefs than those they go about to remedy.—But 'we are bound in justice to consent to their Proposals, because there is a trust reposed in us to preserve the kingdom, by making new laws.' We are glad there is so, then we are sure no new laws can be made without our consent; and that the gentleness of our Answer 'Le Roy s'avisera,' if it be no denial, is no consent, and then the matter is not great. They will allow us yet 'a greater latitude of granting or denying, as we shall think fit in public acts of grace, as Pardons or the like grants of favour.' Why do they so? If these pardons and public acts of grace be for the public good, (which they may vote they are) they will then be absolutely in their own disposal. But have they left us this power? They have sure at least shared it with us: how else have they got the power to pardon serjeant-major-general Skippon, (a new officer of state, and a subject we have no authority to send to speak with) and all other persons employed by them, and such as have employed themselves for them, not only for what they have done, but for what they shall do? If they have power to declare such actions to be no treason, which we would not pardon, and such actions to be treason, which need no pardon, the latitude they allow us, of granting or denying of pardons, is a jewel they may still be contented to suffer us to wear in our crown, and never think themselves the more in danger.—All this considered, the contriver of that Message, (since they will afford him no better title) whom they are angry with, doth not conceive the people of this land to be so void of common sense, as to believe us (who have denied no one thing for the ease and benefit of them, which in justice or prudence could be asked, or in honour and conscience could be granted) to have cast off all care of our subjects good; and the framers and devisers of that Declaration (who have endeavoured to render us odious to our subjects, and them disloyal to us, by pretending such a trust from them) to have only taken it up: neither, we are confident, will they be satisfied, when they feel the misery and the burdens which the fury and the malice of those people will bring upon them, with being told that calamity proceeds from evil Counsellors, whom no body can name; from Plots and Conspiracies, which no man can discover; and from Fears and Jealousies, which no man understands: and therefore that the consideration of it be left to the conscience, reason, affection, and loyalty of our good subjects, who do understand the government of this kingdom, we are well content.—Where will the folly and madness of these people end, who would have our people believe, 'That our absenting ourself from London, (where, with our safety, we could not stay) and the continuing our Magazine at Hull, proceeds from the secret plots of the Papists here, and to advance the designs of the Papists in Ireland? But it is no wonder that they, who can believe sir J. Hotham's shutting us out of Hull to be an act of affection and loyalty, will believe that the Papists or the Turks persuaded us to go thither.—And can any sober man think that Declaration to be the consent of either or both houses of parliament, unaltered either by fraud or force, which (after so many thanks and humble acknowledgment of our gracious favour in our Message of the 20th of January, so often and so unanimously presented unto us from both houses of parliament) tells us, 'That the Message at first was, and, as often as it hath been since mentioned by us, hath been a breach of privilege;' (of which they used not to be so negligent, as, in four months, not to complain, if such a breach had been) 'and that the way and method of proceeding should not be proposed to them;' as if we had only authority to call them together, none to tell them what they were to do, not so much as with reference to our own affairs: what their method hath been, and whither it hath led them, and brought the kingdom, all men see; what ours would have been, if seasonably and timely applied, let all men judge: we will speak no more of it.—But see now what excellent instances they have found out to prove an inclination, if not in us, in some about us, to a civil War: 'Their going with us to the house of commons;' (as often urged, and so fully answered) 'their attending on us to Hampton-Court, and appearing in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames; our going to Hull; their drawing their swords at York, demanding 'Who would be for the king;' the declaring sir J. Hotham traitor, before the Message sent to the parliament; the Propositions to the gentry in Yorkshire to assist us against him, before we received an Answer from the parliament;' desperate instances of an inclination to Civil War! Examine them again: The Manner and Intent of our going to the house of commons, we set forth at large in our Answer to their Declaration of the 19th of May; let all men judge. Next, do these men themselves believe (to what purpose soever that honour hath served their turns) that there was an appearance in warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames? Do they not know, that whensoever we have been at Hampton-Court, since our first coming to the crown, there was not a less appearance, or in a less warlike manner than at the time they mean. We shall say no more, but that our appearance, in warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames, and theirs at Kingston upon Hull, is very different. What is meant by the 'drawing of swords at York, and demanding, Who would be for the king,' must be inquired at London, for we believe very few in York understand the meaning of it. For our going to Hull, (which we will by no means endure should be called a visit) whether it were not the way to prevent rather than to make a Civil War, is very obvious. And the declaring sir J. Hotham traitor, in the very act of his treason, will not be thought unseasonable, but by those who believe him to be a loving and loyal subject no more than the endeavouring to make the gentlemen of this county sensible of that treason (which they are in an honourable and useful degree) before we received our Answer from both houses of parliament: for if it had been (as we expected they should have been) sensible of that 'intolerable injury,' offered to us, might not we have had occasion to have used the affection of these gentlemen? Were we sure that sir J. Hotham, who had kept us out without their order, (we speak of a public order) would have let us in, if they had bidden him? And if they had such a sense of us, (as the case falls out to be) had we not more reason to make propositions to those gentlemen, whose readiness and affection we or our posterity, shall never forget?—But this business of Hull sticks still with them, and finding our questions hard, they used to answer us by asking us other questions: no matter for the exceptions against the earl of Newcastle, (which have been so often urged as one of the principal grounds of our fears and jealousies, and which drew at question from us) they ask us, 'Why, since we held it necessary that a governor should be placed in Hull, sir J. Hotham should be refused by us, and the earl of Newcastle set down?' We answer, Because we had a better opinion of the earl of Newcastle, than sir J. Hotham; and desired to have such a governor over our towns, (if we must have any) should keep them for, and not against, us: if his going down were in a more private way than sir J. Hotham's, it was because we did not that authority to make a noise, by ringing and billeting of soldiers, in a peaceable way, upon our good subjects, as it seems sir Hotham carried down with him. And the reputation which is cast by the way upon that, to make his reputation not so unblemished as we conceived, and the world believes it to be, and 'which, though it was not ground enough for a judicial proceeding,' (it is won't it was not) 'was yet ground enough of suspicion,' must be the case of every subject in England, (and we wish it went no higher) if any vile aspersion contrived by unknown hands, upon unknown or unimaginable grounds, which is the way practised to bring any virtuous and deserving men into obloquy shall give the least credit or countenance in the world.—They tell us their exception to those gentlemen, who delivered their Petition to us in York, was, 'That they presumed to take to them the style of all the gentry and inhabitants of that county;' whereas, they say, many more, of as good quality as themselves, of that county, were of another opinion, I have since, by their Petition to us, discovered that act: their information in that matter is no better than it useth to be; and I will find, that neither the number or the quality of those who have, or will disavow that action, are as they imagine; though too many weak persons are misled (which they do, I will every day more understand), by the passion, skill, and industry of that true Malignant Party, of which we do, and have reason to complain. They say, 'They have received Petition of so strange a nature.' What nature? 'Contrary to the Votes of both houses:' it is, They have received no Petition which I had no mind to receive: but we told them, and we tell them again, and all our good subjects will tell them, That they have received Petitions, with joy and approbation, most the Votes of both houses of their predecessors, confirmed and established into laws by the consent of us and our ancestors; and proved those Petitions to carry the style, and seem to carry the desires of cities, towns, and counties, when of either city, town, or county very few known or considerable persons have been privy to such petitions: Wherein truth, the Petitions delivered to us (against which they except) carried not the style of all, but some of the gentry and inhabitants; and implied no other consent, than such as went visibly along with it.—But we are all this while in a mistake; 'the Magazine at Hull is not taken from us.' Who told you so? They who assure you (and whom, without 'breaking their privileges,' you must believe) that sir J. Hotham's shutting the gates against us, and resisting our entrance with armed men, (though we thought it in defiance of us) 'was indeed in obedience to us and our authority, and for our service, and the service of the kingdom: he was to let none in, but such as came with our authority signified by both houses of parliament;' (himself and they had ordered it so) and therefore he kept us out, only till we, or he, might send for their directions.' We know not whether the contrivers of that Declaration meant that our good subjects should so soon understand (though it was plain enough to be understood) the meaning of the 'king's authority signified by both houses of parliament.' But sure the world will now easily discern in what miserable case we had by this time been, (it is bad enough as it is) if we had consented to their Bill or to their Ordinance of the Militia, and given those men power to have raised all the arms of the kingdom against us (for the common good) by our own authority. Would they not, (as they have kept us from Hull) by this time, have 'beaten us from York, and pursued us out of the kingdom in our own behalf?' Nay, may not this munition (which is not taken from us) be employed against us? Not against our authority signified by both houses of parliament; but only to kill those ill Counsellors, the Malignant Party, which is about us; and yet for our good, for the public good, (they will declare it so) and so no treason within the statute of 25 Edw. 3. which by their interpretation, hath left us, (the king of England) absolutely less provided for in point of safety, than the meanest subject of the kingdom; and every subject of this land (for whose security that law was made, that they may know their duty, and their danger in breaking it) may be made a traitor, when these men please to say he is so. But do they think that, upon such an interpretation, (upon pretence of authority of Book-Cases and Precedents, which, without doubt, they would have cited if they had been to their purpose) out of which nothing can result but confusion to king and people, they will find any credit with our good subjects? and that so excellent a law, made both for security of king and people, shall be so eluded by an interpretation no learned lawyer in England will, at this hour, we believe, set under his hand, notwithstanding the authority of that Declaration; which, we hope, shall bring nothing but infamy upon the contrivers of it.—Now to their Privileges. Though it be true, they say, 'That their privileges do not extend to treason, felony, or breach of the peace, so as to exempt the members from all manner of

process and trial; yet it doth privilege them in the way or method of their trial; the cause must first be brought before them, and their consent asked before you can proceed.' Why then their privileges extend as far in these cases, as in any that are most unquestioned; for no privilege whatsoever exempts them from 'all manner of process, and trial, if you first acquaint the house with it, and they give you leave to proceed by such process, or to that trial: But, by this rule, if a member of either house commit a murder, you must by no means meddle with him, till you have acquainted that house of which he is a member and received their direction for your proceeding; assuring yourself he will not stir from that place where you left him, till you return with their consent: 'should it be otherwise, it would be in the power of every private man, under pretence of murder, to take any man from his service in parliament, and so as many, one after another, as he pleaseth; and so consequently to make a parliament what he will and when he will;' If a member of either house shall take a purse at York, (he may as probably take a purse from a subject, as arms against his king) you must ride to London to know what to do; and he may ride with you and take a new purse every stage, and must not be apprehended, or declared a Felon, till you have asked that house of which he is a member: For, should it be otherwise, it might be in every private man's power to accuse as many members as he would of taking purses, and so bring a parliament (and consequently all parliaments) to nothing. Would these men be believed? And yet they make no doubt, 'but every one who hath taken the Protestation, will defend this doctrine with his life and fortune.' Will not our subjects believe, that they have imposed a pretty Protestation upon them, and that they had a very good end in the doing it, if it obligeth them to such hazards, to such undertakings? Must they forget or neglect our person, honour, and estate, which, by that protestation they are bound to defend, and in some degree do understand; and must they only venture their lives and fortunes to justify Privileges they know not, or ever heard of before? or are they bound by that Protestation to believe, that the framers of that Declaration have power to extend their own Privileges as far as they think fit, and to contract our rights as much as they please; and that they are bound to believe them in either and to venture their lives and fortunes in that quarrel? From declaring how mean a person we are, and how much the kingdom hath been mistaken in the understanding of the statute of 25 Ed. 3. concerning Treason; and that all men need not fear levying war against us, so they have their Order to warrant them, they proceed, in the spirit of declaring, to certify our subjects in the mistakings, which near 150 years have been received, concerning the statute of 11 Hen. 7. c. 1. (a statute our good subjects will read with comfort) and tell them, 'That the serving of the king, for the time being, cannot be meant of Perkin Warbeck, or of any that should call himself king, but such a one as is allowed and received by the parliament in the behalf of the kingdom; and are we not so allowed? However through a dark mist of words, and urging their old Privileges, (which we hope we have sufficiently answered, and will be every day more confuted by the action of our good subjects) they conclude, 'That those that shall guide themselves by the judgment of parliament (which they say is their own ought, whatsoever happen, to be secure and free from all account and penalties, upon the ground and equity of that very statute.' How far their own chancellors may help them in that equity we know not; but, by the help of God and the good law, we shall allow no such equity. And then, here is the Doctrine of that Declaration and these are the Positions of the Contract it. 1. That they have an absolute Power declaring the Law, and that whatsoever they declare to be so, ought not to be questioned by itself, or any subject; so that all right and safety of us and our people must depend upon their pleasure. 2. That no Precedent can be limits to bound their Proceedings; they may do what they please. 3. That Parliament may dispose of any thing, where the king or subject hath a right, for the public good; that they, without the king, are the Parliament, and judge of this public good; so that our consent is not necessary: so the liberty and liberty of the subject, and all the good laws made for the security of them, may be disposed of and repealed by the major parts of both houses, at any time present, and by any ways and means procured so to be; and we have no power to protect them. 4. That a member of either house ought to be troubled or meddled with for treason, felony, or any other crime, without the cause being first brought before them, that they may judge the fact, and their leave obtained to proceed. 5. That the Sovereign Power resides in both houses of parliament, and that we have no negative voice: so then we ourself must be subject to their commands. 6. That the levying of Forces against the personal commands of the king, though accompanied with his presence, is not levying war against the king; but the levying war against his laws and authority, (which they have power to declare and signify) though not against his person, is levying war against the king; and that treason cannot be committed against his person, otherwise than as he is intrusted with the kingdom and discharging that trust; and that they have a power to judge whether he discharge that trust or no. 7. That if they should make the highest precedents of other parliaments their patterns, there would be no cause to complain of want of modesty or duty in them: That they may depose us when they will, and cannot be blamed for so doing.—And now, as if the mere publishing of their Resolutions would not only prevail with the people, but in the instant destroy all spirit and courage in us to preserve our own rights and honour, they have since taken the boldness to assault us with certain Propositions, which they call 'the most necessary effectual means for removing those Jealousies and Differences between us and our people:' that is, that we will be content to divest ourself of all our regal rights and dignities; be content with the title of a king; and suffer them, according to their discretion, to govern us and the kingdom, and to dispose of our children. How suitable and agreeable this doctrine and these demands are to the affection of our loving subjects, under whose trust these men pretend to say and do these monstrous things; and to design, not only the ruin of our person, but of monarchy itself (which we may justly say, is more than ever was offered in any of our predecessors times; for though the person of the king hath been sometimes unjustly deposed, yet the regal power was never, before this time, stricken at) we believe our good subjects will find some way to let them and the world know: and from this time such who have been misled by their ill counsels, to have any hand in the execution of the Militia, will see to what ends their service is designed; and therefore, if they shall presume hereafter to meddle in it, they must expect that we will immediately proceed against them as actual raisers of sedition, and as enemies to our Sovereign Power.—We have done: and shall now expect the worst actions these men have power to commit against us; worse words they cannot give us. And we doubt not but the major part of both houses of parliament, when they may come together with their honour and safety, (as well those who were surprised at the passing of it, and understood not the malice in it, and the confusion that must grow by it if believed, as those who were absent, or involved) will so far resent the indignity offered to us, the dishonour to themselves, and the mischief to the whole kingdom, by that Declaration, that they will speedily make the foul contrivers of it instances of their exemplary justice, and brand them and their doctrine with the marks of their perpetual scorn and indignation."

A sixth Letter from the Committee, with an Account of the King's Proceedings at York. June 6. Both houses received intelligence from their Committee at York, concerning a prodigious meeting of gentlemen and freeholders, which had appeared, at his majesty's summons, on a Moor near that city, on the 3rd of this month. The particulars thereof, in a letter from lord Howard, one of the said committee, directed to the Speaker of the house of peers, was read in these words:

"My lord; According to the commands of the houses, we presented your Petition and Propositions to the king, yesterday morning; we heard them read, and told us, 'He would take some time to consider of an Answer.' I doubt not but the house will expect some account from me of the great meeting yesterday;

yet I believe that no man can fully satisfy to what it tended, or make any judgment thereon, or what sense the country had of it: for, as nothing was offered to them by way of proposition, so nothing was said by them, only that divers times there was made a very great shout or noise. A printed Speech was there read, in divers places of the field, which some heard, but many thousands went away, saying, 'They could give no account of the cause of their being called together.' The number was very great, thought to be about 40,000; the king came to the place with the prince, the duke of York, the Prince Elector, and most of the lords that are in town; the regiment of horse, Trained Bands, his majesty's guard of horse of this county, his own servants and the soldiers that are about the town; with whom he rode about the field, stayed a little, and then departed.—A Petition was offered to his majesty, by sir Thomas Fairfax, in the name of many inhabitants of this county, but it was not accepted. There were but few gentlemen at this meeting, excepting those who put themselves upon the king's guard; this Summons being intended, by his majesty, only for the ministers, freeholders, copyholders, and farmers.—We continue to suffer still by the king's displeasure; for, when we were ready to take horse and accompany our countrymen, it pleased his majesty to send the earl of Newport to us with this message: 'That his maj. did command us that we should not go to the field, nor appear at all at this meeting.' To which we returned this Answer by the earl to his majesty, That we would obey his commands herein at this time; but that we protested, It was a very high breach of our liberty, as we were subjects and Yorkshiresmen: That we humbly conceived we were under no restraint, at present, as prisoners; not having deserved any such affront or punishment, by any thing we had said or done: that there were divers parliament men there, (who, we were confident, had not done so good service to his majesty, in endeavouring the peace of the kingdom, as we had) who were not only admitted to this meeting, but had much respect from his majesty, while we suffered under these undeserved injuries: that though for the present we should forbear going, yet, if any thing should happen, wherein our service should be required by our Instructions, we must and would be ready to come and perform it.' This Answer being sent accordingly, we resolved to stay at our lodgings, the place of the meeting being very near; and sent divers of our servants there, who we directed to give us particular notice of what passed; so that, if there had been occasion, we could presently have been upon the place, to have done any thing which had concerned our duties. We are informed that the earl of Newport hath, by his majesty's commands, sent forth Warrants, that the Recusants arms, deposited in any part of this county, shall be brought to York, for his majesty's service. This being, as we conceive, of some consequence, I thought it my duty to acquaint the house therewith; and shall ever remain, &c. EDW. HOWARD. York, June 4, 1642."

The King's Declaration to the Ministers, Freeholders, &c. of York.] A conference was held this day, between the two houses on the subject of the foregoing Letter, &c. the report of which was made to the lords, in the afternoon; wherein the commons presented their lordships a printed copy of the king's Declaration to the Ministers, Freeholders, Farmers, and substantial Copyholders, assembled by his majesty's special Summons at Heworth Moor, near York, on the third of this month; which was as follows:

"We would have you to be assured, that we never intended the least neglect unto you in any former Summons of the country; our love, as well as our protection, extending to all our subjects: but as you are a great body, time and convenience must be observed in your assembling.—That you may know the general Reasons of our being here, you must understand, That when we found it neither safe nor honourable to expose our person to the tumultuous and licentious proceedings of many, (which to this day are unpunished) who did disorderly approach near our court at Whitehall, we trusted this part of our dominions chiefly to reside in; where, as most of the gentry already have, so we assure ourselves the rest of you will, give us clear testimony of your service and obedience; which we will never use otherwise than for the defence of the true orthodox religion, professed and settled in queen Elizabeth's time, and confirmed by the authority of the statutes of this realm; the defence of the laws and fundamental constitutions of this kingdom, as the justest measure and rule for our prerogative, and your liberties and rights; and, lastly, for the preservation of the peace of this kingdom.—As for our own zeal to the Protestant profession, we refer all the world to our daily exercise of it, and our Declarations concerning it, and to our execution of the laws against the Papists; so likewise we cannot but declare ourself most heartily sorry to find such Separatists and Schismatics, who presume, against the law, to foment new doctrines and disciplines to the disturbance of church and state.—For the law; it being the common inheritance of our people, we shall never enforce any prerogative of ours beyond it, but submit ourself to it; and give you, and all our subjects, the fullest latitude of it, both for the liberty of your persons, and the property of your estates. And for an inviolable confidence and assurance hereof, as we take God, the Searcher of all Hearts, to witness our real intention herein; so we shall no longer desire you to stand for the defence of our person, honour, and just prerogatives, than we shall maintain the laws of the land, the liberty of your persons, and the property of your goods.—And for the clear understanding of our resolutions to maintain peace, we may have the confidence and happiness to rely (against all Malignity whatsoever) to our former 16 years reign; (too long to dissolve our nature (if, in all this time, we never caused the effusion of one drop of blood, it needs be thought, that, in our ripper judgment in government, we should never open such issues as might drown us and our posterity in them: but we are sure to have no enemy, but in the defence of the true Protestant profession, the right of the established law, for the preservation of peace: and certainly all such as those must be yours as well as our enemies.—And to the end that this posture, wherein we meet, should not afflict you with the distempers of the times, (the example of the two houses having made us prepare for a Guard to us and our children and persons) we wish you to look into the composition and constitution of it; and you will find as far from the face or fear of war, that it serves to secure you, as well as us, from it; for choice is of the princely gentry, and of oneiment of our Trained Bands, which cannot be thought to oppress the county, being their own nor war with themselves. And we further assure you, we never intended to use foreign or disaffected in religion; and, that you may fully assure yourselves of our sole dependence upon the love and service of our own people to live and die with them, we have among these our subjects; which had been most irrational, if we had ever intended to have strangers. And further, you may perceive that we do receive none, but such as stand clear in loyalty and religion; for which reason we have caused the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to be given them. Likewise, to prevent any distempers at home, we have shall put the Trained Bands of all this kingdom, under the command of persons of honour, confidence, and affection to the country; straitly charging, upon their allegiance, no officer to accept any command of them, nor soldiers to obey any, save such as are authorized by us. And for the prevention of any innovated power over you, you shall have us here to govern you, and the soldiers to protect you in peace, and to relieve you against all oppressions; for that, as we have told you before, must arise from some great violence (which we hope God will prevent) and from this preparation of our subjects. Therefore let none of you be affrighted with fears; if such a war should follow, it falls the authors home to their own doors; and not by the confidence of our person with you, assure ourself you are not.—Here we had you to your fidelity and duty, had not our malicious insolence, in our former month sent forth a most presumptuous Summons, receiving our people, and presuming upon our royal authority; and these protect themselves as great defenders of religion, peace, and liberty; whereas they become infectious and contagious to the people, seducing them by vain fancies and delusions, as may appear sir warrants, which we could trace to some pits, as we are credibly informed: and you it were just in us to punish these as authors of sedition, but that it would be too at a favour; for it would honour them with title of Martyrdom, for God's Cause, as they vainly pretend: but you may now see whence this spirit comes, that would ke us to be in the act of destruction of religion, and our person a disturber of the peace, I ready to introduce slavery.—These here all the foreign forces we have, or ever intend to have; to act these great designs, withstanding the vain fears hitherto imag-

 ed. So that you see it is high time that the fancies were dispersed and driven away, that we might be repaired in honour and interand you enjoy the blessing of peace and piness, the advancement whereof shall be study and comfort: and therefore we shall,
 as you shall think it convenient time, ease in the number of Trained Bands; and for our billet-money, it had been long since paid, that no part of the Subsidies which we had for that purpose, came to our hands;
 we shall not be wanting, in any thing licit in us, for the full satisfaction reof: but shall make our grace and houn-
 to you answerable to your best fidelity loyalty, as occasion shall be offered to

A Petition offered by sir Tho. Fairfax, which King refuses to accept.] Next was read copy of the Petition of the county of York, which the king had refused to accept: viz.

the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The humble PETITION of the Gentry, Ministers, Freeholders, and other inhabitants of the County of York.

Sheweth; That this particular county so affectionate to your majesty's service) has willingly, for 3 years last past, been the place whereon the tragical miseries (which necessarily accompany war and armies) have been represented and acted; whereby the general wealth and plenty of this county is mustered and brought very low; which weight miseries are sensibly become much more heavy by reason of your majesty's distance in distance, and difference in councils, from your at council the parliament; begetting great tempers and distractions throughout the kingdom, and have evidently, amongst us, produced factions and divisions; drawing to these parts great numbers of discontented persons, who, it may too justly be feared, do extend the public ruin for their private advance.—All these evils are daily fomented, and grow more formidable, by your majesty's moving together (as we conceive not according to law) many companies of the Trained Bands and others, both horse and foot, of this county; by your entertaining multitudes of commanders and cavaliers from other parts;
 the daily resort of recusants, and persons affected in religion, to your majesty's court at York; and by the great preparation of arms and other warlike provisions. These beget in us fears of wars, to the great terror and amazement of us your majesty's peaceable subjects, and the great decay of all commerce and industrious courses for the wealth and prosperity of the country, especially of cloathing, which is the main subsistence of this county; and which is, since your majesty's residence with us, and the following distractions thereupon, suddenly obstructed; in-somuch that many thousand families who are of, and have their livelihood by the trade of cloathing, are at the point of utter undoing; which inevitably will prove to be of dangerous consequence, and will be the inlet to our approaching and unavoidable ruin, unless your maj. graciously please to give redress by removing the causes, which will remove these miserable effects. It is too true that very many, in these and other parts of the kingdom, do wholly withdraw themselves from their former commerce and dealing; and others, both merchants and chapmen, do now generally refuse to make payments for goods long since sold and delivered; alledging that others refuse to pay them for any other commodities formerly sold, till the fears and distractions of the land be settled: This, if not suddenly prevented, will forthwith overturn all such ways of advantage and comfort, as have formerly made this kingdom, and this county in particular, prosperous and happy.—We do therefore, in all humility and duty, in the sense of our deplorable condition, beseech your maj.

 to pardon us if we importune your maj. more than others; since we have endured, and are in hazard, more than any; and that, from these apprehensions, we may offer to your maj.
 our earnest petitions for redress and prevention of these evils, daily threatening danger to your
 maj. and destruction to us; which we conceive is impossible any other way to be effected than by your majesty's entertaining a right understanding betwixt yourself and parliament; by inclining your gracious ear and consent to such councils and Propositions as shall be tendered, by them to your maj. for the honour and greatness of your maj. and posterity, and the good of the church and kingdom; by your majesty's declining all other councils whatsoever; and uniting of your confidence to your parliament;
 and that your maj. would in no way think fit to put us upon that rock of denying either the duty we owe to your majesty, or to your parliament and the whole kingdom, to which we are so deeply engaged by our Protestation;
 which your maj. to our knowledge, never dissented from nor declared against: and that, whilst your maj. expects our performance on our part thereof, we may not, being equally engaged, impeach at all or in the least degree go against our duty in the other; which we stand resolved, by no means either of fear or favour, to be drawn to do.—And we humbly intreat your maj. to take into consideration, That your parliament being the supreme judicatory of your kingdom, the very essence thereof must

of very necessity be destroyed, if their counsels and determinations be subjected to alteration or reversal by the counsels or opinions of any private person, how learned or judicious soever: and, seeing your maj. hath most graciously passed an act, That this parliament shall not be dissolved nor adjourned without consent of your maj. and both houses, we do humbly beseech your maj. to take into your gracious and prudent thoughts that nothing may be done tending thereunto; and that the lords and great officers, now called hither by your majesty's command, may speedily be returned to the high court of parliament; whereby it may be evident to the world, that your maj. intends not to decline the law so enacted: and that, since your maj. hath graciously declared your confidence in the affections of this county, your maj. would not think it fit an extraordinary Guard should be raised thereout; and the cavaliers, and others of that quality, still continued about your maj. as men most useful, and as if kept for some design; they not having, for ought we know, either interest in, or affections to, the public good; their language and behaviour speaking nothing but division and wars, and their advantage consisting in that which is most destructive to others.—And, lastly, That since your maj. hath called in this county to attend your maj. this day, your petitioners do most humbly supplicate, That none, either cavaliers or others, who in truth have not present fortunes in this county, may be admitted into any meeting, this day concerning the public business thereof; nor hereafter be present at any vote or consultation, when any further meeting may be, to prepare and consider of some fit Answer to what your majesty shall propound: We humbly conceiving it neither just nor equal (but a thing to be protested against) that any whomsoever should be thrust upon us as men of this county, that are not, by their fortune and residence, any part of us.—And now your petitioners do most heartily pray, That the God of Heaven, in whose hands are the hearts of kings, would this day incline your majesty's heart seriously to consider the present and imminent miseries that this your kingdom lies under; in the peace whereof visibly, under God, consists the preservation of the Protestant religion, the redemption of our brethren in Ireland, and the establishing of that kingdom to your majesty and posterity from those desperate and unparalleled rebels.—Your majesty's graciously granting of these your petitioners humble desires, (whatsoever may be said to the contrary) they are well assured, will abundantly redound to the glory of God, the honour and safety of your maj. and the good of your posterity. These are the only probable means, under God, to restore peace and plenty, and to make this your kingdom happy; besides the happy acquisition of your people's hearts, the greatest treasure of princes: all these will, graciously, represent your majesty's lively portraiture to him who is the Fountain of wisdom and piety, to whom we shall ever pray for your majesty's long and prosperous reign."

A Petition to the Parliament, on the King's Refusal of the former.] Then was read another Petition from the Gentry, &c. of the same county to the parliament, on occasion of the king's refusing to receive the former: viz.

To the right hon. the Lords and Commons in the High Court of Parliament assembled, The Humble PETITION of the Gentry, Ministers, Freeholders, and other Law-abiding inhabitants of the County of York, assembled there, at his Majesty's Command, the 3d of June 1642.

"We, being resolved humbly to petition your maj. for the Redress of those Grievances which we now lie under, did desire to have met in the Castle-yard at York; we concerning the fittest place to consider of such public affairs as concerned the county: this we was not only denied, but charge was given to the officer there, that we should not have admittance: when we assembled upon the place appointed by his majesty, and did acquaint the county, there met, with a form of a Petition (the sense whereof they formerly approved of) and then, upon the reading thereof, generally consented to, and desired the same should be presented to his majesty) we were violently interrupted by the earl of Lindsey, who with great troop attending him, in an imperious way, snatched out of a gentleman's hand a good quality, a copy of the aforementioned Petition, which, at the desire of the county, he was reading to them: and said, 'You are a company of traitorous rogues and villains, and often lifted up his cane as if he would have struck him. Also a knight of this county was affronted by the lord Saville, upon his reading himself the draught of a Petition upon the place aforesaid, the day above. First, his lordship told him, 'It was a pamphlet,' which he denied; thereupon the lord Saville demanded of him, which he refusing to deliver, his lordship laid hands upon his sword, and almost plucked him from his horse; and took the Petition from him, saying, 'That he was labouring to sow seeds of sedition; and, if he would fight, there would be fighting enough.' Many of the said lord Saville's company then held up their canes at him; and one of them said, 'Hold your prating, it were good to cut you.' This provocation, had not the people been peaceably inclined, might have produced bloody effects; notwithstanding all which, and divers other insufferable injuries, so consistent were we of his majesty's former professions, 'Never to refuse any Petition presented by the people to him in an humble way,' that we persisted not to wait our best opportunity to present the said Petition to his majesty; a Copy whereof we here humbly present unto your grave considerations, which his maj. notwithstanding, pleased not to accept of.—We therefore humbly desire these hon. houses well to weigh these particulars, and to take such course rein, as may tend to the preservation of our erties, and the peace of the kingdom; and that you would be pleased to address yourselves his majesty on our behalf, that, through his wisdoms, our desire may find better ac-tation with his majesty. And we shall hear-ily pray, &c."

Sir J. Bourchier's Letter on the same Occasion. Lastly, was read a copy of a Letter from York, by sir John Bourchier to sir J. Barrington, a member of the house of commons.

"Dear cousin; Yesterday, being at Heworthor, seeing one reading something, I drew near to him, and by inquiry I found that it was a Petition, that was to be presented presently to his majesty; those that heard it read upward of it. Meeting with a friend, I inquired him, if he had not the Petition, or a copy of it, which he told me, he had. I entreated him to lend it me, which accordingly he did:
I read part of it, my lord Saville came with a great company, in a furious manner,
I demanded what I did there; and told me, that I was reading some Pamphlet to the people, and that I was labouring to sow some seed of sedition to seduce the king's subjects:
whereupon I told him, 'It was a Petition that was reading privately to myself, which, upon approach, I had put in my pocket.' My lord Saville, in an imperious manner, demanded me, to deliver it to him, which I refused:
his lordship laid his hand upon the belt of his sword, and almost pulled me off my feet; and forced me to deliver the Petition him. His lordship told me, 'If we loved the king we should have fighting enough;' I answered, 'I came this day to labour for peace.'
Before his lordship's departure, he told me, that he knew me well enough; I answered his lordship, I hoped he knew no ill by me.
My that were with his lordship held up their hands in a terrifying manner; and one of them said, 'Hold your prating, it were good to cane you;' and when his lordship and the others were gone, one of them turned back, and told me, 'be quiet, else I should be caned.' I answered, 'That it were a good deed to put me in the stocks.' Afterwards, I being discoursing with sir Rd. Darley and some others, and telling them how I was affronted, even now, by my lord Saville; and formerly, having fire brought into my coach, and some other affronts done unto me, which I have formerly told you of. One capt. Playne, who was one of my lord Saville's company, came up, and told me, 'I will lay aspersions upon persons of honour; whereupon I told him, 'I did not lay it on my lord, but only that I was so abused and affronted.' Upon due consideration, I verily believe he came to make some quarrel.
Upon my parting from you, you desired to hear from me here, I thought good to let you know thus much concerning myself. I rest, my affectionate cousin to serve you, JOHN BARRINGTON. York, June 4, 1642."

The Parliament resolve to support the Yorkshire Petitioners. The lords having taken into their consideration all the foregoing particulars, ordered, That the earl of Lindsey, lord great chamberlain, and the lord Saville should be apprehended by the sheriff of Yorkshire, and be conveyed, from sheriff to sheriff, to the house. These two lords were, at the same time, voted "Public Enemies of the State, and Incendiaries between the King and his People." The following Resolution was also agreed to by both houses: "The lords and commons, observing not only the wisdom, but the affections of the county of York, expressed in these Petitions; and likewise that they cannot be discouraged from their constant fidelity to the laws and government of this kingdom, which have their life and being from the parliament; have thought fit to declare their good acceptations of their affections; assuring them, That they will interest themselves in those their demands, which tend to the honour and safety of his majesty, and the peace of his kingdom; and may prove an effectual means to keep us from the desperate mischiefs, which those lords, that opposed this Petition, would have brought this kingdom unto."

The King's Proclamation forbidding Obedience to the Ordinance for the Militia. The king having published, the latter end of last month, a Proclamation concerning the Militia, and the same having been communicated to the commons by their Committee at York, that house resolved to appoint another committee to prepare a Declaration in Answer thereto, to show how dangerously the Privileges of Parliament have been broken of late, even at this time, when the king professeth to rule by law; and the dangerous consequences of these breaches. This Declaration, having gone through several alterations by the commons, was at length passed, and ordered to be sent up to the lords by Mr. Pym. Their lordships having agreed thereto, it was, by order of both houses, printed and published this day.
But first we shall give the Proclamation itself:
viz.

By the KING: A PROCLAMATION forbidding all his majesty's subjects, belonging to the Trained Bands or Militia of this kingdom, to rise, march, muster, or exercise, by virtue of any Order or Ordinance of one or both houses of Parliament, without consent or warrant from his majesty, upon pain of punishment according to the laws.

"Whereas, by the statute made in the 7th year of king Edward I, 'the privileges, rights, and commonality of the realm, affirmed in parliament, That to the king it belongeth, and his part it is, by his royal seigniori, straitly to defend wearing of armour, and all other force against the peace, at all times when it shall please him, and to punish them which shall do contrary according to the laws and usages of the realm; and hereunto all subjects are bound to aid the king as their sovereign lord, at all seasons when need shall be: and whereas we understand that, expressly contrary to the said statute, and other good laws of this our kingdom, under colour and pretence of an Ordinance of Parliament, without our consent, or any commission or warrant from us, the Trained Bands and Militia of this kingdom have been lately, and are intended to be, put in arms, and drawn into companies in a warlike manner, whereby the peace and quiet of our subjects is, or may be, disturbed: we being desirous, by all gracious and fair admonitions, to prevent that some malignant persons in this our kingdom do not, by degrees, seduce our good subjects from their due obedience to us and the laws of this our kingdom; subtly endeavouring, by a general combustion or confusion, to hide their mischievous designs and intentions against the peace of this our kingdom; and, under a specious pretence of putting our Trained Bands into a posture, to draw and engage our good subjects in a warlike opposition against us, as our town of Hull is already by the treason of sir J. Hotham; who, at first, pretended to put a garrison into the same only for our security and service: we do therefore, by this our Proclamation, expressly charge and command all our sheriffs, and all colonels, lieutenant-colonels, serjeant-majors, captains, officers, and soldiers belonging to the Trained Bands of this our kingdom, and likewise all high and petty constables, and other our officers and subjects whatsoever, upon their allegiance, and as they tender the peace of this our kingdom, not to muster, levy, rise, or march, or to summon or warn, upon any Warrant, Order, or Ordinance, from one or both our houses of Parliament, (whereto we have not, or shall not give our express consent) any of our Trained Bands; or other forces, to rise, muster, march, or exercise, without express warrant under our hand, or warrant from our sheriff of the county, grounded upon a particular writ to that purpose, under our great seal. And in case any of our Trained Bands shall rise, or gather together, contrary to this our command, we shall then call them in due time to a strict account; and proceed legally against them as violators of the laws, and disturbers of the peace of the kingdom. Given at our Court at York, the 27th day of May, 1642."

The Parliament's DECLARATION, in Answer to the foregoing PROCLAMATION.

"The lords and commons, having perused his majesty's Proclamation, forbidding all his majesty's subjects belonging to the Trained Bands or Militia of this kingdom, to rise, march, muster, or exercise, by virtue of any Order or Ordinance of one or both houses of parliament, without consent or warrant from his majesty, upon pain of punishment according to the laws: do thereupon declare, That neither the statute of 7 Edw. I. therein vouched, nor any other law of this kingdom, doth restrain or make void the Ordinance agreed upon by both houses of parliament for the ordering and disposing of the Militia of the kingdom, in this time of extreme and imminent danger; nor expose his majesty's subjects to any punishment for obeying the same, notwithstanding that his majesty hath refused to give his consent to that Ordinance; but ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.—The Statute of 7 Edw. I. Anno 1279, quoted in his majesty's Proclamation, runneth thus: 'The king to the justices of his bench sending greeting: Whereas of late, before certain persons deputed to treat upon sundry debates had between us and certain great men of our realm, amongst other things, it was recorded, That, in our next parliament, the provision shall be made by us and the common assent of the prelates, earls, and barons, that in all parliaments, treaties, and other assemblies which should be made in the realm of England for ever, every man shall come with our all force and armour, well and peaceably to the honour of us, and the peace of us and our realm; and now, in our next parliament at Westminster, after the said treaties, the prelates, earls, barons, and the community of our realm there assembled to take advice of this business, have said, That to us it becometh, and our part is, through our royal sovereignty, straitly to defend force of armour, and all other force against our peace, at all times when it shall please us; and to punish them which shall do contrary, according to our laws and usages of our realm; and hereunto they are bound to aid us, as their sovereign lord, at all seasons when need shall be: we command you that you cause these things to be read afore you in the said bench, and there to be enrolled. Given at Westminster the 30th day of October.'—The occasion of this Declaration for the restraint of armed men, from coming to the parliament to disturb the peace of it, is very improperly alledged for the maintenance of such levies as are now raised against parliament; the title of the Statute becometh thus, 'To all parliaments and treaties every man shall come without force and arms.' That the question is not, Whether it belong to the king or no to restrain such force; but, whether the king shall refuse to discharge that duty of trust, whether there is not a power in the houses to provide for the safety of the parliament, and the peace of the kingdom? What is the end for which the Ordinance for the Militia was made; and, being agreeable to the scope and purpose of the law, cannot, in reason, be adjudged contrary to it; for although the law do affirm it to be in the king, yet doth not exclude those in whom the law hath placed a power for that purpose, as in the courts of justice, in sheriffs, and other officers and ministers of those courts; and that their power is derived from the king by his patents, yet it cannot be restrained by his majesty's command, by his great seal, or otherwise; much less can the power of parliament be concluded by his majesty's command, because the authority thereof is of a higher and more eminent nature than any of these commands.

it is acknowledged that the king is the fountain of justice and protection; but the acts of justice and protection are not exercised in his person, nor depend upon his pleasure; but by his courts, and by his ministers, who do their duty therein, though the king, in his own person, should forbid them; and therefore, if judgments should be given by them in the king's will and personal command, are they the king's judgments.—The high court of parliament is not only a court of judicature, (enabled by the laws to adjudge and enquire the rights and liberties of the king—) against such patents and grants of his majesty as are prejudicial thereunto, although augmented both by his personal commands, and by his proclamation under the great seal, it is likewise a council to provide for the safety, to prevent the imminent dangers, to preserve the public peace and safety of the kingdom, and to declare the king's pleasure in such things as are requisite thereunto; and as they do herein hath the stamp of royal authority, although his majesty, seduced by counsel, do, in his own person, oppose or interrupt the same; for the king's supreme power and royal pleasure is exercised and declared in this high court of law and council, in a more eminent and obligatory manner, than it can be by any personal act or resolution of his own.—Seeing therefore the lords and commons, which are his majesty's greatest and highest council, have ordained, That, for the present and necessary defence of the kingdom, the Trained Bands and Militia of that kingdom should be ordered according to that ordinance; and that the town of Hull should be committed to the custody of sir J. Hotham, be preserved from the attempts of Papists, and other Malignant persons, who thereby might put the kingdom into a combustion: it is so far from being a force against the king's peace, that it is necessary for the keeping and securing thereof, and for that end is intended; and all his majesty's loving subjects, as well by that law, as by other laws, are bound to be obedient thereunto; and as they do therein is, according to that law, be interpreted to be done in aid of the king, in discharge of that trust which he is bound to perform; and it is so far from being subject to punishment, that if they should refuse to do it, or be persuaded by any commission or command of his majesty to do the contrary, they might justly be punished for the same according to the laws and usages of the kingdom; for the king, by his sovereignty is not bound to destroy his people, but to protect and defend them; and the high court of parliament, and all other his majesty's officers and ministers, ought to be subservient to that power and authority which law hath placed in his majesty to that purpose, though he himself, in his own person, should neglect the same.—Therefore the lords and commons do hereby the said Proclamation to be void in law, and of none effect: for that, by the constitution and policy of this kingdom, the king, by his proclamation, cannot declare the law contrary to the judgment and resolution of any of the inferior courts of justice, much less against the high court of parliament; for if it were admitted, That the king, by his proclamation, may declare a law, thereby his proclamations will, in effect, become laws: which would turn to the subverting of the law of the land and the rights and liberties of the subjects.—And the lords and commons do require and command all constables, petty constables, and all other his majesty's officers and subjects whatsoever, to muster, levy, rise, march and exercise; or to summon or warn any, upon warrant from the lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, captains, or other officers of the Trained Bands, and all others according to the said Ordinance of both houses; and shall not presume to muster, levy, rise, march, or exercise, by virtue of any commission or other authority whatsoever, as they will answer the contrary at their peril: and in their so doing they do further declare, That they shall be protected by the power and authority of both houses of parliament; and that whosoever shall oppose, question, or hinder them in the execution of the said Ordinance, shall be proceeded against as violaters of the laws, and disturbers of the peace of the kingdom."

Letter to the Lords from 9 Peers at York.] June 7. p. m. A Letter directed to the Speaker of the house of lords, was read as follows:

"My lord; We, whose names are underwritten, have received a Summons, dated the 30th day of May, to appear, the 8th of June, at the bar of the house of peers; we are come here to York, at this time, to pay a willing obedience to his majesty's commands, signified by letter under his hand, which commands, remain upon us still; and so we rest Your lordships affectionate servants, Northampton, Will. Devonshire, Monmouth, R. Rich, Hen. Dover, Grev of Ruthin, C. Howard, Tho. Coventrey, Arthur Capel. York, June 5, 1642."

Ordered, That this Letter be taken into consideration to-morrow; and that all the lords in town have notice to be present.

Letter from Lord Willoughby, concerning the Militia.] June 8. The commons received a message from the lords, desiring a present conference concerning certain Letters from the lord Willoughby of Parham, lord lieutenant of Lincolnshire, which was agreed to. Soon after Mr. Hollis reported, That those Letters concerned some passages touching the Militia in that county; and delivered the same to the house, which were read as follows:

"My lord; I received a letter from your lordship, in which the house is pleased to do me a very great honour, far above any desert of mine, and little expected by me: For, my lord, I well know my obedience ties me to fulfil their commands; and in what I have done, I have done but my duty, and that which every honest man ought to do, and oweth of right to the parliament; and whosoever hath that principle in him, it will dictate to him as much, and keep him from other bye-ways. And for my own part, my heart ever was, and shall ever be, both forward and ready to obey their lordships commands in all things, both with integrity and industry, and God's curse light upon him and his, that carries any other heart about him.—My lord, it is too mean a way for me to express my acknowledgment, in paper, to the house for this high favour, which I have received by your lordship's letter. I hope to make it appear to their lordships, by my actions, that I am not an ungrateful servant.—It is a great encouragement to these parts, their lordships Resolutions, in giving their commands to have the rest of the Militia put in present execution; and truly, my lord, it was out of that regard that I did intimate it to my lord of Essex; as holding it a thing much conducing to the public good, and the only remedy to cure these distractions which the kingdom is in, not out of any regard to myself; for I know, if I suffer in executing their lordships commands, it must be against their wills; and when that day comes, I will not give a straw for all I have, were I but a looker-on. My lord, as I was this day at Lincoln, where I appointed to begin to muster, there came a messenger from his majesty, with this Letter; which I held it my duty to acquaint the house with, and likewise my Answer; and, as at Lincoln, so in all other places, I shall be ready to serve your lordship as Your most humble Servant, P. WILLOUGHBY. Lincoln, June 6, 1642." P.S. My lord, ere my letter was sealed up, I could not but give your lordship an account in how good a posture I found the Trained Bands of Lincoln, which was far beyond my expectation; considering the unhappiness in the sickness being spread in the town, which hindered the appearance of some: but, truly, my lord, that was fully supplied by a company of volunteers, equal in number and goodness of arms to the Trained Bands."

The King's Letter to lord Willoughby of Parham.

"C. R. Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we understand that you have begun to assemble, train, and muster the Trained Bands of our county of Lincoln, under pretence of an Ordinance of Parliament, whereto we have not given our consent; which is not only contrary to law, but to our command and pleasure, signified by our Proclamation sent to the sheriff of that our county: wherefore, that you may not hereafter plead ignorance of such our prohibition, we do, by these our letters, command and charge you, upon your allegiance, to desist and forbear to raise, muster, train, exercise, or assemble together any part of the Trained Bands of that our county, either by yourself, or by any others employed under you, or by warrant from you. And because you may, for what you have already done concerning the Militia of that our county, plead that you had not so particular a command, we shall pass by what you have already done therein; so as presently, upon your receipt hereof, you shall desist and give over meddling any further with any thing belonging to the Militia of that our county; but if you shall not presently desist and forbear meddling therewith, we are resolved to call you to a strict account for your disobedience thereof, after so many particular and legal commands given you, upon your allegiance to the contrary, and shall esteem and proceed against you as a disturber of the peace of our kingdom. Given at our court at York, June 4, 1642."

Lord Willoughby's Answer to his Majesty.

"Sir; As there can be nothing of great unhappiness to me, than to receive a command from your majesty, whereunto my conscience cannot give so ready an obedience, as affections; so I must confess the difficulty, this time, not a little, how to express that which I owe to your majesty's late command, and not falsify that trust reposed in me by your high court of parliament; through whose particular directions I am now come into county to settle the Militia, according to Ordinance of parliament; which by the vote of my lord Lyttleton, and others in the house, peers better versed in the laws than myself, passed as a legal thing; and hath since been confirmed, if I mistake not, by his excellency and your majesty's chief justice, sir J. Bankes; both in their accepting command under that Ordinance, and nominating deputy-lieutenants: How much farther proceeded, I know not.—But, sir, if opinions of those great lawyers drew me to an act unsuitable to your majesty's liking, I hope the want of years will excuse my want of judgment. And since, by the command of parliament, I am now so far engaged in service, as the sending out warrants to summon the county to meet me this day at Lincoln, and afterwards in other places, I do humbly beseech your majesty not to impute that command upon me, which must otherwise render me false to those that rely on me; so make me more unhappy than any misery that can fall upon me.—These things, sir, I once more humbly beseech your majesty may be taken into your gracious consideration, and that you would never be pleased to impute any misconceit of me, or of this estate, since nothing hath yet passed by my commands here, or ever shall, but what shall tend to the honour and safety of your majesty's person, to the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, and to the content, I hope, of your majesty's subjects in these parts; in which I remain, Your majesty's, &c. P. WILLOUGHBY."

The Lords resolve to support the lord Willoughby. Mr. Hollis also acquainted the house that the lords had passed a Vote in occasion of the foregoing Letters, to which he desired the common concurrence, in verba: "The lords have thought fit to let you know, how much they value and improve the endeavours of this lord, in a service so much importing the safety of this kingdom; and they doubt not of your readiness to concur with them, upon all occasions, to the manifest use they have, and shall retain, of his deservings; which appear the greater, by how much he difficulties (by those circumstances you have heard read) have been greater. And as my lords resolve to make his interest their own, in this service, for the public good, and safety of this kingdom, so they desire you to join with them, in so good and necessary a work."—The commons agreed to this vote; which, together with the Letters, were ordered to be printed and published.

The Lords pass a Vote against the 9 Peers. [This day the lords took into consideration the letter from the Nine Peers at York, and agreed upon a conference with the other house about it, expressing their sense of the matter in the following manner:—"The lords having received a letter from diverse of their members, who have withdrawn themselves from their attendance in parliament, contrary to the express orders and commands of this house; though his affront be to their own house, and by their own members, yet, as it concerns the safety of the kingdom, and the very being of parliament, in the consequence of it the lords, in that respect, thought it fit to communicate it to the commons; that both houses may, jointly, endeavour to prevent such practices and designs as, by the Malignant Party and the ill-affected members of both houses, may be undertaken, to the dissolution of the parliament, unvalidating the acts and authority thereof; or raising power in opposition thereunto; which the lords cannot but conceive those lords are encouraged unto by the counsels now prevailing, and the forces now raising at York; otherwise it is not imaginable, after a vote passed by both houses, That it appeared the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against his parliament, they would have taken the boldness to have left the house, in contempt of the command thereof, and have gone to York; and, being summoned to appear, would have remained there notwithstanding, and have returned so slight and scornful an answer."

Informations of the King's raising Troops. [June 9. The lords having desired to know of the commons, at a conference, what real informations they have had, that the king had sent out Summons into the county of York, and other counties, for raising of troops, &c. under colour of his majesty's service, with large offers to those that would come in, the commons answered, That they had received intelligence, at the bar, that the king had sent to summon Lancashire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland; and that some of their members had letters of the same; but they are willing to drop those counties, it being notorious only in Yorkshire.

A Subscription set on foot by both Houses, of Money and Horses.] June 10. A message was brought from the commons, declaring, That their members had entered into an engagement, separately, to bring in Money, Plate, and Horses, for the public use; as the only remedy to maintain the Protestant religion, the king's authority, and his person in his royal dignity; the free course of justice, the laws of the land, the peace of the kingdom, and the privileges of parliament. They also hoped their lordships would put the same in execution, and declare themselves and their affections, what they would do therein, since they had more to lose than the house of commons.* Hereupon the lords present subscribed to bring in as follows:

The Lord Admiral, earl of North-	£.	Horses
umberland	2000
Earl of Essex	1000	20
Earl of Holland		30
Earl of Pembroke	1000	40

The horsemen were all to be compleatly armed, and many of the lords engaged to serve in person.

Proposition for bringing in Plate, Money, &c.] A committee of lords was appointed to receive the Answers of those lords who were absent, how far they would act in this affair; the Judges and other assistants to the house were also to be urged to subscribe to it: and, in order to forward this subscription more effectually throughout the whole kingdom, the following Proposition was agreed to by both houses:

"Whereas it appears that the king, seduced

* Lord Clarendon informs us, "That when this Subscription was set on foot in the house of commons, sir Henry Killigrew, being called upon, told them, 'If there were occasion, he would provide a good horse, and a good sword; and made no question but he should find a good cause;' but, within very few days, both he, and all those that were taken notice of for refusing, found it safest for them to leave the town; there being very visibly great animosity against them, both within and without the walls."

by wicked counsel, intends to make war against his parliament; and, in pursuance thereof, under pretence of a guard for his person, hath actually begun to levy forces both of horse and foot, and sent out summons throughout the county of York, for the calling together great numbers; and some ill-affected persons have been employed in other parts, to raise troops, under colour of his majesty's service, making large offers of reward and preferment to such as will come in: and that his majesty doth, with a high and forcible hand, protect and keep away delinquents, not permitting them to make their appearance, to answer such affronts and injuries as have been by them offered unto the parliament; and those messengers which have been sent from the houses for them, have been abused, beaten, and imprisoned; so as the Orders of parliament, which is the highest court of justice in this realm, are not obeyed, and the authority of it is altogether scorned and vilified; and such persons as stand well-affected to it, and declare themselves sensible of these public calamities, and of the violations of the privileges of parliament, and common liberty of the subject, are baffled and injured by several sorts of malignant men who are about the king; some whereof, under the name of Cavaliers, without having respect to the laws of the land, or any fear either of God or man, are ready to commit all manner of outrage and violence; which must needs tend to the dissolution of this government, the destroying of religion, laws, liberty, and property; all which will be exposed to the malice and violence of such desperate persons, as must be employed in so horrid and unnatural an act as the overthrowing of a parliament by force, which is the support and preservation of them all: this being duly considered by the lords and commons, and how great an obligation lies upon them in honour, conscience, and duty, according to the high trust reposed in them, to use all possible means in such cases, for the timely prevention of so great and irrecoverable evils; they have thought fit to publish their sense and apprehension of this imminent danger, thereby to excite all well affected persons to contribute their best assistance, according to their solemn vow and Protestation, to the preparations necessary for the opposing and suppressing of the traitorous attempts of these wicked and malignant counsellors, who seek to engage the king in so dangerous and destructive an enterprise, and the whole kingdom in a Civil War, and destroy the privileges and being of parliaments: this recourse to the good affections of those that tender their religion and just liberties, and the enjoyments of the blessed fruits of this present parliament, which were almost ready to be reaped, and are now as ready to be ruined by those wicked hands, being the only Remedy left them, under God; and without which they are no longer able to preserve themselves, or those by whom they are entrusted. 1. They the said lords and commons do declare, That whosoever shall bring in any proportion of ready Money, or Plate, or shall underwrite to furnish and maintain any number of Horse, Horsemen, and Arms, for the preservation of the public peace, and for the defence of the king and both houses of parliament from force and violence, and to uphold the power and privileges of parliament, according to his Protestation; it shall be held a good and acceptable service to the commonwealth, and a testimony of his good affection to the Protestant religion, the laws, liberties, and peace of this kingdom, and to the parliament and privileges thereof. And because a considerable Aid cannot be raised by few hands, and the condition of all men's estates on occasions is not always proportionable to the affection, therefore no man's affection shall be measured according to the proportion of offer, so that he express his good-will to service in any proportion whatsoever. 2. Whosoever shall bring in any Money, or Plate, shall furnish and maintain any Horse, Horsemen and Arms for the purposes aforesaid, shall have their money repaid, with interest, 6 per cent. and the full value of their plate, in consideration for the fashion, not exceeding 1s. per ounce; and shall have full recompense for all their charge, in finding, furnishing and maintaining of horse, horsemen, arms; and for this both houses of parliament do engage the public faith. 3. The aldermen of London shall be the treasurer, receive all such Money and Plate as shall be brought in for the purposes aforesaid, and acquittances for the same shall be a sufficient ground for the party so lending money, plate, to demand it again with interest, also consideration for the fashion of the plate. 4. Commissaries shall be appointed to value the Horse and Arms furnished for this service; and a signification under their hands of such values of the horse and arms, and of time when first brought in, shall be a warrant to demand satisfaction according to the values; and they shall keep an account of time, from the first inrollment of any horse and horsemen, that such as find they maintain them may be repaid, according to the rate of 2s. 6d. per diem, for so long as they have maintained them in this service, and the commissaries are to attend at Court hall, for the receiving and inrolling of the numbers of horse as shall be brought in. Whosoever shall bring in Money or Plate, shall provide and maintain Horse, Horsemen and Arms for this service, shall do according to their duty therein. And the lords and commons do engage the power and authority of parliament, to save them harmless from prejudice and inconveniences that may befall them by occasion thereof. 6. The members of either house, who are present, shall be desired to declare in their houses respectively what Money, or Plate, they will bring in, and what Horse, Horsemen and Arms they will furnish and maintain. 7. It is desired, That all se residence in or about London, or within 80 iles, will bring in their Money, Plate, or ware, within a fortnight after notice; and by that dwell farther off, within 3 weeks. 8.

 Because every person may not be provided with present Money, or with Horse, or have his plate with him, which he means to bring in, and yet resolves to contribute his share within the time limited; and that it is necessary it should be presently known what the provision will be, for the effecting this great important service; it is ordered, 1. That committees of either house, appointed for that purpose respectively, shall receive the Subscriptions of such member of each house, as are not declared themselves in the house, are absent upon the public service, or for private occasions. 2. That the committees in London, intrusted with the Militia, shall give the Subscriptions in London and Middlesex. 3. That some persons, nominated by knights and burgesses of each county, and approved by both houses, shall be appointed to receive the Subscriptions in the several counties. Lastly, Whatsoever is brought in is not at all be employed upon any other occasion, than to the purposes aforesaid; which is to maintain the Protestant religion, the king's authority, and his person in his royal duty, the free course of justice, the laws of the land, the peace of the kingdom, and the privilege of parliament, against any force which shall oppose them. And this by the action of both houses of parliament."

These Propositions of the parliament had no effect, that, lord Clarendon informs us, was hardly credible what a vast proportion of plate was brought in to their treasurers in ten days, there being hardly men enough to receive it, or room to lay it in; and through being so great of the bringers, that, so days attendance, many could not be charged of their seditious offerings.' Mr.
 Locke adds, 'That the parliament was only furnished with Money by loans upon public faith, but, by the endeavours of the ministers and others, a great quantity of money, Plate and Ammunition was brought even by some poor women, to their weddings and bodkins!'

The Nine Peers at York ordered to be impeached.] Mr. Hollis having reported the opinion of the lords concerning the Letter from the Nine Peers at York, a motion was made, that the departing of these Nine Lords from the parliament, without leave, after such as both houses had declared, that the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; and their continuing at York, notwithstanding their oaths and commands, is a high affront and contempt of both houses: and that the said Lords therein did as much as in their lay, that the service of parliament might be deserted; and are justly suspected to promote a war against the parliament." The previous question being put, it was carried in the affirmative by 109 voices against 51. The Tellers on this remarkable occasion were, for the Yeas, Mr. Hollis and Mr. Cromwell; for the Noes,

 Mr. Waller and Mr. White. Then, it was resolved, That a committee be appointed to draw up an Impeachment against the said Nine Peers.

This day the commons took notice of a Picture, or Print, of sir John Hotham on horseback upon the walls of Hull, and the king on foot before the walls; and ordered this scandalous Picture, as it is called, to be burnt by the common hangman, and the whole impression to be seized.

Petition from Somersetshire, in favour of the King's Proposal for an Accommodation. June 14. The lords had been informed, by the commons, of a Petition that was then framing in Somersetshire, to be presented to both houses, in which were great aspersions cast upon the parliament: A copy of it was procured, and this day read to the house as follows:

To the most High and Honourable Houses of LORDS and COMMONS: The Humble PETI-TION of the Knights, Gentry, Clergy, and Freeholders of the county of Somers-set.

"We, with all thankfulness, do acknowledge your great care and pains, in the service of the common-wealth, whereby you have obtained those good laws, which, by his majesty's graciousness and favour, have been already enacted; and, not doubting of the continuance of these favours still in you, for the good and peace of this kingdom, and of your favourable acceptance of these our humble desires, though we have been discouraged, heretofore, in expressions of the like kind, we do again humbly desire, That the Church and Liturgy, established by law, may be continued and obeyed, until such time as the wisdom of the king and parliament, with the assistance of a free and well-chosen synod, of the most grave and learned divines of this kingdom, shall make some reformation or alteration therein; and, in the mean time, that the disturbers thereof may be discountenanced and punished. That you would be pleased to bestow your endeavours to remove all jealousies and misunderstandings between his majesty and the parliament, the distempers within being the greatest evils that can happen unto us, and which we most fear; and, to that end, to take into your considerations his majesty's Message of the 30th of January, as the means himself proposes for an Accommodation; and that you would provide for his security, by declaring against Tumults and unlawful Assemblies; and that you would take care to suppress seditious Sermons and Pamphlets, which his majesty declares he expects, as the means to invite him to come near to his parliament.—That seeing his majesty and parliament do not agree in a new way for settling the Militia, it is humbly desired that the Trained Bands may be put into such a posture, and governed as in the time of queen Elizabeth, until a law be made; and that the disputes about the manner of doing it may not actuate division in the mean time: that the subject may have the benefit of the Petition of Right, both for his person and estate, in all causes and in all courts; and that the laws of the kingdom may be our only rule of government and obedience.—That whereas great sums of Money have been levied by authority of parliament, and greater are now required, we beseech you to take notice, that the country is much impoverished, and will, unwillingly, bear any farther burden of this kind, but such as shall be employed for the general service of this kingdom and that bleeding kingdom of Ireland; and therefore we most humbly pray, that it may be made known how those former collections have been disposed of; which will be a great encouragement for the readier payment of the present.—Lastly, since his majesty hath often, with sacred protestations, declared to his parliament and people, That he will ever maintain the true Protestant Religion established, the Laws of the kingdom, and the Liberty of the subject, which we do confidently believe; we do, therefore, humbly beseech you, that disputes about prerogative, and the fear of a Malignant Party, or other jealousies, may not embroil you in the greatest of evils, as are those of civil dissensions, or encouragements to act contrary to conscience; but that you would do your utmost to lay aside all distempers; and heedfully watch over the peace and safety of this kingdom, which we will join with you in our earnest prayers to preserve, and willingly adventure our lives and fortunes.”

The persons who were to have presented this Petition to the parliament, if there had not been a stop put to it, were, sir Fra. Pawlet, sir Amias Pawlet, sir Hen. Berkley, sir Ch. Berkley, sir Edw. Berkley, sir Fra. Doddington, sir Fra. Hawley, sir Sam. Gorges, and sir Rob. Philips.

The lords ordered sir F. Doddington and sir C. Berkley to be summoned to attend the house presently; and others, mentioned by the commons, to be sent for on account of this Petition.

The Lord-Keeper disavows his Voting for the Militia Ordinance.] The following Letter from the Lord-Keeper, directed to the lord Willoughby of Parham, was read in the house of lords:

“My lord; His majesty was this day pleased to shew me a letter of your lordship's unto him, wherein you have expressed that I gave my vote in the house of peers for the Ordinance touching the Militia; which he questioning, in regard he heard it otherwise related, I, thereupon, informed him the truth; which is, That I was absent from the house on making the first Ordinance, which was presented to him for his assent; and being present when the second was in agitation, I gave my vote against it; which his majesty hath commanded me to let you know, and is the occasion of this letter from Your, &c. EDW. LITTLETON. York, June 7, 1642.”

But notwithstanding the lord keeper's positive denial of his voting in favour of the Ordinance for the Militia, we find the contrary account of his conduct, as before given from lord Clarendon and Mr. Whitlocke, fully justified by the following entry in the lords Journals:—The lords ordered a committee of three to search the Journals for the truth of the matter; who immediately reported, “That the lord-keeper was present when the Petition the king concerning the Militia was agreed on that he was present, voted, and argued for the following vote, viz. ‘That, in case of extreme danger, and of his majesty's refusal, the Ordinance agreed on by both houses doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.’” Last, That he named his deputy-lieutenants, &c. agreed to the several forms of deputations for the Militia.” These particulars, signed by clerk, were ordered to be sent to lord Willoughby, and forthwith printed and published.

Mr. Hollis's Speech upon Impeaching Nine Lords at York.] June 15. A Motion was brought from the commons by Mr. B. Hollis, containing an Impeachment against Nine Lords who had written and signed a Letter from York; which he introduced the following speech: *

“My lords; By the command of the king's citizens, and burgeses of the house of commons, I come hither unto your lordships in behalf of the parliament; or rather in the behalf of the whole kingdom, labouring in much distraction, many fears, great apprehensions of evil and mischief intended against and now hatching and preparing by that malignant Party, which thirsts after the destruction of religion, laws, and liberty; all which are folded up, cherished, and preserved in the careful bosom of the parliament.—My lords, the parliament is the foundation and basis of government, and consequently of the peace and happiness of the kingdom. As it is the law by which we are ruled and governed in peace and quietness, so it preserves us in power and authority: it watches over religion, that it be not supplanted and destroyed by superstitious innovations; the truth and substance of it eaten up with formalities, pomp, and unnecessary ceremonies; the errors of Popery and Arminianism imposed upon us, as the doctrine of our church; it is opened to all licentiousness; and our liberties hereby, taken to oppress and persecute poor and conscientious men that shall oppose these proceedings, as hath been used of late. It is the conservative of the rights and liberties of the subject, and the corrective of injustice and oppression; whereby equal right is distributed to all, and every man hath that benefit and protection of justice, which is due unto him. It is that by which alone common necessities can be provided for, and public fears revented: so that I may say, not only the peace, happiness, and well-being, but the very being of this kingdom, can have no other support to stand upon but the parliament, it being the foundation upon which the whole frame of the common-wealth is built.—Therefore those who would destroy the building, apply themselves to undermine the foundation. They can take away parliaments, or but taken the power and authority of parliament, which is all one, (for if it once have no power, will soon have no being) they know then all will be at their mercy, nothing will stand in their way to oppose them; but a flood of violence will run over and cover the whole surface of the kingdom, and carry away all, the present enjoyment, and future hope of religion, liberty, and whatsoever else is precious and dear unto us.—And, accordingly, it hath ever been the policy of evil counsellors (who are the greatest enemies we have in the world, or can have) to strike at parliaments, to uproot parliaments, break parliaments, or divide parliaments, by making factions, casting diversions and obstructions, to hinder and interrupt the proceedings of parliament: all against the parliament.—Your lordships have had experience of this truth in this parliament; succession of designs upon it: first to awe it, to take away the freedom of it by the terror of an army; then to bring force against it, actually to assault it, and, with the sword, cut under this only hand, which ties and knits king and people, the people among themselves, and the whole frame of this government, one firm, and I hope indissoluble, knot of peace and unity.—God diverted those designs, and did blow upon them; presently another set upon, which was to obstruct and hinder the proceedings, that, in the mean time, the seed of rebellion might consume the kingdom of Ireland; and distempers, distractions and dissensions be fomented here at home, to tear to the bowels of this kingdom; the parliament being disabled from helping it, by occasion of so many diversions, so much business thrust out unto it, many obstructions and difficulties; especially that great one from which all must receive countenance and support, his majesty's absenting himself, and not concurring with us; thus withdrawing both his presence and influence; by which means such remedies could not be applied as were necessary; and what was done, was done with infinite trouble to the parliament, and excessive damage to the subject, double, treble, what otherwise would have served the turn: so the subject is grieved and oppressed with charge, and the blame of all is laid upon the parliament; and the parliament unjustly said to be the cause of all those evils, which the authors of them had made so great; and so confirmed and secured by the frequent interruptions of the parliament, that they could not suddenly, nor easily, be suppressed or removed.—Well, but, by God's infinite blessing, the parliament was in a fair possibility to wade through this likewise; and though the night had been black and stormy, some day began to appear: miraculously our arms have prospered in Ireland, and, God be praised, the malevolent practices of these vipers at home, as they appeared, were in some sort mastered; and the parliament began to act and operate towards the settling of the great affairs both of church and state, and providing for the defence and safety of this kingdom, against either foreign invasion, or any stirring of the disaffected party among themselves.—Then three ways are together essayed for the weakening and invalidating the proceedings and power of the parliament, and making way for the utter subversion of it. One, Force is gathered together at York, under pretence of a Guard for his majesty's person, to make an opposition against the parliament; and, by a strong hand, to support and protect delinquents, so as no order of parliament can be obeyed, but on the other side slighted and scorned; so to make the parliament of no reputation, to be but 'Imago Parliamenti,' a mere shadow, without substance, without efficacy.—Another, To send out, in his majesty's name, (and as Declarations and Messages from him) bitter invectives against the parliament to perplex it, and engage it, in the expence of time, to answer them; and besides, cunningly to insinuate and infuse into the people, by false colours and glosses, a disopinion and dislike of the parliament; and, if it be possible, to stir up their spirits to rise against it, to destroy it, (and, in it, all other parliaments) to the ruin of themselves, their wives and children.—The third Plot, is, The members are drawn away, and persuaded to forsake their duty and attendance here, and go down to York; thereby to blemish the actions of both houses, as done by a few and inconsiderable number, and rather a party than a parliament; and, perhaps, to raise and set up an anti-parliament there.—My lords, this is now the great design, whereby they hope, by little and little, the parliament shall even bleed to death, and moulder to nothing, the members dropping away, one after another; a desperate and dangerous practice, and as your lordships well observed (when you were pleased to communicate this business to us) an effect of the evil counsels now prevailing and tending to the dissolution of the parliament: of this parliament, which, under God, must be the preserver of three kingdoms, and keep them firm and loyal to their king, subject to his crown, save them from being turned into a chaos of disorder and confusion, and made a dismal spectacle of misery and desolation: this parliament, which is the last hope of the long-oppressed, and in other countries, even almost wholly destroyed, Protestant religion: this parliament, which is the only means to continue us to be a nation of freemen, and not slaves, to be owners of any thing; that we may call our wives, our children, our estates, nay our bodies our own: in a word, which must stand in the gap to prevent an inlet and inundation of all misery and confusion.—My lords, this parliament they desire to destroy; but I hope it will destroy the destroyers, and be a wall of fire to consume them as it is a wall of brass to us, to defend king and kingdom, us, and all we have.—Your lordships wisely fore-saw this mischief, and as wisely have endeavoured to prevent it, by making your Orders, to keep your members here; as that of the 9th of April, and several other Orders enjoining them all to attend; thereby restraining them from repairing to York, where the clouds were observed to gather so fast, and threaten a storm, and such preparations to be made against the parliament that it necessitated both houses to pass a vote:—That the king, seduced by wicked Counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; and all who shall serve, or assist, in such wars, are declared to be traitors, which Vote passed the 20th of May; so setting a mark upon that place, and declaring their opinion concerning those who should at this time resort thither.—Yet now, in such a conjuncture of time, when the kingdom had never more need of a parliament, and the Parliament never more need of all the help and assistance of the best endeavour and advice of every member; the safety and even the being, of the three kingdoms depending upon it; after such Orders and commands of your lordships house to the contrary; such a Vote of both houses; and expressly against their duty, being called thither by writ, under the Great Seal; which is the king's greatest and highest command, and not controulable, nor to be dispensed with, by any other command from him whatsoever; and called to treat and consult 'de arduis regni,' the great, urgent, and pressing affairs of the kingdom, never more urgent, never more pressing: notwithstanding all this, these lords, the earls of Northampton, Devonshire, Dover, and Monmouth, the lords Andover, Rich, Grey, Coventry, and Capel, have left their stations, withdrawn themselves, and are gone to York; and being summoned to appear by an Order of the 30th of May, instead of obedience, return a refusal, by a slighting and scornful Letter, which hath been so adjudged both by your lordships and the house of commons.—My lords, the house of commons hath likewise, upon the consideration and debate of this business, finding it so much to concern the safety of the kingdom and the very being of the parliament, passed this Vote:—That the Departing of these Nine Lords from the parliament, without leave, after such time as both houses had declared, That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; and their still continuing at York, notwithstanding their summons and command, is a high affront and contempt of both houses; and that the said lords, therein, did as much as in them lay, that the service of the parliament might be deserted, and are justly suspected to promote a war against the parliament.—And the house, in further prosecution of their duty in this particular, and in pursuance of their Protestation, which obliges them to endeavour to bring to condign punishment all such high offenders against not only the privileges, but the very essence of parliament, have sent me up to impeach these Lords, and desire that speedy and exemplary justice may be done upon them.—And, accordingly, I do here, in the name of the knights, citizens and burgesses of the commons house assembled in parl. and in the name of all the commons of England, impeach Spencer earl of Northampton, William earl of Devonshire, Henry earl of Dover, Henry earl of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthen, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, for these high Crimes and Misdemeanors following, viz. For that contrary to their duty, they being peers of the realm, and summoned by writ to attend the parliament; and contrary to an Order of the house of peers of the 9th of April last, and several other Orders, requiring the attendance of the members of that house; and after a Vote passed in both houses the 20th of May last, 'That the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament, and that whosoever served or assisted him in that war, was adjudged a Traitor;' did notwithstanding, afterwards, in the same month of May, contemptuously, having notice of the said Votes and Orders, withdraw themselves from the said house of peers, and repair to the city of York; where the preparations of the said war were, and yet are, in contrivance and agitation, they knowing of such preparations; and being, by an Order of the 30th May, duly summoned by the house of peers, to make their appearance before that house upon the 8th day of June instant, they refused to appear; and returned a scornful answer, by a Letter under their hands directed to the Speaker, of the lords house, and remaining there upon record. For which Crimes and Misdemeanors, to the interruption of the proceedings of parliament and great affairs of the kingdom: tending to the dissolution of the parliament, and disturbance of the peace of the kingdom; I am commanded, in the name of the said commons, to demand of your lordships, That the said lords may be forthwith put to their Answer, and receive speedy and exemplary punishment, according to their demerits: The commons saving to themselves liberty, at all times hereafter, to exhibit any other or further Impeachment or Accusation against the said Lords, or any of them.

Ordered, That the impeached Lords should have notice to answer in 16 days time. And with the houses agreed to recall their joint committee at York.

Order against printing of scandalous Pamphlets.] This day two of the Company of Stationers were sent for by the commons, and they attending accordingly, Mr. Speaker strictly enjoined them to be very careful and diligent in searching after any thing that is printed, that may reflect upon his majesty: and an Ordinance was ordered to be drawn, for preventing the printing and publishing of any scandalous or libellous Pamphlet, that may reflect upon the king or the kingdom, the parliament, or Scotland; and for the suppressing of such as have already been printed.

The Parliament's Success in executing their Ordinance for the Militia.] June 16. The Lords received intelligence from their lord-lieutenants in several counties in England, of their great success in putting the parliament's Orders concerning the Militia, in execution; and he great cheerfulness the country expressed in submitting to their commands. Many Orders were issued concerning raising men, and buying of Horses and Armour.

A Call of the H. of Commons.] This being the day appointed for a Call of the house of commons, the same was done with great strictness; when it appears, by the Journals, that 65 members, there named, were absent. It may easily be supposed that these gentlemen had all, or most of them, deserted the house, and were gone to the king at York. On this deficiency a motion being made, That those absent members, whose names were now read, should not sit in the house, till they had made their excuse to a committee appointed for it, and that excuse reported and allowed of by the house, it was carried in the affirmative by 147 voices against 91. This committee were also authorized to consider about levying the Fines of 100*l.* before imposed upon the absent members: but another motion being made, That whatsoever member should withdraw himself from the service of the house, without particular leave of the house first obtained, shall forfeit 20*l.* it was carried in the negative, by 100 against 79.

The King's Declaration to his Privy Council at York: with their Engagement, &c.] About this time the king published the following Declaration, which he had made to all the peers, and others of his privy council, at York, the 13th of this month; together with their Engagement thereupon.

"C. R. We do declare, 1. That we will not require, nor exact, any obedience from you, but what shall be warranted by the known law of the land; as we do expect that you shall not field to any commands not legally grounded, or imposed, by any other: 2. That we will defend every one of you, and all such as shall refuse any such commands, whether they proceed from Votes and Orders of both houses, or any other way, from all dangers and hazards whatsoever: 3. That we will defend the true Protestant Religion established by the law of the land, the lawful Liberties of the Subjects of England, and just Privileges of all the three estates of parliament; and shall require no further obedience from you, than as accordingly we shall perform the same: 4. That we will not (as is falsely pretended) engage you; or any of you, in any war against the parliament, except it be for our necessary defence and safety against such as do insolently invade or attempt against us; or such as shall adhere to us."

The ENGAGEMENT of the LORDS and others.

"We do engage ourselves not to obey any Orders or commands whatsoever, not warranted by the known laws of the land. We do engage ourselves to defend your majesty's person, crown, and dignity, together with your majesty's just and legal prerogative, against all persons and power whatsoever. We will defend the true Protestant Religion established by the law of the land, the lawful liberties of the subjects of England, and just privileges of your majesty and both your houses of parliament. And, lastly, we engage ourselves not to obey any Rule, Order, or Ordinance whatsoever, concerning any Militia, that hath not the royal assent.* York, June, 13, 1642."

also a Declaration of the peers, and others of his privy council, in confirmation thereof. And first

His Majesty's DECLARATION and PROFESSION.

"There having been many rumours spread, and informations given, which may have induced many to believe that we intend to make war against our parliament; we profess before God, and declare to all the world, that we always have and do abhor all such designs; and desire all our nobility and council, who are here upon the place, to declare whether they have not been witnesses of our frequent and earnest Declarations and Professions to this purpose; whether they see any colour of preparations, or counsels, that might reasonably beget a belief of any such design; and whether they be not fully persuaded that we have no such intention; but that all our endeavours (according to our many Professions) tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant religion, the just privileges of parliament, the liberty of the subject, the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom. Given at our Court at York this 15th of June, 1642."

The DECLARATION and PROFESSION of the Lords and others of his Majesty's Privy Council at York.

"We whose names are underwritten in obedience to his majesty's desire, out of the duty which we owe to his majesty's honour and to truth, being here upon the place, and witnesses of his majesty's frequent and earnest Declarations and Professions of his abhorring all designs of making war upon his parliament; and not seeing any colour of preparations, or counsels, that might reasonably beget the belief of any such design; do profess before God, and testify to all the world, That we are fully persuaded that his majesty hath no such intention; but that all his endeavours tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant religion, the just privileges of parliament, the liberty of the subject, the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom. York, June 15, 1642." Subscribed by the same lords and others, as before.

The King's Declaration disavowing his intention of making War against the Parliament. The foregoing Engagement and Testimony of the lords and counsellors were immediately printed and published, together with the following Declaration:

"Though we have, within these last 7 months, met with so many several encounters of strange and unusual Declarations, under the names of both our houses of parliament, that we should not be amazed at any new prodigy of that kind; and though their last, of the 26th of May, gave us a fair warning that, the contrivers of it having spent all their stock of bitter and reproachful language upon us, we were to expect they should now break out into some bold and disloyal actions against us: and having, by that Declaration, (as far as in them lies) divested us of that pre-eminence and authority which God, the law, the custom and consent of this nation had placed in us; and assumed it to themselves; that they should likewise, with expedition, put forth the fruits of that supreme power, for the violating and suppressing that power they despised; (an effect of which resolution their wild Declaration against our Proclamation concerning the pretended Ordinance for the Militia, and the punishing of the proclaimers appears to be) yet we must confess, in their last attempt, (we speak of the last we know, they may probably since, or at this present, have outdone that too) they have outdone what we conceive was their present intention; and whosoever hears of Propositions and Orders for bringing in of Money and Plate to maintain Horse, Horsemen, and Arms, for the preservation of the public peace, or for the defence of the king and both houses of parliament, (such is their Declaration, or what else they please to call it, of the 10th of June) will surely believe the peace of this kingdom to be extremely shaken; and, at least, the king himself to be consulted with, and privy to these Propositions: but we hope that (when our good subjects shall find, that this goodly pretence of 'the defence of the king' is but a specious bait to seduce weak and inconsiderate men into the highest acts of disobedience and disloyalty against us, and of violence and destruction upon the laws and constitutions of the kingdom) they will no longer be captivated by an implicit reverence to the name of 'both houses of parliament;' but will carefully examine and consider what number of persons are present, and what persons are prevalent in those consultations; and how the debates are probably managed, from whence such bold and monstrous conclusions do result; and will, at least, weigh the reputation, wisdom, and affection of those who are notoriously known, out of the very horror of their proceedings, to have withdrawn themselves, or, by their skill and violence, to be driven from them and their councils.—Whilst their Fears and Jealousies do arise, or were infused into the people, from discourses of the rebels in Ireland, of Skipper at Rotterdam, of forces from Denmark, France, or Spain, (how improbable and ridiculous soever that bundle of informations appeared to all wise and knowing men) it is no wonder if the easiness to deceive, and the willingness to be deceived, did prevail over many of our weak subjects to believe, that the Dangers which they did not see might proceed from causes which they did not understand; but for them to declare to all the world, 'That we intend to make war against our parliament,' (whilst we sit still, complaining to God Almighty of the injury offered to us, and to the very being of parliaments) and that we have already begun actually to levy forces both of horse and foot, (whilst we have only, in a legal way, provided a smaller Guard for the security of our own person, so near a rebellion at Hull, than they

we had, without lawful authority, above these months, upon imaginary and impossible dangers) to impose upon our people's sense, as well as their understanding, by telling them we are doing that which they see we are not doing, and intending what they all know (as such as intentions can be known) we are not intending, is a boldness agreeable to no power, at the omnipotence of those Votes, whose absolute supremacy hath almost brought confusion upon king and people; and against which no knowledge in matter of fact, or consent and authority in matter of law, they will endure all to be opposed.—We have upon all occasions, in all possible expressions, professed our fast and unshaken resolutions for peace; and we again, in the presence of Almighty God, our Father and Redeemer, assure the world, that we have no more thought of making a war against our parliament, than against our own children; that we will maintain and observe the acts, assented to by us this parliament, without violation, of which that for the frequent dissolving of parliaments is one; and that we are not, or shall not have, any thought of using any force, unless we shall be driven to it for the security of our person, and for the defence of the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom, and the just rights and privileges of parliament; and therefore we hope the Malignant Party, who have so much despised our person, and usurped our office, shall not, by irreproachable and fraudulent insinuations, prevail with our good subjects to give credit to their wicked assertions, and so to contribute their power and assistance for the ruin and destruction of us and themselves.—For our Guard against our person, (which not so much their example as their provocation forced us to use) it is known it consists of the prime gentlemen in fortune and reputation, of this county, of one regiment of our Trained Bands; who have been so far from offering any affronts, injuries, or disturbance to any of our good subjects, that their principal end is to prevent such; and so may be a security, but can be no Grievance, to our people. That some infected persons, or any persons, have been employed in other parts to raise troops under colour of our service, or have made large, or sly, offers of reward and preferment to such will come in, is (for ought we know, and as we believe) an untruth, devised by the contrivers of this false rumour; we disavow it, and are confident there will be no need of such art and industry to induce our loving subjects, when they shall see us oppressed, and their liberties and laws confounded, (and till then we shall not call on them) to come into us, and to assist.—For the Delinquents, (whom we are said to have a high and forcible hand to protect) let them be named, and their delinquency; and if they give not satisfaction to justice, when we all have received satisfaction concerning sir John Hotham, by his legal trial, then let us be used: but if the design be, (as it is well known to be,) after we have been driven by

force from our city of London, and kept by force from our town of Hull, to protect all those who are delinquents against us, and to make all those delinquents who attend on us, or execute our lawful commands, we have great reason to be satisfied in the truth and justice of such accusation; lest, to be our servant, and to be a delinquent, grow to be terms so convertible, that, in a short time, we be left as naked in attendance, as they would have us in power; and so compel us to be waited on only by such whom they shall appoint and allow, and in whose presence we should be more miserably alone, than in desolation itself.—And if the seditious contrivers and fomenters of this scandal upon us shall have (as they have had) the power to mislead the major part present of either or both houses, to make such Orders, and send such Messages and Messengers, as they have lately done, for the apprehension of the great earls and barons of England, as if they were rogues or felons; whereby persons of honour and quality are made delinquents, merely for attending upon us, and upon our Summons; whilst other men are forbid to come near us, though obliged by the duty of their places and oaths, upon our lawful commands; it is no wonder if such Messengers are not very well entreated, and such Orders not obeyed. Neither can there be a surer and cunninger way found out to render the authority of both houses scorned and vilified, than to assume to themselves, merely upon the authority of the name of Parliament, a power monstrous to all understandings; and to do actions, and to make Orders, evidently and demonstrably contrary to all known law and reason, as to take up arms against us, under colour of defending us; to cause Money to be brought in to them, and to forbid our own Money to be paid to us, or to our use, under colour that we will employ it ill; to beat us, and starve us for our own good, and by our own power and authority; which must, in short time, make the greatest court, and the greatest persons, cheap and of no estimation.—Who those sensible men are of the Public Calamities, of the Violations of the Privileges of Parliament, and the common Liberty of the Subject, who have been baffled and injured by Malignant Men and Cavaliers about us, we cannot imagine: and if those Cavaliers are so much without the fear of God and man, and so ready to commit all manner of outrage and violence, as is pretended, our government ought to be the more esteemed, which hath kept them from doing so; inasmuch as we believe no person hath cause to complain of any injury, or of any damage in the least degree, by any man about us, or who hath offered his service to us. All which being duly considered, if the contrivers of these Propositions and Orders had been truly sensible of the obligation which lies upon them, in honour, conscience, and duty, according to the high trust reposed in them by us and our people, they would not have published such a sense and apprehension of imminent

Danger; when themselves, in their consciences, know that the greatest, and indeed only, danger which threatens this church and state, the blessed religion and liberty of our people, is in their own desperate and seditious designs; and would not endeavour, upon such weak and groundless reasons, to seduce our good subjects from their affection and loyalty to us, to run themselves into actions unwarrantable, and destructive to the peace and foundation of the common-wealth. And that all our loving subjects may see how causeless and groundless this scandalous rumour and imputation of 'our raising war upon our parliament' is, we have, with this our Declaration, caused to be printed the Testimony of those lords, and other persons of our council, who are here with us; who being, upon the place, could not but discover such our intentions and preparations, and cannot be suspected, for their honours and interests, to combine in such mischievous and horrid resolutions: and therefore we straitly charge and command all our loving subjects, upon their allegiance, and as they will answer the contrary at their perils, That they yield no obedience or consent to the said Propositions and Orders; and that they presume not (under any such pretences, or by colour of any such Orders) to raise or levy any horse or men, or to bring in any money or plate to such purpose: But if, notwithstanding this clear Declaration and Evidence of our Intentions, these men (whose design it is to compel us to raise war upon our parliament, which all their skill and malice shall never be able to effect) shall think fit, by these alarms, to awaken us to a more necessary care of the defence of ourself and our people; and shall themselves, under colour of defence, in so unheard-of a manner, provide (and seduce others to do so) to offend us: having given us so lively testimony of their affections what they are willing to do, when they have once made themselves able, all our good subjects will think it necessary to look to ourself: and we do then excite all our well-affected people, according to their Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and according to their solemn vow and Protestation, (whereby they are obliged to defend our person, honour, and estate) to contribute their best assistance to the preparations necessary for the opposing and suppressing of the traitorous attempts of such wicked and malignant persons; who would destroy our person, honour, and estate, and engage the whole kingdom in a Civil War, to satisfy their own lawless fury and ambition; and so rob our good subjects of the blessed fruit of this present parliament, which they already, in some degree, have, and might still reap, (to the abundant satisfaction and joy of the whole kingdom) if such wicked hands were not ready to ruin all their possession, and frustrate all their hopes. We do therefore declare, That whosoever, of what degree or quality soever, shall then, upon so urgent and visible necessity of ours, and such an apparent distraction of the kingdom, (caused and begotten by the malice and contrivance of the malignant party) bring in to us, and our exchequer, ready Money or Plate; or shall underwrite to furnish any number of Horse, Horsemen, and Arms for the Preservation of the Public Peace, the Defence of our Person, and the Violation of the Privilege and Freedom of Parliament; we shall receive it as a most acceptable service, and as a testimony of his singular affection to the Protestant religion, the liberties, and peace of the kingdom; we shall no longer desire the continuance of the affection than we shall be ready to justify, and maintain, those with the hazard of our life. And we do further declare, That whosoever shall then bring in any sums of money or plate to assist us in this great extremity, shall receive consideration after the rate of 8 per cent. for all such Monies as he shall furnish us withal; and shall upon the payment of such money to such persons whom he shall appoint to receive the same, receive security for the same by good and lawful assurance of such of the lands, forests, parks, and houses, as shall be sufficient for the same; (more real security than the name of Public Faith given without us and against us, as if we were no part of the public) and besides we shall always look upon it as a service, most affectionately and sensibly performed, for the preservation of us and the kingdom: But we shall be much grieved that their submission to those our commands and their desisting from any such attempt raising horse or men, may ease all our good subjects of that trouble, charge and vexation."

June 17. The lords took into consideration a printed Book, published in the king's name, called 'An Answer to a Declaration of the Lords and Commons of the 26th of May last, out of which was read this clause, 'We must those ungrateful men, who dare tell their king that they may without want of modesty depose him, &c.' (p. 1329). It was ordered That a conference be held with the commons and a committee of both houses appointed draw a Declaration, by way of Answer to the said Declaration, in answer to the said particular; and that care be taken to display it through the kingdom.

Both houses agreeing, That they perceived an hourly necessity for raising an army of Horse as well as Foot; orders were issued out, and proper officers named for that purpose.

The King grants a Commission of Array. The earl of Stamford informed the lords, by letter from Leicestershire, That he had executed the parliament's Militia Ordinance in that county with great success; but that the Commission of Array was granted to the earl of Huntingdon, Devonshire, and others, to raise and pose him therein, and requiring them to train, and muster the people: that the said commission was to take place in a few days, and therefore the earl of Stamford desired the advice of parliament, what he should do if the said Commission was put in execution. A committee of both houses was immediately appointed pointed to consider how to prevent this new and dangerous project.

The King's Letter to the Citizens of London, forbidding them to lend Money to the Parliament.] June 18. The commons acquainted the lords with a Letter written by the King to the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, which was printed; and desired them to take the said Letter into consideration, and to give order that it might be suppressed, and not dispersed amongst the several companies it was required. This Letter was as follows:

"C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well; Whereas we have received several Informations of great sums of Money endeavoured to be borrowed of our city of London, in some direction proceeding from both our Houses of parliament; and likewise that great labour is used to persuade our subjects to raise Horse, and to furnish Money, upon pretence of raising a Guard for our parliament: these we to let you know, that (notwithstanding any scandalous Votes which have presumed to declare our intention of levying war against our parliament, and to lay other aspersions on us, fully disavowed by us in the presence of Almighty God, in our several Answers and Declarations) all our desires and purposes are for the public peace; and that we have not the least thought of raising or using force, except we are compelled to it for the defence of our person, and in protection of the law: and therefore we expect that you suffer not yourselves to be misled by such vain and improbable suggestions; and do declare, That if you shall lend any sums of Money towards the relief of Ireland, (to which we have contributed the assistance that could be desired of us, in which way soever the money given and raised for that purpose is disposed) or towards the payment of our Scots subjects, we shall take it for an acceptable service at your hands; but upon general pretences, contrived by a few malicious persons against the peace of the kingdom, you shall give or lend any Money, or provide or raise any Horses or Arms towards raising such a Guard, we shall look upon as the raising force against us, and to be done in malice and contempt of us and our authority.—And we do therefore straitly charge and command you to publish this our Letter to the several masters and wardens of the several Companies, that they may be assured that such Money as they shall lend, out of their good affection to the kingdom, may be lawfully employed for Ireland or Scotland, and not towards such Guards; which, in truth, are intended by the contrivers of that design, (though we believe many honest men, seduced by them, do not yet see their end) to be employed against us: and if you and they shall herein fail, punctually and severally to observe our commands, we shall not only proceed against the several Companies for deceiving the trust reposed in them, but against the particular persons, as contemners and opposers of our authority, and of the law of the land, in the most exemplary way the known law of the land shall prescribe to us; and shall be compelled to question the charter of your city, who we are willing yet to believe, (notwithstanding the barbarous and insolent demeanour of the meaner and baser sort) in a good degree to continue loyal to us. And of your obedience to these our commands, we do expect and require a full account, and of the names of such persons who shall oppose the same. Hereof fail you not, as you will answer the contrary at your peril. Given at our Court at York, June 14th, 1642."

Next follows a copy of the king's Commission of Array sent into Leicestershire.* On the reading of it the Lords passed this Vote, "That this Commission of Array for Leicestershire is against law, and against the liberty and property of the subject: and that all those that are actors in putting it in execution, shall be esteemed as disturbers of the liberty of the subject." Ordered also, 1. "That this commission of Array, with the aforesaid Votes, shall be forthwith printed and published throughout the kingdom. 2. That all those persons, except the peers, who had executed this Commission in Leicestershire, should be sent for as delinquents."

The Parliament's Answer to the King's Letter.] The same day another Declaration of the lords and commons, by way of Answer to the foregoing Letter of the King to the lord mayor and citizens of London, was read, and agreed to be printed and published in hæc verba:

"Whereas in a Paper, inscribed 'To our trusty and well-beloved the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs of the City of London, dated the 14th of June, 1642, it is affirmed, 'That great labour is used to persuade his majesty's subjects to raise Horse, and to furnish Money, upon pretence of a Guard for the parliament; but, in truth, to be employed against his majesty:' the lords and commons do declare, That the design of those Propositions is, as was formerly declared, to maintain the Protestant religion, the king's authority and person in his royal dignity, the free course of justice, the laws of the land, the peace of the kingdom, and the privileges of parliament, against any force which shall oppose them. And they do further declare, That as the forces already attending his majesty, and the preparation which his maj. is now making of arms, horse, and ordnance, within his kingdom and from without, at first coloured under the pretence of a Guard, do evidently appear to be intended for some great and extraordinary design; so they give just cause of fear and jealousy to the parliament, and do fully justify their Votes of the king's intention of levying War against the Parliament, to be altogether free from any imputation of scandal, as is injuriously cast upon them by that Paper: for,

so long as his maj. shall continue those levies and preparations, the lords and commons in parliament, having been so often threatened and reviled for their proceedings about Hull and the Militia, so necessarily undertaken for the good and peace of the kingdom, cannot be secured by his majesty's solemn Protestation alone, expressed in this and other Declarations, 'That all his desires and purposes are for the public peace, and that he hath not the least thought of using force, except he be compelled to it for the defence of his person and protection of the laws;' seeing his majesty, in a Declaration published at Heworth-Moor, doth interpret the protection of the laws in such a manner, as giveth just and full occasion to believe, that, by protecting the laws, his maj. intendeth force upon, or against, those who shall submit to the Ordinance of the Militia; and because it appears, by divers expressions of his maj. that he hath discovered an intention of making some attempt upon Hull: in both which cases they do declare, That whatsoever violence shall be used, either against those who exercise this Militia, or against Hull, they cannot but believe it as done against the parliament.—And whereas the houses have, upon loan, received great sums of Money for the service of Ireland, from the companies of the city of London, (for which they give them great and hearty Thanks) they do declare, That these sums shall be dispended, as the former have been, to that only service; notwithstanding an insinuation, laying an aspersion upon them as if they had done otherwise. Further: Whereas it is declared, to the great reproach of the parliament, 'That the sums desired towards the raising of Horse and Arms, are contrived upon general pretences, by some few factious persons,' we leave it to the world to judge how it is possible the houses should have all their members, seeing many of them are, by his majesty, summoned to York; and there, contrary to the laws of the land and privileges of parliament, detained, pay, protected, from the justice of both houses.—And, secondly, How that can possibly be called a Faction, which is done by both houses of parliament, the greatest court of England, the most faithful council his majesty hath. But at such language as this they wonder not, considering by what wicked counsel his majesty's affairs are guided, and by what malignant spirits his majesty's affections to the parliament of late have been misled.—Both houses well weighing the premises, do forbid any mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, or other officers whatsoever, to publish or spread that Paper, as they will answer their contempt to the parliament. And do assure themselves, that neither his majesty's commands, nor his threats, will withdraw or deter men, well-affected to the public, from doing their duty; in contributing such Money, Horse, and Plate, as will be necessary for the preserving the being of parliament, the peace of the kingdom, and those other ends before-mentioned, for which they are desired: the dangerous and mischievous intentions of men about his maj. being such, that whatsoever is most precious to men of conscience and honour, as religion, liberty, and public safety, are like to be overwhelmed and lost in the general confusion and calamity of the kingdom; which will not only question, but overthrow, the charter of the city of London; expose the citizens, their wives, and children, to violence and villainy; and leave the wealth of that famous city as a prey to those desperate and necessitous persons.—The lords and commons, they hope by this means those horrid evils which may be prevented, so those of the city which contribute hereunto, (whereof many so mean and base as to deserve the reproach cast on them by that Paper) and all his majesty's good subjects, may be assured that, doing their duty herein, they shall be protected and secured in their persons, liberties, estates, by the power and authority of the houses of parliament, according to their former engagements, which they will ever faithfully perform."

The King's Reply.] This Answer was sently followed by a Reply from the commons, viz.

"It seems, by a new Declaration of the 10th of June, in Answer to our Letter of the 10th of the same month, to the lord mayor of London, that the lords and commons in parliament have much more leisure than they promise, or that those persons, whom we have before described in our former Answers and Declarations, and of whom only we would be understood to speak, think such Declarations and Votes to be such irresistible engines of victory against us and the law, that no man can oppose them; and therefore, though we will not take notice from whence that came, they will vouchsafe it no other manner but a Paper, (as if found by chance) inscribed 'To our Trusty and Well beloved, &c.' it is a wonder that, since they have assumed the supreme power to themselves, they not taken upon them the supreme style, and directed this very new Declaration, 'their trusty and Well-beloved, their wise men of the city of London;' for it is too great and palpable a scorn to persuade them to take arms against our person, under colour of being loving subjects to our office; and to demand, that they may preserve the king, — are offended that we should believe, — their end of persuading our subjects to furnish Horse, and to furnish Money upon promise of a Guard for the parliament, is, in truth, to employ those horse, men, and money, against us. Let the reasons of our belief be never so plain, and their actions never so evident to all other men to believe so too, the lords and commons do declare, (think what you will, see what you can) 'That the design of the Propositions for raising Men, Horse, and Money, is to maintain the Protestant religion, the king's authority and person in his right, and the free course of justice, the law of

and, the peace of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament, against any force which shall oppose them.' And this all men are bound to believe, though they see the Protestant religion, and the professors thereof, miserably reproached, and in danger of being destroyed by a vicious and malignant party of Brownists, Anabaptists, and other Sectaries: (the principal ring-leaders of whom have too great a power, even with some members in both our Houses of parliament) our authority despised, and, as much as in them lies, taken from us, and reviled in pulpits and presses by persons immediately in their protection, and of their recommendation; our person driven away by tumults and rude multitudes, against whom we have no justice; the course of justice interrupted and stopped by Orders and Injunctions, never heard of till this parliament; the laws of the land trampled under foot, and frustrated; new laws attempted to be made, and imposed upon our subjects, without, and against, our consent; the peace of the kingdom shaken and frightened away by discountenancing the laws, as much as in them lies, the people from the rules of government or obedience, and even declaring a war against us, and the laws of the land; and, lastly, the privileges of parliament so far extended, as if, to be bare sound of privilege of parliament, the liberty and property of the subject, the dignity and certainty of the law were in such subjection, that they may first make what Orders they please, and in what cases they please; and whosoever disputes those Orders, and submits not to those Votes, breaks their privileges: and whosoever breaks their privileges is an enemy to the common-wealth, and worthy of such other attributes (either of favouring the rebellion in Ireland, or advancing the war here) as are most likely to render that person suspected or odious to the people. If, in truth, his be evidently and demonstrably the case, such Declarations will no more gain credit with, or longer mislead, our subjects, than if they should tell them, that we are personally with them in London, when all men see us here at York.—As they have 'declared,' (the best argument or evidence you are to look for) that all that they do is lawful, because they do it; so they proceed, by the same prower, to assure those who are apt to be deceived by them, 'That the force already attending us,' (they could certainly do otherwise if they did really believe such force to be about us) 'and the reparation we are making, do evidently appear to be intended for some great and extraordinary design, and do justify their former Votes of our intention of levying war against our parliament.' And they have at last given some Reasons for that Vote and Declaration: they find, by our several Declarations, that we intend force against those who shall submit to the Ordinance of the Militia, and that we intend to make an attempt upon Hull: in both which cases they are pleased to declare, 'That whatsoever violence shall be used, either against those who exercise this Militia, or against Hull, they cannot but take it as done against the parliament.' We are beholden to them that they have explained to all our good subjects the meaning of their charge against us; that by our intention of making war against our parliament, no more is pretended to be meant, but our resolution not to submit to the high injustice and indignity of the Ordinance, and the business of Hull. We have never concealed our intentions in either of those particulars; (we wish they would deal as clearly with us) but have always, and do now declare, That that pretended Ordinance is against the law of the land, against the liberty and property of the subject, destructive to sovereignty; and, therefore, not consistent with the very constitution and essence of the kingdom, nor with the right and privilege of parliament: that we are bound by our Oath, (and all our subjects are bound by theirs of allegiance and supremacy, and their own Protestation lately taken, to assist us) to oppose that Ordinance, which is already put in execution against us; not only by training and arming our subjects, but by forcibly removing the magazines from the places trusted by the counties, to their own houses, and guarding it there with armed men; whither it will be next removed, and how used by such persons, we know not. That the keeping us out of Hull, by sir John Ilotham, was an act of high treason against us; and the taking away our magazine and munition from us, was an act of violence upon us; (by what hands, or by whose direction soever it was done) and in both cases, by the help of God and the law, we will have justice, or lose our life in the requiring it; the which we do not value at that rate, as to preserve it with the infamy of suffering ourself to be robbed and spoiled of that dignity we were born to.—And if it be possible for our good subjects to believe that such a defence of ourself, with the utmost power and strength we can raise, is making a war against the parliament; we do not doubt (however it shall please God to dispose of us in that contention) but the justice of our cause will, at the last, prevail against those few malignant spirits, who, for their own ends and ambitious designs, have so misled and corrupted the understandings of our people; and that both our Houses of parliament will, in a short time, discern, by their own observation, and the information we shall speedily give them, how near this flourishing kingdom is brought to ruin and confusion by these persons.—And since neither our Declaration, nor the testimony of so many of our lords now with us, can procure credit with these men; but that they proceed to levy Horse, and to raise Money and Arms against us, we are not to be blamed, if (after so many gracious expostulations with them, upon undeniable principles of law and reason, which they answer only by 'voting' that which we say to be neither law nor reason; and so proceed actually to levy war upon us, to justify that which cannot be otherwise defended) at last we make such provision, that, as we have been driven from London, and kept from Hull, we may not be surprized at York; but be in a condition to resist and bring to justice those men, who would persuade our people that their religion is in danger, because we will not consent it shall be in their power to alter it by their Votes; or their liberty in danger, because we will allow no judge of that liberty but the known law of the land: yet whatever provision we shall be compelled to make for our security, we will be ready to lay down, as soon as they shall have revoked the Orders by which they have made levies; and submit those persons who have detained our towns, carried away our arms, and put the Militia in execution contrary to our Proclamation, to that trial of their innocence the law directs, and to which they were born.—If this be not submitted to, we shall with as good a conscience (and we believe we shall not want the affections of our good subjects to that end) proceed against those who shall presume to exercise that pretended Ordinance for the Militia, and the others who keep our town of Hull from us, as we would resist persons who came to take away our life or our crown from us. And therefore we shall again remember and require our city of London to obey our former commands, and not to be misled by the orations of those men, (who are made desperate by their fortunes, or their fortunes by them) who tell them their religion, liberty, and property is to be preserved no other way but by their disloyalty to us: That they are now at the brink of the river, and may draw their swords, when nothing pursues them but their own evil consciences. Let them examine what excellent fruits of religion the lives of those men have brought forth, and what great advancers they have been of the public liberty and property: how long they have had those opinions, that they would ruin them to defend, and how they came to those opinions: let them consider whether their estates come to them, and are settled upon them by Orders of both houses, or by that law which we defend: what security they can have to enjoy their own, when they have helped to rob us; and what a happy conclusion that war is like to have, which is raised to oppress their sovereign: that the wealth and glory of their city is not like to be destroyed any other way, but (and that way inevitably it must) by rebelling against us: nor their wives and children to be exposed to violence and villany, but by those who make their appetite and will the measure and guide to all their actions. Let them not fancy to themselves melancholic apprehensions, which are capable of no satisfaction; but let them seriously consider what security they can have, that they have not under us, or been offered by us; and whether the doctrines these men teach, and would have them defend, do not destroy the foundations upon which their security is built.—And we do, lastly, declare again, and publish to all the world, That we shall proceed against all persons whatsoever, that shall assist those levies, by furnishing Horse, Money, and Plate, as against the disturbers of the public peace, and the authors of those distractions which threaten the ruin of this kingdom."

Ordinance of Parliament for coining Plate.] How little weight the king's regard with the parliament, will appear by the following Ordinance, made and agreed to that day, by both houses: "Whereas great quantities of Plate are brought to the treasurers, appointed by both houses for the receiving Plate and Money, according to the use expressed in the Propositions; it is therefore ordered by the lords and commons in parliament That the said treasurers shall have power by virtue of this Order, to melt down the said Plate, and cause it to be forthwith coined, and shall likewise have power, from time to time, to melt down and cause to be coined all other Plate as shall, hereafter, be brought in."

Lord Paget's Reasons for leaving the Parliament and going to the King.] June 20. copy of a Letter from lord Paget was this entered in the Lords Journals, intitled, "Reasons of his departure from Parliament to the King's most Excellent Majesty at York and is in these words:

"It may seem strange that I, who, with zeal and earnestness, have prosecuted, in the beginning of this parliament, the reformation of all disorders in church and commonwealth, should now, in a time of such great distractions, desert the cause. Most true it is, my ends were the common good; and, what that was prosecuted I was ready to lay down both my life and fortune; but, when I find a preparation of arms against the king, under the shadow of loyalty, I rather resolve to obey a good conscience than particular orders, and am now on my way to his majesty, where I will throw myself down at his feet, and as a loyal subject. PAGET. June 11, 1642."

We do not find any notice taken of this letter by the lords; but the same being printed and published by one Hugh Perry, the commons ordered him to be summoned before the house; and he was afterwards committed to the Gatehouse.—We have before taken notice, That the lord Paget had not only accepted of a commission of lord lieutenant of the county of Bucks, under the Ordinance of parliament, but had also appointed his deputy lieutenants. This is confirmed by lord Clarendon with the following additional particulars: "the lord Paget, who had contributed his faculties to the parliament's service, and to the prejudice of the king's, from before the beginning of the parliament; had been one of the first to breach those bold high overtures; these men were not, at first, willing to be drawn in; had, with great pomp and solemnity, executed their Ordinance, in defiance of the king's proclamation; and had subscribed a pro-number of horses for their service, upon their propositions, than any other of the same quality; avinced in his conscience, fled from them, and besought the king's pardon: and, for the better manifesting the tenderness of his connection, and the horror he had of his former life, he frankly discovered whatsoever he had done of their counsels; and aggravated all till they had done, with declaring it to be worse to worse and more horrid ends, than any good men believed to be possible for him to propose to themselves."

The King's Answer to the Parliament's 19 propositions.] June 21. A Letter from the King, directed to the Speaker of the house of Commons, with an Answer inclosed to the Nineteen propositions from the parliament for peace, (p. 1324), was read in the house of lords, and ordered to be sent down to the commons. The Answer begins with a long recapitulation of all the arguments, before urged, in his majesty's Messages and Declarations to the parliament, which we have already printed: of these, therefore, we shall content ourselves with Lord Clarendon's Abstract; giving only a few passages at large, as are a direct Answer to the Propositions themselves.

"The king first reminded the parliament of the method they had observed in their proceedings towards him: That they had first totally suppressed the known laws of the land, and denied his power to be necessary to the making new ones, reducing the whole to their Declarations and single Votes: that they had possessed themselves of his Magazines, Treasuries, and Militia: that they had so awed his subjects with pursuivants, long chargeable attendance, heavy censures, and illegal imprisonments, that few of them durst offer to present their tenderness of his majesty's sufferings, or own just grievances, and their sense of the violations of the law (the birth-right of every subject of the kingdom) though in an humble Petition to both houses; and if any it was stifled in the birth, called Sedition, and burned by the common hangman: that they had restrained the attendance of his ordinary and necessary household servants; and added upon those small sums of money, which credit had provided to buy him bread; with actions that no money should be suffered to be conveyed, or returned to his majesty to be, or to any of his peers or servants with; so that, in effect, they had blocked him in that county: that they had filled the hearts of his people with Fears and Jealousies, though taken up upon trust) tales of Skippers, Fleets, and such like; by which alarm they might prepare them to receive such innovations, as might best advance their design, as it should be ripe. And now, it seemed, he thought his majesty sufficiently prepared for those bitter pills; that he was in a handsome posture to receive those humble desires; which probably, were intended to make way for a superfetation of a yet higher nature; for they did not tell him, This was 'all. He said, he must observe, that those Contrivers, (the better to advance their true ends in those Propositions) disguised, as much as they could; their intents with a mixture of some things really to be approved by every honest man; others, specious and popular; and some which were already granted by his majesty: all which were cunningly twisted and mixed with those other things of their main design, of ambition and private interest, in hope that, at the first view, every eye might not so clearly discern them in their proper colours.—His majesty said, if the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 9th, 10th, 15th, 16th, and 19th Demands had been writ and printed in a tongue unknown to his majesty and his people, it might have been possible that he and they might have, charitably, believed the Propositions to be such as might have been in order to the ends pretended in the Petition, to wit, 'The Establishment of his honour and safety; the welfare and security of his subjects and his dominions; the removing those jealousies and differences which were said to have unhappily fallen betwixt his majesty and his people; and procuring both his majesty and them a constant course of honour, peace, and happiness; but being read and understood by all, he could not but assure himself that that profession, joined to those Propositions, would rather appear a mockery and a scorn; the demands being such, that he were unworthy the trust reposed in him by the law, and of his descent from so many great and famous ancestors, if he could be brought to abandon that power which alone could enable him to perform what he was sworn to, in protecting his people and the laws; and so assume others into it, as to divest himself of it, although not only his present condition were more necessitous than it was, (which it could hardly be) and he were both vanquished and a prisoner; and in a worse condition than ever the most unfortunate of his predecessors had been reduced to, by the most criminal of their subjects: and though the bait laid to draw him to it, and to keep his subjects from indignation at the mention of it, the promises of a plentiful and unparalleled Revenue, were reduced from generals (which signify nothing) to clear and certain particulars; since such a bargain would have but too great a resemblance of that of Esau's if he would part with such flowers of his crown as were worth all the rest of the garland, and had been transmitted to him from so many ancestors, and had been found so useful and necessary for the welfare and security of his subjects, for any present necessity, or for any low and sordid considerations of wealth and gain: and therefore all men knowing that those accommodations are most easily made, and most exactly observed, that are grounded upon reasonable and equal conditions, his maj. had great cause to believe that the contrivers of those Propositions had no intention of settling any firm accommodation; but to increase those jealousies, and widen that division, which, not by his majesty's fault, was now unhappily fallen between him and both houses.—It was asked, 'That all the lords and others of his privy council, and such great officers and ministers of state, either at home or beyond the seas, (for, he said, care was taken to leave out no person or place, that his dishonour might be sure not to be bounded within this kingdom) should be put from his privy council, and from those offices and employments, unless they should be approved by both houses of parliament;' how faithful soever his majesty had found them to him and to the public; and how far soever they had been from offending against any law, the only rule they had, or any others ought to have, to walk by. His majesty, therefore to that part of that demand, returned this Answer, 'That he was willing to grant that they should take a larger Oath, than they themselves desired in their 11th Demand, for maintaining (not of any part, but) the whole law. And, he said, he had and did assure them, that he would be careful to make election of such persons in those places of trust, as had given good testimonies of their abilities and integrities; and against whom there could be no just cause of exception, whereon, reasonably to ground a diffidence: That if he had or should be mistaken in his election, he had and did assure them, that there was no man so near to him, in place or affection, whom he would not leave to the justice of the law; if they should bring a particular charge and sufficient proof against him: that he had given them a Triennial Parliament, (the best pledge of the effects of such a promise on his part, and the best security for the performance of their duty on theirs) the apprehension of whose justice would, in all probability, make them wary how they provoked it; and his maj. wary, how he chose such as, by the discovery of their faults, might, in any degree, seem to discredit his election: but that, without any shadow of a fault objected, only, perhaps, because they follow their consciences, and preserve the established laws; and agree not in such Votes, or assent not to such Bills, as some persons, who had then too great an Influence even upon both houses, judged, or seemed to judge, to be for the public good; and as were agreeable to that new Utopia of Religion and Government, into which they endeavoured to transform this kingdom, (for, he said, he remembered what names, and for what reasons, they left out of the bill offered him concerning the Militia, those which themselves had recommended in the Ordinance) he would never consent to the displacing of any, whom, for their former merits, and their affection to his maj. and the public, he had entrusted; since, he conceived, that to do so would take away both from the affection of his servants, and care of his servics, and the honour of his justice: and, he said, he the more wondered, that it should be asked by them, since it appears by the 11th Demand, that themselves counted it reasonable, after the present turn was served, for the judges and officers, who were then placed, might hold their places, quamdiu se bene essent: and he was resolved to be as careful of those whom he had chosen, as they were of those they would chuse; and to remove none, till they appeared to him to have otherwise behaved themselves, or should be convicted by legal proceedings, to have done so.—His majesty, said, that Demand, as unreasonable as it was, was but one link of a chain, and but the first round of that by which his majesty's just, antient, royal power was endeavoured to be fetched down to ground; for it appeared plainly, that it was with the persons now chosen, but with his majesty's chusing, that they were displeased; they demanded 'That the persons in the places and employments of those should be removed, might be approved by both houses;' which was so far from being lessening the power of nomination, that of two of which he would never grant either, he would sooner be content, that they should propose and he approve: than they approve, and he nominate; the mere nomination so far from being any thing, that if he could no more, he would never take the pains to do that; when he should only hazard what esteemed to the scorn of a refusal, if they opened not to be agreeable not only to the right, but to the passion, interest, or humour of the present major part of either house: to speak of the great factions, animosities, divisions which that power would introduce into both houses, and in the several counties, the choice of such persons to be sent to a place where that power was, and between persons that were so chosen. Neither that strange potion prescribed to him once, for the cure of a present, pressing, fatal disease; but for a diet to him and his posterity. It was demanded, 'That his counsellors, all chief officers both of law and of arms, commanders of forts and castles, and all officers hereafter made, be approved of;' that is, 'by them from time to time:' and rather than it should be ever left to the crown, (to which it only did, and should, belong) if any part were void in the intermission of parliament, the major part of the approved council was to prove them.' Neither was it only demanded that 'his majesty should quit the power which his predecessors had of appointing persons in those places;' but for counsellors, he was to be restrained as well in the number as in the persons; and a power must be given to both those places which their predecessors had. And, indeed, if that power were parted from him, it would not be fit he should be trusted with those who were to be trusted as well as himself.—He told them, to grant their demand in the manner they proposed, would be to matters that concerned the public, &c. should be resolved and transacted only in parliament : and such other matters of state, &c. by the privy council so chosen,' was, in effect, at once to depose himself and his posterity. He said, many expressions in their demands, had a greater latitude of signification than they seemed to have ; and that it concerned his majesty therefore the more that they should speak out : that both he and the people might either know the bottom of their demands, or know them to be bottomless. Nothing more concerned the public, and was indeed more proper for the high court of parliament, than the making of laws ; which not only ought there to be transacted, but could be transacted no where else. At then they must admit his majesty to be a part of the parliament ; they must not (as the sense is of that part of that demand, if it had any) deny the freedom of his Answer, when he had much right to reject what he thought unreasonable, as they had to propose what they thought convenient or necessary. Nor was it possible his Answers, either to Bills or any other Propositions, should be wholly free, if he might not use the liberty that every one of them, and every subject, took, to receive advice (without their danger who should give from any person, known or unknown, sworn or unsworn, in those matters in which the image of his vote is trusted, by the law, to his own judgment and conscience ; which how difficult to inform was, and ever should be, left to his wisdom to him. He said, he would always, with due consideration, weigh the advices both of his Great, and Privy Council ; yet he should give no more weight to their advices as advices, not commands or impositions ; upon them, as upon counsellors, not as his tutors or guardians ; and upon himself, as their king, not as their pilot or ward : for, he said, whatsoever of reality was, by the modesty of interpretation, put in his majesty in the first part of the second Demand, as to the parliament, was taken from him in the second part of the same, and reduced in that new-fangled kind of counsel ; whose power was such, and so expressed it, that in all public acts concerning the affairs of the nation, which are proper for the privy Council (for whose advice all public acts are sometimes proper, though never necessary) they were desired to be admitted joint-venturers with his majesty in the regality ; and it is not plainly expressed, whether they meant his majesty so much as a single Vote in those affairs ; but it was plain they meant him no more, at most, than a single Vote in them, and no more power than every one of the rest of his fellow-counsellors.—And so, after a sharp course and explanation of the unreasonableness of the several Demands, or the greatest part of them ; and the confusion that, by assenting thereunto, would redound to the subject in general, as well as the dishonour his majesty, he told them, 'To all those reasonable Demands, his Answer was, 'Nonius Leges Angliæ mutari ;' but renewed his promise to them for a very punctual and strict observation of the known laws established ; to which purpose he was willing an oath should be framed by them, and taken by all his privy counsellors. And for any alteration in the government of the church, that a National Synod should be called, to propose what should be found necessary or convenient : and that, for the advancement of the Protestant religion against the Papists, they had not proposed so much to his majesty as he was willing to grant, or as he had himself offered before. He concluded with conjuring them, and all men, to rest satisfied with the truth of his professions, and the reality of his intentions, and not to ask such things as they denied themselves : that they would declare against Tumults, and punish the authors : that they would allow his majesty property in his towns, arms, and goods ; and his share in the legislative power ; which would be counted in him, not only breach of privilege but tyranny, and subversion of parliaments, to deny to them : and, when they should have given him satisfaction upon those persons who had taken away the one, and recalled those Declarations (particularly that of the 26th of May, and those in the point of the Militia, his just rights wherein he would no more part with than with his crown, lest he enable others, by them, to take that from him) which would take away the other ; and declined the beginnings of a war against his majesty, under pretence of his intention of making one against them : as he had never opposed the first part of the 13th Demand, so he would be ready to concur with them in the latter ; and being then confident that the credit of those men, who desire a general combustion, would be so weakened with them, that they would not be able to do this kingdom any more hurt, he would be willing to grant his General Pardon, with such exceptions as should be thought fit ; and should receive much more joy in the hope of a full and constant happiness of his people in the true religion, and under the protection of the law by a blessed union between his majesty and his parliament, than in any such increase of his own revenue, how much soever beyond former grants, as, when his subjects were wealthiest, his parliament could have settled upon his majesty."

This circumstance is greatly exaggerated by the noble historian, as appears by the foregoing List (p. 1362), of the subscribing Peers: stands in their Journals,

The Parliament's Petition to the King, in favour of the Yorkshire Petition, which he had refused. June 25. The King's Answer to the parliament's Petition, presented to him on the 17th of this month, in favour of the Yorkshire Petition, which the king had refused to receive from the hands of sir Thomas Fairfax, at Heworth-Moor, was read. The said Answer, with the Petition that occasioned it, were as follows :

To the King's most excellent majesty ; The Humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS in Parliament assembled.

"Your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the lords and commons assembled in parliament, have lately received a Petition from a great number of the Gentry, Freeholders, and other Inhabitants of the county of York, assembled there by your majesty's command, the 3rd of June; wherein they declare unto us, 'That, having taken a resolution to address themselves unto your majesty in the humble way of a Petition, for the redress of those Grievances which they now lie under, they were violently interrupted and affronted therein by the earl of Lindsey, the lord Saville, and others; and notwithstanding all the means they could use to present their just desires to your maj. yet they could not prevail with your maj. to accept of their Petition;' the copy whereof they have sent to us, with an humble desire, that we would take such course therein as may tend to the preservation of their liberties, and the peace of the kingdom; and that we would address ourselves to your maj. in their behalf, that, by our means, their desires may find better acceptance with your majesty.—Whereupon having seriously weighed and considered the particulars of those their Complaints and Desires, as they are laid down in their Petition; and finding that the Grievances, they complain of, are the Increase of the Miseries formerly sustained by that county, (which hath, well nigh for 3 years last past, been the tragical stage of armies and war) by reason of your majesty's distance in residence, and difference in counsels, from your Great Council the Parliament, begetting great distempers and distractions throughout the kingdom, and especially in that county; the drawing to those parts great numbers of discontented persons, that may, too justly, be feared do affect the public ruin for their private advantage; the drawing together of many companies of Trained Bands, and others, both of horse and foot, of that county, and retaining multitudes of commanders and cavaliers from other parts; the daily resort of Recusants to your majesty's court at York; the great preparations of arms and other warlike provisions, to the great terror and amazement of your majesty's peaceable subjects, and causing a great decay of trade and commerce amongst them: all and every of which particulars are against the law, which your majesty hath made so many and so frequent professions to uphold and maintain:—The lords and commons finding, on the other side, their humble desires to be, 'That your majesty would hearken to your parliament, and, declining all other counsels whatsoever, unite your confidence to your parliament; and that your majesty would not divide your subjects joint duty to your majesty, the parliament and kingdom; nor destroy the essence of your Great Council and Highest Court, by subjecting the determinations and counsels thereof to the counsels and opinions of any private person whatsoever; that your majesty having passed an act that this parliament shall not be dissolved but by act of parliament, your maj. would not do any thing tending thereunto, by commanding away the lords and great officers, whose attendance is necessary thereunto: and that your majesty having expressed your confidence in the affections of that county would please to dismiss your extraordinary Guards, and the Carolina and others of that quality, who seem to have little interest or affection to the public good, their language and behaviour speaking nothing but division and war, and their advantage consisting in that which is most destructive to others.' And, lastly, 'That in such Commissions and Propositions as your majesty maketh to that county such may not be thrust upon them as men of that county, that neither by their fortune or residence are any part of it'—which their humble and most just desires being according to law, which your majesty hath often declared should be the measure and end of your government and actions: and we, your majesty's most faithful subjects, the lords, commons, fully concurring with the gentlemen and others of the county of York, in their petition, That those desires of theirs will abundantly redound to the glory of God, the honour and safety of your majesty, the good of your country, and the peace and prosperity of the kingdom, do humbly beseech your maj. graciously to hearken unto them, and to grant that and that you would join with your parliament in a speedy and effectual course, for the preservation of their liberties, and the peace of the kingdom; which duty, as we are now called upon by that county to discharge, so do stand engaged to God and man for the performance thereof, by the trust reposed in us, and by our solemn Vow and Protestation; and your majesty, together with us, stands engaged by the like obligation of trust, and of an Oath besides the many and earnest professions and Protestations which your maj. hath made for this purpose, to your whole kingdom in general, and to that county in particular; the peace and quiet of this kingdom, (as is well observed by those gentlemen and free-holders of Yorkshire in their Petition) being the only means, under God, wherein consists the preservation of the Protestant religion, the redemption of our brethren in Ireland, and the happiness and prosperity of your majesty, and of all your dominions."

The King's Answer.] The King's Answer to the foregoing Petition of both houses, was as follows:

"His majesty hath carefully weighed the matter of this Petition, presented to him at York, on Friday the 17th of June, by the lords Howard, sir Hugh Cholmley, and sir Philip Stapylton: and though he might refer the petitioners to his two last Declarations, which most of the particulars in this Petition are answered, or might refuse to give any answer at all, till he had received satisfaction in the high indignities he hath so often complained of, and demanded justice for; yet, that the world may see how desirous his maj. is to leave no act, which seems to carry the petition of both his houses of parliament, out of

least degree to reflect upon his majesty's grace and honour, unanswered, is graciously used to return this Answer:—That if the petition, mentioned to be presented to both houses of parliament, had been annexed to a now delivered to him, his majesty might have discerned the number and the quality of petitioners, which his maj. hath great reason to believe, was not in truth so considerable as is pretended; for his maj. assures you, That hath never refused any Petition so attested that would be thought to be: but his maj. remembers, That on the 3rd of June, when there was, upon his majesty's Summons, the greatest and most cheerful concourse of people that ever was beheld of one county, bearing before him at York, a gentleman, Sir Thomas Fairfax offered, in that great audience, a Petition to his majesty; which his majesty seeing to be avowed by no man but himself, and the general and universal acclamations of the people seeming to disclaim it, would not receive; conceiving it not to be of so nice a nature, as to be fit to be presented or tried in that place. And his maj. is most content (and in that must appeal to those who were then present) that whatever the substance of that Petition was, it was not contented to by any considerable number of gentlemen or freeholders of this county; but solicited by a few mean inconsiderable persons, and looked and visibly discountenanced by the body of the known gentry, clergy, and inhabitants of this whole county. And if the terms of that Petition were such as is suggested in this, his majesty hath great reason to believe it was framed and contrived (as many others of such nature have been) in London; not in Yorkshire. For sure no gentleman of quality and understanding, of this county, would talk of his great preparations of Arms, and other warlike provisions, to great terror and amazement of his peaceable subjects, when they are witnesses of the king not taking his arms from him, and stopping ways for bringing more to him: and if there be no greater terror and amazement of his majesty's peaceable subjects, in other places, by his preparations and provisions, there would be more cause to complain of a great Decay of Trade and Commerce there, than is in this county: But his maj. hath so great an assurance of his fidelity and general affections of his good subjects of this county, (which he hopes will be exemplary over his whole kingdom) that he hath great cause to believe, That they rather complain of his majesty's confidence, of his slowness; that whilst there is such favour abroad to raise Horse, and to provide Arms against his majesty, and that endeavoured in execution, his maj. trusts so much to the justice of his cause and the affections of his people; and neglects to provide strength to maintain that justice, and to protect those affected. For any affronts offered, by the earl of Arundel and the lord Saville, to those who petitioned to petition his majesty, his maj.

wishes that both his houses of parliament would have examined that information, and the credit of the informers, with that gravity and deliberation, as in cases which concern the innocence and honour of persons of such quality hath been accustomed; before they had proscribed two peers of the realm, and exposed them (as much as in them lay) to the rage and fury of the people, under the character of being enemies to the common-wealth; a brand newly found out (and of no legal signification) to incense the people by, and with which the simplicity of former times was not acquainted: and then his maj. hath some reason to believe they would have found themselves as much abused in the report concerning those lords, as he is sure they are in those which tell them of 'the Resort of great numbers of discontented persons to him,' and of the other particulars, mentioned to be in that Petition: Whereas they who observe what resort is here to his majesty, well know it to be of the prime gentlemen of all the counties in England; whom nothing but the love of Religion, the care of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, besides their affection to his person, could engage in so great journeys, trouble, and expence: Men of as precious reputation, and as exemplary lives as this nation hath any; whose assistance his maj. knows he must not expect, if he should have the least design against his honour and justice; and such witnesses his maj. desires to have of all his actions.—For 'the declining all other Counsels, and the uniting of his confidence to his parliament;' his majesty desires both houses of parliament seriously and sadly to consider, That it is not the name of a Great or Little Council that makes the results of that council just or unjust; neither can the imputation upon his majesty, of 'not being advised by his parliament,' (especially since all their actions, and all their orders are exposed to the public view) long mislead his good subjects, except in truth they see some particular sound advice, necessary to the peace and happiness of the common-wealth, disesteemed by his majesty; and such an instance, he is most assured, neither can nor shall be given: and that they will think it merit in his majesty, from the common-wealth, to reject such counsel as would persuade him to make himself none of the Three Estates; and giving up his negative voice, to allow them a power superior to that which the law hath given him. whensoever it pleaseth the major part, present, of both houses to say, 'That he doth not discharge his trust, as he ought;' and to subject his, and his subjects, unquestionable right and property to their Votes, without, and against law, upon the mere pretence of necessity. And his majesty must appeal to all the world who it is, 'that endeavours to divide the joint duty of his subjects;' his majesty, who requires nothing but their own duty, guided by the infallible rule of the law, leads them to do; or they, who, by Orders and Votes (opposite and contradictory to law, custom, precedent, and reason) so confound the affections and understandings of his good subjects, that they know not how to behave themselves, with honesty and safety; whilst their conscience will not suffer them to submit to the one, or their security to apply themselves to the other.—It is not the bare saying, 'That his majesty's actions are against the law,' (with which he is reproached in this Petition, as if he departed from his often Protestations to that purpose) must conclude him; there being no one such particular in that Petition alledged, of which his majesty is in the least degree guilty. Whether the same reverence and esteem be paid by you to the law, (except your own Votes be judges) need no other evidence than those many, very many, Orders, published in print, both concerning the church and state; those long imprisonments of several persons, without hearing them, upon general information; the great unlimited fees to your officers, worse than the imprisonment, and the arbitrary censure upon them when they are admitted to be heard: let the law be judge by whom it is violated.—For that part of the Petition which seems to accuse his majesty of a 'Purpose to dissolve this parliament,' (contrary to the act for the continuance) 'by commanding away the lords and great officers, whose attendance is necessary:' This his majesty well knows to be a new calumny, by which the grand contrivers of ruin for the state hope to seduce the minds of the people from their affection to, or into jealousy of, his majesty; as if he meant, this way, to bring this parliament (which may be the case of all parliaments) to nothing. It is not possible for his majesty more to express his affection to, and his resolution for, the freedom, liberty, and frequency of parliaments, than he hath done: and whoever considers how visible it must be to his majesty, That it is impossible for him to subsist without the affections of his people, and that those affections cannot possibly be preserved, or made use of, but by parliaments, cannot give the least credit, or have the least suspicion; that his maj. would chuse any other way to the happiness he desires for himself and his posterity, but by parliaments.—But for his calling the lords hither, or any others absenting themselves who have not been called, whoever considers the Tumults (which no Votes or Declaration can make to be no Tumults) by which his maj. was driven away, and many members of either house in danger of their lives; the demanding of the names of those lords, who would not consent to their Propositions, by a Message from the house of commons delivered at the bar by Mr. Hollis; with that most tumultuous Petition in the name of many thousands, (among many others of the same kind) directed to the house of commons, and sent up by them to the house of lords, taking notice of the prevalency of a Malignant faction which made abortive all their good motions that tended to the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom; desiring that those noble worthies of the house of peers, who concurred with them in their happy Votes, might be earnestly desired to join with that honourable house, and to sit and vote as one intire body; professing, That unless some speedy Remedy were taken for the removal of all such obstructions as hindered the happy progress of their great endeavours, their petitioners should not rest in quietness; but should be enforced to lay hold of the next Remedy which was at hand, to remove the disturbers of their peace; and (want and necessity breaking the bounds of modesty) not to leave any means unassayed for their relief: adding, that the cry of the Poor and Needy was, That such persons who were the obstacles of their peace, and hinderers of the happy proceedings of this parliament, might be forthwith publicly declared; whose removal, they conceived, would put a period to these distractions. Upon which, a great number of lords departing, the Vote, in order to the Ordinance concerning the Militia, was immediately passed; though it had been twice before put to the question, and rejected by the votes of much the major part of that house. And whoever considers the strange Orders, Votes, and Declarations which have since passed, to which whosoever would not consent, that is, with freedom and liberty of language protest against, was in danger of censure and imprisonment, will not blame our care in sending for them, or their coming, or absenting themselves from being involved in such conclusions. Neither will it be any objection, 'That they stayed they long after any Tumults were, and therefore that the Tumults drove them not away.' If every day produced Orders and Resolutions: illegal as, and indeed but the effects of, the Tumults, there was no cause to doubt the same power would be ready to prevent any opposition to those Orders after they were made, which had made way and preparation for the proposition of them; and so whosoever conceived himself in danger of future Tumults (against which there is not the least provision was driven away by those which were past. And his majesty hath more reason to wonder at those who stay behind, after all his legal power is voted from him, and all the people told, 'That he might be, with modesty and duty enough, deposed,' than any man hath: those who have been willing to withdraw themselves from the place where such desperate and dangerous positions are avowed. This his maj. doth not mention, with the least thought of lessening the power or validity of any act to which he hath given his assent this parliament: all and every of which he shall as inviolably observe, as he looks to have his own right preserved; but to shew by what means so many strange Orders have of late been made, and to shew how earnestly his maj. desires to be present with, and receive advice from, both houses of parliament, (against whom it shall never be in the power of a Malignant party to incense him) his maj. again offers his consent. That both houses may be adjourned to any

er place which may be thought convenient, are his maj. will be present, and doubts not the members of either house will make a appearance; and even the intermission, ich must attend such an adjournment, may be the least means of recovering that temper which is necessary for such debates.—And his majesty conceives to be so very necessary, that if the minds and inclinations of every member of either house were equally composed, licence is so great that the mean people out London and the suburbs have taken, it, both for the liberty and dignity of parliament, that convention, for a time, should be another place. And sure, how much soever safety and security of this kingdom depends on parliaments, it will never be thought that these parliaments must of necessity be at Westminster.—His majesty's confidence is no less in he hath expressed (and hath great cause to express) in the affections of this county; an instance of which affections all men know his Lord (which is not extraordinary) to be; and orders that such a legal Guard, at his own charge, for his person, (within 20 miles of a rebellion, and of an army in pay against him) should be objected to by those, who, for so many months, and in a place of known and blessed security, have, without and against, kept a Guard for themselves, at the charge of the common-wealth, and upon that stock of money which was given for the relief of the terrible and bleeding condition of Ireland, or the payment of the great debt due to our kingdom of Scotland.—For the resort of Papists to the court; his majesty's great care for the prevention thereof is notoriously known: That when he was informed two or three of his Irish Guard were of that religion, he gave special direction, with expressions of his displeasure, that they should be immediately dismissed; and provided that no person should stand on him, under that relation, but such as took the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; and he commanded the sheriff to proceed with severity, according to the law, against all Papists that should come within 5 miles of the Court; and if, notwithstanding this, there be any Papists near the court, (which his maj. assures you he knows not, nor hath heard, but in this Petition) he doth hereby command them to depart; and declares to all officers and ministers of justice, that they shall proceed strictly against them, according to the law, and they will answer the contrary at their perils. For the language and behaviour of the Catholics (a word, by what mistake soever it came, much in disfavour) there hath not been the least complaint here; and therefore it is probable the fault was not found in this county. Neither can his majesty imagine what is meant by the mention of 'any men thrust upon them,' such consultations and propositions as his majesty makes to this county, who are neither of their fortune or residence, any part of it; and therefore can make no Answer to it.—To conclude: his majesty assures you, he hath never refused to receive any Petition, (whether you have or not yourselves best know) and will consider what reputation it will be to you of justice or ingenuity to receive all Petitions, how senseless and scandalous soever, of one kind, under the pretence of understanding the good peoples minds and affections; and not only refuse the Petition, but punish the petitioners of another kind, under colour, That it is a crime, that they are not satisfied with your sense; as if you were only trusted by the people of one opinion, to take all pains to publish and print Petitions which agree with your wishes, though they were never presented; and to use the same industry and authority to keep those, that indeed were presented and avowed, from being published, (though by our own authority) because the argument is not pleasant to you; to pretend Impartiality and infallibility, yet to express the greatest passion and affection in the order of your proceedings, and no less error and misunderstanding in your judgments and resolutions.—He doth remember well the obligation of his trust, and of his oath; and desires that you will do so too, and your own solemn vow and Protestation; and then you will not only think it convenient, but necessary, to give his maj. a full reparation for all the scandals laid upon him, and all the scandalous positions made against him; and that it is less dishonour to retract errors, than, by avowing, to confess the malice of them; and will see this to be the surest way for the preservation of the Protestant religion, the redemption of your brethren in Ireland, the happiness and prosperity of yourselves, and all our dominions, and of the dignity and freedom of parliament."

The foregoing Petition and Answer being read, the lords resolved to desire a conference with the commons thereupon, 'Being (as it is expressed in their Journals) a matter the most dangerous and highest that ever came to them; whereby it appeared, that divers scandalous and false Informations were come to his majesty's ears, even of things within their own walls; which, because he seemed to believe and declare to the world, under his own name, it was high time for both houses to clear themselves from those calumnies, by the punishment of those false Informers, and by all other good ways that can be thought of.' This was to be the subject of the conference.—It was also ordered, "That it be referred to the committee, formerly appointed to clear the house from the Imputations laid on them in his majesty's Messages, to collect all the Falsities and Scandals contained in this and the other Messages; to set them forth in one Declaration; and to shew the several Violations of the Laws, since the professions to the contrary; yet notwithstanding to express their duty to his majesty, and their care of the peace; and to declare, that the house does intend to go on with the Propositions; and that, at the time of these sharp Messages, there is a gathering of forces together, and a design to fortify Newcastle; and to shew what necessity there is, upon these occasions, to stir up the people to their subscriptions."

The Lord Mayor, &c. censured for dispersing a Proclamation of the King.] A Proclamation of the King against levying of Horse, bringing in of Money, Plate, &c. for the use of the parliament, having been attempted to be proclaimed in London; and, by order of the lord mayor, posted up at the usual places in the city; the sword bearer, who did it, was sent for, and committed to the fleet. The lord mayor and sheriffs were also ordered to attend the house the next day: but the lord mayor, at his appearance, averring, That he was bound by his oath, to execute any writs from the king, he was told by the Speaker, in the name of the house, 'That he was not bound, by any oath, to execute any writ against law; and that they required him not to publish any thing of that kind, before he had acquainted the parliament therewith; as he would answer the contrary at his peril.'

Debate on the Nineteen Propositions.] June 27. The commons took into consideration their 19 Propositions to the king for peace, and his Answer to them: and, in a full house, it was resolved, 1. 'That the house should not insist upon naming the lord high steward of England, mentioned in the third Proposition.' 2. 'That the house shall insist upon the lord chancellor, or lord keeper of the great seal, to be always chosen with the approbation of both houses of parliament.' The like Resolutions were separately made on the parliament's nomination of the lord treasurer, lord admiral, lord chief governor of Ireland, master of the wards, the two chief justices and the chief baron; but they gave up to the king the election of the lord privy-seal, the earl marshal, warden of the Cinque-Ports, chancellor of the Exchequer, and the two secretaries of state.

Informations from Newcastle.] July 1. At a conference the commons communicated an abstract of some Letters they had received from Newcastle, dated the 22d and 28th of June, which were as follows.

"We fear a storm, and we see it already begun. The earl of Newcastle came here on Friday last, to be governor of Newcastle. He hath taken up a great many soldiers and our town is now guarded. Capt. Legge is there with a great many debauched commanders; and drums go about for all soldiers that will serve the king and parliament, as they say; they refuse none, whatsoever condition they be of: 300 soldiers are sent down to Tynmouth castle to guard it; and they have all arms given them out of the magazine here in this town: there are great guns going down to them, six pieces: they are casting up trenches as fast as may be: there is a fort making at the Haven Mouth, that no ships can go in or out without their leave. We never lived in the like fear, which now we live in. The earl of Newcastle, who is lord-lieutenant, hath forced all his tenants to take up arms; and there is many of sir Wm. Widdrington's own tenants have taken arms. Sir Wm. is now in parliament; but his chief steward brought them in. I was down at Shields and saw the trenches myself. Yesterday all the constables in this town were commanded to go through their several wards, and take notice what arms are in them, and to give a list to the lord-lieutenant. They have got engineers out of Germany, and gunners for their great guns. The earl of Newcastle came hither last week, and, in his way, sent out a warrant to the sheriff and other officers of the county of Durham, to send here 100 horse, and 500 foot with their officers. They are come in, of the earl's and sir Wm. Widdrington's tenants, about 200, and have the arms much against their wills. At Durham the drum beat up, they said, for the king; but since they came here, it is struck up for the king and parliament. The earl is making forts at Shields. There is divers of the ordinance removed to the key-side to be shot down. There is here an expectation of a declaration from parliament to countermand them; and if speedy course were yet taken, might reduce all that is done."

Upon this both houses came to the following Resolutions: "First, was represented the inconveniences and danger, by bringing of soldiers into Newcastle; as, That it was as a receptacle for foreign forces. A receptacle also, for such ill-affected persons as might pair thither out of the south parts of Scotland. They would have the power of raising the trade of sea-coal, and enhancing the price, having the entire command over the coast. The well-affected people there would be much discouraged, as they had been too much already, by putting in these forces; and Papists, thereabouts, would be much encouraged, wherewith Northumberland and the bishoprick do much abound; and the party of malignant clergy, which is strong there also, would be ready to join with them. Lastly, The fear of begetting a jealousy between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and breaking the Pacification. Next, For the illegality of the proceeding: it was done by a Warrant from the earl of Newcastle, to the sheriff, deputy lieutenants, &c. of the bishoprick of Durham, reciting a Warrant of his majesty's, who had made him lord-lieut. of the counties of Northumberland and Durham, and governor of Newcastle, and giving him power to place a garrison there. This was illegal, because such commissions of lieutenancy, &c. were declared to be against law. The drawing of armed men, out of one county into another, by any Warrant, as this was, is also against law. The Remedy proposed for this, was, first, To set out a Declaration against the illegal proceeding. Next, To command the inhabitants of the counties of Durham and Northumberland, not to suffer such forces to be put out of their counties; nor to send any into Newcastle; with an inhibition to the inhabitants of that place to receive any."

no of the king's ships should be sent to guard a mouth of the Tyne, and to receive and secure, from time to time, the directions of parliament, for the preservation of that place, and prevent the inconveniences that may happen from the new built fort."

The king's Commission of Array having been proclaimed and published in London, it was ordered, That the lord mayor, the sheriffs, the mace-bearer, and all other officers that had any hand in this Proclamation, should attend the house the next morning: and a declaration of parliament having been framed, the commons, against the said commission, was agreed to by the lords, and ordered to be forthwith printed and published. An Ordinance was made to constitute Robert earl of Warwick commander in chief over all the Fleet, &c. at sea, with a full commission to remove and displace all officers whatsoever, &c. instead of the earl of Northumberland; who is therestyled a person of known integrity and honour, whom the kingdom might safely confide in, but lately discharged, by the king, from being lord high admiral of England.

Orders, &c. relating to the command of the Fleet.] July 4. At a conference of both houses, a Letter sent from the king to the earl of Warwick was read, importing, "That whereas his majesty had discharged the earl of Northumberland from being lord high admiral of his Fleet, this was to charge the said earl, his allegiance, and as he tendered the peace of the kingdom, to give over and relinquish the command he had, or pretended to have, in any of the king's ships; since it was notoriously known, that, by the laws of the land, it was less than high treason, for any person whatever, to detain any of his majesty's ships contrary to his commands."—Then a List was read of such officers, as at a council of war, on board the James, agreed to obey the commands of parliament, and the earl of Warwick's commands, to the number of ten captains and six masters: but sir John Mennes, Robert Slingsby, capt. John Burley, capt. Fogg, and capt. Baldwin Wake, sent letters of them to the earl, which letters were read in the house, declaring, "That they had received Injunctions from the king, and therefore they could not obey his commands," which they were ordered, by the house, to send for as delinquents; and that, if they refused to come, the earl was desired to cause them to be apprehended, and to place persons of trust in their room.

Persons punished for aspersing the Parliament.] Many persons were, at this time, summoned as delinquents by each house for disrespectful words used against particular members, the proceedings of parliament, and punished by fine and imprisonment. Two were tried this day at the lords bar; one of them, Mr. Winbank, for saying, "That Mr. Pym had been a Bribe of 30*l.* sitting in the chair in the last Term: that he had as many sugar roses given for bribes, as he had sold for 6 or 700*l.* and that before he was a parliament-man he was worth little; but he had now cozened the king of as much money, as he had bought a good estate, and given 10,000*l.* of the king's money, to the marriage of his daughter."

Orders against publishing the King's Declarations, &c.] July 5. Both houses agreed in publishing an Order, "That whereas several Proclamations, Declarations, and Papers in forms of Proclamations, had issued out in his majesty's name, commanding all parsons, vicars, curates, sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, and other officers, to publish and proclaim the same, contrary to law and divers Orders, Ordinances, and Declarations of parliament; and much to the scandal and derogation of it, &c. This was to inhibit all such parsons, and other officers, from doing the same; and those that refused in that manner, should be protected by the power and authority of both houses of parliament."

The Lord Mayor impeached.] This day the commons sent up serjeant Wyld, with an Impeachment against sir Rd. Gurney, lord mayor of London, importing, "That the said sir Richard, on or about the last day of June, 1642, being then lord mayor of London, in several places of the said city, unlawfully and maliciously caused a Proclamation to be made for the putting in execution the Commission of Array; tending to the raising of forces against the parliament, and to the subversion of the laws and peace of this kingdom: for the which the house of commons did impeach the said sir Richard in their names, and of all the commons of England, of high Crimes and Misdemeanours; and they desire that he may be called to a speedy Answer, in the presence of the commons."—"The lord mayor, being at the bar, was asked for his Answer, who confessed, "That he caused the said Proclamation to be published." And being again asked, Whether he would justify and stand by his Answer, or not? He said, "That he desired counsel to advise him in that, and some time to answer." Whereupon counsel was allowed him; and that he should put in his Answer, personally, on the 8th instant.

Advice of the King's intending to besiege Hull.] July 6. Mr. Marten reported, from the committee appointed to consider of the defence of the kingdom, That col. Wilnot, sir Hugh Pollard, and sir John Berkley, were lauded with 14 pieces of brass ordnance, and are making fortifications near Hull: that the lord Willoughby and sir Tho. Glemham are come with 200 horse upon the Humber-side, in Lincolnshire: that the king came to Beverley on the 4th instant, in the morning, intending to sit down before Hull the next day: that his majesty had, by Proclamation, forbid any provisions to be sent into that town, on pain of death; and had cut off the fresh-water river that comes to Hull, and diverted the stream another way: but that (God be thanked) sir John Hotham had drowned the country two miles round the town, so that no near approach could be made.

This day it was resolved by both houses, 1. * That 10,000 foot be raised, 5000 out of the liberty of London, and 5000 out of the counties adjacent: to form them into regiments and companies, and place officers over them: to keep the officers in continual pay, and pay the common soldiers every day that they were trained. Drums were likewise ordered to beat up for soldiers, in and about the city, with all expedition. 2. That all such horses as are brought in, by the lords and commons and others, on the Propositions, shall be mustered in Tottil-Fields, on Saturday next: and that 500 men shall be sent from hence by sea, to Hull."

Impeachment of Mr. Hastings and others, for executing the King's Commission of Array. July 8. The commons at a conference, delivered to the lords an Impeachment against Henry Hastings, esq. second son to the earl of Huntingdon, sir Rd. Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, esq. for High Crimes and Misdemeanors; in which Impeachment the commons desired the lords to use all expedition. A copy of which Articles were as follows:

"Whereas, by order and command of the lords and commons in parliament, for the safety and defence of the county of Leicester, the Magazine of the said county was delivered into the hands of Henry earl of Stamford; who, in June 1642, removed a great part thereof to his dwelling-house called Broadgate, in the said county, for the more safety and security thereof: And whereas, in the said month of June, several Warrants issued out, by order of both houses of parliament; the one directed to the gentleman usher of the house of peers, his deputy or deputies; the other, to the serjeant at arms attending on this house, his deputy or deputies, for the apprehending of the said Henry Hastings, sir Rd. Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, for High Crimes and Misdemeanors by them committed against the said houses of parliament, to answer the same before the said houses: He the said Henry Hastings, sir Rd. Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, well knowing the premises; and the said sir Rd. Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, being then, and yet, Justices of the Peace of the said county, in or about the 22nd day of the said month of June, wickedly and maliciously and without warrant of law, did raise and draw out of the several counties of Derby, Lincoln, and Leicester, forces of horse and foot to the number of 300 persons, or thereabouts, some of them being colliers, and other men and desperate persons, and many of them Papists, and them unlawfully assembled at Loughborough in the said county of Leicester; where the said Henry Hastings, the day aforesaid, made proclamation, 'That if any persons, affected to that service, wanted arms, and would repair to that town, they should be furnished therewith.' And they the said Henry Hastings,

&c. together with the said other persons so assembled, being armed with swords and pikes; and with pistols, muskets, and carbines, many charged with powder and bullets, and other habiliments of war, marched along in a warlike manner; with drums beating, colours flying, and their matches lighted, to the great terror and affrightment of his majesty's subjects, some miles within the said county of Leicester, to the town of Leicester, and so through the said town, with great noise and shouting, to a certain place near the said town called Horse-Fair Lease; to the intent to keep themselves from being arrested by the said officers of the houses of parliament; and in case they should be so arrested, then to rescue themselves by force: and to the intent likewise to take the said Magazine by force and arms, and kill and destroy the said earl of Stamford, the said Henry Hastings, and some other of his said accomplices, giving out 'That they would fetch away the said Magazine with vengeance; and that they would have the earl's life before they left; and would fire his house and have his heart's blood out,' with divers other such-like desperate speeches.—The said Henry Hastings, &c. with the rest of their said confederates, being so assembled at the said Horse-Fair Lease, John Chambers, James Stamford, being authorized thereunto by a Deputation under the hand of the said aforesaid, together with Archdale Palmer, then high sheriff of the said county of Leicester, and divers other persons in their aid and assistance, repaired to the said place to execute the said Warrants from both houses of parliament; and the said Henry Hastings well knowing thereof, did then tell the said Chamberlain 'That he knew he had Warrants from parliament as well for others as for himself, whereupon the said Chambers produced the said Warrants, and read them openly in hearing of the said Henry Hastings, &c. to his obedience to the said Warrants; which he refused to do; but, instead thereof, they, other their said adherents, did violently assault the said high sheriff, Chambers, and Stamford, and rode upon them with their horses; one of the said confederates, named Mr. Walter Hastings, with his pistol charged, gave upon the said Chambers; and some other of them drew out their pistols, and presented muskets upon the said high sheriff and Chambers, using other force and violence upon them to the great danger of their lives: and the said Henry Hastings, &c. by force and arms, in a warlike manner, at the time and place aforesaid, rescued themselves from the said chamberlain and high sheriff, in contempt of justice, to the high affront and scorn of the parliament, and afterwards marched back again, in a warlike manner, into the said town of Leicester; all which doings of the said Henry Hastings, &c. were, and are, contrary to the laws of this realm, the rights and privileges of parliament, tending to sedition, and to the danger and effusion of much blood: wherefore and commons do, in the name of themselves and of all the commons of England, impeach and say Henry Hastings, &c. of the said several high crimes and misdemeanors.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves now, and at all times hereafter, the liberty of exhibiting of any other accusation or impeachment against the said Henry Hastings, Rd. Halford, sir John Bale, and John Pate, any of them; and of replying to the Answers they shall make; or of offering any sort of the premises, or any of them; or of any other Accusation or Impeachment against him or any of them, as the case, according to the course of justice, shall require; do pray that the said Henry Hastings, &c. and every of them, may be forthwith put to answer the issues in presence of the commons; and at such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be upon them, and every them, had and used, as shall be agreeable to law and justice.”

Ordered, That the aforesaid gentlemen should appear before the house, at a time prefixed, to answer the Impeachment read, and to put in their answers to it.

The Lord Mayor's Answer to his Impeachment.] This being the day appointed for the Lord Mayor to make Answer to his Charge, he was called to the bar, as a delinquent, where he delivered in the following Answer:—"The humble Answer of sir Richard Gurney, knight. This defendant, saving to himself all benefit of exceptions to the Impeachment against him exhibited by the honourable house of commons, saith, That he, this Defendant, not guilty of all or any of the Crimes and misdemeanors, in and by the said Impeachment against him charged. R. GURNEY."

The Parliament resolve to raise 10,000 Volunteers in London.] July 9. The lords agreed several Propositions, from the commons, to be presented to the citizens in common council, for raising 10,000 Volunteers with all speed, and regulating the proportion of pay for horse and foot in their service. The first of these Propositions, for raising 10,000 Volunteers, was put to the question in the commons, and carried affirmatively by a majority of 125 against 45.

A further Impeachment against the Lord Mayor.] July 11. At a conference the commons exhibited, to the lords, a further Impeachment against the Lord Mayor; which being afterwards read to him at the bar, he desired more time might be given him to answer by himself. And being asked, Why he refused, at the last common council, to put the question respecting the Magazine that came from Hull, to the city; according to order of both houses, he protested against it? The lord mayor answered, He thought not fit to lay so much disorder in the city, being dangerous; there being much there already, and more they cannot find room for. Afterwards he withdrew, when it was resolved, "That the lord mayor of London, for his contempt to this house, shall be committed to the Tower; and that the lieutenant there shall take care to keep him in safe custody, as he will answer it at his peril." A further day was ordered for his trial.

The Parliament's Narrative of the Proceedings of the King's evil Counsellors.] A Declaration of Parliament was this day agreed on by both houses, to be sent down into the North; as follows:

"It cannot be unknown to the world, how powerful and active the wicked Counsellors about his majesty have been, both before and since this parliament, in seeking to destroy and extinguish the true Protestant Religion, Liberty, and Laws of the kingdom; and that, after many traiterous endeavours against the parliament, by God's providence discovered and frustrated, they drew his majesty into the Northern parts; and, in his name, did publish divers false scandals and ignominious reproaches against the lords and commons; making his majesty's court a sanctuary for all kind of delinquents against the justice and privilege of parliament; and drawing to York, by letters and other means, divers members of both houses; and setting up there a counterfeit imaginary visage of a great council of the peers, in opposition to the parliament; to the great danger, not only of the disturbance, but even of the subversion, of the original constitution and frame of this kingdom.—And, that the way to the great change in Religion and Government intended might be made more easy and passable, many of those, who have shewed themselves faithful to the cause of God and the kingdom, either in parliament or in the country, are put out of the commission of peace and other public employments. The sheriff of Leicester (labouring to keep the peace when Mr. Henry Hastings marched from Loughborough into Leicester, with about 200 foot and 100 horse, of which many were drawn out of Derbyshire, armed, in a warlike manner, with pistols, pikes, and muskets, their drums beating and colours flying, intending to seize upon the Magazine of the county) was, for his good service, put out of his office; and Mr. Hastings, the person who committed this outrage, made sheriff in his place; divers great lords, his majesty's servants, in places of nearness and trust, persons of high honour, merit, and abilities, as the earls of Pembroke, Essex, and Holland, and the lord Fildring, displaced for no other cause but discharging their conscience in parliament; besides divers members of the house of commons, one of which hath long served his majesty in places of honour, and had always been in great favour and esteem till he faithfully discharged his duty in parliament: and, last of all, the earl of Northumberland put from the place of high admiral; a man so eminent in all qualifications of honour and sufficiency, so necessary for the state at this time, when so many ships are at the sea, and the kingdom in so much trouble and distraction, that there can hardly be named a more mischievous effect of wicked counsel, or dangerous preparatives to future confusions, than the bereaving the state of the service of so noble and virtuous a person as he is.—The consideration whereof enforceth both houses to declare, That they cannot think the kingdom in safety, nor themselves to have discharged the trust that lies upon them, till they have done their uttermost, by all fit ways, to procure that office to be restored; whereby the command of the ships, which are the walls of the kingdom, may again be settled in the charge of that noble lord.—In the midst of these unjust and destructive courses, to blind the eyes of the multitude, and disguise their malicious and cruel intentions under the semblance of peace and justice, they have drawn his maj. to make divers solemn Protestations, with fearful imprecations upon himself, and invocations of God's holy name, 'That he intendeth nothing but the welfare of his people; the maintenance of Religion and the Laws of the kingdom; and, for his own security, only to raise a Guard for his person: and that he did, from his soul, abhor the thought of making war against the parliament, or to put the kingdom into a combustion: But having, under this colour, kept about him divers soldiers and officers and gathered some strength, the intentions do now appear with a more open face, by these his majesty's ensuing actions and proceedings; which the lords and commons have thought good to publish, that all the subjects of the kingdom may understand what dangers and miseries are coming upon them, if not timely prevented.—A Garrison of soldiers is, by his majesty's order put into Newcastle, under the command of the earl of Newcastle; who should have formerly seized upon Hull, if, by the wisdom of the parliament, he had not been prevented. The Papists in Cheshire have lately in a very peremptory manner, and in his majesty's name, demanded their arms, taken from them by direction of both houses of parliament, to be again restored to them.—The earl Rivers, lately a notorious professed Papist, and still suspect to be a Papist, although he now comes to church as many other dangerous Papists do, on purpose, as is conceived, to make themselves capable of employment, is put into the Commission of Array, being against law and the liberty of the subject; which he hath executed with rigour, and hath committed divers persons to prison for refusing to submit thereunto, contrary to law and the Petition of Right.—The mouth of the river Tyne is fortified, whereby the whole trade of Newcastle for coal, or otherwise, will be subject to be interrupted whenever his maj. shall please; and the city of London, and many other parts of the kingdom, exceedingly burdened and distressed.—A ship laden with cannon for battery, and other lesser ordnance, powder, and ammunition is come into the river Humber, which also hath brought divers commanders from foreign parts; and in this ship, we are credibly informed, were Mr. Henry Wilmot, sir John Berkley, and sir Hugh Pollard, three of those who are charged in parliament for being pry to the design of bringing up the army; and, amongst others, the lord Digby, a person accused in parliament of high treason; who, when he began to be questioned, fled out of the kingdom; and advised his majesty, by letter, to that course which he hath since pursued, of withdrawing himself from his parliament to a place of strength: and that then he intended to come to him, and in the mean time would do him service abroad.—Divers other large preparations of warlike provisions are made beyond the seas, and shortly expected; besides great numbers of gentlemen, horses, and arms drawing from all parts of the kingdom, and all the gentlemen in Yorkshire request to bring in their horses for his majesty's service; sundry commissions are granted for raising horses, and divers officers of the army are already appointed. Upon Monday morning the 4th of July, his maj. came to Boscley with an army of a considerable number of horse and foot, some regiments of the Train Bands being likewise commanded to be raised. Amongst the soldiers in this army there are divers Papists, and other persons of desperate fortune and condition, ready to execute violence, rapine, and oppression.—Some troops of horse are sent into Lincolnshire, to the great terror of the well-affected people; who are thereby forced either to forsake their dwellings, or keep them with armed men: they begin to be ready to take away men's horses by force, and commit other acts of hostility; and have civilly used the gentlemen sent from the parliament with a Letter to his majesty. Provins are restrained from coming to Hull, and his majesty is shortly expected to come thither with his army; notwithstanding the place is in the custody of the parliament, as hath been often declared to his majesty by both houses, and kept by them for his service and the peace of the kingdom, whereof as soon as they are assured, they intend to leave the town in that state it was.—The War being thus begun to his majesty, the lords and commons in parliament hold themselves bound in conscience to raise forces for the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, and protection of the subjects, their persons and estates according to the defence and security of parliament, and all those who have been employed by them in any public service for these ends; and, through God's blessing, to disappoint the designs and expectations of those who have drawn him into these courses and counsels, in favour of Papists at home, the rebels in Ireland, and the foreign enemies of our religion and peace. In the opposing of all which they desire the concurrence of the well-disposed subjects of the kingdom; and shall manifest, by their countenance and endeavours, that they are carried by no respects but of the public good, which they will always prefer before their own lives and fortunes, and shall ever be most earnest, in their counsels and endeavours, to prevent a Civil War, and see miserable effects it must needs produce, they may be avoided, without endangering a alteration of religion; which is the main end of those who have been the authors and unsellers of his majesty's undertaking this war, and will necessarily draw with it a loss of liberty, and subversion of the law of the kingdom; so that it rests only that the free-born English nation to consider whether they will here to the king and his parliament, by which they have so long enjoyed all that is dear unto them; or to the king, seduced by Jesuitical insinuations and cavaliers, who have designed all slavery and confusion; which, by God's blessing and our joint endeavours, may be time-prevented."

The Parliament's Declaration against the king's compelling the Attendance of his Subjects.] July 12. A third Declaration was used by both houses, in these words:

'The lords and commons declare, That it is just the laws and liberties of the kingdom, that any of the subjects thereof should be compelled by the king to attend him at his pleasure; but such as are bound thereto by special licence; and if any messenger or officer shall, in colour of any command from his majesty, or warrant under his majesty's hand, arrest, take, carry away any of his majesty's subjects, to any place whatsoever, contrary to their wills, it is both against the laws of the land, the liberty of the subject, and tends to the disturbance of the public peace of this kingdom; any subjects, so arrested, may lawfully refuse to obey such arrests and commands."

The Parliament resolve to raise an Army, to petition the King for an Accommodation.

] Mr. Hollis brought up a message from commons, with some votes; which, he said, passed their house with much joy; and in which they doubted not of the lords concurrence with the same cheerfulness. The Votes were these: Resolved, 1. "That an Army shall be forthwith raised for the safety of the king's person, the defence of both houses of parliament, and of those who have obeyed their orders and commands; and for the preservation of the true religion, the laws, liberties, and rights of the kingdom, 2. That the earl of Essex be named general thereof. 3. That a motion shall be forthwith prepared, to move the king to a good accord with the parliament, to prevent a Civil War. 4. That this motion doth declare, That, in this cause, for the safety of the king's person and the defence of both houses of parliament, and of those who obeyed their orders and commands, &c. we will live and die with the earl of Essex, in which they have nominated general in this motion."—Next, a draught of the Petition to the king, for peace, was read; in which they agreed with the commons, as also in all foregoing Votes: and the earl of Holland, John Holland, and sir Philip Stapylton, were appointed to carry the Petition to the king at York.—Then the Speaker of the house of commons acquainted the earl of Essex, That that house had agreed in the desires of the commons, and had approved of his lordship to be general. Hereupon the earl gave their lordships thanks; professing his integrity and loyalty to the king to be as much as any; and that he would live and die with their lordships in this cause.

Further Proceedings in the Lord Mayor's Trial.] July 13. Both houses having been at some trouble to get any alderman of London to act for the lord mayor during his Imprisonment, several of them having absolutely refused it, as not consistent with their oath to the city: it was ordered, That the lord mayor be commanded to depute some person to be locum-tenens, for the government of the city of London, and calling of common councils. On the 14th sir John Conyers, lieutenant of the Tower, who was ordered to deliver the foregoing message, acquainted the lords, that the lord mayor said, He had no power to appoint a deputy for the government of the city, during his absence. Hereupon the lords ordered, That sir George Whitmore, knight and alderman, in the absence of the lord mayor, do cause a court of aldermen to be summoned, to meet at Guildhall the next day; and they, so summoned, are strictly enjoined to appear accordingly; then to make choice of a locum-tenens, or to consider of what other way will be according to the custom and charters of the city, for the safety and good government thereof; and to give account of their proceedings therein to the said lords in parliament, on the 16th instant.

Both houses concurred in an Order to the messengers appointed to present their last Petition, for peace, to the king, to acquaint his majesty, That since the framing and preparing of that Petition, they have received from him a Message, concerning the delivering up of Hull; to which they conceive that Petition gives a full Answer, and therefore had resolved not to return any other: but Mr. Rushworth informs us, "That, lest the king should think it a dilatoriness in the parliament to return an Answer, the two houses sent him post to Beverley: to acquaint his majesty, that the earl of Holland, sir John Holland, and sir Philip Stapylton, were coming down with a Petition of both houses, in Answer to his majesty's said Message."

July 15. A commission for constituting the earl of Essex Captain-General, &c. was read. Upon putting the question, Whether the lords should agree to the Ordinance for this commission? The earl of Portland was the only peer then in the house that dissented.

Speeches against a Civil War.] But these Votes for a speedy Armament, &c. were not carried in the house of commons without much debate. Mr. Whitlocks has given us a Speech of his own against them. There is likewise another of sir Benj. Rudyard's, on the same occasion, yet preserved. And first

Mr. Whitlocke said, 'Mr. Speaker; The question which was last propounded, about raising Forces, naming a General and Officers, of an army, hath been very rare, before this time, in this assembly; and it seems to me to set us at the pit's brink, ready to plunge ourselves into an ocean of troubles and miseries; and, if that could be, into more than a Civil War brings with it. Give me leave, sir, to consider this unhappy subject, in the beginning, progress, and issue of it. Cæsar tells us, and he knew as much of Civil War as any man before him, that it cannot be begun sine malis artibus. Surely, sir, our enemies of the Popish church have left no evil arts un essayed to bring us to our present posture, and will yet leave none unattempted to make our breaches wider; well knowing that nothing will more advance their empire than our divisions. Our misery, whom they account heretics, is their joy, our distractions will be their glory, and all evil arts and ways to bring calamities upon us, they will esteem meritorious.—But, sir, I look upon another beginning of our Civil War. God blessed us with a long and flourishing peace, and we turned his grace into wantonness, and peace would not satisfy us without luxury, nor our plenty without debauchery; instead of sobriety and thankfulness for our mercies, we provoked the Giver of them by our sins and wickedness, to punish us, as we may fear, by a Civil War, to make us executioners of Divine vengeance upon ourselves. It is strange to note how we have insensibly slid into this beginning of a Civil War, by one unexpected accident after another, as waves of the sea, which hath brought us thus far, and we scarce know how; but, from paper combats, by Declarations, Remonstrances, Protestations, Votes, Messages, Answers, and Replies, we are now come to the question of raising Forces, and naming a General and Officers of an Army.—But what, sir, may be the progress hereof, the poet tells you:

Juq; datum sceleris animum, populumq;
potentem

In sua victrici conversum viscera dextra:
'We must surrender up our laws, liberties, properties, and lives, into the hands of insolent mercenaries, whose rage and violence will command us and all we have. Reason, honour, and justice will leave our land; the ignoble will rule the noble; baseness will be preferred before virtue, and profaneness before piety. Of a potent people we shall make ourselves weak, and be the instruments of our own ruin; 'Perditio tua ex te' will be said to us: we shall burn our own houses, lay waste our own fields, pillage our own goods, open our own veins, and eat our own bowels. You will hear other sounds besides those of drums and trumpets; the clattering of armour, the roaring of guns, the groans of wounded and dying men, the shrieks of deflowered women, the cries of widows and orphans; and all on your account, which makes it the more to be lamented.—Pardon, sir, the warmth of my expression on this argument; it is to prevent a flame which I see kindled in the midst of us, that may consume us to ashes. The sum of the progress of Civil War, is the rage of fire and sword; and, which is worse, of brutish men.—What the issue of it will be, no man alive can tell: probably few of us now here may live to see the end of it. It hath been said, That he that draws his sword against his prince, must throw away the scabbard. Those differences are scarce to be reconciled. These commotions are like the deep seas, which being once stirred, are not soon appeased.—I wish the observation of the duke de Rohan, in his 'Interest of Christendom,' may prove a caution, not a prophecy; he saith of England, 'That it is a great creature, which cannot be destroyed but by its own hand:' and there is not a more likely manner than that of Civil War to do it. The issue of all war is like a cast at dice, none can tell upon what square the Alia Belli will light; the best issue that can be expected of a civil war, is, 'ubi victor flet, & victus perit.' Which of these will be our portion is uncertain, and the choice should be avoided.—Yet, sir, what I have said this, I am not for a tame resignation of our Religion, Lives, and Liberties into the hands of our adversaries, who seek to devour us; nor do I think it inconsistent with your great wisdom, to prepare for a just necessary defence of them. It was truly observed by a noble gentleman, That, if our enemies find us provided to resist their attempt upon us, it will be the likeliest way to bring them to an accord with us: and, upon this ground, I am for the question. But I have move you to consider, Whether it be not too soon to come to it? We have tried by proposals of peace to his majesty, and they have been rejected: let us try yet again, and appoint a committee who may review our former positions. And where they find the matters them (as our affairs now are) fit to be altered, that they present the alterations to the king and their opinions; and that, as far as we stand with the security of us and our country, may yield our endeavours to prevent the miseries which look black upon us, and to seek good accommodation; so that there may be strife between us and those of the other party for we are brethren.'

Sir Benj. Rudyard, on the same occasion spoke thus: 'Mr. Speaker; In the way we are, we have gone as far as words can do us: we have voted our own rights and the king's duty. No doubt there is a relation between king and subjects, obedience from subject to a king, protection from a king to people. The present unhappy distance between his maj. and the parliament, makes the whole kingdom stand amazed, in a fearful expectation of dismal calamities to fall upon it deeply and conscientiously concerns this house to compose and settle these threatening

ing distractions.—Mr. Speaker, I am touched, I am pierced, with an apprehension of the honour of the house, and success of this parliament. The best way to give a stop to these desperate imminent mischiefs, is to make a fair way for the king's return hither; it will likewise give best satisfaction to the people, and will be our best justification.—Mr. Speaker, that we may the better consider the condition we are now in, let us set ourselves 3 years back. If any man then could have credibly told us, that, within 3 years, the queen shall be gone out of England into the Low Countries, for any cause whatsoever; the king shall remove from his parliament, from London to York, declaring himself not to be safe here; that there shall be a total Rebellion in Ireland; such discords and distempers both in church and state here, as now we find! Certainly we should have trembled at the thought of it; wherefore it is fit we should be sensible now we are in it. On the other side; if any man then could have credibly told us, that, within 3 years, ye shall have a Parliament, it would have been good news; that Ship-Money shall be taken away by an act of parliament, the reasons and grounds of it so rooted out, as that neither it, nor any thing like it, can ever grow up again; that Monopolies, the High Commission-Court, the Star-Chamber, the Bishops Votes, shall be taken away; the Council-Table regulated and restrained; the Forests bounded and limited; that ye shall have a Triennial Parliament; nay more than that, a perpetual Parliament, which none shall have power to dissolve without yourselves, we should have thought this a dream of happiness! Yet, now we are in the real possession of it, we do not enjoy it, although his maj. hath promised and published he will make all this good to us. We stand chiefly upon further security; whereas the very having of these things is a convenient fair security, mutually securing one another. There is more security offered, even in this last Answer of the king's, by removing the personal votes of Popish Lords, by the better education of Papists children, and by supplying the defects of the laws against Recusants; besides what else may be enlarged and improved by a select committee of both houses named for that purpose. Wherefore, sir, let us beware we do not contend for such a hazardous unsafe security, as may endanger the loss of what we have already. Let us not think we have nothing, because we have not all we desire; and though we had, yet we cannot make a mathematical security; all human caution is susceptible of corruption and failing; God's Providence will not be bound, success must be his: he that observes the wind and rain, shall neither sow nor reap; if he do nothing till he can secure the weather, he will have but an ill harvest.—Mr. Speaker, it now behoves us to call up all the wisdom we have about us, for we are at the very brink of corruption and confusion: if blood begins once to ooz out, we shall presently fall into a certain misery, and must attend an uncertain success, God knows when, and God knows what. Every man here is bound, in conscience, to employ his utmost endeavours to prevent the effusion of blood: blood is a crying sin, it pollutes a land; let us save our liberties and our estates, but so as we may save our souls too. Now I have clearly delivered my own conscience, I leave every man freely to his.

The Lord Mayor's Answer to his 2nd Impeachment.] This day the Lord Mayor was brought to the bar as a delinquent, the commons being present; where, kneeling till he was bid to rise, the Speaker asked him, if he had brought his Answer to the commons additional Impeachment against him; which he delivered in, and it was read in hæc verba:

The Humble ANSWER of Sir RICHARD GURNEY, Knt. and Bart. Lord Mayor of the City of London, to a Second Impeachment exhibited against him to the right hon. the Lords in Parliament, by the hon. the house of Commons.

“The defendant, saving to himself all benefit of exception to the said Impeachment, as to all and every the wicked and malicious advising, countenancing, persuasions, solicitations, and practices mentioned; and as to the illegal imprisonment of John Carter, Wm. Gouch, and Rd. Arnold, or any other Apprentices within the city of London; as also to the charge of Breach of his Oath, and neglect of the duty of his place; and to all and every, or any other offences, practices, contempts, and misdemeanors, by the said Impeachment laid to this defendant, he saith, That he is not of them, or any of them, guilty in such manner and form as the same are in and by the said Impeachment charged.”

The Earl of Holland's Account of his presenting the Parliament's Petition to the King, for Pardon.] July 20. A Letter to the Speaker of the house of lords, from the earl of Holland, one of their Committee sent down into the North, to deliver their last Petition to the king, was read as follows:

“My lord; Our admittance to his maj. was very quick, for that very night we arrived here, after his supper, though he came home late from Lincoln, he commanded us to attend him; where we found him accompanied by many officers, but few lords; for most of them were absent, they say here, to put in execution the Commission of Array, in those shires whither the king's Commission had directed them.—After we had read your Petition, his majesty told us, ‘It was a business of great importance, and required time to advise of his Answer; yet then he remarked, with some sharpness, on some parts of the Petition, which I shall give my lords an account of in person.—I believe we may be dispatched to-day, or, at furthest, to-morrow; for his maj. goes to Nottingham and Leicester, to call those counties together, and to assure them to him; as, he believes, he has already done those where his presence hath been. His forces appear not to be so great as they are; for it is said here, and I believe with some truth, that he may, when he pleases, call a very considerable number together, that are ready, upon the least command, to move towards him: but this is declined on two respects; the one, until he hath received a direct Answer concerning Hull; the other, to ease his charge for the present. There are several troops of horse that have been raised by noblemen and gentlemen, which are quartered in this county.—These generals are only proper to be delivered unto you at this present; when I attend you, which shall be with all the diligence I may, my lords shall have a very particular account of the knowledge and duty of Your, &c. HOLLAND. Beverley, July 18, 1642."

The Parliament's Petition to the King, for Peace.] 'The Parliament's Petition to the King for Peace, was as follows:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; The Humble PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS assembled in Parliament.

"May it please your majesty; Although we, your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, have been very unhappy in many former Petitions and Supplications to your majesty; wherein we have represented our most dutiful affections in advising and desiring those things which we held most necessary for the preservation of God's true religion, your majesty's safety and honour, and the peace of the kingdom; and, with much sorrow, do perceive, that your majesty, incensed by many false calumnies and slanders, doth continue to raise forces against us and your other loyal and peaceable subjects; to make great preparations for war, both in this kingdom and also from beyond the seas; by arms and violence, to over-rule the judgment and advice of your Great Council; and, by force, to determine the questions there depending, concerning the government and liberty of the kingdom; yet such is our earnest desire of discharging our duty to your maj. and the kingdom, to preserve the peace thereof, and to prevent the miseries of Civil War amongst your subjects, that (notwithstanding we hold ourselves bound to use all the means and power, which, by the laws and constitutions of this kingdom, we are trusted with, for the defence and protection thereof, and of the subjects, from force and violence) we do, in this our humble and loyal Petition, prostrate ourselves at your majesty's feet; beseeching your majesty that you will be pleased to forbear and remove all preparations and actions of war, particularly the Forces from about Hull, from Newcastle, Tinnmouth, Lincoln, and Lincolnshire, and all other places; and that your maj. will recall the Commissions of Array, which are illegal; dismiss the troops and extraordinary Guards, by you raised; that you maj. will come nearer to your parliament, and hearken to their faithful advice and humble Petitions, which shall only tend to the defence and advancement of religion, your own royal honour and safety, the preservation of our laws and liberties: and we have been, and shall ever be, careful to prevent and punish all tumults and seditious actions, speeches, and writings, which may give your maj. just cause of distaste or apprehension of danger; from which public aims and resolutions no sinister or private respect shall ever make us to decline; that your maj. will leave delinquents to the due course of justice; and that nothing done or spoken in parliament, or by any person in pursuance of the command and direction of both houses be questioned any where but in parliament.—And we, for our parts, shall be ready to lay down all those preparations which we have been forced to make for our defence. And for the town of Hull, and the Ordinance concerning the Militia; as we have, in both these particulars, only sought the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, and the defence of the parliament from force and violence; so we shall most willingly leave the town of Hull in the state it was before sir J. Hotham drew any forces into it, delivering your maj.'s Magazine into the Tower of London, and supplying whatsoever hath been proposed of by us for the service of the kingdom. We shall be ready to settle the Militia by a Bill, in such a way as shall be honourable and safe for your majesty, most agreeable to the duty of parliament, and effectual for the good of the kingdom; that the strength thereof be not employed against itself, and that which ought to be for our security applied to our destruction: and that the parliament, as those who profess and desire still to preserve the Protestant religion, both in this realm and in Ireland, may not be left naked and insensible to the mischievous designs and cruel attempts of those who are the professed and confederated enemies thereof, in your majesty's dominions and other neighbouring nations: to which if your majesty's counsels shall, from henceforth, concur, we doubt not but we shall quickly make it appear to the world, by the most eminent effects of love and duty, that your majesty's personal safety, your royal honour and greatness, is much dearer to us than our own lives and fortunes; which we do most heartily dedicate, and shall most willingly employ for the support and maintenance thereof."

The King's Answer.] As soon as this Petition was read by the earl of Holland, the king told the Committee, "The reproaches cast upon him by it, were not answerable to the expectations his lordship had made; and that he was sorry that they thought the exposing him to his honour to so much scandal, was the way to procure or preserve the peace of the kingdom; that they should speedily receive his Answer, by which the world would easily discern what he desired peace most." And, accordingly, the second day, his majesty delivered them to the public, his Answer to their Petition; which was likewise read, by one of his servants, in these words:

HIS MAJESTY'S ANSWER to the PETITION of the LORDS and COMMONS assembled in Parliament.

"Though his majesty had no great reason to believe, that the directions sent to the earl of Warwick to go to the river of Humber, with as many ships as he should think fit, for all possible assistance to sir J. Hotham, whilst his maj. expected the giving up of the town unto him) and to carry away such arms as thence as his discretion thought fit to be out of his majesty's own magazine: the using a general by both houses of parliament, to the defence of those who have obeyed his orders and commands, be they never so extravagant and illegal: their Declaration, that, in that cause, they would live and die with the earl of Essex their general,' all which were voted, the same day with this Petition: and the committing the lord mayor of London to prison for executing his majesty's writs and lawful commands, were but ill prologues to a petition which might compose the miserable distractions of the kingdom: yet his majesty's constant desire of the peace of the kingdom, together with the preface of the presenters, that they had brought a Petition full of duty and submission to his majesty, and which demanded nothing of him but his consent to peace, which his maj. conceived to be the language of both houses too) begot a greedy hope and expectation in him, that this Petition would have been such an introduction to Peace, that would at least have satisfied his Message of the 11th of this month, by delivering up of it to his majesty.—But, to his unspeakable grief, his maj. hath too much cause to believe, that the end of some persons by this Petition was, in truth, to give any real satisfaction to his majesty; but, by the specious pretences of offering offers to him, to mislead and seduce the people, and lay some imputation upon him by denying what is fit to be granted; otherwise would not have thrown those unjust reproaches and scandals upon his majesty, for giving a necessary and just defence for his safety; and so peremptorily justified such actions against him, as, by no rule of law or equity, can admit the least colour of defence; after so many free and unlimited acts of disobedience passed by his majesty, without any consideration, have proposed such things which, in justice, cannot be denied unto him, upon such pretensions as, in honour, he cannot grant.—However, that all the world may see how willing his majesty would be to embrace any measure that might beget a right understanding between him and his two houses of parliament, (with whom he is sure he shall have no contention when the private practices and subornations of some few malignant persons shall be discovered, (which his maj. will take care to be speedily done) he hath, with care, weighed the particulars of this Pe-

tion, and returns this Answer:—That the Petitioners were never unhappy in their Petitions or Supplications to his majesty, while they desired any thing which was necessary or convenient for 'the preservation of God's true Religion, his majesty's safety and honour, and the peace of the kingdom;' and therefore, when those general envious foundations are laid, his majesty could wish some particular instances had been applied. Let envy and malice object one particular Proposition for the preservation of 'God's true Religion,' which his maj. hath refused to consent to; what himself hath often made for the ease of tender consciences, and for the advancement of the Protestant Religion, is notorious by many of his Messages and Declarations: what regard hath been to his honour and safety, when he hath been driven from some of his own houses, and kept out of his own towns by force: and what care there hath been of 'the peace of the kingdom,' when endeavour hath been used to put all his subjects in arms against him, is so evident, that his maj. is confident he cannot suffer by those general imputations: it is enough that the world knows what he hath granted, and what he hath denied.—For his majesty's raising Forces, and making Preparations for War, (whatsoever the petitioners, by the evil arts of the enemies to his majesty's person and government, and by the calumnies and slanders raised against his maj. by them, are induced to believe) all men may know what is done that way, is but in order to his own defence. Let the Petitioners remember that (which all the world knows) his maj. was driven from his palace of Whitehall, for safety of his life: that both houses of parliament, upon their own authority, raised a Guard to themselves (having gotten the command of all the Trained Bands of London to that purpose) without the least colour or shadow of danger: that they usurped a power, by their pretended Ordinance, (against all principles and elements of law) over the whole Militia of the kingdom, without and against his majesty's consent: that they took possession of his town, fort, and magazine of Hull, and committed the same to sir J. Hotham, who shut the gates against his majesty; and, by force of arms, denied entrance thither to his own person: that they justified this act, which they had not directed; and took sir J. Hotham into their protection for whatsoever he had done, or should do, against his majesty; and all this, whilst his maj. had no other attendance than his own menial servants.—Upon this the duty and affection of this county prompted his subjects, here, to provide a small Guard for his own person; which was no sooner done, but a Vote suddenly passed of 'his majesty's intention to levy war against his parliament; which, God knows, his heart abhorreth: and, notwithstanding all his majesty's Professions, Declarations, and Protestations to the contrary, seconded by the clear testimony of so great a number of peers upon the place, Propositions and Orders for levies of men, horse, and arms, were sent throughout the kingdom; Plate and Money brought in and received; Horse and Men raised towards an army, mustered and under command; and all this contrary to the law and to his majesty's Proclamation; and a Declaration published, 'That if he should use force for the recovery of Hull, or suppressing the pretended Ordinance for the Militia, it should be held levying war against the parliament; and all this done before his majesty granted any Commission for the levying or raising a man: his majesty's ships were taken from him, and committed to the custody of the earl of Warwick; who presumes, under that power to usurp to himself the sovereignty of the sea, to chase, fright, and imprison such of his majesty's good subjects as desire to obey his lawful commands; although he had notice of the legal revocation of the earl of Northumberland's commission of admiral, whereby all power derived from that commission ceased.—Let all the world now judge who began this war, and upon whose account the miseries which may follow must be cast: what his maj. could have done less than he hath done, and whether he were not compelled to make provision both for the defence of himself, and recovery of what is so violently and injuriously taken from him: and whether these injuries and indignities are not just grounds for his majesty's fears and apprehensions of farther mischief and danger to him.—Whence the Fears and Jealousies of the Petitioners have proceeded hath never been discovered: the Dangers they have brought upon his good subjects are too evident: what those are they have prevented, no man knows; and therefore his maj. cannot but look upon that charge, as the boldest and most scandalous that hath been yet laid upon him, 'That this necessary provision, made for his own safety and defence, is to over-rule the judgment and advice of his great council; and, by force, to determine the questions there depending concerning the government and liberty of the kingdom.' If no other force had been raised to determine those questions than by his maj. this unhappy misunderstanding had not been. And his maj. no longer desires the blessing and protection of Almighty God upon himself and his posterity, than he and they shall, solemnly, observe the due execution of the laws, in the defence of parliaments, and the just freedom thereof. For the Forces about Hull; his maj. will remove them when he hath obtained the end for which they were brought thither. When Hull shall be reduced again to his subjection, he will no longer have an army before it: and when he shall be assured that the same necessity and pretence of public good, which took Hull from him, may not put a garrison into Newcastle, to keep the same against him, he will remove his from thence, and from Tinsmouth; till when, the example of Hull will not be out of his memory.—For the Commissions of Array, which are legal, and are so proved by a Declaration now in the press; his maj.

wonders why they should, at this time, be thought grievous, and fit to be recalled: if the Fears of Invasion and Rebellion be so great, that, by an illegal pretended Ordinance, it is necessary to put his subjects into a posture of defence, to array, train, and muster them, he knows not why the same should not be done in a regular, known, and lawful way: but if, in the execution of that Commission, any thing shall be unlawfully imposed upon his subjects, his maj. will take all just and necessary steps for their redress.—For his majesty's coming nearer to his Parliament; his majesty hath pressed himself so fully in his several Messages, Answers, and Declarations; and so particularly avowed a real fear of his safety, upon such instances as cannot be answered, that hath reason to think himself somewhat reassured; that since, upon so manifest reasons, it is not safe for his maj. to come to them, both houses of parliament will not come near his majesty, or to such a place where the freedom and dignity of parliament might be preserved.—However, his majesty shall be glad to hear of some such example in punishing the tumults (which he knows how to expect, when they have declared, 'That they knew not of any Tumults though the desires of peers desired, both for the dignity and freedom of parliament, That the house of commons would join with them in a Declaration against Tumults, which they refused, (though neglected to do) and other seditious speeches, and writings, as may take their apprehension of danger from him; though, as he remembers the particular complaints, himself hath made of businesses of that nature, and that instead of inquiring out the neglect of examination hath been; when hath been made to both houses to produce authors, as in that treasonable Paper concerning the Militia; and when he sees every pamphlet published against his crown, against monarchy itself, (as the Observer upon his late Messages, Declarations, and presses) and some Declarations of theirs which give too great encouragement in argument to ill-affected persons; his maj. cannot, with confidence, entertain that which would be most welcome to him, the leaving Delinquents to the due course of justice; his majesty is most assuredly been no shelter to any such: if the tedious and delay in prosecution, the vast disbursements of officers fees, the keeping men under a long accusation without trial a whole year and so allowing them no way for their defence and vindication, have frightened men away so chargeable and uncertain an attempt, the remedy is best provided where the mischief grew. If the law be the measure of clemency, none such are within his majesty's protection: but if, by delinquents, such as are understood who are made so by Vote, without trespass upon any known or established law, if, by Delinquents, the Nine Lords are understood, who are made delinquents by his majesty's Summons to come to him, after their stay there was neither safe nor honourable, by reason of the tumults and other violence; and whose Impeachment, he is confident, is the greatest breach of privilege, that, before this parliament, was ever offered to the house of peers: if, by Delinquents, such are understood who refuse to submit to the pretended Ordinance of the Militia, to that of the Navy, or to any other which his majesty hath not consented to; such who, for the peace of the kingdom, in an humble manner, prepare Petitions to him, or to both houses, as his good subjects of London and Kent did; whilst seditious ones, as that of Essex, and other places, are allowed and cherished: if, by delinquents, such are understood, who are called so for publishing his Proclamations, as the lord mayor of London; or for reading his Messages and Declarations, as divers ministers about London and elsewhere; when those against him are dispersed with all care and industry, to poison and corrupt the loyalty and affection of his people: if, by delinquents, such are understood, who have or shall lend his majesty money, in the universities, or in any other places; his majesty declares to all the world, that he will protect such with his utmost power and strength; and directs, That, in these cases, they submit not to any messengers or warrants of parliament; it being no less his duty to protect those who are innocent, than to bring the guilty to condign punishment; of both which the law is to be judge.—And if both houses do think fit to make a general, and to raise an army for the defence of those who obey their orders and commands, his majesty must not sit still, and suffer such who submit to his just power, and are solicitous for the laws of the land, to perish and be undone, because they are called delinquents: and when they shall take upon them to dispense with the attendance of those who are called by his majesty's writ, whilst they send them to sea to ob his majesty, of his ships; or into the several counties, to put his subjects in arms against him, his majesty (who only hath it) will not lose the power to dispense with them to attend his own person, or to execute such offices as are necessary for the preservation of himself and the kingdom; but must protect them though they are called delinquents.—For the Manner of the Proceeding against Delinquents; his maj. will proceed against those who have no privilege of parliament, or in such cases where no privilege is to be allowed, as he shall be advised by his learned counsel, and according to the known and unquestionable rules of the law; it being unreasonable that he should be compelled to proceed against those who violated the known and undoubted law, only before them who have directed such violation.—Having said thus much to the particulars of the Petition, though his majesty hath reason to complain, That, since the sending in Petition, they have beaten their drums for soldiers against him; armed their own general with a power destructive to the law and liberty of the subjects, and chosen a general of their horse: his majesty, out of his princely love, tenderness, and compassion of his people, and desire to preserve the peace of the kingdom, that the whole force and strength of it may be united for the defence of itself, and the relief of Ireland, (in whose behalf he conjures both his houses of parliament, as they will answer the contrary to Almighty God, to his majesty, to those that trust them, and to that bleeding miserable kingdom, that they suffer not any monies granted and collected by act of parliament, to be diverted or employed against his majesty, whilst his soldiers in that kingdom are ready to mutiny, or perish, for want of pay, and the barbarous rebels prevail by that encouragement) is graciously pleased, once more, to propose and require: 1. That his town of Hull be, immediately, delivered up to him; which being done (though his maj. hath been provoked by unbecoming insolencies of sir John Hotham, since his burning and drowning the country, in seizing his wine and other provisions for his house; and scornfully using his servants, whom he sent to require them, saying, It came to him by Providence, and he will keep it; and so refusing to deliver it, with threats, if he, or any other of his fellow-servants, should again repair to Hull about it; and in taking and detaining prisoners divers gentlemen, and others, in their passage over the Humber into Lincolnshire, about their necessary occasions; and such other indignities, as all gentlemen must resent in his majesty's behalf) his majesty, to shew his earnest desire of peace, for which he will dispense with his own honour; and how far he is from desire of revenge, will grant a free and general pardon to all persons within that town. 2. That his majesty's Magazine, taken from Hull, be forthwith put into such hands as he shall appoint. 3. That his Navy be forthwith delivered into such hands as he hath directed for the government thereof: The detaining thereof, after his majesty's directions published and received to the contrary, and employing his ships against him, in such manner as they are now used, being notorious high treason in the commanders of those ships. 4. That all Arms, Levies, and Provisions for a war, made by the consent of both houses, (by whose example his maj. hath been forced to make some preparations) be immediately laid down; and the pretended Ordinance for the Militia, and all power of imposing laws upon the subject, without his majesty's consent, be disavowed; without which the same pretence will remain to produce the same mischief: all which his maj. may as lawfully demand, as to live; and can with no more justice be denied him, than his life may be taken from him.—These being done, and the parliament adjourned to a safe and secure place, his maj. promises in the presence of God, and binds himself by all his confidence and assurance in the affection of his people, That he will instantly, and most cheerfully, lay down all the force he shall have raised, and discharge all his future and intended levies, that there may be a general face of peace over the whole kingdom, and will repair to them; and desires that all differences may be freely debated in a parliamentary way, whereby the law may recover its due reverence, the subject his just liberty, and parliaments themselves their full vigour and estimation; and so the whole kingdom, a blessed peace, quiet, and prosperity.—If these Propositions shall be rejected his majesty doubts not of the protection and assistance of Almighty God, and the ready concurrence of his good subjects; who can have no hope left them of enjoying their own long, if their king may be oppressed and spoiled, and must be remediless. And though his towns, his ships, his arms, and his money be gotten and taken from him, he hath a good cause left, and the hearts of his people; which, with God's blessing, he doubts not, will recover all the rest.—Lastly, If the preservation of the Protestant Religion, the defence of the liberty and law of the kingdom, the dignity and freedom of parliament, and the recovery and relief of bleeding and miserable Ireland, be equally precious to the petitioners, as they are to his majesty, (who will have no quarrel but in defence of these) there will be a cheerful and speedy consent to what his maj. hath now propounded and desired.—And of this his maj. expects a full and positive Answer by Wednesday the 27th day of July instant; till when he will not make any attempt of force upon Hull, hoping in the affection, duty, and loyalty of the petitioners; and, in the mean time, expects that no supply of men be put into Hull, or any of his majesty's goods taken from thence.”

Sentence pronounced upon the Nine impeached Lords.] July 20. The lords being all set in their robes, and the house of commons, with their Speaker, come up, he said, “The knights, citizens and burghesses of the house of commons, having impeached Spencer e. of Northampton, Wm. e. of Devonshire, Henry e. of Dover, Henry e. of Monmouth, Charles lord Howard of Charlton, Robert lord Rich, Charles lord Grey of Ruthyn, Thomas lord Coventry, and Arthur lord Capel, for High-Crimes and Misdemeanors, to the interruption of the proceedings of parliament, and disturbance of the peace of the kingdom, the commons had commanded him to demand their lordships Judgment thereupon.” Then the lord Kimbolton, Speaker of the house of lords for that day, pronounced Sentence against the said Nine Lords, as follows: “1. That they shall not sit, or vote in the lords house during this present parliament. 2. That they shall not enjoy the privileges of parliament as members thereof. 3. That they shall stand committed to the Tower during the pleasure of this house.”

A certificate from the aldermen of London,

* Ever since the lord keeper Littleton left the house of lords, the Speaker's place was filled by some one of the peers present, concerning the election of a locum-tenens the room of the Lord Mayor, was presented and read, importing, “That they had met together according to the direction, and on that day prefixed by the house; and that he called unto them the city counsel, and all experienced in the customs and charters of said city, and, after diligent search of records, they did humbly certify, That it not appear that ever, at any time, the aldermen had made choice of a locum-tenens to en the office of a Lord Mayor: but they said That in the time of a Lord Mayor's absence he being within the franchise, there had a locum-tenens appointed by himself, that still remaining with him; all which they humbly presented, &c.” Signed by 15 aldermen.

The Parliament's Reply to the King's answer to their Petition for Peace.] This is a Reply of both houses to his majesty's Answer to their Petition, sent by the earl of Newcastle, as agreed to, as follows;

“The lords and commons in parliament assembled (having taken into their serious consideration his majesty's Answer to their humble Petition for peace, delivered by the earl of Newcastle, sir Philip Stapylton, and sir John Holles, the demands which he is thereupon presented to make concerning the present delivery of the town of Hull, the Magazine, the disavowing the Ordinance of the Militia, laying down of all Arms raised by authority the two houses of parliament, and adjourning themselves to some other place) do beseech his majesty to accept this their humble petition, and excuse, That they cannot for the present the discharge of the trust reposed in them for the safety of the king and kingdom, yield to those demands of his majesty.—That why they took into their custody the town of Hull, the magazine and navy; passed the Ordinance of the Militia, and made provision of arms; was for the security of religion, safety of his majesty's person, of the law, and parliament, all which they did see to be so urgent and imminent danger; from which they shall be secured, and that the safety of the kingdom shall not be used to the prejudice thereof; they shall then be ready to draw the garrison out of Hull, to demolish the magazine and navy, and settle the Militia bill, in such a way as shall be honourable and safe for his majesty, most agreeable to the duty of parliament, and effectual for the safety of the kingdom, as they have professed in their late petition.—As for adjourning the parliament; they apprehend no reason for his majesty to require it, nor security for them to consent to it. And; as for that reason, his majesty is pleased to express, that they shall not but the usual place will be as usual, and as for any royal person as any other, considering the assurance they have of the loyalty and fidelity of the city of London to his majesty; and the care which his parliament will ever take to prevent any danger, which his majesty may justly apprehend; besides the usual persons, to be had there, beyond any other tax of the kingdom.—As for the laying down Arms: when the causes which moved them provide for the defence of his majesty, the god, and parliament, shall be taken away, y shall very willingly and chearfully forbear further preparations, and lay down their set already raised."

This Reply was sent to the king, then before him; but with no solemnity of messengers, or other ceremony than being inclosed to one of the secretaries of state. It was also ordered to be printed; and likewise forthwith published in all churches and chapels, together with the said Petition and Answer.

Ordinance of Parliament for levying of Tonnage and Poundage.] August 1. The lords took it into consideration a new Ordinance of Parliament, sent up by the commons, concerning the Subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage. It being read, it was resolved, That this we agree with the commons therein, the only dissenting. Which Ordinance was as follows:

The lords and commons now assembled in Parliament, taking into consideration the great dangers that may ensue, not only to this kingdom, but likewise unto that of Ireland, especially in these times of apparent danger, exceeding all former times, either of his majesty or of his royal father king James; and taking into further consideration the great debt now due unto the Navy, as well before the beginning of this parliament as since, amounting to the sum of 300,000*l.* and that ships of war are now in the actual service of his kingdom, as well for the defence thereof of Ireland; and not knowing what other supply of ships and of store will be further requisite in these times of danger; and well knowing that they cannot be maintained without great sums of money, nor the said great sums satisfied by any monies already collected owing by merchants for the time past:— And, foreseeing the danger and necessity of supply, did, long before this time, prepare a new Book of Rates, which passed both houses, now ordered to be published; wherein there is as well an equal respect to the ease of the merchants, as to the raising of such sums of money as might be proportionable to the supplies; and did likewise prepare and pass a bill of Tonnage and Poundage, whereby the Book of Rates is confirmed; which bill they have likewise ordered to be printed and published; which, after it had passed both houses, was, upon the 29th of June last, sent to his maj. at York for the royal assent; which his majesty not having passed, the lords and commons did, upon the 14th of July last, command the earl of Holland, sir John Holland, sir Philip Stapylton, (by whom they did deliver their late Petition to his majesty) in the name of both houses, to move his maj. to give speedy passage to that bill, whereunto his maj. hath given no Answer at all. And whereas the former bill of Tonnage and Poundage did determine the 1st day of July last, since which time no monies intended to be raised by this last bill have been collected; now the said lords and commons, having taken the promises into due and serious consideration, for preventing the inevitable dangers that must necessarily ensue, without timely prevention in that behalf, have thought good to make this their Declaration to all his majesty's loving subjects. 1. Whereas by an act made this present parliament, intituled, 'An Act for the Relief of the Captives taken by the Turkish, Moorish, and other pirates, and to prevent the taking of others in time to come,' all merchants, as well denizens as aliens, for any goods exported or imported, from the 10th day of Nov. 1641, during the term of 3 years then next ensuing, are to make due entries of all such their goods in the port of London, and all other his majesty's ports within the realm of England and dominion of Wales, upon the penalties of the forfeiture of the said goods: now the said lords and commons do enjoin all merchants, as well denizens as aliens, to make due entry of all such goods and merchandize, as they shall, during the continuance of the said act, export and import. And, to the intent that the entries may be accordingly made, they do expect that the customers, comptrollers, searchers, and all other the officers of the said city of London and other the ports respectively, do carefully attend the several charges, and make due seizure as forfeited, of all such goods and merchandize, as shall not be entered according to the intent of that statute. 2. That although the said last bill for Tonnage and Poundage hath not yet had the royal assent, and therefore the subject, by the law, is not compellable to pay the duty therein limited to be paid; yet the premises and pressing necessities considered, the lords and commons do declare, that it shall be taken as an acceptable service to the commonwealth, and a manifestation of their good affections to the public, of all those that shall, upon the entry of their goods, advance and pay, by way of loan, unto the collectors or commissioners, which now are or hereafter shall be named, or to their deputy or deputies, all such sum or sums of money, as are payable by the last Book of Rates, and should have been due in case the said bill had passed into a law. 3. That every merchant so advancing money as aforesaid, shall have an allowance, by way of defalcation, of 15*l.* per cent. out of every 100*l.* he or they shall so advance and pay, over and above all other allowances made in the said bill or Book of Rates, or either of them, and so out of every greater or less sum after that rate. 4. Whereas the bill of Tonnage and Poundage, now remaining with his maj. cannot have the force of a law, without the further concurrence of the lords and commons, in respect the Speaker of the house of commons, by and with the consent of the said commons, is to carry the said bill into the lords house for the royal assent; as also in respect that, in his majesty's absence from parliament, his majesty hath no power to pass his royal assent unto a bill, but by his letters patent under the great seal, and signed with his hand, declared and notified to the lords and commons assembled together in the higher house, as by a statute 23 Henry 8. appeareth: now the lords and commons, for the further assurance of merchants advancing money as aforesaid, do promise and declare, That before they consent to the perfecting of the said bill of Tonnage and Poundage, now remaining with his maj. or any other bill of Tonnage and Poundage whatsoever, provision shall be made that the said allowance of 15l. per cent. shall be confirmed unto the said merchants accordingly; and that they, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, shall be forever acquitted and discharged of and from the payment thereof. 5. To the intent that no merchants do forbear to advance the said money by way of loan, according as is hereby desired, in hopes that the duties in the said bill shall not hereafter become payable from the 1st July 1642, the lords and commons do declare, That no bill of Tonnage and Poundage shall hereafter pass in parliament, but such as shall relate and be in force to compel all merchants, to pay for all goods and merchandizes, exported and imported, from the said 1st of July 1642, on which day the former bill of Tonnage and Poundage expired; in which bill there shall be that clause of forfeiture of the value of all such goods as shall not be duly entered in the custom-house, from and after that day, in such manner as in the said bill is expressed. 6. As to merchants who shall not advance money by way of loan, as aforesaid, in regard of the present and pressing dangers and necessities, the lords and commons do declare, That at what time soever they shall consent to the passing of any bill of Tonnage and Poundage, all such persons, who shall not advance money as aforesaid, shall be charged to pay the duties of Tonnage and Poundage from the said 1st day of July 1642, during the term of the said bill, in such manner as by the said bill shall be provided. 7. That to the intent no officer belonging to any custom-house within this kingdom, or the dominion of Wales, or other persons appointed to be commissioners for receiving such money as shall be advanced by merchants as aforesaid, be discouraged, by reason of any penalties mentioned in any former act of Tonnage and Poundage passed this parliament, from receiving any duties upon merchandize, not being granted by parliament; although the lords and commons do conceive, and hereby declare, That the receiving of the said sums of money before-mentioned is not within the true intention of the said penalties, the same being advanced voluntarily, by way of loan; as also in respect those acts, and the true intent of them, were principally to restrain the crown from imposing upon the people without their consent: yet, for the further encouragement of such person, or persons, who shall receive any such sums, they do declare and promise, That before the said bill of Tonnage and Poundage, now remaining with his majesty, or any other, do pass for a law, there shall be a provision made, in such bill, for the indemnity and security of all such persons in that behalf. 8. That whereas, by the former Order of the commons house of parliament, the officers appointed for that purpose have orders to take bonds of all merchants, for the payment of one per cent. to be raised by virtue of the aforesaid bill, for the redemption of the captives taken by the Turkish or other pirates, or so much thereof as shall be agreed on by the lords and commons in parliament, it is now ordered, That all such merchants shall not advance money by way of loan aforesaid, shall, at all times hereafter, on entry of their goods, make payment of money for their said goods, according to the tenor of the said bill; and likewise all other sums of money as, by virtue of the said bill, are due from the said merchants upon or otherwise, for goods by them formerly entered since the 10th of Dec. 1641, by true intent of which act the one per cent. be paid and received, is to be taken and received according to such rates as were and payable by the bill of Tonnage and Poundage, which did last determine. The lords and commons do ordain, That the same collectors, or commissioners, have formerly received the several duties upon merchandize, upon the several bills of Tonnage and Poundage passed this parliament, shall be, and are, deputed to be commissioners, who are enabled by this Ordinance to receive all such sum, or sums, of money which shall, at any time hereafter, be voluntarily advanced by way of loan, in such manner as they have formerly received the duties of Tonnage and Poundage; which commissioners, their deputy or deputies, or any one of them, shall have full power and authority to give allowance, by way of satisfaction, after the rate of 15l. per cent. on all such monies as shall be advanced according to the true intent of this Ordinance: all monies the said commissioners, their deputy or deputies, shall receive upon account; and from time to time, issue out of the treasury, they, the said commissioners, shall be directed by Order of the lords and commons in parliament, or of such other persons or persons, as they shall nominate and appoint to be employed for the uses herein before expressed.—10. For the more due execution of the premises, and that an account be justly of the commissioners due charge, the clerks and comptrollers, as well of the treasury in London as the out-ports, are required, within 28 days, to make a true copy of all entries as have been made in the several bills of Tonnage and Poundage, and of the monies payable by the said entries; and are to certify the said accounts, monthly, unto Wm. Somers, Esq. viceroy-general in the custom-house of London, who is likewise required to make up a sent upon all the several certificates, and return the same unto the commons house of parliament, or to such committee as shall be sent to authorized by them.—That for the better direction as well of the merchants, what to be performed on their parts, as of the several officers of the custom-house in the several ports respectively: it is ordained by lords and commons now assembled in parliament, That a true copy of the said bill of Tonnage and Poundage, which hath passed in houses, and is now remaining with his majesty, shall be printed, and both it and the Book of Rates published, and sent as well to the officers of the custom-house in the city of London, as unto the officers of the but-ports respectively. Lastly, For the encouragement of merchant-strangers, trading to the port of Dover, to continue their intercourse of trade, the importation of bullion and foreign wares: it is ordered by the lords and commons, that the several officers in that port respectively shall, and may, from time to time, give to all merchant-strangers the like respect and allowance in their customs as they have heretofore done."

The Parliament's Declaration for taking up arms. August 2. the lords read a Declaration, brought up from the commons, by Mr. John Hollis, setting forth the Grounds and Reasons which necessitated the parliament, at that time, to take up defensive Arms for the preservation of his majesty's person, the maintenance of the true Religion, the Laws and Liberties of this kingdom, and the Power and Privilege of Parliament; which, was agreed to follow:

"We the lords and commons in parliament assembled, having taken into serious consideration the present state and condition of imminent danger, in which the kingdom now stands, by reason of a Malignant Party preying with his majesty; putting him upon violent and perilous ways, and now in arms against us, to the hazarding of his majesty's person, and for the oppression of the true Religion, the Laws and Liberties of this kingdom, the Power and Privilege of Parliament; which every honest man is bound to defend, especially those who have taken the late Protestation, by which they are more particularly bound unto it, and the more answerable before God, should they neglect it: wherefore, we finding ourselves engaged in a necessity to take up arms likewise, for the defence of us, which, otherwise, must suffer and perish; having used all good ways and means to prevent extremities, and preserve the peace of the kingdom, which good endeavours of ours malignity of our enemies hath rendered altogether unsuccessful and vain do now think to give this Account unto the world, to be satisfaction unto all men of the justice of our proceedings, and a warning unto those who are involved in the same danger with us, that they see the necessity and duty which upon them to save themselves, their religion and country; for which purpose, we set out this Declaration:—"

"That it appears by the Answer which his majesty hath given to the Humble Petition for Peace, presented unto him by both houses of parliament, and those demands which he makes, that the design which hath been so long carried on to alter the frame and constitution of this government, both in church and state, is now come to ripeness; and the contrivers of it conceive themselves arrived to that condition of strength, that they shall be able to put it in present execution.—For what else can be signified by the demanding of Hull, the Fleet, and the Magazine to be immediately delivered up: all our preparations of force to cease, and the defensive arms of the parliament to be laid down, and the parliament to be adjourned to another place, than that we should, out of the sense of our own inability to make resistance, yield ourselves to the cruel mercy of those who have possessed the king against us, and incited him to violate all our Privileges, and revile the persons and proceedings of the parliament? Or else, if (as it cannot be otherwise conceived) we do not grant what is so unreasonable and destructive, forthwith to bring on that force which is prepared against us, by the concurrence and assistance of Papists, an ambitious and discontented clergy, delinquents obnoxious to the justice of parliament, and some ill-affected persons of the nobility and gentry; who, out of their desire of a dissolute liberty, apprehend, and would keep off, the reformation intended by the parliament.—These persons have conspired to ruin this parliament, which alone hath set a stop to that violence so long intended, and often attempted, for the alteration of religion, and subversion of the laws and liberties of the kingdom.—How far we were plunged in a miserable expectation of most evil days, and how fast this growing mischief prevailed upon us before this parliament, needs not now be declared, it being so fresh and bleeding in every man's memory. Religion was made but form and out-

* In the Debate on this Declaration in the house of commons, exceptions were taken to some words, spoken by sir Symonds D'Ewes, as laying aspersions and imputations upon the committee that had brought it in, viz. 'That there were many things in this Declaration, that were taken out of other men's pockets and budgets, and before printed.' Whereupon he was commanded to withdraw, and it was resolved, That sir S. D'Ewes should ask the committee pardon for the imputation laid upon them by these words, and the offence thereby committed against the house; and that he should receive reprehension for it in his place. He was accordingly reprehended by Mr. Speaker, who admonished him to be more careful of his expressions hereafter; and not to lay imputations upon any particular members, much less upon any committee employed in the service of the house. Commons Journals.

side; and those who made conscience to maintain the substance and purity of it, whether clergy or others, were discountenanced and oppressed, as the great enemies of the state. The laws were no defence nor protection of any man's right; all was subject to will and power, which imposed what payments they thought fit, to drain the subject's purse, and supply those necessities which their ill counsels had brought upon the king, or gratify such as were instruments in promoting those illegal and oppressive courses. They who yielded and complied were countenanced and advanced, all others disgraced and kept under; that so, men's minds made poor and base, and their liberties lost and gone, they might be ready to let go their religion whensoever it should be resolved to alter it; which was, and still is, the great design, and all else made use of but as instrumentary and subservient to it.—When they conceived the way to be sufficiently prepared, they at last resolved to put on their master-piece in Scotland, (where the same method had been followed) and more boldly to unmask themselves, in imposing upon them a Popish Service-Book; for well they knew the same fate attended both kingdoms, and religion could not be altered in the one, without the other. God raised the spirits of that nation to oppose it with so much zeal and indignation, that it kindled such a flame, as no expedient could be found but a parliament here to quench it.—This necessity brought on this parliament; and the same necessity gave it, in the beginning, power to act with more vigour and resolution than former parliaments had done, and to set upon a reformation of the great disorders both in the ecclesiastical and civil state; which drew a more particular envy and odium upon it, than was usual to the generality of parliaments; and was a cause, that those, who had swallowed up, in their thoughts, our religion and liberties, and now saw themselves defeated by this means, bent all their endeavours, and raised all their forces to destroy it.—First, Whilst the Scots Army remained here, they endeavoured to incense the two nations, and engage their armies one against the other; that, in such a confusion as must needs have followed, the parliament, might not be able to sit; and those forces destroying one another, might open some opportunity for them to gain their ends upon both kingdoms; and that then as their need, so the being of the parliament, might cease; the wisdom of the parliament prevented that mischief, and composed those great differences betwixt the king and the kingdom of Scotland. That Plot failing, they endeavoured to turn the English army against the parliament: this was discovered, the chief actors fled, and the danger avoided. Then they labour to stir up the Scots Army against us; but such was the faithfulness and affection of those our brethren, that they could not effect it.—After this they carry the king into Scotland, to try if a party could be there raised to suppress first the good party in that kingdom, and so compass their intended purpose here. At the same time a Rebellion in Ireland, an egg likewise hatching, breaks out, but their plot failed Scotland; yet, upon hopes of success, such preparatives were here, and such numbers of ill-affected persons to this town, that the parliament thought it necessary, for their security, to have a Guard. The king, on his return, instantly dismisses that guard, and puts another upon us; which produced bad effects, as we were glad to dismiss them, rather run any hazard than have such a guard.—Thus left naked, presently some members both houses are unjustly charged with treason, and the king comes with a troop of cavalry to the house of commons, to fetch those members, whom he had caused to be so unjustly accused; the greatest violation of the privileges of parliament that ever was attempted, and so manifest a destruction of the rights of the subject, which is only preserved by parliament, that the city of London took a pious and generous resolution to guard the members themselves; which so grieved and enraged the wicked persons, who had engaged the king, that last, and all those other designs and artifices against the parliament, that they him forsake Whitehall, under pretence that person was there in danger; a suggestion false as the Father of Lies can invent. So do they work upon him and upon the queen, to persuade her to retire out of the kingdom, to carry him further and further from the parliament; and so possess him with an hope, that they cannot put words bitter as gall into his mouth to express it upon all occasions, they make him cross, oppose, and inveigh against all the proceedings of parliament; and so, and protect all those who will affront it; away all power and authority from it, to make it contemptible and of less esteem than the meanest court; draw away the members commanding them to come to him, to him, and, instead of discharging their duty in the service of the parliament, to contribute advice and assistance to the destruction of the endeavour to possess the people that the parliament will take away the law, and introduce an arbitrary government; a thing which every honest moral man abhors, much more the law, justice, and piety of the two kingdoms; parliament; and, in truth, such a charge no rational man can believe, it being impossible so many several persons, as the two houses of parliament consist of, about 600, and in each house all of equal power, should all of them, at least the major part, agree in acts of violence and of tyranny, which make up an arbitrary government; and most improbable, that the nobility and chief gentry of this kingdom should conspire to take away the law by which they enjoy their estates, are protected from any violence and power, and differences from any meaner sort of people, with whom, even if they would be but fellow-servants.—To do all this good upon the parliament, and to make the kingdom believe it, or to raise a

a body shall dare say the contrary, force is required, men are levied, and the Malignant party of the kingdom, as was before specified, is, Papists, the prelatical clergy, delinquents, and that part of the nobility and gentry, which either fear reformation, or seek preferment by betraying their country to serve the King, have combined to bury the happiness of the kingdom in the ruin of this parliament; and, by forcing it to cut up the freedom of parliament by the roots, either take all parliaments away; or, which is worse, make them the instruments of slavery; to confirm it by law, and live the disease incurable.—That done, then they to crown their work, and put that in execution, which was first in their intention; it is, the changing of Religion into Popery and Superstition.—All this while the two houses parliament have, with all duty and loyalty, applied themselves unto his majesty; and moved, by humble prayers, and clear and convincing reasons and arguments, in several sessions, to satisfy him of their intentions, the honesty of their proceedings, their desire of the safety of his royal person and of the peace of the kingdom.—And only to preserve that peace, and prevent the pernicious practices of incendiaries, (such as the lord Digby, who first persuaded the king to get into some bad place, that he might protect those whom he called the king's servants; but in truth such he divide him from his parliament and kingdom, and might be revenged upon his parliament, where, he said, that traitors bare that by; who, in the mean time, promised he did do him service abroad; which, by his letters, appears to be the procuring of supplies against the kingdom and parliament, with which he himself said he would return; as since hath done, disguised, with store of arms, in a ship called The Providence;^a and who had embarked, upon the king's first going from Whitehall, to raise some numbers of horse and to under the colour of a Guard for his majesty, be the foundation of an army against the parliament; which, then failing, hath since had no effect, and shews what was then in their thoughts, before Hull, or the Militia, or any thing else of that nature was in question) the parliament thought fit to secure Hull, lest it might be a receptacle of such ill-affected persons, and of what aid could be gotten from foreign parts: the fleet under the earl of Warwick to defend the kingdom, and prevent such mischief from abroad; the Magazine of Arms, that they should not be employed against us; and the Militia of the kingdom in such hands as the parliament might confide in, to suppress commotions within ourselves.—And how necessary all this was to be done, the succeeding designs and practices upon them do all sufficiently manifest; and great cause hath the whole kingdom to bless God, who put it into the heads and hearts of the parliament to take care of these particulars: for were these pernicious persons about the king masters of them, how easy would it be for them to master the parliament, and master the kingdom? And what could we expect but ruin and destruction from such masters, who make the king, in this manner, revile and detest us and our actions? Such, who have embarked him in so many designs to overthrow this parliament? Such, who have long thirsted to see Religion and Liberty confounded together? Let the world now judge what more could be done by us, than we have done, to appease his majesty, and regain his grace and favour, if (after the presenting of such a Petition as the last was, so full of submissive, humble, affectionate desires of peace, so full of duty and loyalty, as we thought malice itself could not have excepted against; and having received so sharp a return, such expressions of bitterness, a justification and avowed protection of delinquents from the hand of justice, demands of so apparent danger, such manifestations of an intention to destroy us, and with us the whole kingdom; and this most clearly evidenced by their subsequent actions, even since these Propositions have been made unto us from his majesty; over-running several counties, compelling the Trained Bands, by force, to come in and join with them, or disarming them, and putting their arms into the hands of lewd and desperate persons; thereby turning the arms of the kingdom against itself) it be not fit for us, not only not to yield to what is required, but also to make further provision for the preservation of ourselves, and of those who have sent us hither, and intrusted us with all they have, estates, liberty, and life, and that which is the life of their lives, their religion; and even for the safety of the king's person, now environed by those who carry him upon his own ruin, and the destruction of all his people, at least to give them warning that all this is in danger; that if the king may force this parliament, they may bid farewell to all parliaments from ever receiving good by them; and if parliaments be lost, they are lost, their laws are lost, as well those lately made, as in former times; all which will be cut in sunder with the same sword now drawn for the destruction of this parliament.—Then if they will not come to help the parliament, and save themselves, though both they and we must perish, yet have we discharged our consciences and delivered our souls; and we will look for a reward in Heaven, should we be so ill requited upon earth, by those of whom we have so well deserved; which we cannot fear, having found, upon all occasions, such real demonstrations of their love and affection, and of their right understanding and apprehension of our and their common danger; especially now that the question is so clearly stated, and that it appeareth that neither Hull, nor the Militia, nor the Magazine, are the grounds of the war which is so furiously driven on against us by a Malignant Party of Papists, those who call themselves Cavaliers, and other ill-affected persons; but so far forth only as the parliament, and all the members of both houses, and all other persons who have shewed themselves forward for the defence of the sincerity of religion, the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and the just power and privileges of parliament, are preserved and secured thereby.—For the many Designs upon the Parliament above-mentioned, the attempts to be possessed of Hull and of the Magazine, by sending thither capt. Legge, (a delinquent to the parliament for having had a hand in the treasonable practise to bring up the army against us) and the earl of Newcastle in a disguised habit, which was in pursuance of the lord Digby's advice, and the endeavouring to raise forces under pretence of a Guard to the king's person in the winter: all this, before we meddled with Hull, or the Magazine, or Militia, shew plainly that our act in securing them was not the cause of the king's taking up arms, and exercising hostility upon his loving and loyal subjects, which was in the thoughts and endeavours of those about the king; who then had, and still have, the greatest influence upon his councils, before we thought of Hull, or the Militia, or any thing else of that nature; and then that our resigning of them, now, would not prevail with him to make him lay down his arms, and return to his parliament, and gratify the earnest and longing desires of his people, to enjoy his presence, favour, and protection: but that if he could recover, either by our resignation, or any other way, a place of so much advantage to him, and weakening to us, use would be made of it to our infinite prejudice and ruin; the intention being still the same, not to rest satisfied with having Hull, or taking away the Ordinance of the Militia; but to destroy the parliament, and be masters of our religion and liberties; to make us slaves, and alter the government of this kingdom, and reduce it to the condition of some other countries, which are not governed by parliaments, and so not by laws; but by the will of the prince, or rather of those who are about him.—Yet willingly would we give his majesty satisfaction in these particulars, (and so have we offered it) could we be secured that, by disarming ourselves, and delivering them up to his majesty, (as the sword of justice is already put into the hands of divers Popish and other ill-affected persons, by putting them into the commission of the peace, and other commissions; and putting out others that are well-affected) we should not, to our own destruction, put the military sword into the hands of those evil Counsellors and ill-affected persons, who are so prevalent with his majesty; Papists many of them, or very late converts, by taking the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance; for which they may very well have a dispensation, or indulgence, to be enabled thereby to promote so great a service for the Popish cause, as to destroy the two houses of Parliament, and, through their sides, the Protestant religion.—But we have too just cause to believe and know, considering those continued designs upon us, and the composition of the king's army and of his council at this time, that these things are desired to be made use of to our destruction, and the destruction of that which we are bound, by our Protestation, to defend; and woe to us if we do it not, at least do our utmost endeavour in it, for the discharge of our duties and the saving of our souls, and leave the success to God Almighty.—Therefore we, the lords and commons, are resolved to expose our lives and fortunes for the defence and maintenance of the true Religion, the king's person, honour, and estate, the power and privilege of parliament, and the just rights and liberties of the subject; and also for the prevention of the most mischievous design, which gives motion to all the rest, and hath been so strongly pursued these many years, the altering of our religion; which if God in his mercy had not miraculously diverted, long ago had we been brought to the condition of poor Ireland, weltering in our own blood and confusion. And we do here require all those who have any sense of piety, honour, or compassion, to help a distressed state; especially such as have taken the Protestation, and are bound in the same duty with us unto their God, their king, and country, to come in to our aid and assistance: this being the true cause for which we raise an army, under the command of the earl of Essex; with whom, in this quarrel, we will live and die."

^a The lord Digby was taken on board this ship, in the character of a Frenchman; and under that disguise, pretending he could give informations of the most private circumstances of the king's designs, was introduced to Sir John Hotham; to whom he afterwards discovered himself; and even proposed to him surrendering up of Hull to his majesty, which the governor promised his utmost endeavours to effect: but the project, at this time, proved abortive. Lord Clarendon gives a very true account of this extraordinary negotiation, vol. ii. p. 705. In the Commons Journals he is taken of a Frenchman's being on board the ship Providence, who was ordered to be secured.

Portsmouth declares for the King. Aug. 4. Both houses were still busy in giving out written Instructions for their deputy lieutenants in several counties; and in granting indemnities to cities, towns, and even to particular persons, who had any ways signalized themselves in their service. Some places, however, had the resolution to declare for the king; amongst which the important town of Portsmouth was one, whose governor, colonel Goring, had not only declared himself against the parliament; given an oath to the garrison there for that purpose, and those that would not take it he had thrust out of the town; but also, as the commons were informed, taken in to the fort many Papists with provisions.—This intelligence was communicated to the lords this day, at a conference, by the commons; who likewise said, They had considered the best way to reduce this town was to sere the Isle of Wight, whose governor, the Earl of Portland, they suspected, because his wife, they said, was a recusant, her brother being a Maligant, and his brother in the town of Portsmouth. That the commons looked upon this earl to be, legally, a person not fit for that command; because the custody of the town belonged to the earl of Pembroke, as lord of that shire. Lastly, They desired the Earl of Portland might be put into safe custody, and he was committed to the keeping of one of the sheriffs of London for the present; but, a day or two after, on suspicion that he was concerned in the surrender of Portsmouth to the king, he was sent to the Tower.

Aug. 5. The lords were informed by the commons, at a conference, That the marquis Hertford, sir Ralph Hopton, capt. John By, and several other gentlemen, were gone into the West of England, in order to the king's Commission of Array in execution, by force: that the commons had expelled Ralph Hopton, and the rest of their names concerned in this affair, and had sent for them as delinquents; and left it to their lords for consideration what to do with theirs.—The lords ordered, That the marquis of Hertford, with the lords Pawlet and Seymour should be sent for as delinquents, for using force, to the terror of the people, in putting the Commission of Array in execution; and that the sheriffs do apprehend them; the lord lieutenants and deputy lieutenants to be aiding and assisting therein.

Aug. 8. Mr. Pym reported from the committee for the Defence of the Kingdom, 'That an Ordinance was made to pass both houses, that the lord lieutenants to raise forces in counties to oppose those traitorous persons that are against the parliament, and with them fight;' which was read and agreed to.—The day another Ordinance was passed for appointing sir Henry Vane, jun. to be treasurer of the navy: the earl of Essex was, also, appointed lord lieutenant of the county of Hereford and the lord Dacres; and lord Say and the county of Gloucestershire, in the room of lord Mandois who had joined the king, and since executed his majesty's Commission of Array in that county.

Sentence passed upon the Lord Mayor.

Aug. 10. The lords took into consideration the sentence given against the lord mayor, upon the impeachment of the commons. And, after mature deliberation of the whole matter, whether it be fit or safe that he be governor of the city at this time, they came to the following Resolutions. Resolved, 1. "That the lord mayor caused the illegal Proclamation, for the Commission of Array, to be published. 2. That the Petition, charged in the Impeachment to be sent to the king, was by the lord mayor's procurement. 3. That the lord mayor did not suppress the Riot, but did countenance it. 4. That the lord mayor did refuse to call a common council at the time both houses of parliament did command him to do it."—These matters of fact being resolved, the lords gave the following Sentence on him: 1. "That sir Richard Gurney, knight, and bart. lord mayor of the city of London, shall be deprived of that office. 2. That he shall, hereafter, be incapable of holding any office in the city. 3. That he shall be incapable to bear or receive any further honour hereafter. 4. That he shall be imprisoned in the Tower of London during the pleasure of this house."—This Sentence against the lord mayor was pronounced, with the usual ceremony, by the lord Kimbolton.

The King proclaims the earl of Essex, and his Adherents, Rebels. August 11. A letter came from the king, directed to the Speaker of the house of lords, with a Proclamation inclosed, commanding that it should be read: which was done accordingly. The Proclamation had this title, 'For suppressing the present Rebellion, under the command of Robert earl of Essex; and the gracious offers of his majesty's free pardon to him and all such his adherents, as, within six days after date hereof, should lay down their arms. Dated at the Court at York, Aug. 9, 1642.' After this was read, the earl of Essex stood up and said, 'That he was made general by the desire, command, and authority of both houses of parliament, and not of his own seeking; and he protested, that his actions should shew him as dutiful a subject as any the king had.'—The lords took this matter to be of high concernment, as the threatening and proclaiming of both houses of parliament rebels; and resolved to have a conference with the commons. This conference was held the same day, and the report of it made in the house of commons, by sir Robert Harley, was to this effect:

"The lord Kimbolton said, That the lords desired this conference to acquaint the commons with a Letter and a Proclamation they had received from the king: that there needed no language to it: if there had, the lords would have chosen a better Speaker; but the words gave advantage sufficient, which he was to read unto them, and then give the sense of the lords upon it. After the Letter and Proclamation were read, his lordship proceeded and said, There needed no great expression to make them sensible of this Proclamation; they heard the earl of Essex was proclaimed a traitor, and all commanders under him, and all that adhered unto them; and, in those, the parliament and the honest party of the kingdom were proclaimed traitors: that these were big words of terror; but the lords had well considered the grounds before they entered into this action; which was for the maintenance of the law, religion, liberty of the subject, and privilege of parliament: upon which grounds they commanded him to let them know, that, with one consent, they resolved to go on with yet greater vigour than before.—The earl of Essex spoke next, at the conference, and said much the same as he had before to the lords, except adding, 'That he was as ready to adventure his life for defence of the law, as the other great general for the breach of it.'

The Parliament resolve to support them with their Lives and Fortunes.] After hearing this report, the commons immediately voted, "That whereas the parliament had formerly chosen the earl of Essex to be captain-general of such forces as were or should be raised, for the maintenance and preservation of the true Protestant religion, the king's person, the laws of the land, the peace of the kingdom, the liberty and property of the subject, and the rights and privileges of parliament; this house doth now declare, That they will maintain and assist him, and adhere unto him, with their lives and fortunes, in the same cause."

Memorandum, When this Question was put, every man rose up in his place, one after another, and gave a distinct Answer to it. And it was resolved, That such members as were absent should also declare themselves, from time to time, at their coming into the house.

The Marquis of Hertford, &c. impeached.] Aug. 13. Sir Rob. Harley brought up to the lords an Impeachment of the commons against Wm. marquis of Hertford, Spencer earl of Northampton, and Henry Hastings, esq. second son to the earl of Huntingdon, for High Treason, in actually levying war against the king and kingdom; and desired that speedy proceedings might be had against them, according to law and justice. On this the lords directed a Proclamation, and Writs to be sent out to the sheriff, to summon the said lords to appear at the bar of the house on the 29th instant, to answer to this Impeachment, sub pœna convictionis.

The Parliament's Answer to the King's last Proclamation.] A Declaration and Resolution of parliament, in answer to the king's late Proclamation against the earl of Essex, &c. was this day read and agreed to by both houses; wherein they solemnly profess, "That they will really endeavour to make both his majesty and his posterity as great, rich, and potent; as much beloved at home and feared abroad as any prince that ever swayed the British sceptre, on condition that he will immediately disband all his forces; abandon and leave to condign punishment his wicked counsellors; (who have now advised and prevailed with his majesty, by this Proclamation, to invite his subjects to destroy his parliament and good people by a Civil War; and, by that means, to bring ruin, confusion, and perpetual slavery upon the surviving part of a then wretched kingdom) and return and hearken to the wholesome advice of his parliament."

*The King's Message to the Commons, upon their taking 100,000*l.* from the Supplies for Ireland.*] Aug. 16. The commons received the following Message from the King, dated from the court at York the 13th of this month:

"His majesty taking notice of an Order lately made by the house of commons, whereby that house hath unduly assumed to themselves authority to order, direct, and dispose of 100,000*l.* (part of those monies, which the adventurers for the reducing of the rebels of Ireland have paid to that end and only to that purpose) to other uses and intents, contrary to the express words of the act of parliament concerning the same; wherein it is enacted, 'That no part of the money which should be paid in, according to that act, shall be employed to any other purpose than the reducing of these rebels, until they shall be declared to be subdued;' out of his piety and princely care for the confirming and re-establishment of God's true religion in that his kingdom of Ireland, for the relief of his distressed subjects there, for the suppressing of that horrid and bloody Rebellion, and for the supply and payment of his army there, now in great want and necessity, doth strictly require the house of commons, as they will answer the contrary to Almighty God, his majesty, and those that have trusted them, That they immediately retract that mischievous, illegal, and unjust Order, wherein his majesty expecteth their speedy answer and obedience: and the rather that he may, thereby, be secured, that such part of the 400,000*l.* as is, or shall be, collected from his good subjects of England, by virtue of the late act of parliament, whereby the same is granted, may not likewise, under false pretences, be diverted from its proper use for which it was intended; and mis-employed, to the disturbance of the peace of this kingdom in a war against his sacred majesty."

The Commons Answer to the King's Charge. Soon after the following Answer of the house of commons to this Message was, by them, ordered to be printed and published:

"The house of commons having received Message from his majesty of the 13th of Aug. last, whereby they are required to retract an Order made by them, for the borrowing of 100,000*l.* of the Adventurers Money for Ireland, supposing that Order very prejudicial to the affairs of Ireland, and contrary to an act of parliament made this present session; and in the first place, declare, That these directions given by his majesty, for the retracting of this Order, is an high breach of the privilege of parliament: and that they cannot, without a deep sense of sorrow, call to mind how Popish and Prelatical counsels did so far prevail with his maj. that two armies were brought within the bowels of this kingdom, and two Protestant nations ready to welter in each others blood: that when both those armies had been a long time defrayed at the charge of the poor commons of England, and, at length, by God's blessing upon the endeavours of the parliament, quietly disbanded, the same wicked counsels, prevented of that design, did soon after raise this bloody and barbarous Rebellion in Ireland: the suppressing whereof, for the better colour, was recommended to the care of the parliament; who, out of a fellow-feeling of the unspeakable miseries of their Protestant bremen there, (not suspecting this horrid Plot, & two apparent) did cheerfully undertake at great work; and do really intend and endeavour to settle the Protestant religion, and a permanent peace in that realm; to the glory of God, the great honour and profit of his majesty, and security of his three kingdoms; but as they have been discouraged, retarded, and diverted in and from this pious and glorious work, by those traitorous counsels about his majesty, will appear by many particulars, some whereof they shall, upon this just occasion, call to remembrance.—That when the lords and commons had, upon the first breaking out of the Rebellion, immediately provided and sent over 20,000 l. and engaged themselves for the whole kingdom for the reducing of the rebels: yet his majesty, after his return from Ireland to London, was not pleased, either by word or message, to take notice of it, until he came in the house of commons had truly served how forward those mischievous counsellors were to incite his maj. against his Protestant subjects of Scotland, and how slow to prevent the proceeding of his Papist traitors in Ireland.—That although the rebels had most confidently stiled themselves ‘The Queen’s maj.’ and professed that the cause of their king was, to maintain the king’s prerogative and the queen’s religion, against the ‘Puritan Parliament of England;’ and that thereupon the houses of parliament did, humbly and modestly, advise his maj. to wipe away this dangerous scandal, by proclaiming them rebels and traitors to his majesty and the crown of England; which then would have mated and weakened the conspirators in the beginning, and have encouraged both the parliament here, and good people there, the more vigorously to have opposed their proceedings: yet such was the power of those counsels, that no Proclamation was set forth to that purpose, until almost months after the breaking out of this Rebellion; and then command given that but 40 could be printed, nor they published till further directions should be given by his majesty. That after both houses of parliament had sent out a probable way to reduce the kingdom of Ireland, by the adventure of private men, without any charge to the subject in general; and which, they are very confident, could have brought in a million of money, had his maj. continued in or near London: those malicious whisperers, that durst not hinder the passing of the bill, which was so specious in itself and so generally approved, yet have, by notice, by keeping him at his distance, and adding him to make war upon his people, so intimidated and discouraged the adventurers, and others that would have adventured, that they have rendered that good bill in a manner ineffectual.—That the parliament and adventurers had, long since, designed 5000 foot and 600 horse for the relief of Munster, to be sent a brigade, under the command of the lord Burton; had made choice of and listed all the commanders, and prepared money, arms, and other provision for that expedition, and all to be at the charge of the adventurers: and when nothing was wanting but a commission to the lord Wharton, to enable him for that service, such was the power of those counsels, that no commission could be obtained from his majesty; by reason whereof Limerick was wholly lost, and the province of Munster is now in very great distress.—That when divers pious and well-affected persons had prepared 12 ships and 6 pinnaces, with 1000, or more, land forces, at their own charge, by way of adventure, for the service of Ireland, and desired nothing but a commission from his maj. to enable them thereunto; that commission, after twice sending to York for the same, and the ships lying ready to set sail for 3 weeks together, at the charge of near 300 l. a day, was likewise denied; and those adventurers, rather than lose their expedition, were constrained to go by virtue of an Ordinance of both houses of parliament.—That although the lords justices of Ireland have 3 months since, earnestly desired to have two pieces of battery sent over, as very necessary for that service; yet such commands are given to the officers of the Tower, that none of his maj.’s ordnance must be sent to save his maj.’s kingdom.—That although, whilst the earl of Leicester staid here in the service of the parliament, and in providing for his long-expected voyage into Ireland, a Message was sent to the parliament from his majesty, to hasten him away; and letters were written to the said earl from his majesty, that he should make no stay at York for his dispatch, but that his Instructions should be ready for him against he came; and although it is notoriously known that the affairs of Ireland do exceedingly suffer by wanting the personal assistance of a commander in chief, to give both life and motion to the army there: yet the said earl hath been stayed with his majesty, in the North, a month and more, and, as yet, can get no dispatch.—That, notwithstanding the bleeding condition of Ireland, yet divers commanders and officers in pay, and in actual employment there against the rebels, have been called away from that important service, by the express command of his majesty; as Charles Lloyd, engineer and quartermaster-general of the army in Ireland, and divers others. That capt. Green, comptroller of the artillery, a man in pay, and principally employed and trusted here by the lord-lieut. of Ireland, for the providing and ordering the train of artillery which was to be sent to Dublin, and who had received great sums of money for that purpose, was commanded from that employment and trust, to serve his maj. in this most unnatural war against his loyal and best-affected people.—That the parliament having made great provision of cloaths for the poor soldiers in Ireland, for their present succour, and sending 600 suits, part thereof, towards Chester, the last week; the man that undertook the carriage of them, one

Wm. Whitaker by name, was assaulted by his majesty's cavaliers, then lying about Coventry; who took away these 600 suits of cloaths, and the waggon and horses of the poor man, although they were told that the 600 suits of cloaths were for the soldiers in Ireland; and notwithstanding the poor carrier was, five times, with the earl of Northampton, to beg a release of his waggon.—That 300 suits of cloaths, with a chirurgeon's chest of medicaments, being likewise sent for Ireland by one Rd. Owfield, who was employed by the parliament to carry them to Chester; a troop of his majesty's cavaliers, under the command of one capt. Middleton, met with them upon the road, and took away the cloaths and chirurgeon's chest, together with the poor carrier's horses and waggon, for his majesty's pretended service here. That a great number of draught horses, prepared by the parliament for the artillery and baggage of the Irish army, were sent to Chester for that purpose; and being there, attending a passage, are now required by his maj. for his said present service in England. That his majesty's forces are so quartered in and about the common roads to Ireland, that neither money, cloaths, victuals, or other provision, can pass thither by land with any safety. That capt. Kettleby the admiral, and sir H. Straddling the vice-admiral, of the ships which were directed to lie upon the coast of Ireland, to annoy the rebels, and to prevent the bringing to them ammunition and relief from foreign parts, are both called away from that employment, by his majesty's command; and, by reason of their departure from the coast of Munster, to which they were designed, the rebels there have received powder, ammunition, and other relief from foreign parts; by which, and many other particulars too long to relate, it may seem as if those barbarous Irish Rebels are kept on foot and countenanced there, of design to assist the Northern Cavaliers; and, according to the earl of Strafford's unheard-of advice, to have an army in Ireland, with which his maj. may reduce this kingdom; especially considering those confident rebels have presumed, very lately, to send a Petition to his majesty, intitling themselves his majesty's Catholic Subjects of Ireland, and complaining of the 'Puritan Parliament of England;' and desiring, that since his maj. comes not thither according to their expectation, that they may come into England to his majesty; which Petition, we may justly fear, is but a prologue to that tragedy they have designed to act here, in case their coming over be not prevented by the care and vigilancy of the parliament and the good people of England. But lest the house of commons might excuse the making of this Order by way of recrimination, they, for satisfaction to the world, do protest before Almighty God, the Searcher of all Hearts, That they have as great compassion and sorrow for the present sufferings of their distressed brethren in Ireland, as if themselves were in their case; (into which they are confident those horrid traitors, those monsters of men above his majesty, do labour to bring this kingdom) that they have, and shall ever really endeavour, by all possible means, with a due regard to the present state of this kingdom, to supply and support them in this their great affliction, notwithstanding the malice and obstructions of all opposers.—That the house of commons, hereby apprehending the imminent danger of the kingdom, and finding that whilst they were active here to subdue the Rebels of Ireland, there were Papists, traitors and delinquents, more active in the North, to conquer and destroy the parliament and good people of England, thought it necessary to provide for the safety both, by preparing a competent army for the defence of king and kingdom; and although multitudes of well-affected persons had cheerfully brought in great store of plate for that purpose, yet in regard the plate could not be coined with such expedition as the importance of the service did require; and well knowing that 100,000*l.* might, for a short time, be borrowed out of the Adventurers Money for Ireland, without any prejudice to the affairs of that kingdom, whose subsistence depends upon the welfare of this; and, resolving to make a real and speedy repayment of what money should be so borrowed, did make this Order: which, that it might appear to all the world to be neither mischievous, illegal, nor unjust (as his majesty, by the instigation of those malignant whisperers, is pleased to term it) the house of commons thought fit to recite in hæc verba; and, instead of retracting the Order, to repay the money with all possible speed:

'July 30, 1642. It is this day ordered by the commons house of parliament, That the treasurers, appointed to receive the monies come in upon the subscription for Ireland, do forthwith furnish, by way of loan, unto the committee of lords and commons, for the defence of the kingdom, the sum of 100,000*l.* for the Supply of the public necessity, for the defence of the king, parliament and kingdom, upon the public faith; to be repaid, duly and carefully, within so short a time that it shall not be converted from the purpose for which it was intended, or any way frustrate the acts already made in the behalf of that adventure.—By which Order, and that which hath been here truly set down, it will easily appear to all indifferent people of his majesty's three kingdoms, whether the king and his Cavaliers, or the king and his Parliament, do most affect and endeavour the settling of true religion, and a firm and constant peace within that bleeding and distressed kingdom.'

Letter concerning the State of Affairs in Yorkshire.] August 18. The lord Kimbolton reported the effect of a conference, held yesterday with the commons, about Affairs in Yorkshire: when a letter was read, directed to Mr Philip Stapylton, member of parliament for Boroughbridge, as follows:

"Sir; The State of Affairs in this county is of so high importance to the general good of the whole land, as we conceive them requisite to be represented to the houses of parliament; and to receive directions, from thence, as may abide the well-affected subjects in such ways as conduce to the establishment of peace here and elsewhere: and, to that end, the committee, when they returned to the parliament, promised frequent intercourses; and that those, who should be employed from hence upon such occasions, should find a good reception. The gentlemen of the county, having met here at York, this day and yesterday, did resolve it necessary to send the bearer hereof with a view of the present condition of this country, which we desire you to make known to the house; as you shall find it necessary.—His majesty hath now withdrawn all his forces from Hull and Beverley, and sent most part of his horse towards Newark and Nottingham; intending to set up his standard at Nottingham on the 2d of this month: and, by Proclamation, commands all men's attendance on his person; and the Proclamation, which the bearer will deliver, doth more fully inform. His army, at his present, consists especially of horse, which he intended to be about 4000, in several regiments; in which number, we conceive, are not included the 400 horse, which certain of the gentry of Yorkshire promise to raise, nor the main of the count estimated at 500 horse: for our forces here are very few visible, and those of the scum of the country, being raised by beating drums for volunteers: yet it is said, that the proportion is 13,000 foot, though, in discourse, they declare as if 5000 foot will be sufficient for the design; but what it is, or against whom, we know not, otherwise than that it is expressed, in the Proclamation, for raising the Standard: for if it were in defence of the Protestant religion, the laws of the land, and the privileges of parliament, so often repeated, we conceive the Papists, who hate them all, would not so much rejoice, and shew themselves so forward to assist the service; nor make so frequent resort, as now they do, to the parts from Ireland, Lancashire, and all parts of Yorkshire: and, besides, we observe the king hath sent out Warrants to call to the service all Recusants horse and arms; and many Recusants, to makethemselves capable of commands, do resort to church.—It is given out, that the king goes Southward on Tuesday next, though that we can write no certainly: but, whenever he goes away from hence, he leaves the earl of Cumberland to govern these Northern Counties; with authority to raise forces for defence of them, and a council of war to assist; to terrify the subjects, and constrain obedience to his government. It is to be accompanied with a Commission of oyer and terminer, and this parliament and council are to reside at York.—You have already heard how the gentry of this county were summoned to appear before his majesty, at York, the 4th of this month; where his maj. made certain Propositions to them which you have since seen in print: whereupon the earl of Cumberland, lord Saville, lord Fauconberg, all or most of the Commissioners of Array, and divers other gentlemen of the county, met in the Deanry at York; and there framed the Petition sent up by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Maude to the parliament: which, though it was carried then with much secrecy, yet is now divulged; and disliked by a great number of the gentry of this county, who will protest against it in writing so soon as they can meet with a conveniency: yet they which framed it resolve to maintain it, and hold meetings and consultations at the Deanry at York; where they treat of matters of dangerous and high consequence, and contrary to the laws of the land and the liberty of the subject; that is to say,—To join in Associations with other neighbouring counties, to maintain the Petition aforesaid, and to raise an army of horse and foot, for defence of the county under the command of the earl of Cumberland, to be laid about York, and to be paid by the country: To obtain of the king an able soldier to command in this army, under the earl, to whom they intend the country shall allow entertainment; to constrain all persons to contribute to the charge of this army, and to distrain upon such as refuse it. And, to disable the subjects to oppose or defend themselves against this oppression, they intend to disarm and imprison all such gentlemen as shall not consent with them; and they have especially designed to imprison a great number of gentlemen, who they suppose will give opposition to their Trained Bands, in every regiment; and intend to disarm more of them where they find danger of opposition: sir John Mallory, for his regiment, hath already caused both money to be furnished to his soldiers by the constables, and arms to be taken from the people.—These Propositions and Consultations, which are generally spoken of, do not a little perplex the well-affected subjects; and their fears increase by divers particular affronts, and attempts made upon the gentry of this county, by the troops and others of the king's army; as the pilaging of divers gentlemen's houses about Hull, and plundering sir Henry Cholmley's house, near Selby, on Sunday last; and Mr. George Marwood's house, near Knaresborough, 12 miles from York, on Wednesday last. In this of Mr. Marwood's we will relate some particulars, for your better information: It was done in the day time, and by 24 horse or thereabouts; part stayed beyond the Nid running close by the house, part entered the house, and others kept watch that none should come to hinder their attempts: they threatened Mrs. Marwood and her servants with death, to discover where her husband was; and swore they would cut him in pieces before her face, and called her 'Protestant Whore,' and 'Puritan Whore;' they searched all the house, broke open 17 locks, and took away all the money, being about 120*l*. and all his plate they could find; and pretended they had the king's warrant for their so doing, which the king disavows; and his maj. is very much offended to have his name so abused, and threatens to have them all hanged if they be discovered: and though it be Mr. Marwood's lot to suffer first, yet the loose people threaten to pillage and destroy all the Round-Heads, and name some particular persons; under which foolish name, Round-Heads, they comprehend all such as do not go their ways.* These beginnings and preparations of misery are necessary to be made known to all the kingdom, that the good subjects may stand upon their guard; for though we may assure ourselves that the king will endeavour to preserve us, yet we find it is impossible to restrain the malice and rage of bloody Papists and faithless Atheists; and, in time, these mischiefs will approach other parts, though, for the present, we only lie in the mouth of danger.—Now towards the Redress of these growing evils, securing the peace of this county, and preservation of those peaceable subjects intended to be disarmed and left naked to the fury of every malicious adversary, we offer to your considerations the Propositions following; viz. That an Order be conceived in parliament, and declared, that all the kingdom may take notice of it, to this effect: That all well-affected and good subjects, that shall be plundered, pillaged, or suffer in their estates by any of the Cavaliers, or other forces raised without consent of parliament, shall have full reparation of their damages out of the estates of such persons of wealth and quality, whose fortunes, being in the South, do now reside in Yorkshire; and who with their presence and assistance, do countenance and further these distempers of the kingdom, and the mischiefs that do happen, and are like to increase. That there may be speedily sent to Hull, a sufficient proportion of powder, arms, ordnance, and other ammunition, with an order to furnish the country with them as there shall be occasion; especially such as shall be disarmed upon the consultations held in the deanery at York. That Commissions be speedily sent down from the earl of Essex, lord lieut. of this county, to the gentlemen named in this inclosed Paper, or such of them as the house shall elect for the present, to raise and command the forces of this county, for suppressing of any insurrection and unlawful tumults that may happen to arise. That the sheriff be commanded, by special order of parliament, to conduct and assist as the house conceives fitting. This List of gentlemen for commanding the country forces is not intended to disappoint any of trust or command, who are already nominated and intrusted by the parliament; nor are they intended to be continued longer than until some other provisions, by an act, be concluded on by the king and parliament for settling and ordering the Militia. And lastly, it is the desire of the well-affected in this county to receive weekly advertisements from thence by some specially employed for that purpose, until affairs be settled as we may safely confide in the ordinary post; for now we neither rightly understand the proceedings of the house, nor can we represent to them such matters as concern the peace of this county. All which we hope you will be pleased to represent to the house, as the unanimous considerations of a great number of the gentry of this county. And we remain your affectionate, &c. York, August 12, 1642. P. S. The Grand Jury, this Assizes, consist for the most part of such as give occasion to suspect that there is some extraordinary business to be presented; but of all the sheriff excuseth himself, and saith the pannel, returned by him, was viewed and corrected by the Judge a fortnight before the assize."

* In the foregoing month is the first instance we meet with of the Royalists being distinguished by the name of Cavaliers; and this is the first of the Parliament's Party being called Round-Heads.

The lord Kimbolton further reported, That the commons offered to their lordships consideration, a Proclamation from the king, requiring the aid and assistance of his majesty's subjects on the North side Trent, and within 20 miles Southward thereof, for the suppressing of the rebels now marching against him, and that thereupon the commons desired,—
"That a committee of both houses may be appointed to draw up a Declaration, and then to set down the unjust grounds of this Proclamation. 2. To consider the desperate Propositions of those that do meet at the deanery York's house. 3. To consider of the Propositions of the gentlemen of Yorkshire. 4. That the foregoing Letter may be printed and published."

The Parliament declare all such as assist the King, Traitors.] His lordship added, That the commons also desired their concurrence in an Ordinance, declaring all men Traitors that assist his majesty in this war; which was as follows:

"Whereas the king, seduced by evil counsel, doth make war against his parliament and people, intending to make himself an absolute Conqueror of these kingdoms, if not timely prevented; and, for the promoting this war, divers forces of horse and foot have been levied, and are raised, by several parties, and his majesty's good subjects are most cruelly robbed, spoiled, and slain: to the end that no man may be misled through ignorance, the lords and commons in parliament declared, that all such persons as shall, upon any pretence whatsoever, assist his maj. in this war of horse, arms, plate, or money, are traitors to his majesty, the parliament, and the kingdom, and shall be brought to condign punishment for so high an offence."—To all these proposals of the commons the lords gave their consent, nem. con.

Sir R. Gurney removed from his Office Lord Mayor.] This day the lords were informed, That, according to their Order, Nich. Raynton, senior alderman of London, called a common-hall, and that the citizens had elected alderman Pennington their new mayor; and it was necessary and content with the antient customs of the city, that he be sworn and presented at Westminster, &c. That the city having sent to sir R. Gurney for the sword, cap, mace, and collar SS's, he pretended that they were locked up in his house, and he could not come at them: being asked, again, Whether he would deliver them if he had them? he denied to deliver the sword to any but the king from whom he received it. Upon this it was, first ordered, that the thanks of the house should be given sir Nich. Haynton and the rest of the aldermen, for their cheerful, ready, and orderly obedience to the commands of this house: that they approved of alderman Pennington for lord mayor, as his good affections were well known to be for king, kingdom, and privileges of parliament: that he should have the usual he given him by the court of aldermen; and the barons of the Exchequer should attend the next day for the lord mayor to be presented with sword, &c. and, if he be denied, to break in any doors or locks whatsoever, and possess himself of them, and deliver them to alderman Pennington, now lord mayor elect of the city of London." The next day the gentlemen gave the lords this account, "That, according to their Order, he had taken out of sir R. Gurney's study four swords, belonging to the city, one cap of maintenance, one embroidered crimson cap, one collar of SS's, with a great jewel and a pendant pearl, and one great sword, belonging to the city; all which particulars he had delivered to the lord mayor elect: I had his receipt for them."

Mr. Oliver Cromwell prevents the University of Cambridge from sending their Plate to King. August 19. This day, we find a set of Instructions entered in the Lords Journals, directed to OLIVER CROMWELL, esq; John Sherwood, mayor of Cambridge, for which the former was representative in parliament; and 3 aldermen, appointed to take care of the peace and safety of the said town: authorizing them to train and exercise all the armed Bands and volunteers in that town; to lead and conduct them against all attempts that attempt to seize upon the place, or disturb the peace of it: and further, they are hereby authorized to fight with all such persons, and kill and slay them; and by all means, to preserve their town from all hostile attempts whatsoever, &c. Pursuant to these Instructions, the commons had, soon after, intelligence, That Mr. Cromwell had seized on magazines in the castle of Cambridge; and hindered the carrying off Plate, from that city, to the value, as some reported, of 1000*l*. And the next day, an Ordinance was made for the indemnity of Oliver Cromwell, esq; and the persons concerned with him therein; and also further authorizing him and them to make stay of all such Plate, belonging to any of the colleges in the university of Cambridge, as shall be, hereafter, endeavoured to be carried to the king to maintain a war against the parliament.

A Declaration of Parliament, occasioned by the late Letter from Yorkshire. August 20. A Declaration of Parliament was agreed to, on the basis of the last Letter from Yorkshire, and was as follows:

"We the lords and commons in parliament assembled, have perused and seriously considered a Letter sent from many of the principal knights, gentlemen, and other inhabitants of the county of York: directed to a worthy knight of that county, being a member of the house of commons; and intended for the information of both houses of parliament, concerning his majesty's purpose of 'raising his Standard at Nottingham,' the present state of the Northern parts, and the growing mischiefs and miseries like to overwhelm the whole kingdom, by the great oppressions exercised upon his majesty's subjects there; and other unlawful and dangerous counsels and proceedings of those, who, under pretence of his majesty's service, are laying the foundation of an arbitrary and tyrannical government, or rather confusion and desolation, not only in those parts, but in the whole kingdom: upon which and other informations and discoveries, we think fit to publish and declare some few Observations, whereby the good subjects of this kingdom may better discern their own danger; and be stirred up with more earnestness to assist us in the maintenance of religion and of the common justice and liberty of the kingdom, which seems to be in no less hazard than if we had an army of the Irish rebels in the bowels of the land. The first Observation is this; That now it plainly appears to the world, that there was good ground of those Fears and Jealousies, so often expressed by both houses, that his majesty intended to make war against his parliament; and that the Oaths, Protestations, and Execrations, published in his majesty's name, disclaiming any such purpose of war, were nothing but the devices of those wicked counsellors about him; that, under such disguises and pretensions of peace, they might more closely arm and prepare themselves for war, and by violence suppress the parliament; and so to make way for the accomplishment of their own designs, for the alteration of religion and the government of the kingdom.—The second; That this war is said to be for the defence of the Protestant religion; and yet the most diligent assistants and promoters of it are Papists, and that corrupt and superstitious part of the clergy that were running towards Popery; wherein the Papists are so frequent, that they not only send in horse and arms, but the better to qualify their persons for this present service, many heretofore constant Recusants, do now resort to church, and take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance. And with

what affections they look upon the reformed religion, is evident in the speeches of those who robbed Mr. Marwood's house, calling his wife Protestant Whore and Puritan, she being a very virtuous gentlewoman, and of good quality; only the hatred of religion was it which provoked them to such ignominious language, which by those Popish Cavaliers is prosecuted under the name of Roundhead, as it hath been by the Prelatical Clergy under the name of Puritan.—A third; That arms were taken from the honest gentlemen, yeomen, and townsmen; and put into the hands of such desperate persons, as cannot live but by rapine and spoil.—A fourth; That notwithstanding all the Vows and Protestations to govern by law, which have been dispersed throughout the kingdom, to blind and deceive the people, the most mischievous principles of tyranny are practised that ever were invented; that is, to disarm the middle sort of people, who are the body of the kingdom, and to maintain soldiers by forced contributions; to erect a provincial government in the North, clearly against the common law, and the judgment given in this parliament for taking away the court at York: that the contrivers and instruments of these mischiefs, for their better strengthening in these designs, are about to join themselves in an association with other counties: and that directions are given, that such as shall oppose, or not join with them, shall be violently plundered and pillaged.—For the Prevention of these growing evils and mischiefs, the lords and commons do declare, That all well-affected and good subjects, who shall be plundered, pillaged, and suffer in their estates, by any of the Cavaliers, or other forces raised without consent of parliament, shall have such reparation of their damages, out of the estates of those who have been actors and counsellors in such violences; and likewise out of the estates of all such persons in any part of the kingdom whatsoever, who have withdrawn themselves to York, and shall persist to serve the king in this war against the parliament, by any subscription, or contribution, or otherwise have given assistance and countenance to the maintenance of it.—That it shall be lawful for any number of persons to join together, and to defend themselves and others from rapine and force: and the earl of Essex (lord-general of the forces raised by the lords and commons, for the defence of our religion and liberty, and for protection of the oppressed subjects of this kingdom, and lieutenant of the county York) is desired to grant such commissions for levying, leading, and conducting of forces in the Northern parts, as shall be thought requisite by his excellency: and sir John Hotham, governor of Hull, is required to give all kind of assistance, by the garrison of the town, and by furnishing them with powder, arms, and other ammunition as he can spare. And for the better enabling of them in this their necessary defence, it is resolved, That further supplies of arms shall be sent thither as speedily as may be: that the sheriff of the county of York, and the sheriffs of the adjoining counties, and all lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, mayors, justices of the peace, and other his majesty's officers and loving subjects, be aiding and assisting them, in defence of his majesty's subjects from all oppression and violence, with the power of the counties and Trained Bands.—That it shall be lawful for all lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, and head officers of corporations, to disarm all Popish Recusants; and all other his majesty's subjects are to be assisting unto them: and that it shall be lawful for any of his majesty's subjects to seize upon the persons of all such as shall execute the late Commission of Array or shall be actors and assistants in any of the aforementioned oppressions and violences; or shall furnish any arms, money, or other aid or contribution, for the maintenance of this unnatural war, raised by his majesty against his parliament; and to seize upon their horses, arms, money, and other provisions, whereby they might be enabled to disturb the peace of the kingdom.”

Coventry summoned by the King.] Aug. 22. The lords received intelligence, That the king lay then before Coventry, and was playing upon the town with his ordinance, on account of their denying his majesty entrance, and shutting their gates against him.

The Earl of Bath's Reasons for not attending the Parliament.] Aug. 23. A Letter from the earl of Bath to the Speaker of the house of lords, was read:

“My lord; I received last night a summons from your honourable house, requiring my attendance there on Monday next, Aug. 22, according to his majesty's writ. It is true I am summoned, at the beginning of this parliament, as of right I ought; and did not fail to give attendance upon that service, with as much diligence and affection to the public as my inability could express; but I received many interruptions, by scorn, menaces, and abuse from the people inhabiting about London, Westminster, contrary to the constitutional privileges of that and all other councils; and the members ought to come, sit, and retire with honour and safety: and I do not wonder that I may hope for better usage: when I shall humbly desire their lordships to excuse my absence, until I may have some countenance of enjoying that honour and safety, which heretofore I have not had. And so, with respect to your lordship, I remain, &c. Bath, Tavistock, Aug. 15. 1642.”

Ordered, That the earl of Bath should be sent for as a Delinquent. And, upon further information that he had great store of powder in his house in Devonshire, it was ordered, That search should be made for such powder or stores, and the same kept safe till the pursure of the house should be further known.

The King sets up his Standard at Readingham.] This day the lords received intelligence, That the city of Coventry having been managed to hold out against the king, by the arrival of 300 men from Birmingham, and by receiving advice that Mr. Hampden, Mr. Denail, and Mr. Goodwin (who had taken out several commissions under the earl of Essex) were marching to their relief, his majesty's forces drew off, and departed towards Nottingham, in order to set up his Standard there. Although this affair cannot properly be termed Parliamentary Proceeding in itself, yet as it took its rise from thence, we apprehend it no acceptable digression to give some account of the manner of the king's erecting his standard. Mr. Rushworth tells us, "That the king came from Coventry on Monday the 22d of August, in the morning, with some lords and others in company, to Leicester, where he arrived that day at the Abbey; and that presently after dinner his majesty again took horse, and, with his company, rode to Nottingham; where were great preparations for the setting up of the Standard that day, as was formerly appointed. Not long after the king's coming to town, the Standard was taken out of the castle, and carried into the field, a little to the backside of the castle wall. The likeness of the Standard was much of the fashion of the city streamers used at the lord mayor's show, having about 20 supporters, and was carried after the same way; on the top of it hung a flag, the king's arms quartered, with a hand pointing to the crown, which stood above with his motto, 'Give Cæsar his Due.' The names of those knights bannerets who were appointed to bear the Standard, viz. the chief of them, were sir Thos. Brooke, sir Arthur Hopton, sir Francis Wortley, and sir Robt. Doddington. Likewise there were 3 troops of horse to wait upon the Standard, and to bear the same backward and forward, with about 600 foot soldiers. It was conducted to the field in great state, the king, the prince, and prince Rupert (whom is may, had lately made knight of the garter) going along with it, with divers other lords and gentlemen of his majesty's train, besides a great company of horse and foot, in all to the number of about 2000.—So soon as the Standard was set up, and his majesty and the other lords faced about it, a herald at arms made ready to publish a Proclamation, declaring the ground and cause of his majesty's setting up his Standard, namely, to suppress the Rebellion of the earl of Essex, in raising forces against him, to which he required the aid and assistance of all his loving subjects; but before the trumpeters could sound to make proclamation, his majesty called to view the said Proclamation, which being given him, he privately read the same over to himself; and, seeming to dislike some passages therein, called for pen and ink; and, with his own hand, crossed out, and altered the same in some places, and then gave it the Herald; who proclaimed the same to the people, though with some difficulty after his majesty's corrections: after the reading thereof, the whole multitude showed up their hats, and cried, 'God save the King,' with other such-like expressions.—Not long after the reading of the said Proclamation, it being towards night, the Standard was taken down, and again carried into the castle, with the like state as it was brought into the field; and the next day it was set up again, and his majesty came along with it, and made proclamation as the day before; and the like was also done on Wednesday, his majesty being also present; but after that it was set up with less ceremony."—Lord Clarendon's Account of this affair runs thus: "According to the Proclamation, upon the 25th of August, the Standard was erected, about six o'clock in the evening of a very stormy and tempestuous day. The king himself, with a small train, rode to the top of the castle-hill; Verney, the knight-marshal, who was Standard-Bearer, carrying the Standard, which was then erected in that place, with little other ceremony than the sound of drums and trumpets. Melancholy men observed many ill presages about that time. There was not one regiment of foot yet brought thither; so that the Trained Bands, which the sheriff had drawn together, were all the strength the king had for his person and the guard of the Standard. There appeared no conflux of men in obedience to the Proclamation; the arms and ammunition were not yet come from York, and a general sadness covered the whole town. The Standard was blown down the same night it had been set up, by a very strong and unruly wind, and could not be fixed again in a day or two, till the tempest was allayed. This was the melancholy state of the king's affairs when the Standard was set up."—Leaving the reader to reconcile these two accounts, we return to our more certain guides, the Journals of Parliament.

Vol. II.

The E. of Southampton comes from the King, with a Message for Peace. August 27. The earl of Southampton, being sent from the king at Nottingham, came into the house of lords, and took his place; but, being presently commanded to withdraw, went out of the house again. The lords were informed, that the said earl had a Message to deliver to the lords in parliament, from the king; yet, in regard of the manner of his coming into the house without giving any notice of it before, either in one kind or other, the lords did not think fit that the said earl of Southampton should be permitted to deliver the Message; but that he should send it in by the gentleman-usher of this house. Whereupon the usher was sent out to the earl with this Message in writing: "That the lords are not satisfied with the manner of your lordship's coming into the house at this time; they will not therefore receive any Message from your lordship; but, as it comes from his majesty, they are ready to receive it, with all humility; and wish your lordship to send it unto them by the hands of their gentleman-usher." The earl's Answer: "That he desires to let their lordships know, that he was commanded by the king to deliver this message to the house; and he doth not know how his maj. will be pleased if he should should deliver it to Mr. Maxwell." The lords Reply: "That they conceived the delivery of the king's Message to their gentleman-usher, by their command, is a delivery of it to the house." To which the earl gave this Answer: "That he desired not to be pressed to it, for he durst not do it until he had acquainted the king therewith." On this last Answer the lords appointed a committee of four, to draw up a Resolution of the house, touching this business, which was to be sent to the earl by the said usher; which was to this effect:—"That the lords were ready to receive, with humility, the Message from the king, though not from his lordship's hands, because they were unsatisfied with his carriage; therefore they sent their gentleman-usher to bring it to them; which he twice refusing, they shall account him answerable for any ill consequence that may ensue thereby; and their lordships have not proceeded further against him at this time, in respect he was employed by the king to this house, but do command him forthwith to depart this town."

The King's Message for Peace.] Upon this the earl sent in the king's Message by Mr. Maxwell, which was read in these words:

"We have, with unspeakable grief of heart, long beheld the distractions of this our kingdom: our very soul is full of anguish until we may find some remedy to prevent the miseries which are ready to overwhelm this whole nation by a Civil War: and though all our endeavours, tending to the composing of those unhappy differences betwixt us and our two houses of parliament, (though pursued by us with all zeal and sincerity) have been hitherto without that success we hoped for; yet such is our constant and earnest care to preserve the public peace, that we shall not be discouraged from using any expedient, which, by the blessing of the God of Mercy, may lay a firm foundation of peace and happiness to all our good subjects.—To this end, observing that many mistakes have arisen by the Messages, Petitions, and Answers betwixt us and our two houses of parliament, which happily may be prevented by some other Way of Treaty, wherein the matters in difference may be more clearly understood, and more freely transacted; we have thought fit to propound to you, that some fit persons may be by you enabled to treat with the like number to be authorized by us, in such a manner, and with such freedom of debate, as may best tend to that happy conclusion which all good men desire, The Peace of the kingdom: wherein as we promise, in the word of a king, all safety and encouragement to such as shall be sent to us, if you shall chuse the place where we are for the Treaty, which we wholly leave to you; presuming of your like care of the safety of those we shall employ, if you shall name another place: so we assure you and all our good subjects, that, to the best of our understanding, nothing shall be therein wanting on our parts, which may advance the true Protestant religion, oppose popery and superstition, secure the law of the land (upon which is built as well our just prerogative, as the property and liberty of the subject) confirm all just power and privileges of parliament, and render us and our people truly happy, by a good understanding betwixt us and our houses of parliament.—Bring with you as firm resolutions to do your duty: and let all our good people join with us in our prayers to Almighty God for his blessing upon the work.—If this Proposition shall be rejected by you, we have done our duty simply, that God will absolve us from the guilt of any of that blood which must be spilt; and what opinion soever other men may have of our power, we assure you nothing but our Christian and pious care to prevent the effusion of blood, hath begot this motion; our provision of men, arms, and money being such as may secure us from further violence, till it shall please God to open the eyes of our people."

When this was read, the lords received a Message from the commons, desiring a conference about the same Message to them sent the king, sent by sir John Colepeper. This was not that difficulty in admitting this messenger into the house of commons, as in the case of the earl of Southampton with the lords, for the commons being informed by Mr. Speaker, that he had received a Letter from sir John Colepeper, chancellor of the Exchequer, signifying, that he was coming with a Message to the king; which he could not deliver but as a member of that house; yet, in regard of the Order of the house, he durst not presume to come till he had their leave: a debate and thereupon, and a motion being made, That the question for disabling him to sit as a member should be now put, it passed in the negative by 69 against 26; so he was admitted to deliver the Message. At the conference, held on this occasion, the commons delivered six Resolutions, to which they desired the lords concurrence: 1. Resolved, "That this house cannot give Answer to this Message from his majesty, until the Proclamations and Declarations be recalled, whereby the earl of Bark and both houses, with their adherents and assistants, and such as have obeyed and executed their commands, or directions, according to their duties, are declared traitors, or otherwise delinquents; and until the Standard, set up in pursuance of the said Proclamations, be taken down." Read, but not then agreed to. 2. "That the lords be desired to join with the commons in a direction to the lord-general, That he advance his forces with all possible speed, for the defence and safety of the kingdom; that this house doth not this out of any apprehension of backwardness in the lord-general, but to give satisfaction that this house doth not render them any way slack in their duties, for the preservation and safety of the kingdom." Read and agreed to.—The messengers from the commons being called in, the speaker told them, "That the lords concurred with them in the latter Vote; and, as to the former, they should receive an Answer by messengers of their own."

The Parliament's Answer to the King's Message.] A committee being appointed for that purpose, the following Answer to the king's Message for Peace was drawn up, and agreed to by both houses:

"Muy it please your majesty; The lords and commons in parliament assembled, having received your majesty's Message of the 25th of August, do with much grief resent the dangerous and distracted state of this kingdom; which we have, by all means, endeavoured to prevent, both by our several Advices and Petitions to your majesty, which have been not only without success, but there hath followed that, which no ill counsel in former times hath produced, or any age hath seen; namely, those several Proclamations and Declarations against both houses of parliament; whereby their actions are declared Treasonable, and their persons Traitors: and thereupon your maj. hath set up your Standard against them, whereby you have put the two houses of parliament, and, in them, this whole kingdom, out of your protection; so that, until your maj. shall recall those Proclamations and Declarations, whereby the earl of Essex and both houses of parliament, and their adherents and assistants, and such as have obeyed and executed their commands and directions, according to their duties, are declared Traitors, or otherwise delinquents; and until the Standard, set up in pursuance of the said Proclamations, be taken down; your maj. hath put us into such a condition, that, whilst we so remain, we cannot, by the fundamental privileges of parliament, the public trust reposed in us, or with the general good and safety of this kingdom, give your majesty any other Answer to his Message."

Sept. 2. Informations came from several parts, as from Oxford, Worcester, &c. of the slanderings and wistings committed by the king's forces, called now Cavaliers in the Journals; and proper Orders were sent to their general to grant such commissions as he should think necessary for settling the peace in those counties, and the protection of the king's subjects.

An Order for suppressing of Stage Plays.] Sir Robert Harley, this day, brought up the following Order, made by the commons, to forbid Stage-Plays:

"Whereas the distressed estate of Ireland, steeped in her own blood, and the distracted estate of England, threatened with a cloud of blood by a Civil War, call for all possible means to appease and avert the wrath of God, appearing in these judgments: amongst which fasting and prayer hath been often tried to be very effectual, and have been lately and are still enjoined: and whereas public sports do not well agree with public calamities; nor public plays with the seasons of humiliation;

this being an exercise of sad and pious solemnity, and the other being spectacles of pleasure, too commonly expressing lascivious mirth and lechery: it is, therefore, thought fit, and ordained by the lords and commons, &c. That while those sad courses and set times of humiliations do continue, public Stage-Plays shall cease and be forborne; instead of which are recommended to the people of this land, the profitable and seasonable consideration of repentance, reconciliation, and peace with God; which, probably, may produce outward peace and prosperity, and bring again times of joy and gladness to these nations."

Sept. 3. The earl of Carlisle was committed to the Tower, and witnesses ordered to be produced against him, to prove the activeness of the said earl, in endeavouring to put the Commission of Array in execution in Essex.

The King's second Message for Peace.] Sept. 5. The Speaker acquainted the lords, that the lord Spencer had a Message to deliver from the King; on which the lords sent out the gentleman-usher, as before, to receive it, who brought it in, and delivered it to be read, in hæc verba:

"We will not repeat what means we have used to prevent the dangerous and distracted estate of the kingdom; nor how those means have been interrupted; because, being desirous to avoid effusion of blood, we are willing to decline all memory of former bitterness, that might make our offer of a Treaty less readily accepted.—We never did declare, nor ever intended to declare, both our houses of parliament Traitors, or set up our Standard against them; and much less to put them and this kingdom out of our protection: we utterly profess against it before God and the world. And further, to remove all possible scruples, which may hinder the Treaty so much desired by us, we hereby promise (so that a day be appointed by you for the revoking of your Declarations against all persons as Traitors or otherwise, for assisting of us) we shall, with all cheerfulness, upon the same day, recall our Proclamations and Declarations, and take down our Standard: in which Treaty we shall be ready to grant any thing that shall be really for the good of our subjects; conjuring you to consider the bleeding condition of Ireland, and the dangerous condition of England, in as high a degree as, by these our offers, we have declared ourselves to do; and assuring you that our chief desire, in this world, is to beget a good understanding, and mutual confidence, betwixt us and our two houses of parliament."

Resolutions of both Houses thereupon.] The lords, taking this Message into consideration, appointed a committee to prepare an Answer to it; but, at the same time, resolved, That the lord-general shall proceed with his forces, according to former Resolutions.—A conference between the two houses was held on this Message; after which the commons sent up the following Votes for the lords concurrence. Resolved, 1. "That the king, in proclaiming the earl of Essex, and all his adherents, Traitors, hath declared both houses to be traitors, who have published their Resolutions to adhere to him, he having done nothing but by their authority and direction; and doth hereby put them and the whole kingdom out of his protection. To prove this, the Proclamations and the king's Instructions, given to the Commissioners of Array since the last Message, are sufficient evidence. 2. That the king not having removed those impediments mentioned in our former Answer, we do resolve to adhere thereto: Which is, That so long as the Standard is up, and the Proclamation and Declaration unrevoked, we cannot make any other. Only we desire it may be considered, what a dishonour and scorn is cast upon us in that we, and the whole kingdom, are put into the same balance with traitors and delinquents: and as for that Proposition of the king's, 'That when we shall appoint a day to revoke our Declaration against all persons as Traitors or otherwise, for assisting his majesty, he will, upon the same day, revoke his Proclamations and Declarations, and take down his Standard;' we cannot admit of it without the greatest danger and dishonour of the kingdom and parliament, by the consenting to the preservation and indemnity of those who have been so apparently active to the destruction of both. 3. That we are as desirous of a good understanding betwixt his maj. and his subjects, as sensible of the bleeding and distempered estate of England and Ireland; and as careful to settle a good peace in both, as any subjects of this kingdom have ever been: and we do, with much grief, remember that many things are done which give us just cause to believe that there are not the like intentions in his maj. and those who govern his affairs; in that the ships appointed for the guard of Ireland, have been recalled by his majesty's Warrant; the provision of cloaths, to be sent to the army there, have been taken away by his troopers, upon the road; and the horses, waggons, and other necessities, provided for Chester, sent for by his command; also, his maj. keeping that kingdom without the chief governor; whereby the army at Dublin, maintained at the great charge of this kingdom, is made unprofitable, and the rebels grown so insolent as to exercise hostile acts, even to the very walls of that city. Besides many other impediments given to the Irish affairs, mentioned in an Answer of this house to a Message from his maj. of the 13th of August last.—Ordered, That this house agrees with the commons in all these Votes.

September 6. Another, and a yet stronger, Vote of the commons, was sent up to the lords, for their concurrence, which was also agreed to by them, to this effect:—"Whereas his majesty, in a Message received the 5th of Sept. requires that the parliament should revoke their Declarations against such persons as have assisted him in this unnatural war against this kingdom, it is this day ordered and declared by the lords and commons, That the arms which they have been, and shall be, forced to take up, for preservation of the parliament, religion, laws and liberties of the kingdom, shall not be laid down, until his maj. shall withdraw his protection from such persons as have been, or shall be, voted, by both houses, to be delinquents; and shall leave them to the justice of parliament, to be proceeded with according to their demerits; to the end that both this and succeeding generations may take warning, with what danger they incur the like heinous crimes: And also, to the end that those great charges and damages, where-with all the commonwealth hath been burthened in the premises, since his majesty's departure from the parliament, may be borne by the delinquents, and other malignant and affected persons; and that all his majesty's good and well-affected subjects, who by loan of monies, or otherwise, at their charge, have assisted the common-wealth, or shall, in like manner, hereafter assist in time of extreme danger, may be repaid all sums of money by them lent for those purposes, and be satisfied all their charges so sustained, out of the estates of the said delinquents, and of the malignant and disaffected party in this kingdom.

The Parliament's Answer to the King's second Message. On the basis of all these Votes and Resolutions, a committee of both houses had drawn up another Answer to the King; which was this day read and agreed to in these words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty; THE HUMBLE ANSWER AND PETITION OF THE LORDS AND COMMONS ASSEMBLED IN PARLIAMENT, unto the King's last Message.

"May it please your majesty; If we, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, should repeat all the ways we have taken, the endeavours we have used, and the expressions we have made unto your majesty, to prevent those distractions and dangers your maj. speaks of, likely to fall upon this kingdom, we should too much enlarge this Reply. Therefore, as we humbly, so shall we only, let your maj. know, that we cannot recede from our former Answer, for the reasons therein expressed; for that your maj. hath not taken down your Standard, nor recalled your Proclamations and Declarations, whereby you have declared the actions of both houses of parliament to be 'Treasonable,' and their persons Traitors; and you have published the same, since your Message of 25th of August, by your late Instructions sent to your commissioners of Array: Which Standard being taken down, and the Declarations, Proclamations, and Instructions recalled, if your maj. shall then, upon this our humble Petition leave your forces, return unto your Parliament, and receive their faithful advice, your maj. will find such expressions of our fidelities and duties, as shall assure you, that your safety, honour, and greatness can only be found in the affections of your people, and the incere counsels of your parliament; whose constant and undiscouraged endeavours and consultations have passed through difficulties unheard of, only to secure your kingdoms from the violent mischiefs and dangers now ready to fall upon them, and every part of them; who deserve better of your majesty, and can never show themselves (representing your whole kingdom) to be balanced with those persons, whose desperate dispositions and counsels still prevail to interrupt all our endeavours for the relieving of bleeding Ireland as we may bear our labours and vast expences will be fruitless to that distressed kingdom. As your presence is thus humbly desired by us, so is it in our hopes your maj. will, in your reason, relieve there is no other way than this to make our majesty's self happy, and your kingdoms safe."

Sept. 8. The lords received a Letter from the earl of Bedford, general of the horse, dated from Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, Sept. 6th, desiring a reinforcement of 3 regiments of foot, and 3 troops of horse: also another from sir Van. Waller, acquainting them with the reduction of Portsmouth town and fort, to the parliament's service.

Sept. 9. The earl of Essex acquainted the lords, That he intended to set out, in a few days, for St. Alban's, to perform the commands of both houses; and therefore desired to take his leave of them together; hereupon a conference was immediately held for that purpose.

Sept. 10. The lord Montague of Boughton was sent to the Tower, for executing the Commission of Array in Northamptonshire; as was also the earl of Berkshire, for attempting the same in Oxfordshire, though his design was prevented from being put in execution by Mr. Hampden and Mr. Whitelocke. The lords being also informed, that Mr. Ashburnham was come with a Message from the king, and had been in town since yesterday: the usher of the black rod was sent to find him out, to take him into custody, and bring him before them.

The Parliament resolve to abolish Episcopacy: A long Declaration of both houses to their Brethren in Scotland, was agreed to, containing many kind expressions, &c.* wishing uniformity in church government might be established, for settling one Confession of Faith, one Liturgy or Directory of the public worship of God, and one Catechism, in all the three kingdoms. In which was inserted this Resolution of the English parliament. Resolved, nem. con. "That the government of the church of England, by Archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans, and deans and chapters, archdeacons, and other ecclesiastical officers, hath been found, by long experience, a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of Religion, and very prejudicial to the state and government of this kingdom; and that the same should be taken away."

The King's Third Message for Peace. Sept. 13. A Message from the King, directed to the Speaker of the house of lords, was brought in, and read, in hæc verba:

"Who have taken most ways, used most endeavours, and made most real expressions, to prevent the present distractions and dangers, let all the world judge, as well by former passages, as by our two last Messages; which have been so fruitless, that (though we have descended to desire and press it) not so much as a Treaty can be obtained, unless we would denude ourself of all force to defend us from a visible strength marching against us; and admit those persons as traitors to us, who, according to their duty, their oaths of allegiance, and the law, have appeared in defence of us their king and liege lord, whom we are bound, in conscience and honour, to preserve; though we disclaimed all our Proclamations and Declarations, and the erecting of our Standard against our Parliament.—All we have now left in our power is, to express the deep sense we have of the public misery of this kingdom, in which is involved that of our distressed Protestants of Ireland, and to apply ourself to our necessary defence; wherein we wholly rely upon the providence of God, the justice of our cause, and the affection of our good people; so far we are from putting them out of our protection.—When you shall desire a Treaty of us, we shall, piously, remember whose blood is to be spilt in this quarrel, and cheerfully embrace it; and as no other reason induced us to leave our city of London, but that with honour and safety we could not stay there; nor to raise any force, but for the necessary defence of our person and the law, against Levies in opposition to both; so we shall suddenly and most willingly return to the one, and disband the other, as soon as those causes shall be removed. The God of Heaven direct you, and, in mercy, divert those judgments which hang over this nation; and so deal with us and our posterity, as we desire the preservation and advancement of the true Protestant religion, the law and the liberty of the subject, the just rights of parliament, and the peace of the kingdom."

Ordered, That the consideration of this Message be referred to the committee for the safety of the kingdom; and that it be communicated to the commons.

Impeachment against the lord Strange for High Treason. Sept. 14. Sir Robert Harley brought up an Impeachment of High Treason against James lord Strange, son and heir apparent of William earl of Derby, in these words:

"That the said James lord Strange, to the intent to subvert the fundamental laws and liberties and very being of parliaments, and to set sedition between the king and his people, did, upon the 15th day of July, 1642, at Manchester, and at several other times and places, actually, maliciously, rebelliously, and traitorously, summon and call together great numbers of his majesty's subjects, and incite, persuade, and encourage them to take up arms and levy war against the king, parliament, and kingdom.—II. That the said James lord Strange, in further prosecution of his aforesaid wicked, traitorous, and malicious purposes, did, upon the said 15th day of July, at Manchester aforesaid, and at several other times and places, actually, maliciously, rebelliously, and traitorously, raise great forces of men and horse, and levied war against the king, parliament, and kingdom. III. In further prosecution of the aforesaid wicked, traitorous, and malicious purposes, the said James lord Strange, and divers other persons whom he had drawn into his party and faction, did, also, upon the said 15th day of July, at Manchester aforesaid, maliciously and traitorously, with force and arms, and in an hostile and warlike manner, kill, murder, and destroy, Rd. Percival, of Kirkmanshalme, in the said county of Lancaster, linen-webster; and did then and there, at divers other times and places, in the like hostile manner as aforesaid, shoot, stab, hurt, and wound divers others of his majesty's good subjects, contrary to the laws and peace of this kingdom of England, and contrary to his majesty's royal crown and dignity. IV. The said James lord Strange hath set sedition between the king and his people, and now is in open and actual rebellion against the king, parliament, and kingdom.—For which matters and things the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons do, in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, impeach the said James lord Strange, of High Treason.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any other accusation, &c. do pray, that the said James lord Strange may be put to answer all and every the premises, that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgment, may be upon them, and every one of them, had and used, as shall be agreeable to law and justice."

* Ever since the beginning of this parliament, the Scots were styled Brethren; and, in conformity with this appellation, the grant of 500,000*l.* for payment of their army, after the pacification, was called Brotherly Assistance Money.

Ordered, That the Answer to be returned to the house of commons shall be, That this house hath received the Impeachment against the lord Strange; and that they will take the best course they can to have the lord Strange brought to answer the said impeachment.

The lords taking into consideration what course to take for sending to summon the lord Strange to appear, and answer his Impeachment of High Treason; and considering that, if messengers be sent they will be imprisoned, and if proclamation-writs be sent down they will not be sealed: therefore they thought fit to communicate this to the house of commons, to advise in this case how delinquents may be brought up to trial: A Message was accordingly sent, to desire a conference with the commons, concerning the Impeachment of the lord Strange.

Sept. 16. The commons sent up to the lords to write to the lord-general to advance the Army towards the place where the king was, as soon and as conveniently as so great things can move, and as, in his wisdom, he shall think fit; and that a Petition and Instructions shall be sent after him: but the lords thought the lord-general should have the Petition and Instructions before he marched his army, and that the commons be desired to hasten them.

An Order was made, in the nature of a Proclamation, against the lord Strange, to be printed and published in all churches and chapels, and all market towns, &c. prohibiting all persons to join with or assist him without money, ammunition, &c.

The Parliament's Answer to the King's last Message. An Answer to the King's last Message to the parliament was this day read and agreed to, and ordered to be presented to his majesty by sir Rd. May. It was as follows:

To the King's most Excellent Majesty: His Humble ANSWER of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, to his majesty's last MESSAGE of the 11th of September, 1642.

"May it please your majesty; We the lords and commons in parliament assembled, do present this our humble Answer to your majesty's Message of the 11th of this instant Sept. When we consider the oppressions, rapine, firing of houses, and murders (even at that time when your majesty propounded a Truce, committed upon your good subjects by your soldiers, in the presence, and by the authority of their commanders, being of the number of those whom your maj. holds yourself bound to honour and conscience to protect, as performing their duties; we cannot think that your maj. hath done all that in you lies to prevent or remove the present distractions; nor so as your maj. will admit no peace, without curing the authors and instruments of the mischiefs from the justice of the parliament, which yet shall be ever dispensed with all requisite moderation and distinction of offences, although some of those persons be such, whose preservation your kingdom cannot be safe, nor the unquestionable rights and privileges of parliament be maintained, which the power and dignity thereof will be brought into contempt.—We beseech your maj. therefore to consider your expressions, 'That God shall deal with you and your posterity for your maj. desires the preservation of the rights of parliament;' which being understood in the thing, of such as we have declared to be delinquents, we shall believe your maj. both towards yourself and parliament, do not, in this privilege we are most anxious to deny us that which belongs unto the supreme court of justice in this kingdom. Neither will your maj. cause to complain, That you are so nied a Treaty, when we offer all that a Treaty can produce, or your maj. expect; security, honour, service, obedience, support, and all other effects of humble, loyal, and faithful subjection; and seek nothing but that our religion, liberty, peace of the kingdom, and safety of the parliament may be secured from the open violence and cunning practices of a wicked party, who have long plotted our ruin and destruction. And if there were any cause of Treaty, we know no competent persons to treat betwixt the king and parliament; and if both cause and persons were such as to invite a Treaty, the season is altogether unfit, whilst your majesty's Standard is up, your Proclamations and Declarations unrecalled, whereby your parliament is charged with treason. If your majesty shall persist to make yourself a shield and defence to those instruments, and shall continue to reject our faithful and necessary advice of securing and maintaining religion and liberty, with the peace of the kingdom and safety of the parliament; we doubt not but, to indifferent judgments, it will appear who is most tender of that innocent blood which is like to be spilt in this cause; your majesty, who, by such persisting, doth endanger yourself and your kingdoms; or we who are willing to hazard ourselves to preserve both.—We humbly beseech your majesty to consider how impossible it is that any protestations, though published in your majesty's name, of your tenderness of the miseries of your protestant subjects in Ireland, or your resolution to maintain the protestant religion and laws of this kingdom, can give satisfaction to reasonable and indifferent men; when, at the same time, divers of the Irish traitors and rebels, the known favourers of them, and agents for them, are admitted to your majesty's presence with grace and favour, and some of them employed in your service; when the cloaths, munition, horse, and other necessities bought by your parliament, and sent for the supply of the army against the rebels there, are violently taken away; some by your majesty's command, others by your ministers, and applied to the maintenance of an unnatural war against the people here.—All this notwithstanding, as we never gave your majesty any just cause for withdrawing yourself from your great council; so it hath ever been, and shall ever be, far from us to give any impediment to your return; or to neglect any proper means of curing the distempers of the kingdom, and closing the dangerous breaches betwixt your majesty and your parliament, according to the great trust which lies upon us. And if your majesty shall now be pleased to come back to your parliament without your forces, we shall be ready to secure your royal person, crown and dignity, with our lives and fortunes; your presence in this great council being the only means of any Treaty betwixt your majesty and them with hope of success. And in none of our desires to your majesty shall we be swayed by any particular man's advantage, but shall give a clear testimony to your maj. and the whole world, that, in all things done by us, we faithfully intend the good of your maj. and of your kingdom; and that we will not be diverted from this end by any private or self-respects whatsoever.”

Sept. 17. An Impeachment of High Treason was sent up by the commons and read, but not entered in the Journals, against the marquis of Hertford, lord Pawlet, lord Seymour, John Digby, esq. sir John Pawlet, sir John Stawel, sir Ralph Hopton, sir Cha. Berkley, sir Edw. Berkley, sir Henry Berkley, sir Edw. Rodney, sir Francis Doddington, Edm. Windham, Tho. Smith, and Edw. Kirton, esqrs.

The Parliament send a Petition to the King, to be presented by the earl of Essex. Sept. 21. Sir Robert Harley, from the commons, brought up a draught of a Petition which had been framed by that house, and was to be presented to the king by their general, the earl of Essex. The Petition ran in these words:

“We your majesty's loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, cannot, without great grief and tenderness of compassion, behold the pressing miseries, the imminent dangers, and the devouring calamities, which do extremely threaten, and have partly seized upon both your kingdoms of England and Ireland, by the practices of a party prevailing with your majesty; who, by many wicked plots and conspiracies, have attempted the alteration of the true religion, the antient government of this kingdom, and the introducing of Popish idolatry and superstition in the church, and tyranny and confusion in the state; and, for the compassing thereof, have long corrupted your majesty's counsels, abused your power, and, by sudden and untimely dissolving of former parliaments, have often hindered the reformation and prevention of those mischiefs, and being now disabled to avoid the endeavours of this parliament by any such means, have traiterously attempted to over-awe the same by force: and, in prosecution of their wicked designs, have excited, encouraged, and fostered an unnatural Rebellion in Ireland, by which, in a most cruel and most outrageous manner, many thousands of your majesty's subjects there have been destroyed; and, by false slanders upon your parliament, and malicious and unjust accusations, have endeavoured to begin the like massacre here. And being, through God's blessing, therein disappointed, have, as the most mischievous and bloody design of all, drawn your maj. to make war against your parliament and good subjects of this kingdom, leading, in your person, an army against them, as if you intended, by conquest, to establish an absolute and unlimited power over them; and, by your power, and the countenance of your presence, have ransacked, spoiled, imprisoned, and murdered divers of your people: and, for the better assistance in their wicked designs, do seek to bring over the rebels of Ireland, and other forces from beyond the seas, to join with them; and we finding ourselves utterly deprived of your majesty's protection, and the authors, counsellors, and abettors of these mischiefs in greatest power and favour with your majesty, and defended by you against the justice and authority of your high court of parliament (whereby they are grown to that height and insolence as to manifest their rage and malice against those of the nobility and others, who are any whit inclinable unto peace, not without great appearance of danger to your own royal person, if you shall not in all things concur with their wicked and traiterous courses) have, for the just and necessary defence of the Protestant religion, of your majesty's person, crown and dignity, of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and the privileges and power of parliament, taken up arms; and appointed and authorized Robert earl of Essex to be captain-general of all the forces by us raised, and to lead and conduct the same against those rebels and traitors, and them to subdue and bring to condign punishment:—And we do most humbly beseech your maj. to withdraw your royal presence and countenance from these wicked persons; and, if they shall stand out in defence of their rebellious and unlawful attempts, that your maj. would leave them to be suppressed by that power which we have sent against them; and that your majesty will not mix your own dangers with theirs, but in peace and safety, without your forces, forthwith return to your parliament; and, by their faithful counsel and advice, compose the great distempers and confusions abounding in both your kingdoms, and provide for the security and honour of yourself and your royal posterity, and the prosperous estate of all your subjects: wherein, if your maj. please to yield to our most humble and earnest desires, we do, in the presence of Almighty God, profess, that we will receive your majesty with all honour, yield you all due obedience and subjection, and faithfully endeavour to secure your person and estate from all dangers; and, to the uttermost of our power, procure and establish to yourself, and to your people, all the blessings of a glorious and happy reign."

The Parliament's Instructions to their Captain-General.] The same day, and by the same messenger, the commons sent to the lords a form of the instructions, by which their general was to act: both which were agreed to by them as follows:—

INSTRUCTIONS of the Lords and Commons now in Parliament assembled, to be given to his Excellency Robert Earl of Essex, General of the Army.

1. "You shall carefully restrain all impieties, profaneness, disorders, violence, insolence, and plundering, in your soldiers, as well by strict and severe punishment of such offences, as by all other means, which you in your wisdom shall think fit. 2. Your lordship is to march with such forces as you think fit, towards the army raised, in his majesty's name, against the parliament and kingdom; and with them, or any part of them, to fight, at such time and place as you shall judge most to conduce to the peace and safety of the kingdom. And you shall use your utmost endeavours, by battle or otherwise, to rescue his majesty's person, and the persons of the prince and the duke of York, out of the hands of those desperate persons who are now about them. 3. You shall take an opportunity, in some safe and honourable way, to cause the Petition of both houses of parliament, herewith sent unto you, to be presented unto his majesty: and if his maj. shall thereupon please to withdraw himself from the forces now about him, and to resort to the parliament, you shall cause all those forces to disband, and shall serve and defend his maj. with a sufficient strength in his return. 4. You shall publish and declare, That if any, who have been so seduced by the false aspersions cast upon the proceedings of the parliament, as to assist the king in the acting of these dangerous counsels, shall willingly, within ten days after such publication in the army, return to their duty, not doing any hostile act within the time limited, and join themselves with the parliament, in defence of religion, his majesty's person, the liberties and laws of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament, with their persons and estates, as the members of both houses, and the rest of the kingdom have done; That the lords and commons will be ready, upon their submission, to receive such person in such manner, as they shall have cause to acknowledge they have been used with clemency and favour; provided that this shall not extend to admit any man into either house of parliament, who stands suspended, without giving satisfaction to the house whereof he shall be a member: and except all persons who stand impeached or particularly voted, in either house of parliament, for any delinquency whatsoever: excepting likewise such adherents of those who stand impeached in parliament of treason, as have been eminent persons and chief actors in those treasons: and except the earls of Bristol, Cumberland, Newcastle, and Rivers, secretary Nicholas, Mr. Esm. Porter, Mr. Edw. Hide, the duke of Richmond, the earl of Caernarvon, the lord Newart, and the lord Falkland, one of the principal secretaries of state to his majesty. 5. You shall apprehend the persons of all those who stand impeached in parliament, or have been declared traitors by both or either house of parliament, or otherwise delinquents; and you shall send them up to the parliament to receive condign punishment, according to their offences. 6. You shall receive the loans or contributions of money, plate, or horses, from all his majesty's loving subjects, which they shall be willing to make for the support of the charge of the army, and better discharge of the service of the commonwealth; and you shall certify all such sums of money, and the value of such horses, that the parties may thereupon have the benefit of the public faith, for payment to be made unto them as to others of his majesty's subjects, upon the propositions for the subscriptions of money, plate, and horses. 7. You shall carefully protect all his majesty's subjects from rapine and violence by any of the Cavaliers, or other soldiers of his majesty's pretended army, or by any of the soldiers of the army which you command; and you shall cause the arms and goods of any person to be restored to them, from whom they have been unjustly taken. 8. You shall observe such further directions and instructions, as you shall, from time to time, receive from both houses of parliament."

A Committee of both Houses appointed to attend their Army.] Sept. 22. Mr. Pym came up from the commons, with a copy of some additional Instructions, or Directions, to the former, for constituting a standing Committee of assistant members from both houses, in the army; to which they also desired their lordships' concurrence: this was also read and approved of, and a select number of lords appointed for that purpose. Their names were, the earl of Essex lord-general, the earls of Peterborough and Stamford, the lords Kimbolton, Wharton, St. John, Fielding, Hunsdon, Hastings, Brook, Roberts, and Willoughby of Parham. These 12, with 24 commoners, were to act as follows:

1. "The said Committee, or any 4 of them, whereof the said earl of Essex to be one, shall have power to meet together at such times and places as they shall think fit, and to consider and advise touching such matters that shall concern the army, as the said earl shall think convenient. And, from time to time, shall acquaint both houses of parliament with their resolutions therein, that both houses may further proceed thereupon, as to them shall be thought convenient for the public. 2. They, or any 4 of them, whereof the earl of Essex to be one, shall have power, and are hereby authorized, to advise and use all convenient and reasonable means they can, to supply the army with money and other necessities: and, for that end and purpose, are hereby authorized to take the subscriptions of all persons that shall give, lend, or advance any money, plate, or other provisions whatsoever, necessary for the army, and shall give a note unto all such persons that shall so lend or advance, expressing the nature and particular thereof; which note, subscribed with the hand of the said earl of Essex, and any three of the said committee, whereof two to be of the house of commons, shall be sufficient warrant for the party that shall so lend or advance, to receive the same again, with interest after the rate of 8l. per cent. out of such monies as shall be collected for the affairs of this kingdom, and both houses do engage the public faith for the same. 3. They, or any 4 of them, whereof the earl of Essex to be one, shall have power, and are hereby authorized, to sit with the said earl; and to examine all such persons as shall be sent for, apprehended, or brought before them, by virtue of any Warrant, sent and issued under the hand of the lord general; and shall have power to continue them in safe custody, and send them up to parliament, or discharge them, as they shall think fit, and shall most tend to the public good."

The E. of Essex assembles all his Forces at Northampton; And the King his at Shrewsbury.] Sept. 23. A strict Order was made for all the regiments of horse and foot in the parliament's service, to repair forthwith to the rendezvous appointed for them. The earl of Essex had set out from London, in great state, says Rushworth, the 9th of this month, and went to his head quarters at St. Alban's: from thence he marched to Northampton; where soon after, his whole army met him, making altogether about 15,000 men. The king, after erecting his Standard at Nottingham, marched from thence to Derby, Stafford, and Leicester, and so into Wales. At Shrewsbury his majesty's army was increased to a considerable body; and great quantities of plate being brought in to him, he erected a new mint and had store of money. Before this his majesty had raised much treasure, by receiving large remittances from the queen, on her pawned jewels; by contributions from the lords and gentlemen with him at York; and by a loan from the University of Oxford. On the other hand the parliament were furnished with money, by loans upon the public faith; and, by the painful endeavours of several ministers, and other ways already described, a great quantity of money, plate, and ammunition, was brought in. Besides all this the parliament had also taken 100,000l. of the 400,000l. voted to be raised for the service of Ireland.

The King's Speech and Protestation at the Head of his Army.] In the king's progress through the counties abovementioned, he collected the gentry and people together at particular places, and made several speeches to them; most of which were printed by the king's authority at that time, and are in Husband's and Rushworth's Collections: but, as none of these appear in the Journals of either house, we omit them; except one which was read in that of the lords, on the 29th of this month as follows:

HIS MAJESTY'S SPEECH AND PROTESTATION, made at the Head of his Army, between Stafford and Wellington, the 19th of September, 1642, after the reading of his ORDERS.

"Gentlemen; You have heard these Orders read; it is your part, in your several places, to observe them exactly: the time cannot be long before we come to action, therefore you have the more reason to be careful; and I must tell you, I shall be very severe in the punishing of those, of what condition soever, who transgress these Instructions. I cannot suspect your courage and resolution. Your conscience and your loyalty hath brought you hither to fight for your religion, your king, and the laws of the land. You shall meet with no enemies, but traitors, most of them Brownists, Anabaptists, and Atheists; such who desire to destroy both Church and State, and who have already condemned you to ruin for being loyal to us. That you may see what use I mean to make of your valour, if it please God to bless it with success, I have thought fit to publish my resolution to you in a Protestation; which, when you have heard me make, you will believe you cannot fight in a better quarrel; in which I promise to live and die with you."

HIS MAJESTY'S PROTESTATION.

"I do promise in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, That I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true Reformed Protestant Religion, established in the Church of England; and, by the grace of God, in the same will live and die. I desire to govern by the known laws of the land, and that the liberty and property of the subject may be, by them, preserved with the same care as my own just rights. And if it please God, by his blessing upon this army raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from this rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the just privileges and freedom of parliament; to govern by the known laws of the land, to my utmost power; and particularly to observe inviolably the laws consented to by me this parliament. In the mean while, if this time of war, and the great necessity and straits I am now driven to, beget any violation of those; I hope it shall be imputed, by God and man, to the authors of this war, and not to me, who have so earnestly laboured for the preservation of the peace of this kingdom.—When I willingly fail in these particulars, I will expect no aid or relief from any man, or protection from Heaven: but in this resolution I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of God's blessing."

After the reading of this Speech and Protestation, it is entered, that "Because these may prove of much prejudice to the parties that are employed by the parliament in the army, the house resolved, That a conference be held with the commons, in order to appoint a committee of both houses, to consider of somewhat to be printed by their authority, along with the said Protestation, to vindicate the reputation of those persons concerned; and that somewhat may be expressed in it, That it is not the intent of parliament utterly to take away the Common Prayer-Book, as is rumoured abroad."

The Earl of Essex's Speech and Protestation, at the Head of the Parliament's Army. About the same time was printed the following Speech and Protestation of the earl of Essex, at the Head of the Parliament's Army, before his arrival at Worcester, on the 24th of September:*

* From the edition of the times, published by Henry Fowler, Sept. 29, 1642.

"Gentlemen and Fellow Soldiers; Ye are at this time assembled for the defence of his majesty, and the maintenance of the true Protestant religion, under my command; I shall therefore desire you to take notice what I, that am your general, shall, by my honour, promise to perform toward you, and what I shall be forced to expect that you should perform towards me. I do promise, in the sight of Almighty God, that I shall undertake nothing but what shall tend to the advancement of the true Protestant religion, the securing of his majesty's royal person, the maintenance of the just privilege of parliament, and the liberty and property of the subject; neither will I engage any of you into any danger, but (though for many reasons I might forbear) I will in my own person run an equal hazard with you; and either bring you off with honour, or (if God have so decreed) fall with you, and willingly become a sacrifice for the preservation of my country.—Likewise I do promise that my ear shall be open to hear the complaint of the poorest of my soldiers, though against the chiefest of my officers; neither shall his greatness, if justly taxed, gain any privilege, but I shall be ready to execute justice against all, from the greatest to the least. Your pay shall be constantly delivered to your commanders, and if default be made by any officer, give me timely notice, and you shall find speedy redress. This being performed on my part, I shall now declare what is your duty toward me, which I must likewise expect to be carefully performed by you. I shall desire all and every officer to endeavour, by love and affable carriage, to command his soldiers; since what is done for fear is done unwillingly, and what is unwillingly attempted can never prosper. Likewise it is my request that you be careful in the exercising of your men, and bring them to use their arms readily and expertly, and not to busy them in practising the ceremonious forms of military discipline; only let them be well instructed in the necessary rudiments of war, that they may know to fall on with discretion, and retreat with care; how to maintain their order, and make good their ground.—Also I do expect that all those, who have voluntarily engaged themselves in this service, should answer my expectation in the performance of these ensuing Articles: 1. "That you willingly and cheerfully obey such as, by your own election, you have made commanders over you. 2. That you take special care to keep your arms at all times fit for service, that, upon all occasions you may be ready, when the signal shall be given by the sound of drum or trumpet, to repair to your colours; and so to march upon any service, where and when occasion shall require. 3. That you bear yourselves like soldiers, without doing any spoil to the inhabitants of the country: so doing you shall gain love and friendship, where otherwise you will be hated and complained of; and I, that should protect you, shall be forced to punish you according to the severity of law, 4. That you accept and rest satisfied with such quarters as shall fall to your lot, or be appointed you by your quartermaster. 5. That you shall, if appointed for sentries or perdues, faithfully discharge that duty; for, upon fail hereof, you are sure to undergo a very severe censure. 6. You shall forbear to profane the Sabbath, either by being drunk, or by unlawful games; for whosoever shall be found faulty must not expect to pass unpunished. 7. Whosoever shall be known to neglect the feeding of his horse with necessary provender, to the end that his horse be disabled or unfit for service; the party, for the said default, shall suffer a month's imprisonment, and afterward be cashiered as unworthy the name of a soldier. 8. That no trooper, or other of our soldiers, shall suffer his paddee to feed his horse in the corn, or to steal men's hay; but shall pay every man for hay 6*d.* day and night, and for oats 2*s.* the bushel. And lastly, 9. That you avoid cruelty; for it is my desire rather to save the lives of thousands than to kill one, so that it may be done without prejudice.—These things richly performed, and the justice of our cause truly considered, let us advance with a religious courage, and willingly adventure our lives in the defence of the king and parliament.²

Letters from the Earls of Essex and Dorset, relating to the Parliament's Petition to the King. Oct. 3. The lords received a packet of Letters from the Lord-General, in which was a copy of one his lordship had sent to the earl of Dorset in these words:

"My lord; I am commanded by the parliament to present their humble desires in a Petition to his majesty, which I desire your lordship would acquaint him with; that I may know his majesty's pleasure in what manner he will have it presented to him, and that there may be a safe convoy for such persons as I shall send to his majesty with it. I held it fit to put this trouble upon your lordship, knowing your nearness to the king, and believing your willingness to do a courtesy to Your, &c. Essex."

The Earl of Dorset's Answer was as follows:

"My lord; The king's late arrival here last night is the cause I could no sooner return this gentleman. According to your lordship's desire, I have acquainted his majesty with the Petition you are ordered to present to him from the parliament. He hath commanded me to let your lordship know, That the Petitions of the houses shall never find his ear but against them; and that those whom you shall appoint to bring it (so they be none of those he hath, by name, accused of treason) shall come and go very safely; so as they come to-day, and send a trumpet before to acquaint the king with their entrance.* I rest, &c. Dorset. Shrewsbury, Sept. 28, 1642."

* Lord Clarendon informs us, That the earl of Essex's Letter was sent by Mr. Fleetwood, Next the Lord-General's Letter to the Committee of Safety was read, in hæc verba:

"My lords and gentlemen; Having received from both houses of parliament a Petition to his majesty, I did send a letter to the earl of Dorset, by Mr. Fleetwood, unto which I received Answer last night: and because the Answer concerns much the parliament, I held it fit to send you copies of both, and I desire they may be presented to both houses. Your lordships will quickly see the difficulties arising from this Answer; not only in the ambiguity of the phrase, 'He hath, by name, accused of treason,' which both houses are themselves declared already, by his majesty's Proclamations, and Declarations, set forth before my coming from parliament; but also the uncertainty of what other Proclamations have been since made, and who therein have been personally named; and chiefly in this, That admitting this doubtful phrase to be intended strictly, I cannot send such who have been already accused by name, without exposing them to the uttermost hazard; and to send others, who are not personally named, might, upon this restriction, allow that exception; and thereby deeply wound the parliament, who never admitted any such restriction. This causeth me to suspend the sending of the Petition, and to make this address to the Committee. I am, &c. Essex. Worcester, Sept. 29, 1642."

A conference being held on the contents of these Letters, both houses came to the following Resolutions: 1. "That it doth not stand with the honour and privilege of parliament, that the Petition be delivered to the king under the restrictions mentioned in the earl of Dorset's letter. 2. That the lord-general shall signify unto his majesty, by such means as he shall think fit, the Resolutions of both houses, concerning the delivery of this Petition." But this second Resolution was altered by the lords, viz. "That the lord-general, by himself, or such hands as he shall think fit, shall, with all convenient speed, deliver the Petition unto his majesty. 3. That the lord-general shall be desired to proceed, according to his former instructions, in such manner as, in his own judgment, he shall think fittest and most advantageous to the service."

Advice of the King's coming to London with his Army. Both houses seem now extremely busy, for several days, in issuing out Orders for payments of Money, on different affairs, but all towards carrying on the war; with others matters of less concernment, such as sending for delinquents, and imprisoning them: but no public or private bills, or even a private cause, are so much as mentioned in either Journal; provision for their own safety being now their principal business. On the 12th of this month, the lords at a conference, were in-only a trooper in his guards, without a trumpet, or any ceremony. This Mr. Fleetwood afterwards raised himself to the rank of a general, and was one of Cromwell's upper house.

formed that the committee of safety had, the night before, received letters of the king's intentions to leave Shrewsbury, and march with his army directly towards London. On this intelligence the commons desired, lest the people should be frightened and taken un-awares, that the aforesaid committee might draw up a Declaration, to be published through all the neighbouring counties, for the Trained Bands and all the forces, in and about London, to be put into a posture of defence, and be placed under such officers as that they may be ready at an hour's warning.

The Parliament's Orders for Defence of the City.] Oct. 14. It was ordered, That guard-houses, with posts, bars and chains, be forthwith erected and set up, in such places and by-lanes, in the parishes of St. Margaret's, Westminster, St. Martin's in the Fields, in the confines of Westminster; St. Clement's, Danes; St. Mary, Savoy; St. Andrew's, Holborn; St. Giles in the Fields; Covent-Garden, St. John's-Street; St. James at Clerkenwell; St. Giles, Cripplegate; Shoreditch, White-Chapel, Islington, Mile-End, Southwark, and Lambeth, as should be thought necessary and convenient for the defence and safety of London and Westminster: and that the Trained Bands and Volunteers of the said parishes should be under arms, and keep watch day and night; that they should seize and arrest all suspicious persons, arms, or ammunition, passing or re-passing through the said places, and them keep till the pleasure of the parliament was known.

Bill for calling an Assembly of Divines.] Oct. 15. A bill was sent up to the lords, intitled, 'An Act for calling an Assembly of godly and learned Divines, to be consulted with by the parliament, for settling the Government and Liturgy of the Church of England; and for vindicating and clearing the Doctrine thereof from false aspersions and interpretations.' The commons desired the lords to give expedition to this bill, because it was to commence on the 5th of Feb. next; and it was read a first time this day.

Resolutions as to Contributions to the Parliament Loan, &c.] Oct. 15. p. m. A conference was held between the two houses, in which the commons delivered the following Resolutions for their lordship's concurrence; which was granted. Resolved, 1. "That such persons as shall not contribute to the charge of the common-wealth, in this time of imminent danger, shall be held fit to be disarmed and secured." 2. That the fines, rents and profits, of archbishops, bishops, deans, deans and chapters, and of such notorious delinquents as have taken up arms against the parliament, or have been active in the Commission of Array, shall be sequestered for the use and service of the common-wealth. 3. That the king's revenue, arising out of rents, and fines in courts of justice, compositions for wards, and the like, and all other his majesty's revenues, shall be brought into the several courts and other places where they ought to be paid in; and not issued forth nor passed out, without Orders from both houses of parliament."

In consequence of the first of these Resolutions many persons, who refused to lead money, were sent for by the commons as delinquents; of whom we shall mention one only as an instance: Mr. Fountayne, a barrister at law, being asked by the Speaker, Whether he would contribute any thing in this time of common danger; said, He did humbly desire that he may not be compelled to give any answer. But being pressed to give his reasons for refusing to make any answer, he replied, Because he conceived it to be against the Petition of Right. Hereupon the commons resolved, That he be committed prisoner to the Gatehouse, there to remain during the pleasure of that house for his contempt; and that his arms be seized and taken from him by the sheriffs of London. However, a few days after, upon Mr. Fountayne's humble petition, the commons gave him leave to go, with the keeper of the Gatehouse, to bury his wife; but this liberty not to exceed four days.—A committee was also appointed to prepare a Declaration to set forth, That this demanding of contribution upon the Propositions, is according to law; and to set a mark of malignity and disaffection upon such as shall refuse to contribute, in this time of common danger.

The Parliament's Order for assembling the Trained Bands.] Next was read the following Declaration, ordering all Trained Bands to be in readiness. It was also agreed to by the lords, and ordered to be printed and published:

"The lords and commons in parliament, considering, with much tenderness and compassion, the miserable condition of this kingdom, distracted and distempered with many present evils and imminent dangers, and brought now to such height of extremity of misery, that two English armies are near together, even ready to join in a dreadful and bloody encounter, through the violent and wicked counsel of those who have captivated both the person and the power of the king to their own impious and traiterous designs, do thereupon think good to publish and declare the same to the kingdom; together with some Directions and Provisions which may prevent the utter desolation and ruin both of religion and liberty, already overwhelmed and suppressed in the intention and hope of those rebels and traitors about the king; to which purpose it is desired by both houses, that all well-affected subjects may take notice of these particulars, that the king, by the help and assistance of the Papists, the prelatical and corrupt part of the clergy, the delinquent nobility and gentry, and by the concurrence of some notable traitors from beyond seas, the lord Digby, O'Neale, and others, and of many desperate, mercenary, and ill-affected persons from all parts of the kingdom, hath raised an army, armed, clothed, and fed, for the most part, with the spoils of his subjects; giving them leave to plunder and rob all sorts of people, and to exact money and plate from corporations, by threatening fire and sword if they should refuse it.—That this wicked counsel doth not only hinder his majesty from exercising the justice and protection of a king towards his people, but even that honour which is observed betwixt enemies; for, by a confident instrument of his majesty, sir John Henderson, a Papist, as we are credibly informed, one David Alexander was urged to kill sir John Hotham, telling him it would be a good service both to God and the king; which he refused to do, saying, 'It was the work of a butcher, and not of a soldier.' This Alexander being a Scotsman of a very poor fortune, and if a mind fit for desperate attempts, the king sent for him twice while he was at Beverley; and when he came to his presence he spake to him publickly in the field, and appointed a sum of money to be given him, which he received.—After which another proposition was made to him by the said sir John Henderson, that he would put fire to the Magazine of the army raised by the parliament; and to gain the better opportunity to effect it, that he should labour to get some employment in the train of artillery, which he undertook, and endeavoured to obtain; but before he could effect his mischievous intention, he was discovered, apprehended, and examined, and thereupon confessed the practice and undertaking; the particulars thereof are referred to the examinations thereupon taken. That the king doth send out letters to borrow great sums, professing, That those who will not lend him money do give him just cause to suspect their loyalty to his person and the peace of the kingdom: and this will be a sufficient reason to make them liable to be plundered and spoiled of all they have; but, such is the violence of the king's army, that their friends are in little better case than they who oppose them; and those who escape best must yet feed and billet the soldiers for nothing.—In those places where the Trained Bands are willing to go forth to serve in his majesty's army, yet, for the most part, their arms are taken from them and put upon those who are more mercenary and less interested in the common-wealth; and so likely to be fitter instruments of rapine and spoil. By these great violences and oppressions they have so exhausted those parts, that his majesty cannot stay long about Shrewsbury; and it is the earnest desire of the Cavaliers, that he would march forward towards London, those rich and fruitful counties in the way being like to yield them a supply of their necessities, and the wealth of London, a full satisfaction of their hopes; where they likewise think to find a party, which, upon his majesty's approach, may make some disturbance, and facilitate their designs upon the city.—That if the king's army prevail, the good subjects can expect nothing but that their lives and fortunes will be exposed to the malice and rapine of those ravenous soldiers, who often talk of cutting the throats of honest and religious men, and have long expected their goods and estates, as the rewards of their service; the kingdom will again fall under the government of those mischievous counsels, who, before this parliament, had even brought both religion and liberty to ruin; and we shall have no hope left of any more parliaments, but such as shall be concurrent and subservient to these ends.—The Means of curing and preventing these Evils and Dangers we conceive to be these: That good provision be made, by Loan and Contribution, for the army raised by the parliament under the lord general the earl of Essex, which is no whit inferior in horse and foot to the king's army, better armed, full paid, restrained from disorder and rapine as much as may be; well provided of all outward necessities, but above all, well encouraged and instructed in the goodness of the cause, by the labour of many godly and painful divines.—That this Army be ready always to attend the removes of the king's army, either in one body or divided, as there shall be occasion, according to the wise conduct and direction of the lord-general; that so no opportunity of fighting upon advantage be lost, nor the greedy soldiers of the king's army suffered to range and spoil the country at their pleasure. That the counties through which the king's army is to pass, do associate themselves, and draw all their forces together, for the mutual defence of their persons and goods from oppression and spoil. That those counties be required to send in all their horses fit for carriages and dragoons, as well for the assistance of the lord-general; (for which, in convenient time, they shall receive satisfaction) as likewise that by such means those horses may be kept from being employed by the king's army. That command and direction be given to all lieutenants of counties and deputy-lieutenants, that all the Trained Bands and all Volunteers be put into readiness to be brought to such rendezvous, and to be obedient to such commanders in chief, as shall be appointed by the committee for the safety of the kingdom, or by the lord-general; that so the king's army may find opposition in every place as they pass, and the inhabitants may have at hand a sufficient protection and defence; and the lord-general may strengthen his own army with these forces, as he shall see cause. That powder, munition, and ordnance, with all other necessities, be prepared for these forces; that so, without any trouble or confusion, they may be brought together, and fitted for service upon all sudden occurrences. That all those who, in the city of London or any other place, shall wear any colours or other marks of division, whereby they may be distinguished from others, and known to be of the Malignant Party, shall be examined, searched, and disarmed: as likewise all others who, being able, shall not lend or contribute towards the public safety of the kingdom in this time of so great and imminent danger. That it be commended to the serious consideration of those in the king's army, and of all others that intend to assist and succour his majesty in this.

impious and unnatural war, (amongst whom it may be hoped there are some honest men and protestants) what it is that moves them in this quarrel.—Is it for fear of some innovations and alterations of religion, or Church-government? Let such as are possessed with this vain and causeless apprehension know, that nothing is intended or desired, but to take away the government by bishops, which hath been so constantly and evidently mischievous to the church and state; with such other things as shall be found to be justly offensive; and nothing to be settled and introduced but by authority of parliament, after consultation first had with an assembly of learned and reverend Divines.—Is it to uphold the authority, prerogative, and honour of the king, and to preserve the safety of his royal person? Surely the parliament is, and ever hath been, ready to do any thing that belongs to them to secure all these; which they have often testified by many humble Petitions to his majesty. If there be no cause, for any of these respects, to seek the destruction of the parliament, and the blood and ruin of their kindred, friends, and acquaintance; what remains then to be the matter of the quarrel, the motives of such great combustions, and the effects and consequences of their victory if they should prevail? That priests, Jesuits, and the pope's nuncios, may domineer and govern in the king's counsel, as heretofore; that the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and their suffragans, may suppress diligent and powerful preaching, banish and oppress all the most pious and best affected subjects of the kingdom, and introduce the Popish religion, under Protestant profession; till they have strength and boldness to cast off the disguise, and openly appear that which indeed they are, and would not seem to be. That the earl of Bristol, and his son the lord Digby, Mr. Jermyn, and other such traitors, may possess the great places and government of this kingdom; and be the arbiters of the affairs of state, and distributors of preferments and disgraces to such who shall further or oppose their designs. That the delinquents, oppressors, and destroyers of the kingdom, may not only escape the justice of the parliament, but triumph in the spoils of all honest men and good patriots; that through our troubles and divisions, the rebels in Ireland may prevail; that we may cease to be a free nation; and become the object of cruelty and oppression at home, and of scorn and infamy abroad. And if there can be no other fruit of their hazard and endeavours on that side, let them then consider whether, by adhering to the parliament, they may not expect effects, more suitable to the desires of honest men; the glory of God, in the preservation of his truth; the peace of the church, by securing it against the pride, avarice, and ambition of the clergy: the honour, greatness, and security of the king, by freeing him from false and traitorous counsels, and establishing him in the hearts and affections of his people; the prosperity of the whole kingdom, by the blessing of good laws and a righteous government."

Oct. 17. Alderman Pennington being chosen lord mayor of London, upon the removal of sir R. Gurney, he was ordered, on account of the lord keeper's absence, to appear before the lords in parliament for their approbation, before he was sworn at the bar of the Exchequer. The lords passed great compliments on the new lord mayor, for his experienced duty and loyalty to the king and kingdom, and were well pleased the city had made such a choice.

Oct. 19. The lord Coventry, who had revolted from the king to the parliament, sent a submissive Letter to the lords by the earl of Northumberland, and offered 2000*l.* in money for carrying on the cause in hand: alleging, that though he had subscribed, at York, to furnish the king with horses, &c. he did it only for one month, and would not contribute or meddle, in any thing of that nature, hereafter, desiring to be protected, in person and estate, and have his goods in Worcestershire restored to him. All which the lords readily accepted of and promised him.

Letters from the E. of Essex, &c. concerning the last Petition to the King.] Oct. 20. A conference was held, in which were exhibited some Letters from the earl of Essex, dated from Worcester, sent to the Committee of Safety; and, first, one from himself:

"My lords and gentlemen; In obedience to your commands, I sent Mr. Lionel Coppe, with a Letter and three Votes of both houses, with a desire of a safe conduct to such as should be sent with the Petition to his majesty; My lord Dorset's Answer I have sent your lordships, who can better tell how to consider of it than I your servant. My lords, this Answer did not take me unprovided; for, since the first Answer I sent up to the parliament, I expected no better. And for my head, which is so much sought after, if God please, I intend to sell it at such a rate that the buyers shall be no great purchasers. I shall not, in this letter, presume further upon your patience, acknowledging the great affairs you have; only this, assuring you, That I shall neither spare any hazard or pains to declare myself to be, Your, &c. ESSEX. Worcester, Oct. 18, 1642."

Next the Letter from the earl of Dorset, in answer to that from the Lord-General, we read:

"My lord; I have received your Letter of the 15th and in it, the Votes of both houses of parliament of the 3rd; and have directed from his majesty to return you this Answer. That, if justice had been done, the gentlemen that brought it could not expect his liberty. And for the address of the Petition of both houses, as his majesty, by my former Letter, declared his resolution, That he would not receive any by the hands of such as he had, by name, proclaimed traitors; so now his majesty, having declared you the principal in that matter, will not receive any by your address: but, as his maj. then declared by me, his earl of

will be open to hear any fitting address from either or both houses in such manner as his maj. hath declared. This being all I have in charge from his majesty to signify unto you, remain, &c. DORSET. Woolverhampton, Oct. 16, 1642."

Then followed a Letter from the Committee of both houses in their army, to the Committee of Safety at Westminster, in these words:

"My lords and gentlemen; In obedience to the commands of the houses, the lord-general dispatched Mr. Copley, commissary-general of the musters, to desire a safe convoy of all such as his excellency should send with the Petition of both houses to his majesty; and, yesterday morning, Mr. Copley returned with the foregoing Answer, by which your lordships may perceive that his majesty absolutely refuses to receive any Petition by any address of the lord-general, as one who is there expressed to be the principal of the number of those whom he king hath proclaimed Traitors. This we humbly conceive to be an high indignity and scorn cast upon the authority of parliament, in the person of his excellency unto whom they have committed the care and government of their army, in which their religion and safety is so much concerned; and a final and utter rejection of the submissive, dutiful, and earnest desires of peace, so often laid at his feet, with the cries and groans of his loyal and loving subjects. My lords, we could not chuse but express this our sense of it; the further consideration whereof we leave unto your wisdoms; and rest: Your, &c. Bedford, Mandeville,* Brooke, Willoughby, D. Hollis, P. Stapylton, Ar. Goodwyn.—Worcester Oct. 18, 1642."

After the reading of these Letters, the lords thought it fit that this denial of the king to receive the Petition from the lord-general, as likewise the danger this kingdom and the city of London is in by the advancing of the king's army, with other particulars in the last conference, should be communicated to the citizens, that they might be provided, and more readily come into an association for their defence, which both houses had ordered to be drawn up for that purpose. The lord mayor was accordingly ordered to call a common-hall, and a committee of lords and commons appointed to deliver this to them.

Oct. 22. An Ordinance was read and agreed to, importing, That the houses being credibly informed of the king's approach to this city with his army; and, by former Declarations, giving great cause to expect their intentions are to destroy both parliament and city: they believe it therefore necessary, for their present safety and defence, that all the stables of the city of London, and suburbs, should be forthwith searched, and the number of horses in them, fit to be listed, taken; declaring and promising, upon the public faith, to satisfy and pay for such as shall miscarry in the use of them; and the rest to be returned to the owners of them, when this action shall be passed and the danger over. This Order to be sent to the committee of the Militia in London and Westminster, and the lord-lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants of Middlesex and the neighbouring counties.

Next follows the earl of Warwick's Commission, who had been recalled from the Fleet, constituting him Captain-General of all the Forces raised, or to be raised, in or about London, without any derogation to the commission already given by parliament to the earl of Essex.

The Parliament's Protestation to the whole World, in Vindication of their Proceedings.

Then a Declaration of both houses, which had been drawn up by the committee of safety, was read, agreed to, and ordered to be printed; as follows:

A PROTESTATION and DECLARATION of the LORDS and COMMONS in Parliament, to this Kingdom, and to the whole World, Oct. 22, 1642.

"We the lords and commons in this present parliament assembled, do, in the presence of Almighty God, for the satisfaction of our consciences, and the discharge of that great trust which lies upon us, make this Protestation and Declaration to this kingdom and nation, and to the whole world, 'That no private passion or respect, no evil intention to his majesty's person, no design to the prejudice of his just honour and authority, engaged us to raise forces, and take up arms against the authors of this war, wherewith the kingdom is now enflamed.'—And we have always desired from our hearts and souls, manifested in our actions and proceedings, and in several humble Petitions and Remonstrances to his majesty, professed our loyalty and obedience to his crown, readiness and resolution to defend his person, and support his estate, with our lives and fortunes to the uttermost of our power.—That we have been willing to pass by not only those injuries, ignominies, slanders, and false accusations, wherewith we have been privately oppressed and grieved; but likewise many public encroachments, and high usurpations, to the prejudice of religion and liberty; divers bloody, traitorous and cruel practises and designs, for the utter ruin of the church and state; so as we might, for the time to come, have been secured from that wicked and Malignant Party, those pernicious and traitorous counsels, who have been the authors and fomenters of the former mischiefs and present calamities, which have and still do distemper this church and state.—That for the same purpose, and for the avoiding of blood, we directed the earl of Essex lord-general, by himself or others, in some safe and honourable way, to cause to be delivered an humble Petition, whereof we did de-

* So stiled as heir apparent to the earl of Manchester. In the foregoing part of this work he is called lord Kimbolton, being summoned to the house of lords by his father's barony of that name.

sire nothing from his majesty, but that he would return in peace to his parliament; and, by their faithful counsel and advice, compose the distempers and confusions abounding in his kingdoms, as he is bound to do; we therein professed, in the sight of Almighty God, which is the strongest obligation that any Christian, and the most solemn public faith which any such state as a parliament can give, That we would receive him with all honour, yield him all true obedience and subjection, and faithfully endeavour to defend his person and estate from all danger; and, to the uttermost of our power, to establish him and his people in all the blessings of a glorious and happy reign, as it is more largely expressed in that Petition.—For the delivery of which Petition, his excellency hath twice sent unto the king, humbly desiring a safe conduct for those who should be employed therein: but his majesty refused to give any such safe conduct, or to receive this humble and dutiful Petition by any address from the earl of Essex; saying, 'That if justice had been done, the gentleman which brought the 2nd Message could not expect his liberty.'—By all which, and many other evidences and inducements, we are fully convinced in our judgments and belief, That the king's counsels and resolutions are so engaged to the Popish party, for the suppression and extirpation of the true religion, that all hopes of peace and protection are excluded; and that it is fully intended to give satisfaction to the Papists, by alteration of religion; and to the Cavaliers and other soldiers, by exposing the wealth of the good subjects, especially of this city of London, to be sacked, plundered, and spoiled by them.—That for the better effecting hereof, great numbers of Papists have, in shew, conformed themselves to the Protestant religion, by coming to the church, receiving the Sacrament, and taking the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy; which some of their own priests have encouraged them to do, by maintaining, 'That they might do all those things, and yet continue good catholics:' under which cover his maj. did, at first, begin to strengthen himself (those of that religion being weak, and unable to endure the envy and discontent which the arming of Papists would procure in the kingdom); and therefore endeavoured to keep off all jealousies and suspicions, by many fearful Oaths and Imprecations, concerning his purpose of maintaining the Protestant religion and the laws of the kingdom; causing some professed papists to be discharged out of his army; and none to be received that would not endure the test of coming to church, receiving the sacrament, and taking the Oaths of Allegiance.—That his majesty being now grown stronger, and able, as he conceives, to make good his own ends by arms, his confidence in the priests doth more clearly appear: persons imprisoned for Priests and Jesuits have been released out of the jail of Lancaster; professed Papists have been invited to rise and take up arms; commissions, under his majesty's authority, have been granted to many of them for places of command in this war, with power to raise men; and great numbers have been raised by them, and they daily increase; as namely, to sir Nich. Thornton, sir Tho. Howard, bart. sir Edw. Widdrington, sir Wm. Kiddell, Mr. Smith of Ash, Mr. Gray of Morpeth castle, Mr. Elington of Denington, Mr. Holtby, all of Northumberland, bishoprick of Durham, and Newcastle; to Mr. Clifton, Mr. Walter, sir Wm. Gerrard, bart. sir Cecil Trafford, and Mr. Anderson of Lostocke, in the county of Lancaster; divers forces are raised, and paid by the earl of Worcester; his son, the lord Herbert, a notorious Papist, is made general of all South-Wales: and we are further informed out of Yorkshire, by divers persons of great worth and quality, That those that raise forces in those parts for his majesty, do arm and employ Papists, and use their advice in their consultations; all which is contrary to the solemn Oaths, Protestations, and Execrations, whereby his maj. bound himself to maintain the Protestant religion, and the laws of the land; by which he endeavoured to get a confidence in the people of his good intentions; which, how well it is answered, we leave to the world to judge.—That sir John Henderson and col. Cocburn, men of ill report both for religion and honesty, are sent to Hamburg and Denmark, we are credibly informed, to raise forces there, and to bring them to Newcastle; to join them with the earl of Newcastle and the army of Papists which they intended to raise there; and that divers endeavours have been used, in other foreign parts, to bring strange forces into the kingdom.—That the king hath received about him divers Papists of Ireland, some of which are indicted of high treason for their rebellion there, notoriously known to have been in actual rebellion; as namely, the lord Traaffe, sir John Oungane, col. Fitz-Williams, proclaimed rebels; dr. Meara, indicted for the rebellion in Ireland, and fled for the same, and yet appointed physician to prince Rupert.—That his majesty hath sent for the Petition of the Irish Rebels, which the justices had stopped, with evident expression of favour to them; whereby that kingdom is like to become an unfit habitation of any Protestants, and a seminary of war and treason against this kingdom.—That divers English traitors, actors in the former design against the kingdom and parliament, are the chief counsellors and actors in this present war against his subjects, as the lord Digby, O'Neal, Wilmot, Pollard, Ashburnham, and others.—That we have been likewise credibly informed, that divers Jesuits and Priests, in foreign parts, make great collections of money, for relief of the Papists in Ireland, and the furthering of his majesty's designs here against the parliament; and that by them, and some others fled out of this kingdom for treason, great means are made to make up the differences betwixt some princes of the Romish religion that so they might unite their strength for the extirpation of the Protestant re-Union; wherein principally this kingdom and the kingdom of Scotland are concerned, as making the greatest body of the reformed religion in Christendom, and best able to defend themselves and succour other churches.—For all which Reasons we are resolved to enter into a solemn Oath and Covenant with God to give up ourselves, our lives and fortunes, into his hands; and that we will, to the uttermost of our power and judgment, maintain his truth, and conform ourselves to his will. That we will defend this cause with the hazard of our lives, against the king's army, and against all that join with them in the prosecution of this wicked design; according to the form to be agreed upon by both houses of parliament, to be subscribed by our hands; and that we will, for the same ends, associate ourselves, and unite with all the well-affected in the city of London and other parts of his majesty's dominions.—That we expect our brethren of Scotland (according to the act of Pacification, whereby the two kingdoms are mutually bound to suppress all debates and differences, to the disturbance of the public peace) will help and assist us in defence of the cause; which, if the Popish party prevail, must needs either involve them in that alteration of religion which will be made here, or engage them in a war against this kingdom, to defend their own religion and liberty: and we doubt not but the God of Truth, and the great Protector of his people, will assist and enable us, in this our just defence; to restrain the malice and fury of those that seek our ruin; and to secure the persons, estates, and liberties of all that join with us; and to procure and establish the safety of religion, and fruition of our laws and liberties, in this and all other his majesty's dominions; which we do, here again, profess, before the ever-living God, to be the chief end of all our counsels and resolutions without any intention or desire to hurt or injure his maj. either in his person or just power."

The King's Answer.] There is no mention of any Answer from the king to this Protestation of parliament in the Journals: we shall however give it here for the sake of connection, though it was printed after the Battle of Edge-hill. * This circumstance of time is necessary to be kept in view, on account of some expressions which carry a reference to that action.

"If, in truth, the framers of this Declaration are not engaged by any private passion or respect, by any evil intention to our person, or design to the prejudice of our just honour and authority, to raise these forces and army against us (as they call Almighty God to witness they are not) they will think it their duty to disclaim the protection of the conductors of that army; who, the next day after this so solemn Protestation, used their utmost power, by the strength of that army, to have destroyed us, and put our person (for whose defence they would make the world believe this army is raised) into as much danger as the skill and malice of desperate rebels could do; otherwise this Protestation, now made, will appear of the same nature with those by which they promised to make us a glorious king; when, by their Nineteen Propositions, they endeavoured to strip us of all those rights which made us a king and them subjects.—What those actions and proceedings have been, which have manifested their loyalty and obedience unto us, will be as hard to find, as in their humble Petitions and Remonstrances; when, in truth, their actions have been the greatest scorn of our authority, and their Petitions the greatest reproaches and challenges of us, which any age have produced: and we have not only the clear evidence of our own conscience, but the testimony of all good men, that we left no action unperformed on our part, which might have prevented the misery and confusion which the ambition, fury, and malice of these seditious persons have brought upon this poor kingdom; neither is there any thing wanting to the happiness of church and state, but that peace and order which the faction of these men have robbed them of.—But they say, 'They directed their general, the earl of Essex, to deliver an humble Petition to us, wherein they desire nothing from us, but that we would return in peace to our parliament; and by their faithful counsel and advice, compose the distempers and confusions abounding in our kingdoms, as we are bound to do.' We were never so backward in receiving, or so slow in answering, the Petitions of either or both our houses of parliament that there was any need of an army to quicken us; which either or both houses of parliament have, in no case, any more shadow of right or power to raise by any law, custom, or privilege, than they have, by their Votes, to take away the lives and Fortunes of all the subjects of England; yet the framers of this Declaration take it unkindly, that upon their profession in the sight of Almighty God (which is, they say, the strongest assurance that any Christian can give) we did not put ourselves into their hands, (those hands which were lifted up against us, and filled at that time with arms to destroy us,) and leave a strength God had supplied us with, of good and faithful subjects; who, notwithstanding all their threats and menaces, had brought themselves to our assistance. If that Petition had been so humble as they pretended, they would not have lost the advantage of publishing it in this their Declaration; that the world might as well have been witness of our refusal of peace, as it hath been of their disdain of any way to it, when they rejected our several earnest offers of a Treaty.—But why did they not send this humble Petition? Why, 'His excellency twice sent unto us for a safe-conduct for those who should be employed therein, and we refused to give any, or to receive the humble and doubtful petition.' Sure, when our good subjects shall understand the strange enmity between these men and truth, the no-conscience they use in publishing, and informing those by whom they pretend to be trusted, things monstrous and contrary to their own knowledge, they will be no less offended with their falsehood to them, than their treason to us. 'Tis well known we never refused to give admittance to any Message or Petition from either or both houses of parliament; their messengers have been received and entertained, not only with that safety, but with that candour, as is due to the best subjects; when their errand hath been full of reproach and scorn, and the bringers, bold, arrogant, and seditious in their demeanour; and therefore there needed to have been no more scruple made in the delivery of this, than the other Petitions which have been brought us.—The truth is, we were no sooner acquainted at Shrewsbury, by the earl of Dorset, that he had received a Letter from the earl of Essex, intimating, 'That he had a Petition from both houses to be delivered to us, and to that purpose asking a safe-conduct for those who should be sent; but we returned this Answer, That as we had never refused to receive any Petition from our houses of parliament, so we should be ready to give such a reception and answer to this as should be fit; and that the bringers of it should come and go with all safety;' only we required, 'that none of those persons whom we had particularly accused of high treason should be, by colour of that Petition, employed to us.'—After this we heard no more till a second Letter, at least a fortnight after the first to the earl of Dorset, informed us, 'That our former Answer was declared to be a breach of privilege, in that we would not allow any messengers to come to us;' that is, that we were not content that such persons, who had conspired our death, might securely come into our presence.—Our second Answer differed little from our former, insisting, 'That the address should not be made by any of those persons whom we had particularly accused of high treason, amongst whom the earl of Essex himself was one; but declaring that our ear should be still open to hear any Petition from our two houses of parliament: whether this were a denial from us to receive their Petition, or, whether, if our two houses of parliament had indeed desired to treat with us by Petition, they might not as well have sent it to us, as they have since done their Instructions to their ambassadors into Ireland, and their new Bill, for rooting out Episcopacy, and devising a new form of church-government, let all the world judge. We have reason to believe that the Petition then prepared for us (if we have seen the true copy of it) was thought, by the persons trusted for the presenting it, fitter to be delivered after a battle and full conquest of us, than in the head of our army, when it might seem somewhat in our power whether we would be deceived or not.—For that continued dishonest accusation of our inclination to the Papists, (which the authors of it in their own consciences, which will one day be dreadful to them, know to be most unjust and groundless) we can say no more, and we can do no more, to the satisfaction of the world. If they know that the Romish priests have encouraged those of that religion to conform themselves to the Protestant religion, by coming to Church, receiving the Sacrament, and taking the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, they are not conversant with the subtleties of them that we are; but we must confess, till we be certain they have found that way to deceive us, that to elude the laws which are against them, we shall, in charity, believe their conformity to be real, and not pretended: But that any Romish or Jesuits, imprisoned, have been released by us out of the goal of Lancaster, or any other goal, is as false (to use an expression of their own) as the Father of Lies could invent; neither are the persons named in that Declaration to whom commissions are supposed to be granted for places of command in this war, so much as known to us; nor have they any command, or, to our knowledge, are present in our army; and 'tis strange that our Oaths and Protestations before Almighty God, for the maintenance of the Protestant religion, should be slighted in the end of that Declaration; when in the beginning of it, it is acknowledged to be the strongest obligation and assurance that any Christian can give. We desire to have our Protestations believed by the evidence of our actions: But they are informed (and that on ground enough for them to lay the basest imputation upon their sovereign) that sir John Henderson and colonel Cochran (men of ill report both for religion and honesty) are sent to Hamburg and Denmark, (we thought we should have heard no more news from Denmark) to raise foreign forces, and to bring them hither. We have before, in our Declaration (sufficient to satisfy any honest man) declared our opinion and resolution concerning foreign force; and we had never greater cause to be confident of security in our own subjects, and therefore cannot believe so vile a scandal can make any impression in sober men.—Let a few of the nobility and gentry about us, and in our service, be viewed; and will they not be found the most zealous in the Protestant religion, the most eminent in reputation, of the greatest fortunes, and the greatest fame, the most public lovers of their country, and most earnest supporters of the liberty of the subject, that this kingdom hath? How different the reputation of the principal ringleaders of this faction and rebellion is, how careful they are of employing virtuous and honest men, is apparent to all the world; when they have entertained all the desperate and necessitous persons (whereof many are Papists, which we speak knowingly as having taken several of them prisoner) they can draw to them; and when they are proceeding at the common law, for an odious and infamous crime, that Mr. Gillen says liberty to keep them company in this rebellion.—For our affection and gracious inclination to the city of London, and how far we are from any such purpose as these impious men charge us with, appears in our late Proclamation; in which we declare the suburbs to be comprehended, as well as the cities of London and Westminster; to which we doubt not they will give that credit and obedience, as we shall have cause to commend their loyalty in joining with us to suppress this rebellion; which, untroubled, in a short time must make that place most miserable.—For the Oath and Covenant which they threaten us with; if it be to engage them to do, or not to do, any thing contrary to the Oaths they have already taken of Allegiance and Supremacy; as it cannot oblige them being taken, so we doubt not our good subjects will easily discern that it is a snare to betray and lead them into a condition of the same guilt, and so of the same danger with themselves: and we must therefore declare, whosoever hereafter shall suffer himself to be cozened by those stratagems, and take such a voluntary oath against us, we shall impute it to so much malice, as will render him incapable of our pardon; and shall proceed against him as a desperate promoter of sedition, and an enemy to the kingdom.—Let all honest men remember the many gracious acts we have passed this parliament, for the ease and benefit of our people; that when there was nothing left undone or unoffered by us, which might make this nation happy, these mischievous contrivers of ruin, instead of acknowledging our grace and justice, upbraided us with all the reproaches malice and cunning could invent, in a Remonstrance to the people, a thing never heard of till that time; that having thus incensed mutinous and seditious minds, they made use of them to awe the parliament, driving us and the major part of both houses from our city of London; that they took away our fort and town of Hull from us, kept us from thence by force of arms, and employed our own magazine against us; that they seized upon our royal navy, and with it chased our good subjects, and kept all supply from us; that they voted away our negative voice, and then raised a formidable army to destroy us; that when they had thus compelled us to raise some power for our defence, (by the help of such of our good subjects, who, against the fury of these men, durst continue loyal) they absolutely and peremptorily refused to treat with us for the peace of the kingdom: And, lastly, That on the 23rd day of Oct. they brought this army (raised for the defence of our person) into the field against us; and used their best skill and means to destroy us and our children. We say, whoever remembers and considers this progress of theirs, will think of no other Covenant than to join with us in the apprehending the authors of this miserable Civil War; that posterity may not, with shame and indignation, find that a few schismatical ambitious persons were able to bring such a flourishing glorious kingdom, which hath so long resisted the envy of Christendom, to a speedy desolation, to satisfy their own pride and ambition.—And we doubt not our good subjects of Scotland will never think themselves engaged by the act of Pacification, (to which we willingly consented) to assist a rebellion against their own natural king, for the assistance of persons accused, and notoriously known to be guilty of high treason; the bringing of whom to condign punishment would, with God's blessing, be a speedy means of happiness and peace to our three kingdoms."

The King resolves to march towards London. The king, having by this time greatly augmented his army at Shrewsbury and the counties adjacent, left the earl of Essex behind him at Worcester, and resolved to march directly towards London. This resolution put both houses and the city into the utmost consternation; the parliament not only sent to their general to hasten after the king, but were endeavouring to raise another army, under the command of the earl of Warwick, to oppose him.

The Parliament and Citizens prepare for their Defence Oct. 24. Orders were given, requiring all manner of persons whatsoever, in London, Westminster, and Southwark, to shut up their shops, and forbear their trades; that so they might, with the greater freedom and diligence, for the present, attend the defence of the said places, and put in execution such Commands as they should from time to time receive from both houses of Parliament for that purpose. And, to secure themselves within doors, the house of commons had thought fit to require a Declaration from each of their Members, separately, That they would be assisting to the earl of Essex in this cause, with their lives and fortunes; and, as a testimony of it, to give or lend some money, immediately for that service.

An Ordinance of Parliament was read and agreed to, 'For making Provision for those that should be mimed in the present war, in the Service of the Parliament; and also for the Wives and Children of those that should be slain'

Oct. 25. An Order was made for putting the City Militia, &c. in motion; and another for allowing a maintenance to the king's youngest children, the duke of Gloucester and the princess Elizabeth, then at St. James's, out of his majesty's revenues, which the parliament had taken into their own hands.

Oct. 26. p.m. A Proclamation from the king, entered in the Lords Journal of this day, was read, but it is not mentioned who delivered it:

"C. R. His majesty, verily believing that many of his subjects, who are now in actual rebellion against him, are ignorant against whom they fight, is graciously pleased to promise free pardon to both officers and soldiers (except those that are, by name, proclaimed traitors) who shall lay down their arms and submit themselves to his majesty. We command you, Clarencieux king at arms, to pronounce this before the earl of Essex's army."

Relation of the Battle of Edge-hill. This day the lord Wharton made a relation of the Fight which had happened on Sunday last, the 23rd instant, between the Parliament's Forces and the King's, at a place between Warwick and Banbury, near a town called Keynton; and that it was conceived there were slain, of the king's party, 3000; and, on the parliament's side, not above 300. That the lord-general with his forces were retired to Warwick, and that the king's army was in those parts, but refused to meet the parliament's forces on the Monday before his excellency retired*.

Oct. 27. The lord Wharton signified to the lords; That the lord-general desired the relation of the Battle at Keynton might be made to the city of London, having found so much friendship from them to the parliament's cause. Herupon the house ordered the lord mayor to be sent to, to call a common-hall to meet this afternoon, at 5 o'clock; and an extraordinary committee of both houses to be appointed to go to the city, where the lord Wharton was to make the Relation to them. Accordingly a committee of 10 lords and 20 commoners was bent; some of whose speeches on this occasion, being preserved in a pamphlet of this time, and no where else that we know of, deserve our notice. We shall therefore give them in their own phrase and diction †.

The lord Wharton spoke thus:—My lord mayor, and you the aldermen and common council of this city; In a business of this very great consequence and concernment, it was very well known to my lord-general, that you could not but be full of great expectations; and my lord had, according to his duty, taken care for to give information to the parliament, who had sent him, of what had proceeded: In the very next place it was his particular respect to this city, to my lord mayor, the aldermen, the common council, and all the commons of this city, that they might likewise be acquainted with the success of that business; towards which they themselves had been at so much expences, and shewed so much love and kindness in all their proceedings for that purpose: And because letters might be uncertain, and might miscarry, there being great interception of them, the forces of the armies being close together, my lord thought fit to send Mr. Strode, a member of the house of commons, and myself: And certainly whatsoever shall be related by us to you, it will be good news, or else we should not willingly have undertaken the bringing of it; and for the truth of it, though we already hear that there are those that have so much malignity as to oppose it, yet the certainty of it will clear itself; and therefore there shall need no apologies to be made, but that which shall be said to you, shall be the truth, and nothing but the truth, in a very clear way of relation of what hath past.—Gentlemen, I shall open to you, as near as I can, as it comes within my memory, those circumstances which are worthy the taking notice of: And first, the Occasion why so many of the forces were not then upon the place; which you will find to be upon very good ground and reason, for the preservation of the counties that were behind, and of this city; which is the particular thing in the care, and now under the diligence of my lord-general to preserve. There was left at Hereford, which lies upon the confines of Wales, a regiment of foot under the command of my lord of Stamford, and a troop or two of horse: that the power of Wales might not fall in upon Gloucestershire and upon the river of Severn, and so upon the West. There was likewise left at Worcester (which you all know how it is seated upon the river of Severn, and what advantage it hath to intercept all force that shall come from Shrewsbury down into the West) a regiment of lord St. John and sir John Merrick's. There was, for the safety of Coventry (for that was a town it was likely the king might have fallen upon; the regiment of my lord Rochford; but it seems that his excellency the earl of Essex's army did so quickly come up to the king's, that his majesty thought it no way fit or advantageous for him to spend any time upon those places, for certainly they would have very quickly been relieved; so that the king stepped by Warwick and Coventry, which otherwise, we conceive they were towns he had as good an eye upon as any other towns in the whole kingdom, excepting this. There were likewise, occasioned by the suddenness of my lord's march, two regiments of foot, one under the command of a gentleman you all know, col. HAMPTON, and the other under the command of col. GRATHAM, with some 10 or 12 troops of horse, one day's march behind; bringing up some powder, ammunition, and artillery, which my lord would not stay for; purposely upon his diligence and desire that there should not be an hour lost in pursuing after that army, and that he might make all haste in coming up to this town: And his desire to make haste to keep with that army was such, that he kept, for 2 or 3 days together, a day's march before that army: and so, there being another regiment lodged in Banbury, occasionally for their own safety, there was with the earl, when this Battle was fought upon the Lord's Day, 11 regiments of foot, and about 35 or 40 troops of Horse. That which makes me say this to you, is partly for your satisfaction, that you may know the reason of the things that are past; and partly that you may give the more glory to God for his blessing, and for his preservation of that remnant of the army.—Upon the Saturday at night, after a very long march, for they came not in till 9 or 10 o'clock, the army came to Keynton; and the next morning, about 7, (though all that night there was news came that the king was going to Banbury) we had certain information and he was coming down a hill, called Edge-hill, which hath some advantage by nature for forts and broad works, and such things as those are; and the king's army that army which, being raised by his authority, was under the pretence of being raised for him and the parliament, but really against the parliament) coming down the hill, my lord of Essex presently drew out into the field; and drew his army into a place of as good advantage as possibly he could, though the other army had the advantage by the hill, which they were possessed of before; and, at the beginning of the day, the wind was against us, and was for the advantage of the other army. The preparation on both sides was for the making of them ready for fight, and the king's coming down the hill was so long, that there was nothing done till 4 in the afternoon. And, gentlemen, I shall tell you the worst as well as the best, that you may know all; and that when you have known the worst, you may find it in our judgments, to give the more praise to God for his mercy, after there was so little probability of any success.—After we had shot or 3 peices of ordinance, they began for to boot some of theirs; and truly, not long after, before there was any near execution, 3 or 4 of our regiments fairly ran away. I shall name you on the particulars, and afterwards name you those that did the extraordinary service, whereof you will find those of this city to have been very extraordinary instruments. There were that ran away, sir Wm. Fairfax's regiment, sir Henry Cholmley's, my lord Kimbolton's, and, to say the plain truth, my own.—Gentlemen, to see by this time, I am like to tell you the worst of every thing; but yet I must say this, that though they did so, I hope there will be a good number of them got together again, that may shew themselves in better condition, and better way of service than yet they have done: I hope so, and, by the blessing of God, it may be so, for they are but young soldiers; and we have some young soldiers that have, this last little, done very extraordinary and gallant service.—Not long after there was a charge upon the left wing of the horse, where I conceive there was a matter of 18 or 19 troops; and truly I cannot say they did so well as they should, though I hope there are not many of them cut off neither, but that they will be brought together again to do very good service hereafter; but so it is, they had the worst of it. By this you will see that, at the beginning of the day, we might think it would not prove so well as it pleased God it did afterwards in the close of the day; for four troops were divided, and one part of the horse was not in good order; but it pleased God now to shew himself, for after the king's horse had past the left wing of our horse, (I cannot say it was in my hands but God's own Providence) they went to the town where all our baggage was, the baggage of the officers and the private persons of the army, not they of the artillery, as the colonels cars and the captains cars, and such provision as that) and there they took a bait upon our pillage, and fell a plundering all the while the rest of the army was fighting; and indeed my lord-general had some more loss than ordinary, by some cloaths and money he had there; but we may thank God they were away, for thereby the rest of our army had better opportunity to do the service they did.—My lord-general himself, upon this extremity, did begin to shew himself to be more than an ordinary man, and indeed I think more than I have heard tell of any man; for he charged up at several times, once with his own troop of horse, as I remember; but I am sure with his own regiment of foot, which was raised here in Essex; and though so many ill passages happened before, yet by his own foresight and encouragement, and the encouragement of others, his troop of horse fell upon the king's own regiment, (which they had the most hopes of) called the Red Regiment; and, after a sore and bitter fight (for to give them their due, they fought very well, those of my lord of Essex's regiment I mean and those horse I spake of before) they killed the king's standard-bearer, sir Edmund Verney; also took the king's Standard which was raised up against the parliament, and brought it to my lord-general; and he delivered it to a servant, who was not so careful as he ought to have been; yet it was not re-taken by force, but by the carelessness and negligence of some persons: they took likewise the earl of Lindsey the king's general, prisoner, and carried him away; they took prisoner my lord-general's son, my lord Willoughby of Eresby; as also the person you have heard so much of, and been so well acquainted with here, col. Lausford, which should have had the Tower, he was likewise taken prisoner, and his brother slain; sir Edw. Stradling prisoner, and divers others of quality, as my lord Aubigny, col. Vavasour, and sir Edw. Murray, a Scotsman of great quality.—While these were upon this service, I must do justice to divers other of the officers of the horse, which were upon the right wing, that did extraordinary service too; that was my lord of Bedford himself, who did very gallantly; sir Wm. Balfour, the late lieutenant of the Tower, sir Philip Stapylton, and all the troop which formerly had been under some other kind of report, did extraordinary service, and kept entirely to their charge; and though they were long under the power of the other's canon, there being some 17 shot against them, they stood still; and, God be thanked, not a man of them hurt.—There was likewise very extraordinary service performed by my lord Grey and sir Arthur Haslerig, who indeed were a help to give a great turn to the day, by cutting off a regiment of the king's which was called the Blue Regiment; and there were many other gentlemen of great worth, that did very extraordinary service too. I would not have you understand that others did not do it, because I remember not their names, for I speak to you now but on the sudden;

only these I have named come now to my memory, and you will hear more of the rest upon other occasions.—Upon the close of the day, we knew it for certain that the best regiment of the king's was cut off, and his next best regiment, which was that under my lord of Lindsey; that there were all the prisoners taken and persons of quality slain I told you of; and we were informed by the countrymen, that saw them bury their dead next day, and bring them up into heaps, that there were about 3000 of theirs slain; and we cannot believe, nor we cannot have any information to give us reason to believe, that there were above 300 of ours slain.—It is to be observed of God's Providence in this day's work, that though it began so improbably, yet before the close of the night, which was two hours, (for they began to fight but about 4 o'clock) we had got the ground that they were upon; and had also got the wind of them; and we do not know, nor by information can conceive, that there were 20 men of ours killed by all the king's cannon.—And when it was night and there could be no more fighting, we drew our forces together, and so likewise did the king. They were then but at a reasonable distance, it may be three times, or six times the length, or some such distance, of this room; but in the night the forces of the king withdrew up towards the hill from whence they came: and my lord-general sent, amongst others, myself for to bring up those forces to him, which I told you were a day's march behind; these were col. Haunpden and col. Grantham and those troops of horse; and the artillery; and about one or two o'clock the next morning, they came to my lord-general, and joined with the rest of the army.—When the king had drawn his forces up the hill, my lord-general drew us a matter of three quarters of a mile, further from the hill, that he might be out of the power of their cannon; there we stood on our arms all the night, and in the morning, drew ourselves again into the field; but we heard no more news of the other army, more than we saw some scattering men, of some 3 or 4 troops of horse on the top of the Hill, which came to bury the dead, and to take away some of their cannon, and such things as those were; but they came no more down the hill, neither that day, nor on Tuesday; though there were divers reports came to us, in the army, and I believe came hither, that there was fighting on Monday and Tuesday: but, there was no fighting, for the king kept on the top of the hill; and we came away on Tuesday, at 4 o'clock; so that we can assure you there was no more action, than what was on the Lord's Day.—Gentlemen, now I have declared this Narration to you, I shall say no more than this, That certainly my lord-general himself hath deserved as much in this service, for his pains and care, and for the particular success that was upon it, as truly as, I think, ever any gentleman did; and in the next place, that as God of his own immediate providence did thus declare himself for the owing of his own cause, so you will not forget to apply yourselves to God, to give him the glory, and to intreat his blessing upon your future attempts."

Mr. Strode spoke next:—"Gentlemen all; As the noble lord hath told you, my lord-general sent him up to you to give you a clear information of what was done; and he hath given you so clear a one, that there is little left for me to say to you; only my attestation, and that is needless. Had that been all I should have said nothing; but in the enumeration of those regiments that did run away, and of his own, I must needs say thus much, that, when they were all away, he staid with us in the service all that night. This I hold my duty to this honourable person, since it was modesty in himself to say nothing.—I shall crave leave a little further to make you some observation, that as God did this great work, and we ascribe to him the honour, so you will look upon the persons by whom he did it. In the first place you have heard, when it was a thousand to one but that we had lost the day, by the running away of the troop of horse and the 4 regiments, that the general did draw up his own regiment; and that then did God begin, in them, to shew his own work; and not only in them, but by a regiment raised in Essex, another regiment raised in this city under the command of Mr. Hollis, and one regiment of my lord Brooke's which had the day upon them. These were the men that were, ignominiously, reproached by the name of 'Round-Heads'; but by these 'Round-Heads' did God shew himself a most glorious God: and truly, gentlemen, they that will report to you the number of our dead, farther than we have reported them to you, must find them many miles from the army; and then they were men that ran away so far, that it was no matter who killed them; for our men, killed any where about the place, we cannot find in all, or think of, above 300, and you will say they were well lost that run away; there were few lost of them that stood their ground, and they that were so lost were lost with honour: so that truly I can say no more to you, in such a cause as this, that you have undertaken with your purses and with your persons: God hath shewed himself with us; be you but courageous and we never need doubt it. And so we say all."

Then the earl of Pembroke said; "My lord mayor, and you gentlemen of the city; I am commanded, and the reason that makes me trouble you at this time with saying any thing, is by reason of a Letter I received from the committee, which I think, is a Letter of some consequence, and fitting for you to see; otherwise I am so ill a speaker, after such a declaration made to you, that I have not the boldness to say any thing to you; but truly though I say little, yet I have ever had so good a heart to this business, that I shall ever live and die in it.—Gentlemen; you have shewed yourselves like brave and noble citizens; you have acted with that nobleness, with that alacrity, with that love to God, king, and parliament, that none of your ancestors before ever shewed more love, nor care, nor zeal, nor performed better. I have only this to say to you, If the times are such, (not that I think there is any great peril in the king's army, now, for we have told you nothing but the truth) yet when you have seen this Letter, you will find there is very good cause for you to crown this work; which must be by following it with the same zeal, love, care, nobleness, and alacrity; which if you do, you may well crown yourselves with the name of a glorious city, and none more."

Here the Letter was read as follows: "To the earl of Cumberland, general of his majesty's Forces in the North: My very good lord; Your lordship's, of the 20th of this month, I have received by Stockdale, and have read it to his majesty; who willed me to signify to your lordship, that he is well pleased with your lordship's continuing of the sheriff in his place, albeit he sent a writ for his discharge. His majesty takes a special notice of your lordship's vigilancy and care in the trust he hath reposed in your lordship, as he hath, by many gracious expressions, declared at several times openly, upon conference of your business in that county. Your lordship's care of my lady duchess of Buckingham is, I assure you, very well taken by his majesty. Sir Ralph Hopton, and other gentlemen in the West, have raised 10,000 horse and foot, with which they have already disarmed all persons in Cornwall that are disaffected to the king: they have taken Lancaster, and are marching into Devonshire, to disarm the disaffected there, and so intend to come to meet the king at London. There are also in Wales about 6 or 7000 men levied for the king, which are to be under the marquis of Hertford, that will be ready upon all occasions to come to his majesty; but we hope he will not need their help, having given the earl of Essex such a blow, as they will make no haste again to adventure themselves in that cause against God's Anointed. Your &c. Edw. Nicholas. Edgscot, Northamp. Oct. 21, 1642."

After reading this Letter,

The earl of Holland said:—"My lord mayor, and you gentlemen of the city; It is more by obedience than confidence, that I say any thing to you at this time. That which I shall say to you, is to observe on the Relation that this noble lord hath made: in the first part of it what deliverance God hath sent you, that in a danger (and indeed such as, I am confident, all that were there believed the cause of religion, and liberty, and all lost) you saw what a present turn it had; such a one, as if it did not give us the victory, yet it gave us the advantage, that is certain; and truly a very great one, especially when it was taken from so unhappy a condition as we were likely to be in; wherein God hath shewed us what a danger might have fallen upon us: and certainly it is because every man should consider, in that danger, what he might have suffered, and what his cause might have suffered; and by this to give you all warning, that as he hath now begun to deliver you only by his hand, and by his power, he will expect that you will express such a thankfulness to him for it, as now to make his cause your work; and to do it with your hands boldly and with courage.—For by this Letter that you have heard read now, you see what is threatened against you: the least that you must expect as to this great army of the king's is, that certainly, by the disposition of those that command it, and have great power in it, they intend you no less (and that is to be believed) than the destroying of the city and your persons, and the preying upon your fortunes. This is not all; for you see if this doth not prevail, or be not powerful enough, an army must come from the West; you see the preparation of another in the North; from all parts of the kingdom the sword is drawn against you: and truly, having those ill intentions that they certainly have, it is the wisest course they can take; for in your city is the strength of the kingdom: indeed: it is not only the life but the soul of it: if they can destroy you here, the rest of the kingdom must all submit and yield; and, in that yielding, must give over the maintenance of all that is most dear to them."

Then lord Say and Sele made the following speech: "My lord and gentlemen, It cannot be doubted by what you have heard but that the intentions of these malignant, mischievous counsellors, and these men of desperate fortunes that they have gathered to them, and into whose hands they have put our king, are, that this rich and glorious city should be delivered up as a prey, as a reward, to them for their treason against the kingdom and the parliament; that your lives should satisfy their malice; your wives, your daughters their lust; and religion itself, the dearest thing of all others to us, should be made merchandize of to invite Papists, to invite foreigners.—Notwithstanding their intentions, let no man's heart be discouraged: you have power enough in your hands to bring all this wickedness upon their own heads, through God's blessing: if you will use your hands, if you will hold them up to serve your God, to defend the true religion of Almighty God, to defend your lives, to defend this kingdom and the parliament; you need not fear any thing that can be done by this broken army; nor fear those things that are here written in this Letter, nor those things that are falsely buzzed abroad by a Malignant Party in your city, to amaze you. There is no fear of danger, but in security, in sitting still; and therefore if you will be stirred up (as I cannot doubt, cannot imagine but you will) to do what every man, both by the law of God, and by the law of nature in this case, will be induced to do, through God's blessing, you shall both honour God, maintain the true religion, save this kingdom, save the parliament, and crown your good beginnings that God hath pleased to show himself unto us in.—This is not now a time for men to think with themselves, that they will be in their shops to get a little money: this is a time to do what you do in common dangers; let every man take his weapons in his hand; let him offer himself willingly to serve his God, and to maintain true religion. You may remember what God saith by the prophet, 'My heart is set upon those people that are willing to offer themselves willingly upon the high places;' let every man therefore shut up his shop, let him take his musket, let him offer himself readily and willingly; let him not think with himself, Who shall pay me? but rather think this, 'I will come forth to save the kingdom, to serve my God, to maintain his true religion, to save the parliament, to save this noble city; and when this danger is overcome, I will trust the state that they will have a regard unto whatsoever may be fit, either for my reparation in any loss, or for my reward.' Do as you do in common dangers, as when there is a house on fire; men ask not who shall pay them their day's wages; but every man comes forth of his doors; helps to quench the fire; brings a bucket, if he has one; borrows one of his neighbour, if he has not: when the fire is quenched then the city will regard to repair any man that has suffered all day. That do you; every one bring forth his arms, if he has any; if he has none, let him borrow them of his neighbour, or he shall be armed by the state; let every man arm himself and his apprentices, and come forth with boldness, and with courage, and with cheerfulness, and doubt not but God will assist you; for this is God's cause; and that should be your encouragement: they are Papists, they are Atheists, that come to destroy you: they come indeed, in the first and principal aim, to destroy religion: Papists are invited; they have commissions, are these the men that should defend the Protestant religion, when they are Papists and Recusants? If you shall come forth, God will go forth with you, he will fight for you, he will save you; but how? He will not save you without yourselves. You may remember what was said, 'Curse ye Meruz, because they came not out to help the Lord against the Mighty.' He needs not your help, but he will use your service, that he may bless you; and therefore let every man be encouraged, let him shew his readiness, let him shew his forwardness. Remember what the Scripture saith, 'Hear, O Israel, God is with you as long as ye are with him.' The Lord will be with you in this cause, for it is his cause; but then you must shew yourselves ready to be with him. But I need not use these speeches to those that have expressed, already, so much affection as you have done; I shall only encourage you to go on: be not therefore daunted; let not malignant parties, that go up and down, and would go about to inform you that there are these fears and these dangers, let them not, I say, make you be wanting to yourselves; fear them not at all. I shall conclude with this which the good king said, 'Up and be doing, and the Lord be with you.'

Then the Lord Wharton spoke again:—"Gentlemen, I shall trouble you but with a word or two; the one is upon part of that Narrative which I began withal; whereas, truly, I take myself to be very beholding to that gentleman that spoke after me, that he did not forget to inform you of the extraordinary blessing that God bestowed upon the courage of honest, pious, and religious men; for, truly, there was very few that did any extraordinary service, but such as had a mark of religion upon them. That which I omitted to tell you was this, That one great cause of our preservation, and of the success of that day, was the barbarousness and inhumanity of prince Rupert and his troops; who, while we were a-fighting, he only pillaged the baggage, (which was a poor employment!) but most barbarously killed the country men that came in with their teams, and women and children that were with them. This I think comes not amiss to tell you, because you may see what is the thing they aim at, which is pillage, and baggage, and plundering; and the way which they would come by it is murdering and destroying: and therefore it will come in very properly, to encourage you to that work, which the two noble lords have so well opened to you, which is the standing upon your defence."

The Earl of Holland concluded thus:—"My lord mayor and gentlemen; It is but a word or two that I shall say to you, for the shutting up of this business. The danger hath been represented to you, we must desire you likewise to consider how near it moves, so that you must resolve and act both together. We conceive this army will be at Oxford as this night, that is within such a distance as, within three days, they may march to London. It is very necessary for you to provide against this, as a danger that may be very suddenly upon you, if they should chance to march before our army; and with such an advantage as to break up bridges, or any such thing as may hinder our army to move presently and suddenly after them. Consider how open you are to this danger, if you provide not presently for it: therefore, as we have given you reasons, and indeed as you may take almost from your own reasons, to defend yourselves, it will be very necessary for you to look upon this as a danger, that will not allow the loss of an hour in providing against it: and that is all I shall say unto you."
